

THE Mennonite Encyclopedia

A Comprehensive Reference Work on the Anabaptist-Mennonite Movement

VOLUME IV

O—Z

Supplement

Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pennsylvania
Mennonite Publication Office, Newton, Kansas
Mennonite Brethren Publishing House, Hillsboro, Kansas

1959

66340

Copyright 1959 by
The Mennonite Publishing House
Scottdale, Pa.

Printed and Bound in
The United States of America by the Mennonite Publishing House
Scottdale, Pennsylvania

BX
8106
M547
V. 4
Ref.

BOARD OF EDITORS

Editors

Harold S. Bender, Dr. theol.
Goshen, Indiana

C. Henry Smith, Ph.D. (*1948)
Bluffton, Ohio

Associate Editor

Cornelius Krahn, Dr. theol.
North Newton, Kansas

Managing Editor

Melvin Gingerich, Ph.D.
Goshen, Indiana

Assistant Editors

Elizabeth Horsch Bender, M.A. P. C. Hiebert, M.A.
Goshen, Indiana Hillsboro, Kansas

Frank C. Peters, Ph.D.
Winnipeg, Manitoba

Ernest Crous, Dr. phil. A. E. Janzen, M.A.
Göttingen, Germany Hillsboro, Kansas

John G. Rempel
Saskatoon, Sask.

Robert Friedmann, Dr. phil. S. F. Pannabecker, Ph.D.
Kalamazoo, Michigan Elkhart, Indiana

John C. Wenger, Dr. theol.
Goshen, Indiana

N. van der Zijpp
Rotterdam, Netherlands

PUBLISHING COMMITTEE

Paul Erb, Chairman
Scottdale, Pa.

Willard Claassen, Secretary
Newton, Kansas

Orlando Harms
Hillsboro, Kansas

P. E. Schellenberg
Reedley, Cal.

Walter Unrau
Newton, Kansas

A. J. Metzler, Publishing Agent
Scottdale, Pa.

EDITORIAL COUNCIL

At Large

Roland H. Bainton, Ph.D.
New Haven, Connecticut

Ernst Correll, Dr. oec. publ.
Washington, D.C.

Franklin H. Littell, Ph.D.
Atlanta, Georgia

Fritz Blanke, Dr. theol.
Zürich, Switzerland

Elmer E. S. Johnson, Ph.D. (*1959)
Hereford, Pennsylvania

Wilhelm Pauck, Dr. theol.
New York, N.Y.

European and Latin-American Areas

France

Pierre Sommer (*1952) and Pierre Widmer
Grand Charmont, Doubs

Germany

Ernst Crous, Dr. phil.
Göttingen

Netherlands

N. van der Zijpp
Rotterdam

Russia

B. H. Unruh, Dr. theol. (*1959)
Karlsruhe, Germany

Switzerland

Samuel Geiser
Brügg bei Biel

Brazil

Peter Klassen
Curitiba, Parana

Paraguay

Nikolai Siemens (*1957)
Filadelfia, Chaco

North American Mennonite Groups

General Conference

J. Herbert Fretz, B.D.
Freeman, S.D.
J. W. Fretz, Ph.D.
North Newton, Kan.
Delbert L. Gratz, Dr. phil.
Bluffton, Ohio
J. H. Janzen (*1950)
Waterloo, Ont.
Ed. G. Kaufman, Ph.D.
North Newton, Kan.
C. E. Krehbiel (*1948)
Newton, Kan.
Paul J. Schäfer, B.A.
Gretna, Man.
J. D. Unruh, Ph.D.
Freeman, S.D.
W. B. Weaver, M.A.
Bloomington, Ill.

Mennonite Church

S. F. Coffman (*1954)
Vineland, Ont.
Paul Erb, M.A.
Scottdale, Pa.
G. F. Hershberger, Ph.D.
Goshen, Ind.
Milo Kauffman, Th.M.
Hesston, Kan.
Ira D. Landis, B.S.
Bareville, Pa.
C. K. Lehman, Th.D.
Harrisonburg, Va.
John Umble, M.A.
Goshen, Ind.
S. C. Yoder, S.T.D.
Goshen, Ind.

Old Order Amish Mennonites

Eli J. Bontreger (*1958)
Shipshewana, Ind.
L. A. Miller
Arthur, Ill.

United Missionary Church

J. A. Huffman, B.D.
Winona Lake, Ind.
Everek R. Storms, M.A.
Kitchener, Ont.

Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde)

David P. Reimer
Giroux, Man.

Evangelical Mennonites

Reuben Short
Archbold, Ohio

Evangelical Mennonite Brethren

Orlando Wiebe, B.A.
Omaha, Neb.

Bergthal Mennonites

H. H. Hamm
Altona, Man.

Hutterian Brethren

David Decker
Olivet, S.D.
E. C. H. Arnold
Farmington, Pa.

Mennonite Brethren

Orlando Harms, B.A.
Hillsboro, Kan.
P. N. Hiebert, B.A.
Bakersfield, Cal.
B. B. Janz
Coaldale, Alta.
P. E. Schellenberg, Ph.D.
North Newton, Kan.
Aron A. Toews
Abbotsford, B.C.
A. H. Unruh
Winnipeg, Man.

Krimmer Mennonite Brethren

C. F. Plett, Th.D.
Doland, S.D.

Church of God in Christ, Mennonite

P. G. Hiebert
Atmore, Ala.

Conservative Mennonites

Elmer G. Swartzendruber
Wellman, Iowa

PREFACE

The plans for the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA, which were first projected in 1945, almost fourteen years ago, have now been realized with the appearance of this final fourth volume. In addition to the Board of Editors and the Publishing Committee, a large staff of co-workers and writers in America and Europe have contributed to making this dream a reality, and it is fitting that due recognition be given them. The editors have drawn heavily on the German forerunner, Mennonitisches Lexikon, which began before World War I and has now been published to include the letter R; the unpublished material from S to Z assembled by the editors Hege and Neff has been fully available. Ernst Crous, the chief Lexikon editor since 1945, with his wife Rose Crous, have been most helpful in editing this material. However, in many areas the editors of the ENCYCLOPEDIA have had to pioneer. This has been particularly the case in connection with Mennonitism on the North and South American continents as well as in the new mission areas. But it applies also in specialized fields of interest, such as culture, economics, education, ethics, sociology, theology, and piety, which were little noticed by the Lexikon, but which are of major significance in understanding both Anabaptism and modern Mennonitism.

The development of Anabaptist studies has been so rapid and so extensive that it has not been possible to exploit to the full the scholarly production in this field, whether in published form or in unpublished manuscripts such as doctoral dissertations. The editors regret that limitations of space as well as of personnel have also restricted this exploitation. The ENCYCLOPEDIA has assembled a vast amount of information on Anabaptism: biographies, regional and local geographical surveys, theological and ethical essays, etc., but an exhaustive report has proved to be impossible. The student need only inspect the indexes of persons and places of the various volumes of the Täufer-Akten series, appearing since 1930 and still incomplete, as well as the older comprehensive regional treatments such as those by Wappler and Rembert and the Hutterite Chronicle, to learn how many known Anabaptist persons, as well as places where Anabaptism appeared, are not treated by the ENCYCLOPEDIA. A number of younger scholars who have done major research on Anabaptism have contributed substantially to the strengthening of this part of the ENCYCLOPEDIA. The older Swiss Mennonite historian, Samuel Geiser, should also be mentioned.

The primary regional editors have done outstanding work. N. van der Zijpp, of Rotterdam, the editor responsible for the Netherlands, has written most of the numerous articles for this area. He has in effect produced an encyclopedia of the Dutch Doopsgezinden. Ernst Crous has had the responsibility for Germany, and contributed a considerable number of major and minor articles. Robert Friedmann has written or revised almost all of the articles pertaining to the Anabaptists of the former Austro-Hungarian empire and to the Hutterites throughout the centuries, but his contribution was by no means limited to these areas, as was also the case with van der Zijpp for Holland. Cornelius Krahn, Associate Editor, in addition to sharing the responsibility of editing and proofreading the entire ENCYCLOPEDIA, was responsible for Mennonitism in Russia, as well as for a considerable part of its descendant elements in America, and was also concerned for its antecedents in West and East Prussia and ultimately Holland. He wrote articles in this general area, as well as almost all the articles for Russia, and has produced an exhaustive report on Mennonitism in Russia. Harold S. Bender, Editor, has in addition to the over-all responsibility for the ENCYCLOPEDIA written many of the major general articles, done the final editing of all the articles, and carried particular responsibility for the Swiss-South German stream of Anabaptism-Mennonitism in Europe and America. His wife, Elizabeth Horsch Bender, has had a major role both by her singlehanded translation of all the material used from the Lexikon and by serving as general copy editor and editorial proofreader. Melvin Gingrich, Managing Editor, has contributed numerous articles on the American scene.

The chief editorial office of the ENCYCLOPEDIA has been located on the Goshen College campus at Goshen, Ind., adjacent to the Mennonite Historical Library of the Goshen College Biblical Seminary, whose extraordinary and indispensable resources were made constantly and fully available by its curator, Nelson Springer, whose competent assistance is here gratefully acknowledged. The office of the associate editor, Cornelius Krähn, was located on the Bethel College campus at North Newton, Kan., similarly adjacent to a rich Mennonite Historical Library, of which he has been the long-time director. The Dutch editor is fortunately also the librarian of the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, which is unusually strong in Dutch Anabaptist-Mennonite materials. And the library of the Göttingen Mennonite Research Center has been of much value to the German editor, who has been its director from the beginning. Miss Liesel Widmer, now of Basel, Switzerland, gave two years of service as head of the ENCYCLOPEDIA office, part of the time doing much of the work of the managing editor who was in Japan 1955-57. John A. Hostetler served in the office in the early stages.

Over twenty-seven hundred writers have contributed, many of them furnishing only one article, but some furnishing a great many. Two of these writers have been outstanding in their contributions: Ira D. Landis, the historian of the large Lancaster Mennonite Conference, who handled his area with devoted care, and J. H. Lohrenz, who wrote many articles for the Mennonite Brethren.

At the Mennonite Publishing House where the printing was done, Ellrose D. Zook should be mentioned as the chief of the editorial department who piloted the large printing operation through successfully. Also deserving mention are the three artists who did the extensive map work, Ivan Moon (in major part), Joseph Alderfer, and Jan Gleysteen. Beulah Loucks, copy editor, and Laura Showalter, proofreader, were constantly careful for professional quality.

Some articles which should have been included in the regular alphabet were overlooked or received too late for inclusion. These have been incorporated into a Supplement found at the close of this volume. Users of the ENCYCLOPEDIA will kindly take this into consideration as they look for desired materials. In addition to this, corrections and additions for the articles of all four volumes have been grouped in one compact section at the very end of Volume IV.

The list of "Maps and Illustrations" in this volume (page x) gives exact information as to what maps can be found in the four volumes and where they are located. The final list has been modified slightly, compared to its earlier appearances. The "Key to Symbols for Writers" is found at the beginning of each volume. In a few cases the authors of articles taken from the Lexikon could not be identified. The only index provided is one listing the articles dealing with Anabaptism, omitting the very short martyr articles.

Harold S. Bender, Editor

Cornelius Krähn, Associate Editor

KEY TO SYMBOLS AND ABBREVIATIONS

A. Symbols Used for the North American Mennonite Bodies

Church of God in Christ, Mennonite	(CGC)	Krimmer Mennonite Brethren	(KMB)
Conservative (Amish) Mennonite	(CAM)	Mennonite Brethren Church	(MB)
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren	(EMB)	Mennonite Brethren in Christ	(MBC)
Evangelical Mennonite Church	(EMC)	Mennonite Church	(MC)
Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde)	(EMC, KG)	Old Order Amish Mennonite Church	(OOA)
General Conference Mennonite Church	(GCM)	Old Order Mennonite Church	(OOM)
		United Missionary Church	(UMC)

B. Geographical Abbreviations

States of the United States of America				Countries	Provinces of Canada
Cal.	California	N.D.	North Dakota	Can.	Canada	Alta.	Alberta
Col.	Colorado	N.Y.	New York	Ger.	Germany	B.C.	British Columbia
Ill.	Illinois	Okla.	Oklahoma	Neth.	Netherlands	Man.	Manitoba
Ind.	Indiana	Ore.	Oregon	Par.	Paraguay	Ont.	Ontario
Kan.	Kansas	Pa.	Pennsylvania	P.R.	Puerto Rico	Sask.	Saskatchewan
Minn.	Minnesota	S.D.	South Dakota	Sw.	Switzerland	Other
Mo.	Missouri	Va.	Virginia	U.S.	United States	Co.	County
Neb.	Nebraska					N.A.	North America
						Twp.	Township

C. Bibliographical Symbols

- ADB Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie 56v. (Leipzig, 1875-1912)
- Beck, Geschichts-Bücher Josef Beck, Die Geschichts-Bücher der Wiedertäufer in Oesterreich-Ungarn (Vienna, 1883)
- Bender, Two Centuries H. S. Bender, Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature, A Bibliography of Mennonitica Americana 1727-1928 (Goshen, 1929)
- Bibliographie des Martyrologes F. Vander Haeghen, Th. Arnold, and R. Vanden Berghe, Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais. II. Recueils (The Hague, 1890)
- Biogr. Wb. H. Visscher and L. A. van Langeraad, Biographisch Woordenboek van Protestantische Godgeleerden in Nederland, A-L (I, Utrecht), later by J. P. de Bie and J. Loosjes (II, III, IV, V, and installment #29, The Hague) 1903-
- Blaupot t. C., Friesland Steven Blaupot ten Cate, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1839)
- Blaupot t. C., Groningen . . . Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland, 2v. (Leeuwarden, 1842)
- Blaupot t. C., Holland . . . Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht en Gelderland, 2v. (Amsterdam, 1847)
- BRN S. Cramer and F. Pijper, Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, 10v. (The Hague, 1903-14)
- Catalogus Amst. Catalogus der werken over de Doopsgezinden en hunne geschiedenis aanwezig in de bibliotheek der Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Amsterdam (Amst., 1919)
- DB Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (Amsterdam, 1861-1919)
- DJ Doopsgezind Jaarboekje vv. 1-48 (Assen, et al., 1901-43, 1949-)
- Dirks, Statistik Heinrich Dirks, Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland Ende 1905 (Anhang zum Mennonitischen Jahrbuche 1904/05). Gesammelt von Heinrich Dirks, Prediger der Gnadenfelder Gemeinde (Gnadenfeld, 1906).
- Friesen, Bruderschaft P. M. Friesen, Die Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Bruderschaft in Russland (1789-1910) im Rahmen der mennonitischen Gesamtgeschichte (Halbstadt, 1911)
- Gbl. Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten vv. 1-85 (Sinsheim, later Karlsruhe, 1870-)
- Gem.-Kal. Mennonitischer Gemeinde-Kalender (formerly Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender) (various places, chiefly Kaiserslautern, Weierhof, Karlsruhe, 1892-)
- Gesch.-Bl. Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter. Herausgegeben vom Mennonitischen Geschichtsverein (Frankfurt, later Karlsruhe, 1936-40, 1951-)
- Grosheide, Bijdrage Greta Grosheide, Bijdrage tot de geschiedenis der Anabaptisten in Amsterdam (Hilversum, 1938)

- Grosheide, Verhooren . . . Verhooren en Vonissen der Wederdoopers, betrokken bij de aanslagen op Amsterdam in 1534 en 1535, in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap, Vol. XLI (Amsterdam, 1920)
- HRE Herzog-Hauck, Realencyclopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche, 24v. (3.ed., Leipzig, 1896-1913)
- Inv. Arch. Amst. J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Inventaris der Archiefstukken berustende bij de Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Amsterdam, 2v. (Amsterdam, 1883-84)
- Kühler, Geschiedenis I W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden in de Zestiende Eeuw (Haarlem, 1932)
- Kühler, Geschiedenis II,1 Idem, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland II. 1600-1735 Eerste Helft (Haarlem, 1940)
- Kühler, Geschiedenis II,2 Idem, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland: Gemeentelijk Leven 1650-1735 (Haarlem, 1950)
- Lietboecxken Een Lietboecxken, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren, contained in Het Offer des Heeren (see Offer)
- Loserth, Anabaptismus Johann Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892)
- Loserth, Communismus Idem, Der Communismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert: Beiträge zu ihrer Lehre, Geschichte und Verfassung (Archiv für österreichische Geschichte, Vol. LXXXI, 1, 1895)
- Mart. Mir. D(utch) Tileman Jansz van Braght, Het Bloedigh Tooneel of Martelaers Spiegel der Doops-gesinde of Weereeloose Christenen, Die om 't getuygenis van Jesus haren Salighmaker geleden hebben ende gedood zijn van Christi tijd af tot desen tijd toe. Den Tweeden Druk (Amsterdam, 1685), Part II
- Mart. Mir. E(nglish) Idem, The Bloody Theatre or Martyrs' Mirror of the Defenseless Christians Who Baptized Only upon Confession of Faith and Who Suffered and Died for the Testimony of Jesus Their Saviour . . . to the Year A.D. 1660 (Scottsdale, Pa., 1951)
- ME Mennonite Encyclopedia (I, 1955; II, 1956; III, 1957; IV, 1959)
- Mellink, Wederdopers A. F. Mellink, De Wederdopers in de noordelijke Nederlanden 1531-1544 (Groningen, 1954)
- Menn. Bl. Mennonitische Blätter vv. 1-88 (1854-1941), published variously at Danzig, Hamburg-Altona, and Elbing (W. Prussia)
- MHB Mennonite Historical Bulletin (Scottsdale, Pa.; 1940-)
- Menn. Life Mennonite Life (North Newton, Kan., 1946-)
- ML Christian Hege and Christian Neff, Mennonitisches Lexikon, 3v., A-R (Frankfurt and Weierhof; I, 1913; II, 1937; III, #31-36, 1938-42; #37-42 at Karlsruhe, 1951-58) et seq.
- Menno Simons, Opera Opera Omnia Theologica, of alle de Godtgeleerde wercken van Menno Simons (Amsterdam, 1681)
- Menno Simons, Writings The Complete Writings of Menno Simons c. 1496-1561. Translated from the Dutch by Leonard Verduin (Scottsdale, 1956)
- MQR Mennonite Quarterly Review (Goshen, Ind., 1927-)
- Müller, Berner Täufer Ernst Müller, Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (Frauenfeld, 1895)
- Naamlijst Naamlijst der tegenwoordig in dienst zijnde predikanten der Mennoniten in de vereenigde Nederlanden (Amsterdam, 1731, 1743, 1755, 1757, 1766, 1769, 1775, 1780, 1782, 1784, 1786, 1787, 1789, 1791, 1793, 1802, 1804, 1806, 1808, 1810, 1815, 1829)
- N.N.B.Wb. P. C. Molhuysen and P. J. Blok, Nieuw Nederlandsch Biografisch Woordenboek vv. 1-10 (Leiden, 1911-37)
- Offer Dit Boec wort genoemt: Het Offer des Heeren, om het inhoud van sommige opgeofferde kinderen Gods . . . (n.p., 1562, 1567, 1570, 1578, 1580, Amsterdam, 1590, n.p., 1591, Amsterdam, 1595, Harlingen, 1599). The 1570 edition is cited as reproduced in BRN II, 51-486, including Een Lietboecxken, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren (pp. 499-617)
- Reimer, Familiennamen Gustav E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940)
- Rembert, Wiedertäufer Karl Rembert, Die "Wiedertäufer" im Herzogtum Jülich (Berlin, 1899)
- RGD Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (2.ed., 5v., Tübingen, 1927-32)
- Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis I Hermanus Schijn, Geschiedenis dier Christenen, welke in de Vereenigde Nederlanden onder de Protestanten Mennoniten genaamd worden . . . Tweede Druk op nieuws uit het Latyn vertaald, en vermeerderd door Gerardus Maatschoen (Amsterdam, 1743)

- Schijs-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, which is volume II of the preceding work, entitled Uitvoering Verhandeling van de Geschiedenisse der Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1744)
- Schijs-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, which is volume III of the preceding work, entitled Aanhangzel Dienende tot den Vervolg of Derde Deel van de Geschiedenis der Mennoniten . . . in het welke noch Negentien Leeraars der Mennoniten . . ., by Maatschoen alone (Amsterdam, 1745)
- TA Baden-Pfalz M. Krebs, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer. IV. Band, Baden und Pfalz (Gütersloh, 1951)
- TA Bayern I Karl Schornbaum, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer II. Band, Markgraftum Brandenburg (Bayern I. Abteilung) (Leipzig, 1934)
- TA Bayern II Idem, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer, V. Band (Bayern, II. Abteilung) (Gütersloh, 1951)
- TA Hessen G. Franz, Urkundliche Quellen zur hessischen Reformationsgeschichte. Vierter Band, Wiedertäuferakten 1527-1626 (Marburg, 1951)
- TA Württemberg G. Bossert, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer I. Band, Herzogtum Württemberg (Leipzig, 1930)
- TA Zürich L. von Muralt und W. Schmid, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz. Erster Band Zürich (Zürich, 1952)
- Unruh, Hintergründe B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen im 16., 18. und 19. Jahrhundert (Karlsruhe-Rüppurr, 1955)
- Verheyden, Brugge A. L. E. Verheyden, Het Brugsche Martyrologium (12 October 1527-7 Augustus 1573) (Brussels, n.d., [1944])
- Verheyden, Courtrai Idem, Le Martyrologe Courtraisien et la Martyrologe Bruxellois (Vilvorde, 1950)
- Verheyden, Gent Idem, Het Gentsche Martyrologium (1530-1595) (Brugge, 1946)
- Vos, Antwerpen Karel Vos, De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de zestiende eeuw (reprint from Bulletin de la Commission Royale de Belgique LXXXIV, Brussels, 1920)
- Vos, Menno Simons . . . Menno Simons, 1496-1561, zijn leven en werken en zijne reformatorische denkbeelden (Leiden, 1914)
- Wackernagel, Kirchenlied Philipp Wackernagel, Das deutsche Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des XVII. Jahrhunderts, 5v. (Leipzig, 1864-77)
- Wackernagel, Lieder Idem, Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt, 1867)
- Wappler, Thüringen Paul Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913)
- Wiswedel, Bilder W. Wiswedel, Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täuferium, 3v. (Kassel, I, 1928; II, 1930; III, 1952)
- Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch Rudolf Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch der Hutterischen Brüder (Macleod, Alta., and Vienna, 1923)
- Wolkan, Lieder Idem, Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1903)
- Zieglschmid, Chronik A. J. F. Zieglschmid, Die älteste Chronik der Hutterischen Brüder: Ein Sprachdenkmal aus frühneuhochdeutscher Zeit (Ithaca, 1943)
- Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch Idem, Das Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (Philadelphia, 1947)

D. Other Symbols and Abbreviations

- A.D.S. Algemene Doopsgezinde Societeit. MCC Mennonite Central Committee
- Vereinigung Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden
- Verband Verband badisch-württembergisch-bayrischer Mennonitengemeinden e. V.
- CPS Civilian Public Service. KfK Kommission für kirchliche Angelegenheiten (or Kirchenangelegenheiten). CO Conscientious objector to military service.
- q.v. "quod vide," "which see," is a cross-reference indicating that an article on the subject is to be found in the regular alphabetical order.

* signifies deceased. † indicates that an illustration will be found in the pictorial section at the end of the volume.

AML Amsterdam Mennonite Library

BeCL Bethel College Historical Library; GCL Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library

MAPS AND ILLUSTRATIONS

The maps listed below will generally be found close to the articles they serve. Illustrations are grouped at the end of each volume. This final list of maps differs slightly from the lists published in the first three volumes. For a complete list of illustrations in Volume IV, see the Illustration section at the end of the volume, pp. 1 f.

ALPHABETICAL INDEX OF MAPS, VOLUMES I-IV

Africa, Mennonite Mission	I, 22	Indiana	III, 24
Alberta	I, 32	Indonesia	III, 32
Alexandertal Settlement, Samara, Russia	I, 47	Iowa	III, 49
Allen and Putnam Counties, Ohio	I, 56	Japan	III, 97
Alsace, Upper, France	I, 67	Johnson, Iowa, Washington and Henry Counties, Iowa	III, 116
Alternative Service Camps (Canada)	I, 606	Kansas	III, 144
Amish, Old Order Communities	I, 94	Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church	III, 243
Argentina	I, 155	Lancaster County, Pa.	III, 272-73
Asia, Central (following Siberia)	IV, 518	Luxembourg	III, 423
Austria, 16th Century Anabaptism	I, 194	Manitoba	III, 458-59
Barnaul Settlement, Siberia	I, 235	Maryland and Delaware	III, 533
Belgium, 16th Century Anabaptism	I, 270	Memrik Settlement, Russia	III, 570
Bern Canton, Switzerland	I, 288	Mennonite Brethren Church, N.A.	III, 596
Brazil and Adjacent Areas	I, 409	Mennonite Church, N.A.	III, 610
British Columbia	I, 430	Mexico, Mennonite Settlements	III, 663
Bucks and Montgomery Counties, Pa.	I, 462	Michigan	III, 673
California	I, 492	Mifflin County, Pa.	III, 683
Canada	I, 502	Missouri	III, 718
Caucasus, Russia	I, 536	Molotschna Settlement, Russia	III, 733
Chaco, Paraguay, Mennonite Colonies	I, 546	Montana (with Washington)	IV, 893
Chicago, Illinois	I, 555	Nebraska	III, 816
China, Mennonite Missions	I, 561	Netherlands	III, 825
Chortitza Settlement, Russia	I, 572	New York	III, 864
Church of God in Christ, Mennonite	I, 599	North Holland Province, Netherlands	III, 918
Civilian Public Service, Mennonite, U.S.	I, 605	Ohio	IV, 6
Congo, Belgian, Mennonite Missions	I, 690	Oklahoma	IV, 34
Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church	I, 701	Ontario	IV, 62
Cottonwood County, Minnesota	I, 722	Oregon (with Washington)	IV, 893
Danzig, Free City of	II, 8	Orenburg Settlement, Russia	IV, 76
Delaware (with Maryland)	III, 533	Palatinate, Germany	IV, 107
East Reserve Settlement, Manitoba	II, 126	Paraguay (see Chaco)	I, 546
Elkhart and Lagrange Counties, Indiana	II, 188	Pennsylvania	IV, 137
Emmental Region, Switzerland	II, 206	Rhine, Lower	IV, 318
Europe, Anabaptism in 1550	II, 256	Rockingham County, Va.	IV, 348
Europe, Mennonitism in 1938	II, 257	Russia, European	IV, 381-82
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren and Evangelical Mennonites	II, 263	San Joaquin Valley, Cal.	IV, 413
Far East, Mennonitism in 1955	II, 302	Saskatchewan	IV, 424
France	II, 360	Siberia	IV, 518
Fraser River Valley, British Columbia	II, 381	Somerset County, Pa., and Garrett County, Maryland	IV, 573
Friesland Province, Netherlands	II, 408	South Dakota, Eastern	IV, 585
Galicia	II, 434	Switzerland, 16th Century Anabaptism	IV, 674
General Conference Mennonite Church, N.A.	II, 466	Tazewell, Woodford, and McLean Counties, Ill.	IV, 689
Germany, West (in two parts)	II, 484	Terek Settlement, Russia	IV, 695
Groningen Province, Netherlands	II, 588	Trakt Settlement, Russia	IV, 742
Harvey County, Kan., and Adjacent Area	II, 672	Ukraine, Russia	IV, 764
Holmes County, Ohio	II, 793	United States, All Mennonites	IV, 778-79
Hutterites in Canada and U.S. (two maps)	II, 863-64	Virginia	IV, 830-31
Hutterites in Moravia, Slovakia, and Transylvania	II, 860	Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana	IV, 893
Hutterites in Slovakia (enlarged)	II, 861	Waterloo County, Ontario	IV, 897
Hutterites in the Ukraine	II, 861	Wayne County, Ohio	IV, 901
Idaho (with Washington)	IV, 893	West and East Prussia (Germany) and Poland	IV, 921
Illinois	III, 7	West Reserve Settlement, Manitoba	IV, 928
India, Mennonite Missions and Churches	III, 21

KEY TO SYMBOLS FOR WRITERS IN VOLUME IV

Abrahams, David, Headingly, Man.	D.Ab.	Dahlenberg, Paul, Bridgewater, S.D.	P.Da.
Adrian, J. S., Swift Current, Sask.	J.S.Ad.	Decker, David, Olivet, S.D.	D.D.
Alwine, David C., Johnstown, Pa.	D.C.A.	*Dedic, Paul, Graz, Austria	P.De.
Andres, F. J., St. Catharines, Ont.	F.J.A.	Detweiler, Richard C., Perkasie, Pa.	R.C.D.
Andres, H. J., North Newton, Kan.	H.J.A.	DeWind, Henry A., Whitewater, Wis.	DeWind
Arnold, E. C. H., Farmington, Pa.	E.C.H.A.	Dick, A. A., Mountain Lake, Minn.	A.A.D.
Aschliman, Freeman, Toledo, O.	F.W.A.	Dick, H. H., Mountain Lake, Minn.	H.H.Di.
Augsburger, Myron S., Harrisonburg, Va.	M.S.A.	Dick, Karl, Wolf Point, Mont.	K.D.
Badertscher, Ivan L., Orrville, O.	I.L.B.	Diener, Charles, Canton, Kan.	C.D.
Baer, Joseph F., Sarasota, Fla.	J.F.B.	Diener, Harry A., Hutchinson, Kan.	H.A.D.
Baer, Paul E., Royersford, Pa.	P.E.B.	Dirks, Albert, Scott City, Kan.	A.Di.
Bainton, Roland H., New Haven, Conn.	R.H.B.	Dirks, David J., Sun Valley, Cal.	D.J.D.
Barkman, J. F., Steinbach, Man.	J.F.Ba.	*Driver, Joseph R., Waynesboro, Va.	J.R.D.
Bartel, John, Shafter, Cal.	J.Ba.	Duerksen, A. R., Bluffton, O.	A.R.D.
*Basinger, Elmer, Mt. Pleasant, Iowa	E.B.	Duerksen, Jacob A., Washington, D.C.	J.A.D.
Bauman, Harold E., Goshen, Ind.	H.B.	Duerksen, John W., Premont, Tex.	J.W.D.
Beachy, Claude R., Grantsville, Md.	C.R.B.	Dyck, Cornelius J., Elkhart, Ind.	C.J.D.
Becker, Alvin G., Woodburn, Ind.	A.G.B.	Dyck, H. H., Mountain Lake, Minn.	H.H.D.
Becker, Eduard, Darmstadt, Ger.	Ed.B.	Dyck, Peter J., Frankfurt, Ger.	P.J.D.
Bender, Allen, Baden, Ont.	A.Be.	*Dyck, Peter P., Rosemary, Alta.	P.P.D.
Bender, Elizabeth Horsch, Goshen, Ind.	E.H.B.	Dyck, Walter J., Richfield, Pa.	W.J.D.
Bender, Ezra C., Martinsburg, Pa.	E.C.B.	Eash, Samuel T., Middlebury, Ind.	S.T.E.
Bender, Harold S., Goshen, Ind.	H.S.B.	Ebersole, Myron, Newton, Kan.	M.Eb.
Bender, Ross T., Kitchener, Ont.	R.T.B.	Ediger, Elmer, N. Newton, Kan.	E.Ed.
*Berg, P. H., Hillsboro, Kan.	P.H.B.	Eicher, William R., Milford, Neb.	W.R.E.
Bittinger, Elmer E., Spring, Pa.	E.E.B.	Enns, J. H., Winnipeg, Man.	J.H.En.
Blanke, Fritz, Zürich, Sw.	F.Bl.	Enns, William H., Springstein, Man.	W.H.E.
Block, John A., Waldheim, Sask.	J.A.Bl.	Ensz, H. A., Inman, Kan.	H.A.E.
*Block, Theodor, Oberursel, Ger.	T.B.	Epp, August, Newton, Kan.	Au.E.
Boese, Curt D., Walton, Kans.	C.D.B.	Epp, A. W., Fairview, Okla.	A.W.E.
Bontrager, John M., Centerville, Mich.	J.M.B.	*Epp, David H., Chortitza, Russia	D.H.E.
Bontrager, J. P., Winton, Cal.	J.P.Bo.	Epp, Frank H., Altona, Man.	F.H.E.
*Bontreger, Eli J., Shipshewana, Ind.	E.J.B.	Epp, G. G., Rosthern, Sask.	G.G.E.
Bontreger, Manasseh E., Calico Rock, Ark.	M.E.B.	Epp, H. F., Mountain Lake, Minn.	H.F.E.
Borntrager, Lillie, Bloomfield, Mont.	L.B.	Epp, Hans P., Colonia Volendam, Paraguay	H.P.E.
Bos, C. A. W., Rotterdam, Neth.	C.A.W.B.	Epp, Henry P., Waterloo, Ont.	H.P.Ep.
*Bossert, Gustav, Jr., Stuttgart, Ger.	G.Bos.	*Epp, J. H., Hepburn, Sask.	J.H.E.
Bowman, H. E., Springfield, O.	H.E.Bo.	Erb, Paul, Scottdale, Pa.	P.E.
Braun, Abraham, Nierstein, Ger.	A.B.	Esau, John T., Crooked Creek, Alta.	J.T.E.
Brenneman, T. H., Sarasota, Fla.	T.H.B.	Esch, Ben, Tiskilwa, Ill.	B.Es.
Bricker, Samuel L., Chambersburg, Pa.	S.L.B.	Esh, Glenn, Akron, Pa.	G.Es.
Brown, Peter, Winkler, Man.	P.Br.	Esh, Jacob D., Glendale, Ariz.	J.D.E.
Buckwalter, Earl, Hesston, Kan.	E.Bu.	Falk, William H., Altona, Man.	W.H.F.
Buckwalter, Harry R., Hannibal, Mo.	H.R.Bu.	Farmwald, Andrew D., Plain City, O.	A.D.F.
Buckwalter, Ira J., New Holland, Pa.	I.J.B.	Fisher, John B., Mechanicsville, Md.	J.B.F.
Buller, Joe, Goltry, Okla.	J.Bu.	Flaming, John H., Ulysses, Kan.	J.H.Fl.
Burkhard, Sarah Schiffler, Roseland, Neb.	S.S.B.	Flickinger, W. J., Bluffton, O.	W.J.F.
Burkholder, Harold D., Dallas, Ore.	H.D.B.	Fox, Sam, Okeene, Okla.	S.F.
*Burkholder, Oscar, Breslau, Ont.	O.B.	Frank, Walter H., Allentown, Pa.	W.H.Fr.
Burkholder, Paul H., Markham, Ont.	P.H.Bu.	Franz, John M., Dallas, Ore.	J.M.F.
Byler, J. N., Akron, Pa.	J.N.B.	Friedmann, Robert, Kalamazoo, Mich.	R.F.
Carper, Mrs. Reuben, Denbigh, Va.	E.W.C.	Gering, William, Newton, Kan.	W.Ge.
Castillo, Mrs. David, La Junta, Col.	E.S.C.	Gingerich, Andrew, Mannsville, N.Y.	A.Gi.
Claassen, Willard, Newton, Kan.	W.Cl.	Gingerich, LeRoy, Versailles, Mo.	L.G.
Classen, Johann Peter, Winnipeg, Man.	J.P.C.	Gingerich, Melvin, Goshen, Ind.	M.G.
Classen, Mrs. Jonas, West Liberty, O.	M.B.C.	Gingerich, Orland, Baden, Ont.	O.G.
Clemens, James R., Goshen, Ind.	J.R.C.	Goerz, Heinrich, Vancouver, B.C.	H.G.
Clemens, Paul R., Lansdale, Pa.	P.R.C.	Good, A. C., Sterling, Ill.	A.C.G.
Coblentz, J. Simon, Norfolk, Va.	S.J.C.	Graber, Daniel J., Goshen, Ind.	D.J.G.
Coffman, Vinetta, Shipshewana, Ind.	V.C.	Graber, Ellis, Souderton, Pa.	E.Gr.
Conrad, Lloyd, Wakarusa, Ind.	L.D.C.	Graber, Harvey, Goshen, Ind.	H.Gr.
*Cornies, Johann, Molotschna, Russia	J.C.	Graber, Mrs. O'Ray, Buhler, Kan.	E.C.G.
Crous, Ernst, Göttingen, Ger.	E.C.	Graeff, Arthur D., Philadelphia, Pa.	A.D.G.
Culp, Elmer I., Tiskilwa, Ill.	E.I.C.	Gratz, Delbert L., Bluffton, O.	D.L.G.

Greiman, Mrs. Loyd, Intake, Mont.	L.B.G.	Keener, Oliver M., Harrisonburg, Va.	O.M.K.
Groff, Llewellyn, Ogema, Minn.	L.Gr.	Keim, Leander S., Haven, Kan.	L.S.K.
Groh, Harold D., Kitchener, Ont.	H.D.G.	Keim, Noah A., Uniontown, O.	N.A.K.
Grunau, J. C., Hillsboro, Kan.	J.C.Gr.	Kenagy, Mrs. Edward, Silverton, Ore.	E.G.Ken.
Guengerich, Paul T., Parnell, Iowa	P.T.G.	Kennel, P. R., Shickley, Neb.	P.R.K.
*Habegger, Alfred, Lame Deer, Mont.	A.H.	Kennel, Vernon, Atglen, Pa.	V.K.
Habegger, Loris A., Wayland, Iowa	L.A.H.	King, Donald E., Pigeon, Mich.	D.E.K.
*Hallman, E. S., Akron, Pa.	E.S.H.	King, Sanford E., Hutchinson, Kan.	S.E.K.
Hallman, William E., Pehuajó, Argentina	W.E.Ha.	Klassen, George H., O'Neal, Ark.	G.H.K.
Hamm, H. H., Altona, Man.	H.H.H.	Klassen, Herbert C., Abbotsford, B.C.	H.C.Kl.
*Harder, Franz, Germany	F.H.	Klassen, J. H., Inman, Kan.	J.H.K.
Harder, J. A., Yarrow, B.C.	J.A.Har.	Klassen, Jacob J., Coaldale, Alta.	Ja.Kl.
Harder, Leland, Elkhart, Ind.	L.Ha.	Klassen, Johann Peter, Winnipeg, Man.	J.P.Kl.
Harms, J. A.	J.A.Ha.	Klassen, John J., Clearbrook, B.C.	J.J.Kl.
Harms, Orlando, Hillsboro, Kan.	O.H., OHa.	Klassen, Peter, St. Catharines, Ont.	P.K.
Hartzler, John D., Eureka, Ill.	J.D.H.	Klassen, William, Elkhart, Ind.	W.Kl.
Haury, Helmut, Weierhof, Ger.	H.Ha.	Kleinsasser, Samuel, Headingley, Man.	S.K.
Heatwole, Nelson J., Harrisonburg, Va.	N.J.H.	Klügel, Maria, Göttingen, Ger.	M.K.
Heffner, W. F., York, Pa.	W.F.H.	Koch, Roy S., West Liberty, O.	R.S.K.
*Hege, Christian, Frankfurt, Ger.	Hege	Koehn, John A., Livingston, Cal.	J.A.K.
Hege, Henry, Geary, Okla.	H.H.	Koehn, John J., Galva, Kan.	J.J.Ko.
Hege, Ulrich, Reihen, Ger.	U.H.	Koehn, Noah, Winton, Cal.	N.K.
Heidebrecht, David A., Tosfield, Alta.	D.A.H.	Koehn, Reuben J., Lahoma, Okla.	R.J.K.
Hein, Gerhard, Berlin, Ger.	G.H.	Kolb, Elmer G., Pottstown, Pa.	E.G.Ko.
Helmick, Chester M., Elkhart, Ind.	C.M.H.	Krabill, Murray, Fredericktown, O.	M.Kr.
Hershberger, Guy F., Goshen, Ind.	G.F.H.	Krahn, Cornelius, N. Newton, Kan.	C.K.
Hershey, Paul, Gulfsport, Miss.	P.H.	Kratz, Mrs. Warren A., Harrisonburg, Va.	M.W.K.
*Hershey, T. K., Goshen, Ind.	T.K.H.	Kraus, C. Norman, Durham, N.C.	C.N.K.
Hertzler, Frank N., Elizabethtown, Pa.	F.N.H.	Krebs, Manfred, Karlsruhe, Ger.	M.K.
Hess, John H., Toronto, Ont.	J.H.H.	Kreider, Mrs. Leonard, Wadsworth, O.	R.W.K.
Hiebert, H. H., Hillsboro, Kan.	H.H.Hie.	Kreider, M. Lena, Palmyra, Mo.	M.L.K.
Hiebert, Jacob N., Langham, Sask.	J.N.H.	Kroeker, M. A., Hillsboro, Kan.	M.A.K.
Hiebert, Lando, Hillsboro, Kan.	L.Hi.	Kurtz, Christian J., Elverson, Pa.	C.J.K.
Hiebert, P. G., Atmore, Ala.	P.G.H.	Kurtz, J. A., Oley, Pa.	J.A.Ku.
Hiebert, P. N., Bakersfield, Cal.	P.N.H.	Kurtz, Omar A., Oley, Pa.	O.A.Ku.
Histand, Nelson, Pryor, Okla.	N.H.	Landes, Emanuel, Ingolstadt, Ger.	E.L.
Histand, Paul W., Trevoze, Pa.	P.W.H.	Landis, Ira D., Bareville, Pa.	I.D.L.
Hofer, Clarence E., Dinuba, Cal.	C.E.H.	Langenwalter, J. H., N. Newton, Kan.	J.H.La.
Hofer, Jacob N., Langham, Sask.	J.M.H.	*Lapp, George J., Goshen, Ind.	G.J.L.
Hofer, John J., Arden, Man.	J.J.Ho.	Lapp, John E., Lansdale, Pa.	J.E.L.
Holsinger, Justus G., Hesston, Kan.	J.G.H.	Leatherman, John D., Upland, Cal.	J.D.L.
Horst, John L., Harrisonburg, Va.	J.L.H.	Lehman, Chester K., Harrisonburg, Va.	C.K.L.
Horst, Moses K., Maugansville, Md.	M.K.H.	Lehman, J. Irvin, Harrisonburg, Va.	J.I.L.
Hostetler, David E., Apple Creek, O.	D.E.H.	Lehman, Walter H., Chambersburg, Pa.	W.H.L.
Hostetler, Guy M., Upland, Cal.	G.M.H.	Leisy, A. J., Wisner, Neb.	A.J.L.
Hostetler, J. J., Peoria, Ill.	J.J.H.	Lind, N. A., Sweet Home, Ore.	N.A.L.
Hostetler, John A., Scottsdale, Pa.	J.A.H.	Linscheid, Willis, Butterfield, Minn.	W.L.
Hostetler, Lester, Sugarcreek, O.	L.Ho.	Litwiller, Nelson, Montevideo, Uruguay	N.L.
Hostetler, S. Jay, Accra, Ghana	S.J.Ho.	Loewen, Mrs. Henry R., Wichita, Kan.	E.C.L.
Hovens Greve, K., Amsterdam, Neth.	K.Ho.	Loewen, S. L., Hillsboro, Kan.	S.L.L.
Huebert, G. D., Winnipeg, Man.	G.D.H.	Lohrenz, Gerhard, Winnipeg, Man.	G.L.
Huffman, J. A., Winona Lake, Ind.	J.A.Hu.	Lohrenz, J. H., Hughestown, India	J.H.L.
Isaac, John P., Glendale, Cal.	J.P.I.	Long, C. Warren, Tiskilwa, Ill.	C.W.L.
Jaehde, Mrs. William, Jr., Ransom, Kan.	M.J.	McCrary, Mrs. J. D., Pueblo, Col.	M.McC.
Jantz, Jesse H., Neodesha, Kan.	J.J.	McDowell, Emerson L., Toronto, Ont.	E.L.M.
Jantzen, G. H., Dallas, Ore.	G.H.J.	Martin, Daniel L., Sheldon, Wis.	D.L.M.
Janz, B. B., Coaldale, Alta.	B.B.J.	Martin, Jesse B., Waterloo, Ont.	J.B.M.
Janzen, A. E., Hillsboro, Kan.	A.E.J.	Martin, Loyal J., Hillsboro, Kan.	L.J.M.
Janzen, David, Winnipeg, Man.	D.Ja.	Martin, Simon B., Kitchener, Ont.	S.B.M.
Janzen, H. H., Basel, Sw.	H.H.J.	Massanari, Karl, Goshen, Ind.	K.L.M.
Jeltes, H. F. W., The Hague, Neth.	H.F.W.J.	Mast, Russell L., N. Newton, Kan.	R.L.M.
Jost, Arthur, Reedley, Cal.	A.J.	Matthijssen, Jan, Pati, Java	J.M.
Kauffman, A. H., Goshen, Ind.	A.H.K.	Maust, Earl J., Bay Port, Mich.	E.J.M.
Kauffman, Floyd, Minot, N.D.	F.E.K.	Mecenseffy, Grete, Vienna, Austria	G.Me.
Kaufman, Abram, Plain City, O.	Ab.K.	Menzel, Gustav, Germany	G.M.
*Kaufman, Ammon, Davidsville, Pa.	A.Ka.	Metz, Abram G., Bergey, Pa.	A.G.M.

Metzler, Edgar, Kitchener, Ont.	E.Me.	Raber, Chester A., Louisville, Ken.	C.A.R.
Meyer, Mrs. J. C., Cleveland, O.	E.S.M.	Rahn, Ben, Inman, Kan.	B.R.
Miller, Amon M., Fairview, Neb.	A.M.M.	Range, Karl, Germany	K.Ra.
Miller, D. Paul, Mankato, Minn.	D.P.M.	Redekop, H. H., Winkler, Man.	H.H.R.
Miller, D. Walter, Orrville, O.	D.W.M.	Redekop, J. F., N. Clearbrook, B.C.	J.F.R.
Miller, Daniel E., McMinnville, Ore.	D.E.M.	Reese, Goldie S., Pittsburgh, Pa.	G.S.R.
Miller, Edward J., Gulfport, Miss.	Ed.J.M.	Regehr, Ernst, El Ombu, Uruguay	E.Re.
Miller, George S., Wellman, Iowa	G.S.M.	Regehr, J. I., Main Centre, Sask.	J.I.R.
Miller, H. E., Elkhart, Ind.	H.E.M.	*Regier, C. H., Elbing, Kan.	C.H.R.
Miller, Ira E., Harrisonburg, Va.	I.E.M.	Regier, Daniel G., Alsen, N.D.	D.G.R.
Miller, Ivan J., Grantsville, Md.	I.J.M.	Regier, Otto, Bad Segeberg, Ger.	O.R.
Miller, Jacob J., Bowling Green, Mo.	J.J.Mi.	Regier, P. K., N. Newton, Kan.	P.K.R.
Miller, Jonathan M., Kalona, Iowa	J.M.M.	Reichenbach, R. C., Shamokin, Pa.	R.C.Re.
Miller, Mary, Hesston, Kan.	M.M.	Reimer, B. D., Steinbach, Man.	B.D.R.
Miller, Myrtle, High River, Alta.	M.Mi.	Reimer, David P., Giroux, Man.	D.P.R.
Miller, Omar G., Hubbard, Ore.	O.G.M.	Reimer, Gustav E., Nova Witmarsum, Brazil	G.R.
Miller, Paul R., Walnut Creek, O.	P.R.M.	Reimer, Peter J., Rosenort, Man.	P.J.R.
Miller, Mrs. William S. Hutchinson, Kan.	C.Y.M.	Reist, H. F., Premont, Tex.	H.F.R.
*Mininger, H. J., Ithica, Mich.	H.J.Mi.	Rempel, Alexander, Göttingen, Ger.	A.R.
Mishler, Raymond, Sheridan, Ore.	R.M.	Rempel, Hans, Kiel, Ger.	H.R., F.R.
Moyer, Ernest K., Quakertown, Pa.	E.K.M.	Rempel, Jacob, Saskatoon, Sask.	J.R.
Moyer, Jacob M., Souderton, Pa.	J.M.Mo.	Rempel, J. G., Saskatoon, Sask.	J.G.R.
Muffley, John Wesley, Bowmansville, Pa.	J.W.M.	Risler, Walter, Crefeld, Ger.	W.R.
Nafziger, Valentine, Milverton, Ont.	V.N.	*Risser, John D., Hagerstown, Md.	J.D.R.
Near, Richard, Shelby, Mich.	R.N.	Rocke, Emanuel M., Woodburn, Ind.	E.M.R.
*Neff, Christian, Weierhof, Ger.	Neff	Ropp, Herman E., Wellman, Iowa	H.E.R.
Neufeld, G. G., Manitou, Man.	G.G.N.	Rosenberger, Arthur S., Quakertown, Pa.	A.S.R.
Neufeld, Herman, Vancouver, B.C.	H.Ne.	Roszhart, Herbert, Aurora, Neb.	H.Ro.
Neufeld, Heinrich T., Enid, Okla.	H.T.N.	Rotermund, Hans-Martin, Göttingen, Ger.	H-M.R.
Neufeld, I. G., Fresno, Cal.	I.G.N.	Roth, Roy D., Hesston, Kan.	R.D.R.
Neufeld, Vernon H., N. Newton, Kan.	V.H.N.	Roth, Ruth C., Goshen, Ind.	R.C.R.
Neufeld, William, San Jose, Cal.	W.Ne.	Rupp, E. E., Archbold, O.	E.E.R.
*Newman, A. H., Macon, Ga.	A.H.N.	Ruth, Marvin D., Lansdale, Pa.	M.D.R.
Nickel, Arnold, Freeman, S.D.	A.N.	Ruth, Melvin L., Phoenix, Ariz.	M.L.R.
Nickel, H. H., Abbotsford, B.C.	H.H.N.	Sawatzky, John J., Calgary, Alta.	J.J.Sa.
Nickel, J. D., Rosemary, Alta.	J.D.N.	Schantz, Albert, Fronberg, Ger.	A.S.
Nickel, J. W., N. Newton, Kan.	J.W.N.	Schellenberg, Bernhard J., Winnipeg, Man.	B.J.S.
Niepoth, Wilhelm, Crefeld, Ger.	W.N.	Schellenberg, Theo. R., Washington, D.C.	T.R.Sc.
Nyce, Howard G., Newton, Kan.	H.G.N.	Schertz, Dale, Remington, Ind.	D.S.
Odlozilik, Otakar, Philadelphia, Pa.	O.O.	Schertz, Mrs. J. J., Flanagan, Ill.	Mrs. J.J.S.
Ortman, Arthur F., Warroad, Minn.	A.F.O.	Schmidt, August, Canton, Okla.	A.Sch.
Ortmann, Anna F., Marion, S.D.	A.F.Or.	Schmidt, Edwin T., Waldheim, Sask.	E.T.S.
Ortmann, Hellmuth F., Munich, N.D.	H.F.O.	Schmidt, Mrs. Herbert B., Newton, Kan.	M.P.S.
Oswald, Samuel, Beemer, Neb.	S.O.	Schmidt, H. U., Meno, Okla.	H.U.S.
Paetkau, David, Coaldale, Alta.	D.Pa.	Schmidt, John F., N. Newton, Kan.	J.F.S.
Pannabecker, S. F., Elkhart, Ind.	S.F.P.	Schmidt, John R., Asunción, Paraguay	J.R.Sc.
Pauls, D. C., Inman, Kan.	D.C.P.	Schmidt, P. U., Goessel, Kan.	P.U.S.
Peachey, Paul, Tokyo, Japan	P.P.	Schmidt, Rudolf, Newport, Wash.	R.Sc.
Pelsy, René, Sarrebourg, Alsace	R.P.	Schowalter, Paul, Weierhof, Ger.	P.S.
Penner, Archie, Steinbach, Man.	A.P.	Schrag, Martin H., Grantham, Pa.	M.H.S.
Penner, G. H., Plum Coulee, Man.	G.H.P.	Schroeter, August A., Reedley, Cal.	A.A.S.
Penner, Horst, Weierhof, Ger.	H.P.	Schrock, Leroy E., Glen Flora, Wis.	L.E.S.
Penner, John D., Morris, Man.	J.D.P.	Schweitzer, Charles, Moscow, Kan.	C.Sc.
Penner, John P., Vineland, Ont.	J.P.Pe.	Schweizer, Albert, Sterling, Kan.	A.Sc.
Persijn, J. H., Netherlands	J.H.P.	Shank, Mrs. Charles S., Goshen Ind.	L.S.S.
Peters, Francis, Walnut Hill, Fla.	F.P.	Shank, Clarence, Marion, Pa.	C.S.
Peters, Frank C., Winnipeg, Man.	F.C.P.	Shank, Harvey E., Chambersburg, Pa.	H.E.S.
Peters, G. W., Fresno, Cal.	G.W.P.	*Shank, John R., Versailles, Mo.	J.R.S.
Peters, John, Yarrow, B.C.	J.Pe.	Shank, Lester C., Harrisonburg, Va.	L.C.S.
Peters, William J., Gruenthal, Man.	W.J.Pe.	Shantz, Merle, Hespeler, Ont.	Me.S.
Pletscher, Werner, Germany	W.Pl.	Shellenberg, Menno A., Winton, Cal.	M.A.S.
Plett, C. F., Doland, S.D.	C.F.P.	Shelly, Maynard, N. Newton, Kan.	M.Sh.
Prieb, Wesley J., Hillsboro, Kan.	W.J.P.	Shelly, Paul R., Bluffton, O.	P.R.S.
Quiring, Horst, Korntal, Ger.	H.Q.	Shelly, Wilmer S., Frederick, Pa.	W.S.S.
*Quiring, Jakob, New York, N.Y.	J.Q.	Sherk, J. Harold, Washington, D.C.	J.Ha.S.
Quiring, Walter, Rosthern, Sask.	W.Q.	Short, Reuben, Archbold, O.	R.Sho.

Showalter, Richard L., Reedley, Cal.	R.L.S.	Unruh, John, Warden, Wash.	J.U.
*Showalter, Timothy, Broadway, Va.	T.S.	Unruh, P. D., Colfax, Wash.	P.D.U.
Siemens, Ernest, Shafter, Cal.	E.Si.	Unruh, William F., Newton, Kan.	W.F.U.
Slagell, John, Hydro, Okla.	J.S.	*Vos, Karel, Middelstum, Neth.	K.V.
*Smith, C. Henry, Bluffton, O.	C.H.S.	Voth, Abraham, Morden, Man.	A.V.
Smith, Lena Mae, Newton, Kan.	L.M.S.	Waldner, Friedrich, Poplar Point, Man.	F.W.
Smith, Tilman R., Eureka, Ill.	T.R.S.	Waldner, Joseph A., Mitchell, S.D.	J.A.Wa.
Smith, Willard H., Goshen, Ind.	W.H.S.	Wall, P. F., Downey, Cal.	P.F.W.
Smucker, Herman J., Iowa City, Iowa	H. J. Sm.	Walter, Jacob, Macleod, Alta.	J.Wa.
Smucker, Silas J., Rensselaer, Ind.	S.J.S.	Walter, Solomon F., Mount Pleasant, Iowa	S.F.W.
Snyder, Earle S., Guelph, Ont.	E.S.S.	Waltner, Erland, Elkhart, Ind.	E.W.
Snyder, Elvin V., La Plata, Puerto Rico	E.V.S.	Waltner, Harris, Moundridge, Kan.	H.Wa.
Snyder, Harvey E., Kitchener, Ont.	H.E.Sn.	Warkentin, Henry, Yarrow, B.C.	H.Wa.
Snyder, William T., Akron, Pa.	W.T.S.	Warkentin, Melvin L., Hillsboro, Kan.	M.L.W.
Springer, N. P., Goshen, Ind.	N.P.S.	*Warns, Johannes, Wiedenest, Ger.	J.Wa.
Sprunger, Eva F., Berne, Ind.	E.F.S.	Weaver, Ivan K., Petoskey, Mich.	I.K.W.
Sprunger, Samuel F., Coopersburg, Pa.	S.F.S.	Weaver, William B., Bloomington, Ill.	W.B.W.
*Stauffer, Ezra, Tofield, Alta.	E.S.	Wedel, J., Steinbach, Man.	J.We.
Stauffer, William H., Sugarcreek, O.	W.H.St.	Wenger, John C., Goshen, Ind.	J.C.W.
Steiner, James A., Wadsworth, O.	J.A.S.	Wenger, Linden M., Harrisonburg, Va.	L.M.W.
Steiner, John S., Goshen, Ind.	J.S.S.	Whitmer, Paul E., Bluffton, O.	P.E.W.
Stoll, Abraham J., Wheatland, N.D.	A.J.S.	Wichert, John J., Vineland, Ont.	J.J.W.
Stoll, Henry J., Rensselaer, Ind.	H.J.St.	Widmer, Joseph, Modenheim, Alsace, France	J.Wid.
Stoltzfus, Grant M., Harrisonburg, Va.	G.M.S.	Wiebe, Alfred, Seiling, Okla.	A.Wi.
Stoneback, George S., Wichita, Kan.	G.S.S.	Wiebe, David V., Hillsboro, Kan.	D.V.W.
Stucky, Harley J., N. Newton, Kan.	H.J.S.	*Wiebe, Herbert, Gross-Falkenau, West Prussia	H.Wi.
Studer, Gerald C., Smithville, O.	G.C.S.	Wiebe, Herman J., Madison, Sask.	H.J.W.
Stutzman, Harry J., Berlin, O.	Ha.S.	Wiebe, Jacob Z., Marion, Kan.	J.Z.W.
Stutzman, Milo D., Kingman, Alta.	M.D.S.	Wiebe, Johannes, Golzwarden, Ger.	J.Wi.
Suderman, John P., Pandora, O.	J.P.S.	Wiebe, John A., Mountain Lake, Minn.	J.A.W.
Swarr, Harry C., E. Petersburg, Pa.	H.C.S.	Wiebe, Orlando H., Omaha, Neb.	O.H.W.
Swartz, Mrs. Alvin, Talbert, Ken.	E.R.Sw.	Wiebe, Pete V., Hillsboro, Kan.	P.V.W.
Swartzendruber, A. Lloyd, Kalona, Iowa	A.L.S.	Wiebe, Willard W., Mountain Lake, Minn.	W.W.W.
Swartzendruber, Elmer G., Wellman, Iowa	E.G.S.	Wiens, Frank, Asunción, Paraguay	Fr.W.
Swartzendruber, Victor E., Bloomfield, Iowa	V.E.S.	Wiens, Henry A., Langham, Sask.	H.A.W.
Swartzentruber, Amos, Tres Lomas, Argentina	A.Sw.	Wiens, H. E., Mountain Lake, Minn.	H.E.W.
Swartzentruber, Clayton, Dalton, O.	C.Sw.	Wiens, Henry J., Swift Current, Sask.	He.J.W.
Swope, Wilmer D., Leetonia, O.	W.D.S.	Wipf, Daniel S., Alexandria, S.D.	D.S.W.
*Teufel, Eberhard, Stuttgart-Fellbach, Ger.	E.T.	Wipf, Joseph, Frankfort, S.D.	Jo.W.
Thiesen, Daniel S., Newton, Kan.	D.S.T.	Wiswedel, Wilhelm, Bayreuth, Ger.	W.W.
Thiessen, D. J., Vauxhall, Alta.	D.J.Th.	Wolf, N. H., Harrisburg, Pa.	N.H.W.
Thiessen, Gerhardt T., Orange Grove, Cal.	G.T.T.	Wood, J. S., Yale, Mich.	J.S.W.
Thiessen, J. F., Newton, Kan.	J.F.T.	Wurz, John M., Beiseker, Alta.	J.M.W.
Thiessen, J. J., Saskatoon, Sask.	J.J.Th.	Yeackley, Earl, Thurman, Col.	E.Ye.
*Tilitzky, C. G., Abbotsford, B.C.	C.G.T.	*Yntema, J., Haarlem, Neth.	J.Y.
Toews, A. A., N. Clearbrook, B.C.	A.A.T.	Yoder, Edwin, Parnell, Iowa	E.Yo.
Toews, Isaac J., Linden, Alta.	I.J.T.	Yoder, Edwin J., Topeka, Ind.	E.J.Y.
Toews, Jacob C., Leamington, Ont.	J.C.T.	Yoder, Gideon G., Hesston, Kan.	G.G.Y.
Toews, Jacob J., Kitchener, Ont.	J.J.T.	Yoder, Jacob P., Reedsville, Pa.	J.P.Y.
Troyer, Mrs. Clarence, Engadine, Mich.	W.I.T.	Yoder, John Howard, Goshen, Ind.	J.H.Y.
*Troyer, Levi S., Mio, Mich.	L.S.T.	Yoder, John L., West Liberty, O.	J.L.Y.
Troyer, Menno M., Conway, Kan.	M.M.T.	Yoder, Ray F., Nappanee, Ind.	R.F.Y.
Troyer, Reuben, Conway Springs, Kan.	R.Tr.	Yoder, S. C., Goshen, Ind.	S.C.Y.
Tschetter, David W., Bridgewater, Kan.	D.W.T.	Yoder, Walter E., Goshen, Ind.	W.E.Y.
Tschetter, Mrs. P. A., Fort Macleod, Alta.	Mrs. P.A.T.	Yost, A. L., Moundridge, Kan.	A.L.Y.
Tschetter, P. A., Estuary, Sask.	P.A.T.	Yost, Burton G., Zionsville, Pa.	B.G.Y.
Ulrich, Wilfred, Kitchener, Ont.	W.U.	Zacharias, John L., Waldheim, Sask.	J.L.Z.
Umble, John S., Goshen, Ind.	J.S.U.	Zacharias, Werner, Swift Current, Sask.	W.Z.
Unruh, A. H., Winnipeg, Man.	A.H.U.	*Zehr, Edmund P., Beatrice, Neb.	E.Z.
Unruh, Abe J., Montezuma, Kan.	A.J.U.	Zehr, Harold A., Roanoke, Ill.	H.A.Z.
*Unruh, B. H., Karlsruhe-Rüppurr, Ger.	B.H.U.	Zijpp, N. van der, Rotterdam, Neth.	vdZ.
*Unruh, Edward, Chickasha, Okla.	E.U.	Zimmerman, E. E., Peoria, Ill.	E.E.Z.
Unruh, J. D., Freeman, S.D.	J.D.U.	Zook, Le Roy A., Wooster, Ohio	L.A.Z.
		Zook, Ruby, Garden City, Mo.	R.Z.

THE
MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA

Oak Dale Mennonite Church (CM), near Salisbury, Somerset Co., Pa., is one of the three meetinghouses of the Casselman River (q.v.) congregation of the Conservative Mennonite Conference. Services are held every two weeks, simultaneously with Cherry Glade in the southern part of the district. On alternate Sundays and for communion or special meetings the whole congregation meets at Maple Glen near Grantsville, Md. The Oak Dale church, a frame structure built in 1896, was remodeled and enlarged in 1931. Present seating capacity is 350. I.J.M.

Oak Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located about five miles west and one-half mile south of Adair, Mayes Co., Okla., had its beginning as a mission station about 1927, when Monroe Hostetler of Hesson, Kan., located in the community and conducted a Sunday school in the schoolhouse. Later preaching services were also arranged for and a mission was organized under the South Central Conference. Richard Birky served as the resident pastor 1942-47. In 1944 a house was remodeled as a church. In the spring of 1957 a new concrete block building was finished and dedicated; this building is located five miles west of Adair on Highway 28. In 1956 the membership was 21, with Richard Birky as pastor again 1954- , now a bishop. N.H.

Oak Grove Beachy Amish Church, near Centreville, Mich., was established c1954. In 1957 it had 32 members with Clarence Miller and Moses Yoder serving as ministers. H.S.B.

Oak Grove Mennonite Church (MC) located in Champaign County, Ohio, was organized in 1845-50 by Amish settlers from Fairfield County, Ohio, and Mifflin County, Pa. The first center of the settlement lay several miles southeast of the present Oak Grove church built in 1875. The earlier meetinghouse, built soon after 1855, was located on the plot known as the Hooley cemetery, the present burying place of the congregation. Until the beginning of the present century, baptismal services still were conducted in near-by Kings Creek south of the cemetery. Early ministers were Jacob Hartzler, bishop (1854), Jonas Troyer, later of Clinton Frame (q.v.), Elkhart Co., Ind., and John P. King, bishop-deacon (völliger Armendiener), who later moved to Logan County, Ohio. John Werrey (later Warye), an immigrant from Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, ordained preacher in 1855 and bishop in 1862, led his congregation from a strict Old Order Amish to a more liberal Amish Mennonite discipline, but thereafter resisted any change. He and David Plank (q.v.), the latter at Walnut Grove in Logan County, could not agree with John P. King's stricter discipline which still required hooks and eyes and, for unmarried men, topless buggies. Another cause of friction was Warye's contention that King's ordination as bishop-deacon did not entitle him to take his regular turn with the other ministers in the Sunday morning preaching service. The Oak Grove congregation under the leadership of David Plank organized a Sunday school in 1865. Virile lay leadership through the Sunday school built up a strong congregation. It has benefited from contacts with local Methodist and Quaker religious movements. But in 1880 the congregation suffered loss of membership through the unskillful handling of a disciplinary problem involving the use of a musical instrument in a home in the Walnut Grove congregation. The result was the withdrawal of important sections of both congregations and the founding of the Indiana or Miller congregation (now extinct), so called because it was organized by Eli Miller, bishop at the Clinton Frame (Indiana) congregation. During the present century the leading figures in the congregation were Samuel E. Allgyer (q.v.), minister and bishop; and Samuel L. Warye and Jonathan J. Warye, deacon and preacher, respectively, the sons of John Warye. The Mennonite Church (MC) has drawn heavily on the congregation for educational and missionary personnel. However, the group has also suffered its full share of loss of membership to other religious bodies. The membership in 1957 was 239, with Nelson Kanagy as pastor. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Early Sunday Schools at West Liberty, Ohio," MQR IV (1930) 6-50.

Oak Grove Mennonite Church (MC) located 2 miles west of Grantsville, Md., on top of Negro Mountain, a member of the Allegheny Conference, was started as a Sunday school in a log schoolhouse. The first members were received in 1888. The first meetinghouse was built in 1900 and remodeled in 1954. The church membership reached 45 in 1920 and then gradually declined. Since 1950 the work has been revived and in 1957 there were 30 members, with A. C. Walls as pastor. C.R.B.

Oak Grove Mennonite Church, unaffiliated, located near Smithville, Wayne Co., Ohio, is probably the oldest Mennonite congregation of Amish background in the state. The first settlers came to the area about 1817 from Somerset and Mifflin counties, Pa., and organized a congregation in 1818, meeting in homes for worship. Other families of Swiss Mennonite background came directly from Switzerland and Alsace-Lorraine. Early bishops were David Zook, Christian Schantz, Jacob Yoder, assisted by ministers Christian Brandt, Christian Naftzinger, Peter Blough, Solomon Zook, and deacons Jacob King and Jacob Troyer.

The first meetinghouse (frame) was built in 1862, and a second (Pleasant Hill) in 1881 to accommodate members in the northern part of the district. In 1905 the Oak Grove meetinghouse was replaced by the large frame structure used by the present congregation.

The early congregation was a member of the Amish General Conference and Eastern A.M. Conference, and until 1947 of the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference. Since 1947 Pleasant Hill has been a separate congregation, still under the Ohio and Eastern Conference, while Oak Grove continued independent. Under able and progressive leadership the varied background of the Oak Grove congregation led to a fused polity, highly active congregational interest and participation in higher education, missions, and the broader program of the church at large. Though a rural church, less than half the members (numbering 400 in January 1958) are actively employed in agriculture. The bishop, now retired, is Jacob S. Gerig, with Virgil M. Gerig minister with full pastoral authority in the local congregation.

Other leaders serving earlier in addition to the above were John K. Yoder and Benjamin Gerig (bishops), C. K. Yoder, Jonathan Smucker, Christian Kureth (Conrad), John Smiley, Isaac Miller, D. Z. Yoder, S. K. Plank, David Hostetler, Stephen Miller, C. Z. Yoder, Peter Conrad, Albert Hartzler, P. R. Lantz, Peter Baumgartner, J. N. Smucker, Wm. G. Detweiler, Elmer Meyer (ministers and deacons).

V.M.G.E.

J. Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Goshen, 1941) 209-31; ML III, 282.

Oak Grove Old Order Mennonite Church, Dayton, Va., one of the two O.O.M. congregations in Virginia. The meetinghouse was built in 1921, 1½ miles south of Dayton. It is one of two meetinghouses shared by the two factions of the O.O.M. in Virginia (q.v.).

H.S.B.

Oak Shade Mennonite Church, located in the Baptist Chapel, Kirkwood, Route 1, Lancaster Co., Pa., was opened by the Mennonites (MC) in 1923, with Abram L. Huber in charge. The results among the Scotch-Irish here were somewhat disappointing and the work closed in late 1930. But when more Mennonites moved into southern Lancaster County it was reopened on May 14, 1933. In 1957 the membership was 35. It is the southern end of the Jacob L. Harnish Bishop District. Ray S. Yost and Mervin A. Good are the ministers.

I.D.L.

Oak Terrace Mennonite (MC) Church, Blountstown, Fla., under the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was begun in 1953 by a number of families moving in chiefly from near Kouts, Ind. In 1957 the membership was 41, with Kore Zook as pastor.

H.S.B.

Oakhill Amish Mennonite Church (now extinct) was located about 11 miles west of Eugene, Lane Co., Ore. (See Eugene Mennonite Church.) M.G.

Oakwood Mennonite Church (MC), Conowingo, Md., a mission church under the Lancaster Conference, was started in 1950. In 1957 it had 44 members, with Paul G. Leaman as pastor. The meetinghouse is 1½ miles north of the Conowingo Dam, and 6 miles west of Rising Sun, Md.

H.S.B.

Oath. The oath is the strongest possible confirmation of the truth of a statement by calling upon God to witness. The most familiar and most common explanation is that the oath is the calling upon the holy and omniscient God as witness and protector of the truth and as judge and avenger of untruth and lying.

Among the Jews, who had a living faith in a personal God, the oath had a deeper religious meaning than among the pagans. With the Jews the prescribed oath before a tribunal was very rare. It was used only as a sort of oath of purification in case of injury or theft of some entrusted or found property. Ex. 22:6 ff.; Lev. 5:23; Prov. 29:24. But it was very frequent in their civil and business life. In the Old Testament the oath was required. The basic passage is designated as Gen. 21:28-31, where Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, demanded of Abraham an oath that he would not deal falsely with him or his descendants but show mercy as Abimelech had shown Abraham. Abraham rendered the oath and as a testimony of the oath gave the king seven lambs. This is the origin of the Hebrew word for swearing, which means to affirm with seven sacrifices. The simplest form of the oath was the elevation of the right hand or both hands. Gen. 14:22; Deut. 32:40; Dan. 12:7. It appears to have been generally customary, so that the expression "to lift the hand" is equivalent to swearing (Hebrew and German of Ex. 6:8; Num. 14:30).

A presupposition of a proper oath in the Old Covenant is faith in the living God. Only the oath by Him is expressly commanded. Ex. 22:10. It is considered a sign of faithful attachment to God. Deut. 6:13; 10:20; Jer. 12:16; Isa. 48:1. A special blessing of God is promised for it. Ps. 24:4; Isa. 65:16. Only the oath by false gods is prohibited. Ex. 20:7; Lev. 19:12; Josh. 23:7. God swears by Himself (Isa. 45:23), by His soul (Amos 6:8), by His eternal life (Deut. 32:40), by His all-power (Isa. 62:8), or by His holiness (Amos 4:2; Ps. 89:36). Man swears by God and His name. Ex. 22:10. The most common formula for the oath was "As the Lord liveth" (Judg. 8:19; I Sam. 14:39). Less usual was the assertion, "The Lord be (watch) between me and thee" (Gen. 31:50; I Sam. 20:42; Jer. 42:5). Curses upon others and upon oneself are frequent with the formula, "The Lord do so to me" (I Sam. 3:17; 14:44), "Let the Lord even require it" (I Sam. 20:16), "The Lord shall return thy wickedness upon thine own head" (I Kings 2:44; see also Num. 21). The Israelites also swore by the king and his life. Gen. 42:15; II Sam. 11:11. Not unusual is the oath by the life of the one addressed, "As thou livest" (I Sam. 1:26; 17:55; also I Sam. 20:3; 25:26; II Kings 2:2; 4:6; 4:30). Later the practice of swearing by calling curses upon oneself increased among the Jews. Their hesitancy to speak the name of God also led to their swearing oaths by things that had some relation to Him, as by heaven, by Jerusalem, by the angels, by the earth, by the temple, by the altar, and by the sacrifice. Against this increasing abuse of the oath earnest voices of urgent warning were raised. Eccl. 9:2; Sir. 23:9-17.

The N.T. position on the oath is on a higher plane than that of the Old; it adopts an actually opposite position. Whereas in the O.T. the oath was commanded as a religious duty, in the N.T. it is expressly forbidden. This is taught unequivocally and clearly by the words of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:33-37): "Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths: but I say unto you, Swear not at all." Jesus here definitely opposes the O.T. custom with something new and essentially different. If the oath was permitted and even commanded to those of "old times," which means the members of the Old Covenant, it is now abrogated for His disciples. For them is meant the strict command of the Lord, the "I say unto you," that they must not only refrain from swearing falsely, but that they must not in any case or under any circumstance whatever swear an oath. Jesus mentions several kinds of oaths, formulas for the oath that were especially popular in that day, i.e., by heaven, by earth, by Jerusalem, and by one's head. It is possible that He is here opposing the casuistry of the Pharisees, which distinguished between such oaths and an oath by God, declaring the former less binding than the latter.

It is therefore completely erroneous to say that Jesus made an exception of the oath by God in His prohibition. Much more the conclusion from the lesser to the greater is correct here. If even the oath by heaven, by earth, by Jerusalem, and by one's head are forbidden because and in so far as they are in a relationship with God, so much the more is the oath by God prohibited. To this strict and rigorous prohibition of the oath Jesus adds the definite command that His disciples in their assurances restrict themselves to a simple yes or no and avoid all that goes beyond them by way of strengthening a statement because it is of evil. Whether this is interpreted to mean the evil one (devil) or abstract evil makes little difference. Jesus means that the oath has its basis in a corrupt and sinful condition and that it leads to such a condition, both of which the Christian is to avoid and put away.

An express repetition of the prohibition of the oath by Jesus is found in James 5:12: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation." The closing words, which constitute the only difference between these words and those of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, suggest that the oath is punishable; it is a wrong toward God and is thus subject to His punishment.

There are therefore religious and moral concerns which underlie the prohibition of the oath. A deep reverence for God must restrain man from using the absolutely holy God as a witness to his statements. Even if one is ever so sure of telling the truth, it is very easy to be in error and thereby sin, and thus by an oath involve God in his sin. It is presumptuous for a man to assert in extreme form his trust in his own ability to be truthful and to call down upon himself the judgment of God. The Christian should rather so live before God that His presence sanctifies heart and mouth; consequently he does not willingly sin against God's commandments and always has God for a witness wherever he is and whatever he does. Hence the Christian does not make a special attempt to be truthful before courts and in extraordinary considerations but always seeks to live in the highest truth. The oath dulls this sense of absolute commitment and hence has a demoralizing rather than morally elevating effect. Jesus' prohibition of the oath is therefore not a literalistic, legalistic command but is grounded on a deep and solid religious and ethical foundation. The rejection of the oath binds one to absolute obedience to Jesus in full discipleship and always to live and testify in complete truthfulness.

The leading Church Fathers, such as Origen, Gregory of Nazianzus, Tertullian, and Chrysostom, rejected the oath most vigorously. It was only after the state church was set up and Christianity became a state religion that the oath returned to use among Christians. It was the state's interest that called for the oath, and the church as the willing servant of the state supported and sanctioned its demand. Augustine gave the theological foundation for the oath. He was quite aware of the objections to the oath and hence called for its use only in urgent matters. But he nevertheless held that the oath contributed to the glory of God and was useful to the state and the neighbor. This remained the basic position of the Catholic Church. Councils and popes, especially Innocent III, constantly increased the emphasis upon the oath as a matter of divine law.

The Reformers and the Protestant churches adopted the position of the Catholic Church on the oath. Luther interpreted the passage in Matthew 5 as forbidding the swearing of an oath on one's own initiative or out of custom, but taught that the command of the state to render an oath must be obeyed. His Greater Catechism says, "The oath is a right good work, by which God is praised, the truth and the right are confirmed, lies are stopped, people are brought to peace, obedience is done, and strife is overcome, since God Himself enters in to separate right from wrong and good from evil." The Heidelberg Catechism answers thus the question whether one may piously swear an oath with the name of God: "Yes, if it is required by the authorities or in case of need to maintain and promote loyalty and truth to the honor of God and the welfare of one's neighbor. For such swearing is grounded in the Word of God and therefore was rightly used by the saints of the Old and New Testaments." This is the general Protestant understanding and teaching concerning the oath down to the present time. It is claimed that the oath is necessary even in Christian society because of the all too common unreliability of ordinary statements and the general distrust of people toward each other, in short because of the imperfection of human society. Says Martenson, "Lying and mutual distrust are with us, and so from ancient times the oath has been used as a guarantee for truthfulness." Such a position fails to recognize and properly evaluate Jesus' strict prohibition of the oath.

But alongside of the church's position there has always been another position which rejects the oath completely in obedience to the command of Jesus and of James. This has been the position of the medieval sects (though not uniformly), the Cathari, Albigenses, Waldenses, Beguines, and Beghards, also the Wiclifites, Hussites, and Bohemian Brethren.

The Anabaptists rejected and opposed the oath from the beginning in strict obedience to the express prohibition of Jesus. Andreas Castelberger requested the Zürich Council in 1526 to excuse him from the oath (Urfehde) when he was to be exiled. Georg Blaurock refused to swear the oath when he was expelled on Jan. 5, 1527. The seventh article of the Schleithem Confession of Feb. 24, 1527, expressly refers to the prohibition of Christ "who taught the perfection of the law and forbids Christians all swearing." Our speech is to be simply yes and no. This was the general rule among the Anabaptists as is frequently attested in the trials, disputations, and confessions extracted by torture, although Hubmaier and Denk did not take such a strong position. (See the disputations of Zofingen in 1532 and Frankenthal in 1571, also the discussion with Hans Pfistermeyer in 1531.) Felix Manz, swore the Urfehde, as did Blaurock shortly after Jan. 5, 1527.

The case was slightly different among the Anabaptists in Holland. At first Menno Simons was not so strict on the oath as he was later. Hoekstra says that at first, on the ground of Jesus' use of "verily" and Paul's use of several strong asseverations, Menno thought that the prohibition of the oath in the N.T. referred only to temporal matters, such as flesh and blood and money and property, whereas one was allowed to use only yes and no in affirming divine truth to the honor of God and the welfare of one's neighbor. Later he declared that the asseverations of the N.T. had nothing to do with the swearing of an oath. Peter Tasch (q.v.), an Anabaptist leader in Hesse, wrote a tract Vom Eid, which has apparently been lost.

Menno dealt with the oath in only two of his writings. The first was his booklet of 1552 entitled A Fundamental and Clear Confession, in which he earnestly admonishes: "Worthy Reader, are you one who fears the Lord and you are pressed to take an oath—stand by the Word of the Lord, which forbids you so clearly to swear, and let your yea be yea and your nay be nay, as He has commanded, whether it means life or death to you, so that you may by your valiance and steadfast truthfulness so admonish and rebuke the worthless, unfruitful, vain world, which respects nothing less than the Word of the Lord, that by your yea and nay it may be brought in its faithlessness and falsity to righteousness, so that perchance someone may be converted from his unrighteousness and thereby led to deeper thought and be saved."

Menno's second writing dealing with the oath was his Epistle to Martin Micron of 1556 written in reply to Micron's A Clear and Scriptural Instruction on the Oath. Most skillfully Menno points his opponent to the "bright and clear words of the Son of God whose word is truth and whose commandment is eternal life," and deplores that they "are falsified for the sake of human authorities."

Among the martyrs in Offer des Heeren who expressly rejected the oath were Elizabeth (1549), Frans van Bolsward (1545), Joos Kind (1553), Lee-naert Plovier (1559), and Hans van der Maes (1559).

All the Mennonite confessions of faith without exception have included a prohibition of the oath. The Concept of Cologne (1591) says: "According to the teaching of Christ and James one is not to swear, rather all words and deeds are to be confirmed by a truthful yes or no, and nothing added thereto, and this is to be kept just like a sworn oath." The Confession of Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerrits of 1610 declares briefly and laconically, "Jesus Christ, king and lawgiver (Matt. 28:20; Gal. 6:2) of the N.T., has forbidden the Christian all swearing of the oath (Matt. 5:33, 37; Jas. 5:12), wherefore the N.T. believer is not permitted to swear an oath." The Dordrecht Confession of 1632 concludes emphatically from the prohibition of Christ "that all high and low oaths are forbidden us," and calls upon us to keep all promises, sayings, and testimonies as faithfully "as if we had sworn with a high oath." The prohibition of swearing is most thoroughly defended in the Cornelis Ris Confession of 1766.

The Hutterites also had a high regard for the prohibition of the oath. Peter Riedemann discusses the oath extensively in his Rechenschaft (1545). He bases the difference between the Old and New Testaments in the fact that the O.T. has the shadow (Col. 2:17) of the truth while the N.T. has the full brightness, the O.T. has the spirit of the slave while the N.T. has the spirit of sonship, hence the shadow "must give way to the spirit of truth which operates in us."

Since the oath has always been held to be essential to the existence of the state it was inevitable that the refusal of Mennonites to use it would bring them into conflict with government. It was only gradually and after long and serious attempts to suppress them that those countries in which Mennonites settled became willing to grant them the special privilege of substituting the simple affirmation (Handgelübde) for the oath. This was especially true in Switzerland, for the authorities felt that the rejection of the oath meant the undermining of all authority; hence they fought the Anabaptists as a sect dangerous to the very existence of the state. Stubbornly they insisted on the oath (Urfehde) whenever an Anabaptist was expelled from their territory, and the loyalty oath if they granted toleration. Not until late in the 17th century did Zürich, for instance, finally authorize the affirmation in place of the oath for expellees and even then the exception was simply allowed in practice without putting it into the legal regulations. Similarly in Bern as late as 1813 a decree was issued denying to the Mennonites all civil and voting rights because they refused the loyalty oath. A regulation of Nov. 22, 1820, specified that instead of the loyalty oath an affirmation which had the same consequences as the oath could be rendered in the official residence of the judge (Oberamtmann). With the adoption of the new federal constitution of 1874 Mennonites have been permitted to substitute the affirmation for the normal oath.

In Holland the Mennonites early received special consideration for their position on the oath through the good will of Prince William of Orange. He granted the request of the Mennonites of Antwerp (Sept. 23, 1566) for release from the requirement of the oath. Likewise his intervention secured to the Mennonites of Middelburg in 1577 and 1578 exemption from the civil oath. Four years later the state of Zeeland attempted without success to impose a law requiring all Mennonites to perform the oath. In 1585 the Dutch States General decided to exempt the Mennonites from the oath, and a law of March 28, 1588, specified the wording of the substitute formula. Friesland, on the other hand, issued a decree on March 8, 1597, denying those who refused the oath the privilege of living in the country, and not until March 19, 1659, was the requirement of the oath canceled for Mennonites; on July 10, 1700, a substitute formula was provided. The city of Groningen passed a decree on April 25, 1616, exempting Mennonites from the oath.

Louis XVI of France rejected the request of the Alsatian Mennonites in 1766 for exemption from the oath. Jacob Frey of Dürrenzen, who refused to swear an oath, was sentenced on Sept. 7, 1769, to lifelong exile from France and a fine of 10 pounds and court costs. But the Mennonites of France refused to yield and finally won their release when the Court of Cassation in 1810 decreed that "Anabaptists and Quakers" need not render an oath, and since 1812 it has been the general practice in France to permit members of recognized religious bodies to substitute an affirmation for the oath.

In Austria Mennonites were freed from taking an oath by a royal decree of Jan. 10, 1816.

The Privilegium (q.v.) granted by Paul I of Russia on Sept. 6, 1800, guaranteed "for all time" to the Mennonites the right to substitute a simple yes and no for an oath before the courts.

In Germany the practice in regard to the oath has been variable. On Oct. 13, 1768, the imperial high court decreed that the Mennonite affirmation was to be accepted as a substitute for the oath; but only a few states in the empire, e.g., Hesse-Nassau, observed this decree. Almost everywhere Mennonites had to fight for exemption. In Prussia it took the Mennonites a long time to secure toleration. The rulers repeatedly ordered expulsion of the Mennonites, but their decrees were not executed because of the economic advantages accruing from Mennonite settlement, and the Mennonites were quietly allowed the religious freedom which the laws did not openly grant. Those settlements living under Polish rule, however, were granted special privileges of freedom by the Polish kings, which evidently included exemption from the oath. In Elbing they were allowed to substitute the simple yes and no but required to place the hand on the breast. The first express grant by a Prussian king of substitution of affirmation for the oath was by Frederick II on June 14, 1773, in response to a Mennonite petition, of June 7. The affirmation was fully legalized by a law of May 11, 1827. In East Friesland a decree of Aug. 30, 1631, governing leasing of land authorized the substitution of the "Mennonite oath." But Mennonites still had much trouble before the courts and in spite of repeated petitions did not acquire full exemption until the decree of June 2, 1701. In Friedrichstadt the Privilegium of Feb. 13, 1623, granted Mennonites exemption. In Altona the grant was made as early as 1601 and reconfirmed on June 6, 1641.

The earlier Mennonite practice of settling all disputes without going to law long kept the oath question from becoming a serious issue in Germany. But after the 18th century, with settlement in the city and entering business life, involvement in legal matters was almost inevitable. Trouble arose on this account in Crefeld and in Mannheim. In the latter city a legal action was broken off because two Mennonites refused to swear the required oath. An appeal to the ruler resulted in a decree that Mennonites were to be granted the privilege of affirmation "according to previous practice." By 1893 Mennonites were exempt from the oath in practically all the German states (ten Doornkaat-Koolman). In the absence of a general uniform law for all Germany, however, Mennonite conference petitions were directed to securing such a law; e.g., the Vereinigung (q.v.) presented such a request to the Prussian authorities on Dec. 22, 1892, and again in 1910, and in 1910 to the federal authorities. The 1919 constitution of the German Republic instituted the secular oath (all reference to God omitted), but since Mennonites did not want to swear in any form they requested exemption.

In the United States and Canada the Mennonite immigrants coming from Europe at various times 1683-1880 received full recognition for their position on the oath. In this they were greatly aided by the prior arrival of the Quakers who had an identical position, the Quaker Colony of Pennsylvania being the only place of direct Mennonite settlement up to 1815. Recognition of the affirmation instead of the oath on grounds of conscience is not provided in the federal constitution, but the guarantee of religious freedom which it contains is understood to include this and has been so interpreted by the courts. However, many state constitutions include express provisions for the use of the affirmation in place of the oath, and there has never been any serious trouble on this point in the United States or Canada. The modern spirit of toleration in most countries makes it relatively easy to secure recognition of conscience in such matters almost anywhere, even in the absence of specific constitutional or legal guarantees.

It is noteworthy that the principle of nonswearing of oaths has been and still is upheld by all Mennonite groups of whatever country, conference, or theological position, the one historic Anabaptist-Mennonite principle of which this can be said. Individual exceptions of course have taken place, and there are no doubt Mennonites today who are careless in applying this principle in all legal matters. Some Mennonites, for example, who are notaries, follow the inconsistent practice of administering the oath to others; and others sign legal forms on which the oath is printed without substituting the word "affirm" for "swear," as they may legally do. To some this may seem to be a minor technicality, but where it is ignored the deeper meaning of the rejection of the oath has been obscured or lost.

(Details of the history and practice in Germany regarding the Mennonite objection to the oath are given in the exhaustive treatment by Neff in the article Eid, ML I, 542-46, which carried the account up to 1920, which article has been reproduced in somewhat condensed form above. The following supplementary section by William Klassen adds material chiefly on the attitude of the 16th-century South German Anabaptists toward the oath.)

NEFF, H.S.B.

In the major disputations between the Anabaptists and the Reformers the question of the oath had an important place. Hans Hillerbrand has correctly noted, "Contrary to the question of nonparticipation in war, where due to the absence of universal conscription in the sixteenth century the Anabaptist position remained largely a theoretical one, the problem of the oath was real and pertinent."

The earliest confession, drafted at Schleithem in February 1527, makes it clear that the Anabaptist stand against oaths was absolute. The oath is there defined as a confirmation among those who promise or are in disagreement with each other. It has been commanded in the law, but Christ who is the fulfillment of the law teaches that under no circumstances should His disciples swear an oath. The reason for this is that we cannot make a hair on our head white or black. Since we may not be able to accomplish the content of the oath due to the contingencies of human existence, the oath is forbidden.

After this definition of the oath and the exposition of Christ's teaching, the writers deal with certain objections to this interpretation. (1) To the objection implying that since God swore an oath to Abraham, man can do so also, Sattler, the editor if not author of the Schleithem articles, replies that God is able to accomplish His promise, whereas human beings cannot. (2) The objection insisting that Christ forbade only the swearing by certain things, such as temple, heaven, or the head, is answered with a reference to Christ's question: "You blind fools, what is greater, the throne, or he that sits upon it?" (3) To the argument asserting that swearing must be right, since Peter and Paul swore, the reply is that the apostles in calling God to witness were actually only testifying to what God will do, and not themselves promising what they will do; swearing and testifying are two different things. Testifying refers to the present, while swearing refers to the future. Even the statement by Simeon to Mary is here called a testimony, even though it clearly refers to the future. The final (4) argument for the rejection of the oath is the word of Christ, Let your word be Yes, Yes, and No, No, and whatever is above that is from the evil one. For it is clear that Christ did not permit the oath. All those who simply seek Christ will follow His clear word and understand it.

The Confession of Schleithem (q.v.) exerted a profound influence, not only among Anabaptists, but also evoked a reply from Zwingli and Calvin.

The standard objections to this Anabaptist position on the oath, found in both of these Reformers, are to a large extent anticipated in the Schleithem Confession. A large number of Anabaptists followed this interpretation of the oath and refused to swear under any circumstances. At Strasbourg those who refused to take the oath were identified as Anabaptists. Also the only Anabaptist treatise devoted exclusively to the oath was written at Strasbourg by Fridolin Meyer (q.v., Meiger) in 1528 in which the various Scripture passages on the oath were set side by side. This manuscript leaflet of four pages found with the record of his cross-examination indicates that the Strasbourg Anabaptists were discussing this issue.

Already before the convocation at Schleithem Hans Denk had formulated a position on the oath which he discussed in his treatise Von der wahren Liebe (January 1527). He argues that since man is unable to keep his vows or covenants, whatever appears as right should be performed without a promise or commitment. Where a man makes a vow concerning something over which he has no power, there is either a presumption without understanding, or else hypocrisy with understanding. He deals also with the argument that God's swearing justifies ours, since we are to become perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect! Denk rejects this because we do not have the power to accomplish our oath, and insists that we must follow the example of Christ.

Nor should anyone be too hasty in saying yes or no simply because it is allowed, for whoever assures someone with an affirmation, has already sworn, because he anticipates the will of God and might become a perjurer. This is not the case if one deals correctly as Paul did when it was impossible for him to carry out his plans with the Corinthians.

With respect to matters which have taken place in the past, Denk says that whoever would testify to them should do so with as few words as possible, yes or no, for whatever is above that must be settled with God. If someone has God as a witness to the truth of his statement, he may appeal to this fact, as Paul also did, only let him be careful not to take the name of God in vain, for this is forbidden in the law, as also the N.T. forbids swearing. In his "Recantation," Denk devotes the last section (X) to the oath. He begins again, as he did earlier, with the assertion that swearing, judging, etc., are not wrong in themselves, but forbidden so that no occasion be given to the flesh. The abuse of the oath, seen everywhere, is that it is assumed certain that what is sworn will take place. "Whoever has the mind and spirit of the Lord, promises, vows, and swears nothing, except that which he may do with a good conscience, namely, that which he is obligated to do out of the teaching of Christ, such as not to steal, not to kill, not to commit adultery, not to avenge oneself, and the like. And yet he will promise nothing, except on the grace of God, not what he will do, but rather what he would like to do, so that he is not guilty of presumptuousness.

"Summa, whatever one can say by the truth, that he may also testify to by God, even more by creatures, such as raising the hand and the like, . . .

whether one call it swearing or not, it has not been the meaning of Christ at any time to forbid such. Paul says: I call upon God as witness to my soul, as if to say, God shall repay my soul if I do not speak the truth. That is no different than the way a man swears today: This or that I will or desire to do, so help me God, i.e., if my will is not this, God will not help me, etc."

Denk is here cited at some length because he indicates a difference from the position of Schleithem in some important respects, and it may be that it is due to him that a number of important South German Anabaptists diverged from the statement of Schleithem on the subject of the oath.

Hans Hut, in his testimony of 1527 (October), asserts that the oath in community, civic, and state affairs is not forbidden by God and that the authority of government in this area can only be questioned when it demands an oath which is against God (see Hut in ML, but not in ME). Hut surely knew of Schleithem, and there are indications that he had had discussions with the Kürschner (Jacob Gross?) and others about the oath. The lack of uniformity in the traditions surrounding Hut calls for caution in evaluating this evidence, but on the surface it would seem to agree with the position which is later seen in the Marpeck brotherhood.

Pilgram Marpeck himself was accused by Bucer of teaching the Strasbourg Anabaptists that swearing and resisting are wrong, but he never discusses the oath at any length in any of his writings. The only possible exception is an epistle in the Kunstbuch attributed by Heinold Fast to Marpeck, directed to the Swiss Brethren (No. 8), dated 1543. The reference to the oath there is as follows: "Concerning the oath, we cannot captivate or bind anyone's conscience to your understanding of it (which we have abundantly and earnestly understood from you), nor can we bind a cord on anyone's neck, nor can we subjugate our conscience to your understanding. . . ." Unfortunately at this point a page is torn out, leaving the statement on the oath incomplete without proof of authorship. But the epistle shows that the South Germans had discussions with the Swiss about the oath, and that there was disagreement on it.

Jörg Rothenfelder (q.v.), the editor of the Kunstbuch, wrote a one-page discussion of the oath (fol. 157). But since this folio is without signature, it is possible that the page mentioned above as missing at the end of the Marpeck epistle is simply displaced to here. The position reflected in this statement deviates from the absolute rejection of the oath by Schleithem by equating calling God as witness with swearing an oath, and making it legitimate since Paul and Peter did this. Rothenfelder gave as one of the reasons why he left St. Gall earlier the differences between him and the Swiss Brethren, and one of the issues was the oath. So it is clear that there is a difference on this point between the Swiss Brethren and at least some of the South German Anabaptists.

How can one account for this difference? A comparison of Schleithem and Denk would reveal first of all that Denk was more interested in meeting abstract theological arguments than in legislating for a congregation. Schleithem, on the other hand, set out to demarcate clearly the differences between them and the false brethren. As a result it appears to be more legalistic than do the writings of Denk. A greater difference, however, is seen in their approach to the Scriptures. The method of Sattler is to take the face value of the words of Scriptures and attempt to fulfill them, whereas Denk and others after him attempted to grapple with the meaning of the Scripture.

On the question of the oath this difference becomes most apparent in connection with the pamphlet written by Wolfgang Musculus (q.v.) entitled Ain frydsams vnnd Christlichs Gesprech, ains Euangelischen, auff ainer, vnd ains Widertauffers, auff der andern seyten, so sy des Aydschwurs halben mitainander thund (Augsburg, 1533) (in GCL). Musculus knew the Anabaptists well, having served as Bucer's secretary in Strasbourg, and having left Strasbourg shortly before Pilgram Marpeck. In Augsburg in the later years he had discussions with Marpeck. Musculus was an acute exegete and a temperate polemicist against the Anabaptists, believing that they could be won through convincing arguments. The tone of his pamphlet is very gentle, and his effort to understand their position is apparent. Rothenfelder and perhaps Marpeck were convinced by his statement on the oath, mainly no doubt, because Musculus began with the Bible and allowed it to speak to the matter of the oath, trying to show that the Anabaptist interpretation actually did violence to the intent of Scripture. He begins his refutation with the definition of an oath, making it so broad that it includes not only the asseverations of Paul and the apostles, but also the "Verily, verily" of Jesus Himself, and then appeals to the principle of imitatio Christi as an argument for the oath. Musculus also discusses the assertion of the Anabaptists that the future is uncertain, hence human beings cannot commit themselves by means of an oath, saying that this interpretation would rule out all commitments and all vows, including the marriage vow. His position is that the oath is acceptable because it assures the hearer that the one who takes an oath has searched his heart and promises that, God giving him strength, he will fulfill his obligations. For the past, the oath has the effect of calling on God to witness that what he is saying is indeed true.

Musculus' treatment of the oath is a distinctly different approach to the subject. The main basis of his argument is not the Old Testament, but the New, but in the New he shows exegetical skill and an amazing knowledge of Jewish traditions that must have impressed any Anabaptist who read his pamphlet.

Through Martin Micron's translation into Dutch in 1535 the book by Musculus became an important element in the discussions between Menno and Micron in 1556. Micron defended the position of Musculus, while Menno said that the plain word of Scripture is "lamentably falsified and plastered over with the vile dung of satanic glosses, merely to suit the rulers" by both Musculus and Micron. Menno does more than simply discard their interpretations; he grapples with their views in several respects.

By bringing in the temporal and eternal categories Menno sought to invalidate Musculus' argument by stating that Paul and Christ's asseverations were only in the sphere of eternal matters, and that in temporal matters they did not use them. In doing so he tacitly granted the equating of the oath with calling God to witness, thus departing from Schleithem on this point. He also admits that in a sense a vow is the same as an oath, but is valid and necessary in the area of eternal truth which does not relate to temporal matters. Marriage vows and baptismal vows would come under this category. For his position he claims the support of men like Jerome, Erasmus, Philip Melancthon, Haymo, and Origen. The yea and the nay of the Anabaptist has the force of an oath because he does not lie, and so the rulers should not fear his refusal to swear. In Menno's writings on the oath the desire to fulfill the words of Christ literally comes strongly to the fore, and the faith is clearly stated that God will not deceive us with His doctrine. The aspect of promise for the future in an oath does not appear as strongly as it does among the Swiss and the South Germans.

The Anabaptists lived their lives in the immediacy of the divine Spirit, and a life thus lived refuses to be held by an oath. Thus when a group of Anabaptists were asked to swear an oath (Urfehde) never to return to Strasbourg in 1532, they refused to do so, stating that this would be trying to ascertain where the Spirit would next lead them. Logically, of course, while there is a strong element of Biblical truth here, this freedom rules out any long-term contract or commitment.

Widmoser has suggested that Marpeck distinguished between the secular and religious oath in much the same way Menno did, only he reversed the tables and made the secular oath permissible (e.g., to serve the city faithfully as an engineer) but ruled out any oath which might restrict his religious life. Support for this view is utterly lacking in the sources, and it is perhaps still more accurate to state that the Anabaptists did not differentiate between the secular and the religious realms in the way that Luther did in his two-kingdom view.

For the contemporary problem it is obvious that the oath has little place in a secularized society, whose God if it believes in one is totally irrelevant. The oath in that context is either a legal tool to make punishment for perjury possible, or else simply a remnant of a civilization once supposedly based on a Deity. Otto Bauernfeind has ably demonstrated the dilemma in which the oath has placed Protestant Christianity, and has shown that when the security of a society is threatened, recourse is taken to an oath (Nazis, loyalty oaths in America, Reformation time). This pathological trait of society creates difficulties for the church which has no policy on the oath, because in war, for instance, "the good and acceptable and perfect will of God is always affirmatively related to preparations for war, while for the establishment of peace it is always comfortably neutral." In a context like modern society the oath becomes utterly absurd, but a mere mechanical abstention from it does little to change the situation. As Bauernfeind shows, the oath was not a part of early Christianity, where the simple formula was yes, yes, and no, no. The principles involved in the oath go far beyond any slavish literal obedience to the letter of Scripture. W.K.L.

Beatrice Jenny, Das Schleithheimer Täuferbekenntnis 1527 (Thayngen, 1951) 16 f., 75 f.; Walter Fellmann, ed., Hans Denck Schriften II (Gütersloh, 1956) 84, 110; Menno Simons, Writings, 517-21, 922-27; Peter Rideman, Account of Our Religion, Doctrine and Faith (n.p., 1950, Engl. tr. of the Rechenschaft of 1545, printed 1565) 114-18; S. Hoekstra Bz., Beginnselen en leer der oude Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1863) 268; W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); Joh. Dyserinck, De vrijstelling van den eed voor de Doopsgezinden, eene historische Studie (Haarlem, 1883, enlarged reprint from De Gids, 1882, No. 10); idem, Het Recht der Waarheid tegenover den Staat (Bijdrage tot de eedvraag) (Amsterdam, 1902); J. ten Doornkaat-Koolman, Die Verpflichtung der Mennoniten an Eidesstatt (Berlin, 1893); Philipp Kiefern-dorf, Der Eid (Worms, 1892); K. Vos, "Bastiaan van Weenigen en het eedvraagstuk," in Nederl. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis, 1908; "Was heisst Mennonit" (extensive discussion of the oath), Monatsblätter der Mennonitengemeinde Krefeld (1905); Ein Christlich gespräch gehalten zuo Bern zwischen den Predicanten und Hansen Pfyster Mayer von Aarouw den Widertouff, Eyd, Oberkeyt, und andere Widertoufferische Artikel betreffende (n.p., n.d.—Bern, 1531); Joh. Oecolampadius, Underrichtung von den Widertouff, von der Oberkeit und von dem Eyd, auff Carlins N. Widertouffer Artikel (Basel, 1527); Wolfgang Meislin, Ain frydsams unnd christlichs Gesprech ains Evangelischenn, auff ainer, und ains Widertouffers, auff der andern seiten, so sy des Aydschwurs halben mitainander thund (n.p., 1533); Johann Faber, Von dem Ayd schwören. Auch von der Widertouffer Marter ... (n.p., 1550); Klaas Toornburg, Schriftuurlijke verhandelinge tegens het eedzweeren, en voor de wraak en weerloose lydsaemheyt en volmaecht liefde, die de christen moeten oeffenen, aen en omtrent de boose en vyanden ... (Alkmaar, 1688) (all the above titles are in GCL; DB 1863, 61; 1868, 27, 53 f.; 1875, 93 f.; 1876, 75; 1881, 43; 1883, 19; 1899, 181; 1904, 233; 1907, 162; 1908, 93, 197 f.; 1909, 83, 113; Menn. Bl., repeated references 1876-1921 (see ML I, 546 for specifics); B. Bauer, Der Eid, Eine Studie (Heidelberg, 1854); Brandt, Der Eid in den Reichsprozessordnungen (Kassel, 1895); Otto Proksch, "Das Eidesverbot Jesu Christi," Thüringer Kirchliches Jahrbuch XIII (1907) 21 f.; Johannes Pedersen, Der Eid bei den Semiten (1924); Otto Bauernfeind, Eid und Friede (Stuttgart, 1956); Hans J. Hillerbrand, "The Anabaptist View of the State," MQR XXX (1958) 105-7; Daniel Kauffman, Doctrines of the Bible (Scottsdale, 1929, 2nd ed. 1949) 517-21; George R. Brunk, Ready Scriptural Reasons (Scottsdale, 1926) 189-91; John C. Wenger, Separated Unto God (Scottsdale, 1951) 104-8; Gerhard Roosen, "On the Swearing of Oaths," Christian Conversation on Saving Faith (Scottsdale, 1941, Engl. tr. of Christliches Gemüthsgespräch, first ed. 1702 at Ratzeburg?); Das von den Gliedern der Mennonitengemeinde im Grossherzogthum Baden an Eidesstatt abzuleistende Handgelübde (Heilbronn, 1862, 2nd ed. Sinsheim, 1890); J. Dyserinck.

Ob Mission, a Mennonite mission along the Ob River in Siberia, Russia, opened by the Mennonites when World War I and the Russian Revolution cut them off from their work in foreign fields. As early as 1889 F. W. Baedeker (q.v.) and J. G. Kargel (q.v.), well-known leaders of the evangelical movement in Russia, preached in the prisons of Siberia. Here, in the Omsk district on the Ob River, they especially noticed the native Ostyaks (Khants), who lived under conditions similar to those of the Eskimos. During the Russo-Japanese War Karl Benzen (q.v.), a German Baptist and associated with Mennonite Brethren of Chortitza, engaged in evangelistic work and distribution of Bibles in this area, and during these five years among the German and Russian population he became acquainted with the Ostyaks. Upon his return to European Russia he advocated the cause of missions among them, especially in the Mennonite circles.

In 1918, during the Revolution, a group consisting of Johann Peters, his wife, his sister Helena, and Johann Kehler, all Mennonites, and Paul Beer and his wife, undertook the trip to Northern Siberia to begin mission work. They had no special preparation or any idea where they would find a field of labor nor any congregational backing. They settled on the territory along the Ob River from Tomsk to Narym, up to Khante Mansiysk, where the Irtysh River joins the Ob. They first contacted all evangelical Christians, usually Baptists, who had migrated or had been banished to this place. The natives of the territory are, besides the Ostyaks (Khants), the Voguls (Mans) and further north the Samoyeds (Nents). Small outposts were established from which the missionaries undertook preaching trips. Johann Peters and his group worked for five years around Narym. Karl Benzien and Johann Peters undertook a trip to the Mennonite settlements in Siberia to create interest in their work. In 1924 they were joined by six families and a few individuals. More stations were opened, some as far north as Obdorsk, covering at times an area extending some 750 miles north and south. In 1925 Johann Peters returned to his home settlement in Orenburg and also reported to the Mennonite General Conference (Bundeskonferenz) in Moscow, on the success in the work and the need for more workers and support. Enthusiastically he wrote in 1926: "Brethren, for nine years we have now had religious freedom in our country. Why do so many go to America and so very few come to the northern mission field where we can proclaim the Gospel without interference?" As a result interest in this work increased. Reports were published in Unser Blatt, contributions were made, and new workers arrived. Some of the workers preached in Russian, while others learned the native tongues of the various tribes. Special interest was shown by the Mennonites, especially the Mennonite Brethren, of the settlements in Siberia, Samara, and Orenburg, some of whose leaders even visited the mission stations.

A complete history of the efforts of Mennonites and other evangelical Christians to bring the Gospel to the exiled and imprisoned Russians and the natives of this area has not been written, nor is it known how long this work was continued. C.K.

Unser Blatt I, 24, 216, 242, 309; II, 271, 374; III, 16, 188; J. G. Kargel, Zwischen den Enden der Erde (Wernigerode, 1928); R. S. Latimer, Ein Bote des Königs, Dr. F. W. Baedeker's Leben und Wirken.

Obbe (Ubbo) Philips(z) (Filips) (c1500-68), a leader of the Anabaptists in the Netherlands, the (probably older) brother of the well-known Dirk Philips (q.v.), was the illegitimate son of a Catholic priest at Leeuwarden. The father gave the son a careful education. Whereas the gifted Dirk devoted himself to the study of theology, the likewise talented brother applied himself to the study of medicine. According to the custom of the time he practiced his profession as a barber rather than a physician, though the surgical services were the most important part of the barber's profession. About 1530 he married and set up shop in Leeuwarden.

Considering his intellectual interests it is not surprising to find that Obbe was drawn into the movements that began to stir the town. The idea of the Reformation came to the city early. Gellius Faber (q.v.) in the neighboring Jelsum was a zealous exponent of the new teaching. In the city itself Obbe made contacts with learned men who had studied at the University of Wittenberg and had there become acquainted with the leaders of the Reformation. Thus he soon began to question the correctness of Catholic doctrine. It is probable that he witnessed the first execution of an Anabaptist, Sicke Freerks (q.v.), which took place in his home town on March 20, 1531. The evangelicals of Leeuwarden at this time formed a circle that practiced a sort of mystic individualistic piety that attracted Obbe. They wished to "worship God quietly in the manner of the fathers and the patriarchs," so that "each one could seek God from his heart, and serve and follow Him without a preacher, teacher, or any other outward meeting" (Bekentenisse, 122).

His further religious development he described in his only extant writing, the "Confession" which, although written before 1560, was published after his death from the original manuscript by Cornelis Claesz in Amsterdam in 1584. The full title reads Bekentenisse Obbe Philipsz, waermede hy verclaert, sijn Predick-ampt sonder wettelicke beroeping gebruyckt te hebben, beclaecht hem dies, en waerschuwet einen yeders, wt sijnen eygen Boeck, met eyghener Handt gheschreuen, ghecopieert. It soon went through a second edition (without date), was translated into French by Charles de Nielles (Leiden, 1595) and republished in Dutch by Willem Jansz Stam in 1609. (Copies of all editions in AML, and of the 1609 edition in GCL.)

Soon afterward Obbe became acquainted with the Anabaptists, who were under the influence of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.). The feverish excitement stirred up in wide circles by his prophecies made a deep impression on Obbe. When Bartholomeus (Boeckbinder) van Halle (q.v.) and Dirck Cuper (q.v.), emissaries of Jan Matthijsz of Haarlem (q.v.), arrived in Leeuwarden, Obbe did not hesitate, emerged from his seclusion and was baptized with many others by these emissaries. This happened in November or December 1533. These men must have considered him to be the best suited person to spread their ideas, for on the next day he and a friend Hans Scheerder (q.v.) were ordained to preach, to baptize, and to lead the brotherhood (Bekentenisse, 129).

Filled with zeal Obbe left the city at once after his ordination, to preach and baptize with his brethren and to promote the new doctrine. Meanwhile, however, the authorities had become aware of the movement, especially when in Obbe's absence another prophet, Peter de Houtzager (q.v.), had appeared in Leeuwarden and continued the preaching of "the imminent destruction of all tyrants." Thus when Obbe returned after some time, he found the city gates closed at midday, and managed only with difficulty to enter. The authorities were looking for the leaders of the movement; finally when his name appeared on a bulletin of the Stadholder (Feb. 23, 1534) as one of the "seducers and deceivers who wander about the country, who rebaptize people and teach bad and dangerous errors and sects," he realized that he could no longer stay in the city.

Obbe then went to Amsterdam and made contacts with the very numerous brethren there, who called themselves Bondgenoten (q.v., comrades of the covenant). There were already two wings, representing diametrically opposed ideas. The majority had preserved their sobriety and leaned toward the quiet ideas of Jacob of Campen (q.v.). Obbe was attracted to this group. But the other party was already under the dubious influence of Jan Matthijsz, who wanted to bring about by violent means the imminent coming of the kingdom of God which he proclaimed. Obbe did not stay in Amsterdam. He was no longer secure anywhere. In the late fall of 1534 he came to Delft, where he ordained David Joris (q.v.) as elder. He had already ordained his brother Dirk Philips at Appingedam, and he also ordained Menno Simons later in Groningen (about 1537, after he had baptized Menno probably at the end of 1535 or in January 1536).

In the time before and after the Münster catastrophe it was difficult to find the right course to follow. The men who had really drawn him to the Anabaptist movement he saw in the camp of the revolutionaries. He needed all his strength to resist the enticing ideas of this group. "But God knows that Dirk and I could not find it in our hearts that such attacks were right, and also diligently preached against them, but nothing did any good, for the great majority were of that mind. . . . Sometimes some of us were saddened to death and our hearts became chilled in our bodies, and we did not know whither to go or what we ought to do: the whole world was persecuting us for the sake of our faith with fire, water, sword, and bloody tyranny, the prophets deceived us on every hand and the letter of Scripture took us captive, the false brethren whom we reprov'd and opposed swore to kill us, and the love of so many hearts aroused our pity to such a degree, as God knows, that my soul was often saddened to death" (Bekentenisse, 135). The assertion by Mellink (Wederdopers, 367 f., 381, 394) that in 1534-35 Obbe had much contact with revolutionary Anabaptists is at the least very questionable. The fact that many persons baptized by him soon after belonged to the revolutionary wing is no proof, and Mellink himself admits (op. cit., 390 and especially 267) that Obbe in 1535 remained aloof from the revolutionary plans.

Until Menno Simons became the leader of the peaceful Anabaptists, all that were averse to violence and fanatical enthusiasm looked up to Obbe as their leader. For this reason the early Dutch Anabaptists of this period were often called Obbites or Obbenites. After Münster, when no distinction was made by the public anywhere between the violent and the peaceful Anabaptists, though the radical difference had just been very clearly demonstrated, Obbe apparently went to Germany. Nearly all trace of him is lost. He appeared about 1539 in the region of Rostock, after he had found some followers in Schwerin. This is gathered from a letter written by Joachim Kükenbieter, the Lutheran preacher of Schwerin, to Johann Gartzke, his colleague in Hamburg, warning him of the Obbenites; he gave them the surprising testimony that they "to some extent honored the government and were not revolutionaries" (DB 1884, 16).

By 1540 Obbe's activity seems to have come to an end. A list of elders of the early period contains for 1540 the note that Obbe Philips had "fallen away." He was no longer working with Menno Simons. In his writing against Gellius Faber, Menno said, "That Obbe has become a Demas and Adam Pastor has left us I could not prevent; the same thing happened also during the time of the apostles. May God restore them according to His will. They have received their dismissal and are no longer (as long as they are not converted) reckoned among us" (Complete Writings, 761). It is more difficult to determine to whom Obbe then attached himself. For his "falling away" he gives only one important reason: the illegitimacy of his office, which made him feel that his ordaining others was also a great wrong. That is the reason for his writing the confession. It begins and ends with this. Some have concluded from it that he returned to the Catholic Church, which alone offers a guarantee for the legality of a church office by the apostolic succession. But de Hoop Scheffer is right in calling attention to the fact that his utterances concerning the papacy as "a Sodom of Babylon, Egypt, and an abomination of desolation" (Bekentenisse, 122) refute this supposition. Other supporters, viz., that he became an unbeliever (Herman Schijn), or joined the "House of Love" as a follower of Hendrik Niclaes (q.v.), are not very tenable. The attempt of W. J. Kühler to present him as typical of the individualistic-spiritualistic Anabaptist wing of Sebastian Franck (q.v.) merits consideration (Geschiedenis I, 1932, 230 ff.). Indeed, there is some similarity between his ideas and those of Franck. In his confession he cited Franck's Chronica (Bekentenisse, 122). Like the latter he repudiated all existing churches, believing that the true church of God is invisible, and any attempt to establish it in a visible form is wrong, unless there were a direct commission of God. Obbe received his commission from Jan Matthijsz, and this call was "illegitimate." He therefore considered himself as one who has been deceived and has deceived others.

Nevertheless Obbe spoke with deep respect of baptism on confession of faith even after his defection, and was on the whole not far removed from the principles of the peaceful Anabaptists. He spoke sharp words only against those who had been revealed as false prophets and revolutionaries, not against Menno and his followers.

Even if the shadows concealing the last year of his life until his death in 1568 can never be entirely lifted, it can be asserted, in the light of known facts, that Kühler's verdict is not unjustified, "that in Obbe the brotherhood certainly lost its most appealing leader" (Geschiedenis I, 232). P.S., vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis I; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "De bevestiger van Menno Simons," DB 1884, 1-24, German translation in Menn. Bl., 1884, 77 ff. (somewhat shortened); Bekentnisse Obbe Philipsz (BRN VII, 121-38), with critical introduction by Samuel Cramer, 91-120; J. C. Burgmann, Commentatio Historio-ecclesiastica. De Ubbone Philippo et Ubbonitis (n.p.-Rostock, 1773); K. Vos, "Obbe Philips," DB 1917, 124-38; 1876, 20; 1906, 29 f.; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1909, 161; 1916, 131; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim; ML III, 369-71.

Obbe Philipsz Bekentnisse: see Bekentnisse.

Obbenites, the name given to the followers of Obbe Philips 1533 ff.

Obbes(z), Nittert (c1581-c1636), a Mennonite preacher, a native of Pilsum, East Friesland, Germany, came to Amsterdam as a tailor in 1598. In 1614 he was called to preach for the Waterlander congregation in the Groote Spijker, as a colleague of Reynier Wybrands, Cornelis Claesz Anso (q.v.), and Pieter Andriesz Hesseling (q.v.). The choice was unfortunate. Nittert came under the influence of Socinianism and brought it to the pulpit, though in concealed form. Called to account by the fellow ministers and by Hans de Ries (q.v.), the Waterlander elder, Nittert promised to refrain from preaching this doctrine. Nittert then drew up in writing a number of points in which he accused de Ries as well as the other Amsterdam preachers of fanaticism; they taught two different Words of God, i.e., besides the written Word also an unwritten Word. De Ries denied the charge. The fact is that whereas Nittert held determinedly that the written Word is a dead letter, being therein a disciple of Socinus, de Ries and his following made a distinction but not a separation, between the Scripture and Jesus Christ, the inner Word. The charge that de Ries suppressed the written Word in favor of the inner Word he vigorously denied.

It was Jan Theunisz (q.v.), a friend and follower of Nittert Obbesz, who in 1625 published without Nittert's knowledge a book written by Nittert, and gave it the insulting title Raegh-besem, seer bequaem om sommige Mennonijtsche schuren te reinigen van de onnutte spinnwebbens, sotte grollen en ydelheden eeniger Gheest-drijveren, Swinck-vel-dianen ende des selfs voorstanderen, die op hun bysondere drijvingen ende inspraken steunen tot verminderingh van 't beschreven woordt Godts.

De Ries defended himself in a pamphlet Ontdekkinge der dwalingen (1627); the Amsterdam preachers wrote their Apologia in 1626. Jan Theunisz tried to defend his friend. The poet Joost van den Vondel (q.v.), at that time a member of the Waterlander congregation, intervened in Nittert's favor and wrote his malicious Antidotum (q.v.). He apparently did not grasp the core of the quarrel and completely misunderstood the Amsterdam preachers. A large number of pamphlets dealt with the quarrel; e.g., Dialogus ofte T'samen-sprekinge tusschen een Waerheydt-soeckende Neutralist ghenaeamt Vrederick ende een Waterlandsch Broeder (Amsterdam, 1626). Nittert himself wrote Eenighe Vragen met een brief aen Hans de Rys and Oprechtigheyd van Reynier Wybrandsz, Pieter Andriesz en Cornelis Claesz . . ., both of 1626.

When Nittert found followers in other places, especially in Rotterdam (Eduard Nabels, q.v.), North Holland (Jan Willemsz of De Rijp, q.v.), and even in Franeker, an attempt was made to mediate the difficulty. Rippert Eenkes and other neutral preachers drew up a confession of faith on Sept. 5, 1626, which agreed with de Ries and repudiated Socinianism. Nittert yielded his views and signed the document on Sept. 9, 1626. He was suspended from preaching and not reinstated. His following continued the dispute for a time. Jan Theunisz submitted in 1634. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 548; II, Nos. 1180, 1204-31, 1366; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 143-75; H. F. Wijman, "Jan Theunisz," in Jaarboek Amstelodamum XXV (1928), particularly pp. 78-100; DB 1865, 51, 57-72; ML III, 282.

Obbites or Obbenites (Dutch, Obbi(e)ten or Obbeniten), a wing of the Dutch Anabaptists named for Obbe Philips (q.v.).

Obelecker, Tele, an Anabaptist martyr of Mühlhausen, Thuringia, Germany, baptized by Heinz Kraut (q.v.), was drowned in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern with nine brethren on Nov. 8, 1537. In the cross-examinations held on Oct. 19 and 22, 1537, she confessed her faith, rejecting infant baptism and the oath, but promising obedience to the government. (Wappler, Thüringen, 158 ff.; ML III, 283.) NEFF.

Oberbayern: see Bavaria.

Oberbiegelhof: see Büchelhof.

Oberecker (Overacker, Overakker), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Affers in the Adige Valley of Tirol, Austria (now Italy), was sent with Hieronymus Käls (q.v.) and Michael Seifensieder (q.v.) to Tirol as a missionary of the Hutterian Brethren. They were seized in Vienna. Hans was burned at the stake on March 31, 1536. In prison the two men wrote an important Rechenschaft und Bekentnis besides several epistles to the brotherhood in Moravia and their relatives. Three times, wrote Hans Oberecker, the day of the Lord had appeared to him, so that he "prayed that God would let him incur this wrath, which is so great and dreadful upon wickedness." NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 119-22; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 127-29; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 158; L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938) 205-10, contains their Confession; Wolkan, Lieder, 170; Mart. Mir. D 39, E 445; ML III, 283.

Oberflörsheim, a village between Alzey and Monsheim, Rhenish Hesse, Germany. As early as 1664 the Mennonite lists in the Karlsruhe archives name four Mennonite families in this village, and in 1685 the families of Peter Weber, Peter Mundorf, Peter Dahlem, Johann Dahlem, Johann Horbach, and Dietrich Schwarz are listed with 42 persons. In 1738 the families of Arnold Kramer, Johann Hahn, and Johannes Schmidt were added. In 1732 the congregation numbered 13 families; the preacher was Christian Weber, the deacons Johann Dahlem and Heinrich Rupp; the latter lived in Gundersheim. Members of the congregation also lived in Monzernheim and Dahlsheim. Here the families of Jakob Heer, Johann Geber, Abraham Müller, Johannes Nold, and Abraham Kolb are named in 1743.

The Dutch Naamlijst names Christian Weber as a preacher here from 1725 and elder 1728-c75. Other ministers were Jacob Dalman (Dahlem), elder 1740-?, Wilhelm Kramer (Krämer) 1748-c80, Johann Schörger, Heinrich Müller 1759-?, Henrich Strohm, Peter Müller, Jacob Hahn, Jilles (?) Hahn 1772, Wilhelm Weber 1775, Peter Krämer 1775. In 1766 the Naamlijst calls this congregation Oberflörsheim-Spiesheim-Griesheim, in 1769-82 Oberflörsheim and Guntersheim, and from 1784 Oberflörsheim. In 1769 the Oberflörsheim-Spiesheim congregation had about 100 members. The list of 1752 gives particulars concerning the families and financial resources of the Mennonites of Oberflörsheim. It lists six families: Jakob Dahlem with six children, Jakob Hahn with seven, Wilhelm Krämer with four, Johannes Schmitt with five, Christian Weber with four, and Peter Weber with four children, a total of 42 persons, with a total capital of 12,000 florins.

In 1737 the following incident of religious intolerance is recorded: Dietrich Weber married a Catholic servant girl; the children were brought up in the Mennonite faith. The oldest was baptized as an adult. Then the Catholic clergy compelled the children to become Catholic. The father was compelled to join one of the three recognized churches. All pleas and petitions of the father and the congregation were in vain. The father finally joined the Reformed Church.

The Danzig Namensverzeichnis of 1805 lists Johann Galle as the elder of the congregation from 1766 until his death in 1838 (he had left Monzernheim in 1803), Philip Weber and Peter Krämer as leaders from 1775. The Danzig Namensverzeichnis of 1857 names only Jakob Krämer as leader. It states further that preaching services were alternately conducted by Löwenberg of the Weierhof and Molenaar of Monsheim; the latter soon took charge alone until 1866, when the congregation was dissolved. The inhabitants of the village joined the Monsheim congregation. The cemetery was sold. In 1957 there were four Mennonite families and four part families living in the village, and the burgomaster was a Mennonite named Stauffer. NEFF, vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1472; Müller, Berner Täufer, 211; Namensverzeichnis; Naamlijst; Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 11, p. 170; ML III, 283 f.

Obergum, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a small Mennonite congregation, which had a meetinghouse here, remodeled in 1806, but soon after abandoned. The congregation was also known as Winsum and Obergum, or only Winsum (a neighboring village). It belonged to the Flemish branch, not to the Old Flemish as most congregations in this province did, and was a member of the "Humsterlandsche Sociëit" (q.v.). In the 18th century the following preachers served here: Eltje Hans, resigned 1754, Andreas Huizinga 1740-c55, Jan Syrts 1740-c55, Jan Pieters Reckers 1754-c65, Johannes Adema 1766-c87. Then the pulpit became vacant. In 1816 the Mennonites at Obergum and Winsum joined the newly founded congregation of Mensingeweer (q.v.), which arose from the merger of a number of small congregations in this area. About 1670 a second Mennonite congregation, belonging to the Ukowallist (q.v.) group, built a meetinghouse at Obergum. About this congregation no further information was available. Probably it soon died or merged with another congregation. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2175 f.; Naamlijst 1815, 107; 1829, 65; DB 1906, 46; G. A. Wumkes, De Gereformeerde Kerk in de Ommelanden... (Groningen, 1904) 39.

Oberholtzer (Overholtzer, Overholser, Overholt), a Mennonite family name, probably of Swiss origin. One of the immigrants bearing this family name was a Martin Oberholtzer (1709-44) of Germany who settled in the Deep Run (q.v.) area of Bucks County, Pa. A Jacob Oberholtzer was living in Franconia Township, Montgomery Co., Pa., in 1719. The settlers of 1710 in what is now Lancaster County, Pa., included two Oberholtzers, Martin and Michael. Descendants of the family in Lancaster County included two deacons, a preacher (MC), and Bishop Jacob Oberholtzer (c1826-88) of Bowmansville (GCM). The Franconia Conference Oberholtzers included at least six preachers, three deacons, and a bishop, Isaac Oberholtzer (1815-87) of the Blooming Glen congregation. The Ontario Conference (MC) included a deacon and a preacher bearing the name. By far the most prominent representative of the family was John H. Oberholtzer (q.v., 1809-95), a preacher from 1842 in the Franconia Conference, founder of what is now the Eastern District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1847, a bishop from 1847 (GCM), schoolteacher, locksmith, publisher, and author. He played a major role in the formation of the General Conference (GCM). In Westmoreland County, Pa., one of the pillars in what is now the Scottdale church (MC) was John D. Overholt (1797-1878), ordained preacher in 1830 and bishop in 1833. His uncle Abraham Overholt (1785-1870) was a successful distiller from 1810 (Old Overholt Whiskey) and a member (trustee at times) in the church (MC). This Overholt family descends from the above Martin Oberholtzer. A preacher Jacob Oberholtzer of Bucks County, Pa., moved to Mahoning County, Ohio, in 1806, and became the first ordained Mennonite minister in Ohio, organizing the congregation there. J.C.W.

E. S. Loomis, Some Account of Jacob Oberholtzer who settled about 1719, in Franconia Township, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania (Cleveland, 1931); A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Martin Oberholtzer (Milton, N.J., 1903).

Oberholtzer, Jacob (1767-1847), a Mennonite (MC) minister, who (according to tradition) lived in Bucks County, Pa., and moved to what is now Mahoning County, Ohio, in 1806. He was the first ordained Mennonite minister to take up residence in Ohio. He organized the congregation in Mahoning County in 1815, and in 1833 he contributed land for church, cemetery, and school.

The Mennonites of Beaver Township supported a church school. In 1828, when legislation was enacted by the state whereby taxes could be levied to establish public schools, dissension arose within the congregation on the question of private or public schools. A group, led by Jacob Oberholtzer, favored church schools in order to preserve the German language. When the issue was decided in favor of public schools in 1834, Jacob Oberholtzer moved to Ashland County, Ohio, and served the congregations there until his death. He was a forceful speaker. He was married twice. His first wife was Catherine Baughman (d. 1806), to whom were born seven children, and his second Elisabeth Mellinger, of Mahoning County, to whom were born thirteen children.

W.D.S.

Oberholtzer, John H. (1809-95), one of the founders and outstanding leaders of the General Conference Mennonite Church, was born on a farm near Clayton, Berks Co., Pa., on Jan. 10, 1809, the second child of Abraham and Susanna Hunsberger Oberholtzer and the fourth generation from immigrant Jacob Oberholtzer, who landed at Philadelphia in 1732. At the age of 16 he began teaching in local schools. Later learning the trade of a locksmith, he established himself in a shop near Milford Square, Bucks County. He became very skillful as a locksmith and his German locks are still to be found in the community. He supported himself by this trade during his later ministry when his ministerial labors and printing enterprises were causes of expense to him. His aggressive spirit did not rest with these accomplishments, for he continued to educate himself in spare moments. He became an able writer and fluent speaker. In 1842, at the age of 33 years, the Swamp Mennonite Church (Franconia Conference, MC) called him as a preacher. He became a fluent and fascinating speaker and preached in neighboring churches of other denominations, an unheard-of innovation among Mennonites of the day. From the beginning of his ministry he organized children's Bible classes which he called "Kinderlehre." He started using a European Mennonite catechism and later developed these Sunday afternoon classes into one of the early Mennonite Sunday schools in America at West Swamp in 1857.

Following his call into the ministry in 1842 Oberholtzer found himself dissatisfied with many customs and methods of the Mennonite church of his day. He did not at first wear the ministerial straight-collar coat as required by the conference, though later he was willing to do so. Perhaps the greatest cause of distress was the lack of a written constitution and minutes in the conference. Questions of discipline and polity from pioneer days had always been decided by the conference without any definite written standards. In 1847 Oberholtzer proposed such a written constitution to the Franconia Conference. This proposed innovation, coupled with a growing ill-will against him engendered by other things, such as the temporary refusal to wear the prescribed coat, occasioned the unfortunate conference division of October 1847. On Oct. 28, 1847, Oberholtzer took the lead in organizing a new Mennonite conference with other older and younger ministers and leaders dissatisfied with the old conference. This division, perhaps the most far-reaching of all schisms in the American Mennonite Church, brought forth much controversy during the past century. Without maligning or defending John Oberholtzer, or aligning him with later errors of his group, it is fair to state that from his own writings and actions it is clear he was not interested in changing the basic doctrines of the church. It was his desire rather to introduce new ways of propagating the old Gospel, such as Christian education through ministerial training and Sunday schools, missionary work, and publication work. He was ahead of his time. The Mennonite Church (MC) for the most part was not ready to accept the new ways of working.

Oberholtzer pioneered in other "firsts." In 1844 he drew up a constitution for the Swamp Mennonite congregation, probably the first congregational constitution among American Mennonites. In 1850, through his leadership, West Swamp adopted a plan for "the poor and suffering members of the Christian community," an early mutual aid plan. Probably the most important of all was his periodical, the Religiöser Botschafter, started in 1852, the first successful Mennonite periodical in America. He purchased a hand printing press for his locksmith shop, learned to set type, and became the editor, printer, and agent for this enterprise. He was one of the leaders who founded the General Conference of the Mennonite Church in Iowa in 1860. He was a staunch supporter of its early mission work among the American Indians, and was a mission board member until 1881. He was one of the first to encourage a trained and supported ministry and was a leader in supporting the Mennonite seminary operated at Wadsworth, Ohio, 1867-78.

In 1872 Oberholtzer resigned as chairman of the Eastern District Conference, a position he had held from the beginning in 1848. From then until his death he continued to preach and serve, but not as a conference leader. The work had passed into other hands, but he still attended conferences and took a vital interest in the ongoing work of the General Conference Mennonite Church. He preached until October 1894. He died Feb. 15, 1895, at the age of 86+ J.H.F.

"Life of John H. Oberholtzer," The Mennonite, March 1895, p. 44; "Obituary of J. H. Oberholtzer," Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac for 1896, p. 28; "A Pennsylvania Mennonite Church," Menn. Life II (October 1947) 33; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); J. H. Oberholtzer, Der Wahre Charakter von J. H. Oberholtzer (Milford Square, 1860); Bender, Two Centuries, 90-93; ML III, 284.

Oberholtzer Mennonite Church (MC), built in Beaver Twp., Mahoning Co., Ohio, in 1825. The land was donated by Jacob Oberholtzer (q.v.), a minister of the congregation. The building committee for this log church, 30 x 36 ft., was George Baughman and Jonathan Oberholtzer. In 1871 this log church was replaced by a brick church, 40 x 50 ft., begun in 1869 located a short distance to the southwest. The building committee for this brick church was Jacob Yoder, Daniel Ziegler, and Melchior Mellinger. The erection of this new church precipitated an Old Order (Wisler) (q.v.) schism in the Columbiana-Mahoning congregation in 1872, which followed Bishop Jacob Wisler from the main body in Indiana. In 1898 the building was enlarged. This church was known as Oberholtzer's until 1898, when it was called the Middle Church. About 1900 Allen Rickert, a minister, suggested, "Let's call it Midway." David Lehman was the first to use the name in making announcements from the pulpit. The name Midway (q.v.) Mennonite Church continues to the present. In August 1957 a marker of Georgia granite was placed on the site of the original log church.

W.D.S.

Oberländer: see Overlanders.

Oberlehen and Oberpenning (Oberpanning), villages in the Tirolean districts of Kitzbühel and Hopfgarten, Austria. Upon the request of the clerk Hans Finsterwalder the imperial government at Innsbruck sent him detailed instructions on April 2, 1528, on how to deal with penitent Anabaptists and those who reported to the authorities. The instructions were as follows: Leaders and baptizers should be put to death. Special efforts should be made to apprehend the preacher Pauls and his successor Hans Rat, who had been so brazen as to hold meetings at Münichau (q.v.), the castle of the suspect Helene von Freyberg (q.v.), for which she was to be called to account by the Innsbruck authorities. The possessions of 30 fugitive Anabaptists were to be confiscated. The houses in which Anabaptist meetings were held in Oberpanning, Taurer, Seebach, Oberlehen, Bühel, and Pfaffenberg, and Schussling at Münichau should be burned or torn down, unless they were in such a location that other houses would be threatened thereby, to set an example, as had already been done in the Rattenberg district. If it should not be possible to destroy them, they should be confiscated and held for further instruction.

P.DE.

Kopialbuch Causa Domini im Tiroler Land, Regierungsarchiv II, 204 ff.; Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML III, 284 f.

Oberlen (Oberli), Christian, an Anabaptist martyr, put to death at Bern, Switzerland, on Sept. 17, 1543. Particulars are lacking. This martyr is not listed in the Dutch editions of 1660 and 1685 of van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, but is found with some other Bernese martyrs in the German edition published at Ephrata in 1748. A Peter Oberley (Oberli) is named in a letter dated June 13, 1711, by the Dutch ambassador Runckel (q.v.). He was an Amish elder in Switzerland; in 1762 he made a tour of the congregations in the Palatinate, Germany.

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. E 1130; Müller, Berner Täufer, 211; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 24, No. 37; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1334.

Obernassau, one of the oldest Mennonite congregations in West Prussia, Germany, formerly called Nischeffe (Nieschewski, q.v.), founded in the middle of the 16th century below the town of Thorn, apparently by Dutch settlers; the congregation belonged to the Waterlander (also called Frisian) branch. Some of the members lived on the Korzeniecer Kämpe (q.v.), an island in the Vistula. In Obernassau a church was built in 1778, which was burned by lightning on June 11, 1889, but was rebuilt with the aid of other congregations and dedicated on Nov. 2, 1890, by Elder Hans Foth. The substantial tower on this church was an exception in Mennonite church architecture. The Dutch Naamlijst names a number of ministers who served here: Jacob Adriaen, Jacob Adriaen de Jonge, Hans Flemming (Flaming, Vlaming) 1737, Hendrik Bartels, Cornelis Jantzen, Jacob Eck about 1760-80, Peter Bartels 1764, Hans Nikkel, preacher 1766, elder 1779-after 1810, Zacharias Bartel 1773, Jakob Bartel 1779-82, Abraham Eck 1780, Zacharias Bartel 1796, Cornelius Baltzer 1801.

About 1775 a number of members left Obernassau and moved to Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) near Warsaw, Poland; among these emigrants was their preacher Hans Flaming. The reason for this migration was apparently economic, farming having become very difficult in Obernassau because of repeated floods and high taxes. After the serious flood of 1736 the Dutch Mennonites gave considerable relief, as they did again in 1888.

In the 19th century emigration to Russia and to America reduced the congregation; living conditions had changed. When they settled on the island the Vistula flooded their land, to be sure, but the sediment left on the fields produced good crops. But the dams built for the railroads narrowed the channel of the river to such an extent that the river washed away the good soil and destroyed crops. The dams built by the people offered little protection. Great damage was caused by the flood of 1855, followed by others, usually just before the harvest, in 1871, 1879, 1883, 1888, 1891, 1896, and 1903. At the beginning of the 20th century the farmers on the Korzeniecer Kämpe had to leave when a harbor was built there. Two Mennonite families, Dirks and Foth, moved to Thorn in 1906.

In 1815 twenty families belonged to this congregation; in 1852 the baptized membership was 64 (besides 28 children), in 1888 it was 61 (besides 27 children); in 1905 the membership numbered 43, and in 1933 only 12, including children. The last ministers were David Dirks, elder from 1878, and Heinrich Foth, preacher from 1875, later elder, died c1909. The Gemeinde-Kalender of 1941 lists the congregation as having 12 members, four of them with the right to vote.

HEGE.

W. Kerber, "Die Kirche zu Nessau," Gem.-Kal., 1906, 107-14 with pictures; "Die Gemeinde zu Obernassau bei Thorn," Menn. Bl., 1905, 29; Gesch.-Bl., 1937, 73; 1939, 34; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1883, 17, 19; 1888, 15 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1640, 1642, 1647 f.; DB 1910, 189; ML III, 285.

Oberösterreich: see Austria.

Oberpfalz: see Bavaria.

Oberschulze (German for mayor or executive official) was the highest officer of the district or county (German, Gebietsamt, q.v.; Russian volost) in the Mennonite settlements in Russia, Manitoba, Mexico, and South America. Each village had a mayor (Schulze) and all the villages of a single Mennonite settlement were administered by the Gebietsamt, of which the Oberschulze was the head. The position of the Oberschulze in civic matters was parallel to that of the elder in the spiritual realm (see also Government of Mennonites in Russia).

The Oberschulzen of Chortitza were Peter Siemens, 1801-5; Nikolai Krahn and Peter Siemens, 1808-23; Isaak Töws, Jacob Penner, Peter Löwen, and Jacob Bartsch, 1832-38; Jakob von Kampen and Jacob Bartsch, 1841-54; Johann Siemens, Jacob Dyck, Jakob Hamm, and Heinrich Martens, 1869-72; Jakob Braun, Isaak Lehn, Peter Andres, and Johann Hildebrand, 1881-87; Franz Thiessen, Peter Dyck, Heinrich Fröse, Kornelius Martens, Peter Koop, and Jacob Wiebe, 1905-8; Johann Hübert and Jakob Wiebe, 1909.

Molotschna Oberschulzen were Klaas Wiens, 1804-6; Johann Klassen, 1806-9; Gerhard Reimer and Johann Klassen, 1812-15; Peter Töws, Gerhard Enns, Johann Klassen (Orloff), Johann Klassen (Tiegerweide), and Johann Regehr, 1833-42; Abraham Töws, 1842-48; David Friesen, 1848-65; Franz Dyck, 1865-67; Abraham Driedger and Kornelius Töws, 1868-73; Abraham Wiebe, 1873-79; Peter Dück and Klaas Enns, 1882-85; Johann Enns, 1885-89; Klaas Enns and Peter Neufeld, 1889-99; Franz Nickel, 1899-1906; Dietrich Dyck, 1906-10.

In 1870 a new district was organized known as "Gnadenfeld," where the following served as Oberschulze: Wilhelm Ewert, 1870-71; Franz Penner, 1871; Peter Ewert, Gerhard Fast, and David Unruh, 1878-87; Gerhard Dürksen, 1887-1904; Jacob Dürksen, 1904-10. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 678 ff.) C.K.

Obersülzen, a village near Grünstadt in the Palatinate, Germany, in which there was a comparatively large Anabaptist congregation in 1568 with preachers and deacons. After the Thirty Years' War the congregation was united with Gerolsheim (q.v.) and Heppenheim a.d. Wiese (q.v.). Regular church services were held in rotation in the three villages. The congregation was originally called Gerolsheim; Müller states that Dirmstein (q.v.) and Offstein (q.v.) belonged to the total congregation. In 1732 it numbered 40 families; the preachers were Hans and Christian Borckholder, the deacons were Christian Stauffer of Obersülzen and Johannes Hirschler of Gerolsheim; in 1769 the congregation had 69 baptized members. Beginning in 1783 the congregation was called Heppenheim. It is listed thus in the resolutions of Ibersheim (q.v.), which were signed for the congregation by Gerhard Hütwohl of Heppenheim. Several years later the center of gravity shifted to Obersülzen, which has remained the seat of the congregation. Since the middle of the 19th century it has been merged with Monsheim.

In 1671 a number of Swiss Mennonite emigrants settled near Obersülzen. Jacob Everlin (Eberlinck), probably a minister of the Obersülzen congregation, corresponded with the Lamist Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam, sending a list of the names of these Swiss Brethren. Thereupon four delegates of the Amsterdam congregation visited Obersülzen in 1672 and supported the immigrants with a considerable amount of money. Everlin also reports concerning doctrinal differences between the Swiss Brethren and his own congregation. Abstracts of letters written by the Dutch delegates in 1671-72 and sent from Obersülzen are found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, E 1125-27.

On May 5, 1682, the Alzey district officials demanded a report on a funeral of the Anabaptists in Obersülzen, at which a large meeting of the same took place, and on their Sunday service, at which preachers coming from other localities functioned. The reply was that after the preacher who had lived among them for twenty years had died, they had been holding a meeting every three or four weeks in a home or in a barn, attended by 50-100 Anabaptists from the surrounding villages. The present preacher (Vermahner) lived at Gerolsheim, and occasionally one came from Rodenbach and Mannheim. Thus the funeral had been attended by many Mennonites from the vicinity. Thereupon all meetings of the Mennonites were prohibited in Obersülzen and at Heppenheim. Then the Mennonites in the Alzey district presented a joint petition to the elector on Sept. 7, 1682, to be permitted to conduct their services according to the concession they had received. The petition was granted. On March 5, 1688, a conference was held at Obersülzen, at which the Strasbourg Articles of 1568 and 1607 with directions and advice for preachers and elders were augmented. The Dutch Naamlijst names the following ministers in the 18th century: Ulrich Burckholder, preacher 1742-c80, Jacob Hirschler, preacher 1756, elder 1761-81, Martin Blümm 1760, Gerhard Hutwohl 1769, Johann Burckholder 1784, Johann Lehman, elder 1782. Heinrich Fried (d. 1761), preacher, is named in letters sent from Obersülzen to Amsterdam.

The last lay preachers chosen from the members were Johann Burckholder of Gerolsheim from 1838, Heinrich Herstein of Obersülzen from 1845 (also elder), and Daniel Hirschler of Heppenheim from 1853. On Sept. 25, 1859, Johannes Molenaar, pastor of the Monsheim congregation, preached his funeral sermon and assumed the duties of minister in the congregation, which dedicated a new chapel in 1866. From 1862 the Obersülzen congregation was officially a branch of the Monsheim congregation. In 1890 the Mennonite residents of Battenburg, who had belonged to the Alteinigen congregation, joined Obersülzen. There were in Obersülzen in 1802 33 Mennonites, including children, and 66 in 1834. In 1869 it numbered 68 baptized members, in 1888 120, children included, in 1941 about 100, in 1957 94 baptized members. Formerly the congregation had two meetinghouses; in addition to the one at Obersülzen, which was built in 1806, there was also one in Heppenheim, built in 1783. Now only the one in Obersülzen is used. NEFF.

Miller, Berner Täufer, 52, 211; Menn. Bl., 1855, 54; 1861, 34 f.; Inu. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1248 f., 1405, 1407, 1417; Mart. Mir. D 827-30, E 1125 f.; ML III, 288.

Obihiro Mennonite Church, Obihiro, Hokkaido, Japan, was started in 1951. In 1957 it had 14 members with missionary Carl Beck as pastor. The congregation meets in the basement of the Beck home. H.S.B.

Ochino, Bernardino (1487-1567), a Protestant clergyman of Siena, Italy, early entered the Franciscan order and later the Capuchin, whose vicar general he became, and preached with superior success. In 1541 he became acquainted with Waldensian doctrines and in the following year he fled from Italy to Augsburg via Constance, Zürich, Geneva, where he stayed three years, and Basel. In Augsburg he was appointed pastor of the Italian congregation. After the defeat of the Schmalkaldian League he again had to flee. By way of Zürich and Basel his path went to London, whither Archbishop Cranmer called him in 1547. For six years he worked here with great blessing. When Edward VI died and Mary Stuart came to the throne, he fled. By way of Strasbourg and Basel he went to Geneva, arriving there on the day of the execution of Michael Servetus (Oct. 27, 1553), and won disfavor by expressing his disapproval of the execution. In 1555 he took charge of the newly created Protestant Italian congregation in Zürich. For ten years he served with unwavering faithfulness in addition to great literary activity. In 1563 the council expelled him from the city on the absolutely false charge that he had sponsored polygamy in his book, Die 30 Dialoge. This book was translated into Latin by Sebastian Castellio (q.v.). Without a home, Bernardino Ochino wandered from country to country. When he was expelled from Cracow in Poland, he turned to Moravia, and at Austerlitz in a Hutterite house he died on Jan. 21, 1567. His books Tragödie, Labyrinthe, and especially his Catechism show some noteworthy echoes of Anabaptist doctrine. Ochino, however, differs from the Mennonites in his anti-Trinitarianism. His unitarian views made him sincerely welcome among a group of anti-Trinitarian Italian scholars like Biandrata (Blandrata) and Gentile. (HRE XIV, 256 ff.; Menn. Bl., 1893, 27, 47, 58; ML III, 290.)

NEFF.

Ochsenbach, a town in the Güglingen district of Württemberg, Germany. Not far from the mother community of Ochsenbach and the daughter community of Spielberg, the Anabaptists found a good hiding place at Bromberg. The local pastor reported in 1574 that the Anabaptist Simon Kress (q.v.) had come frequently from Moravia to Ochsenbach as a deceiver and was lodged by his cousin Klaus Eysenbrei. The latter had a son and a daughter in Moravia, and had also kept the pastor's little daughter without the father's knowledge for two weeks and led her astray, though he must have "felt and heard my displeasure in my diligent seeking and inquiring." The "leading astray" of the parson's daughter obviously consisted in keeping her concealed and indoctrinating her in Anabaptist teaching, while the worried father missed his child for two weeks—certainly an unusual, but reliably recorded incident. In 1575 a case of an inheritance came up before the church council in Stuttgart which had its roots in Ochsenbach; a member of the community wished to acquire several vineyards which were left by Anabaptist relatives who emigrated to Moravia. The council wished to sell the vineyards to the relatives, but the proceeds of the sale were to go into the church treasury on account of the heavy expense of keeping the Anabaptists imprisoned. This is surprising, for it was generally known that the Anabaptists had to pay for their detention in prison by working, or if they were released, by payment of cash. It is known that Duke Frederick appropriated the Anabaptist properties, and that after his death (1608) the guardian of these properties was held accountable for them (TA Württemberg, p. XIII).

In 1577 the dean of the region reported to Stuttgart that the miller of the Schöppen Mill, which was part of the Ochsenbach parish, had refused to render the customary oath of submission, and that his three children, the oldest of whom was nine years old, were not yet baptized. In the same year it was reported that the Baron of Bromberg employed Anabaptists in the Schöppen Mill as servants—not an isolated instance among the nobility, and a testimonial for the diligence and faithfulness of these workers in the house and the fields. In 1583 two thirds of an Anabaptist home near the church was given to the Ochsenbach community free of charge to be used as a school; the third they were to buy of the owner with community funds and have it repaired. In January 1589 an order was issued from Stuttgart to the magistrate of Güglingen to bring Friedrich, the Schöppen miller, who had been arrested, to Stuttgart under custody and to report where his unbaptized ten-year-old child was. In August 1589 the magistrate was informed that the Anabaptist Friedrich Miller of the Ochsenbach parish had promised to leave the principality, and had moved away. Eberhard of Weitershausen had put another into the mill, by the name of Dionysius Reitboldt, who was even worse than the former miller. For when the pastor of Ochsenbach summoned him to give an account of his faith, he uttered terrible and frightening blasphemies against "our" religion with defiance. The magistrate was to arrest the blasphemous Anabaptist (was he really an Anabaptist?) Dionysius and bring him to Stuttgart. The two weeks' concealment of the pastor's little daughter in 1574 had some consequences after all. In 1604 it is reported: "At Ochsenbach two little children of the former pastor Stephan Schultheiss (in Ochsenbach 1558-78), Anna 28 years ago, and Timotheus 12 years ago have left the country and become Anabaptists, leaving an estate of 700 gilders, welcome to the treasurer." In 1610 there was a case of illegal confiscation of alleged Anabaptist property by the procurator in favor of the duke, who was in need of money. The government recognized the claim for repayment; 255 gilders had to be paid the heirs, not by the duke, but from the income of the Anabaptist property in the Güglingen district. In 1616 the pastor, mayor, and judge of Ochsenbach asked to keep two estates of the inheritance of the two daughters of Veit Schuhmacher who had gone to Moravia, to be given the manager of the church treasury, to pay 10 Talers to the schoolmaster and sexton, and repair the tower clock, the bell, and windows in the very dilapidated little church. Numerous cases are known of the application of funds confiscated from Anabaptists to the erection and repair of Lutheran churches and schools, which is of course better than for personal enrichment. The government did not give away the property in question, but sold it for a small price to the community.

E.T.

TA Württemberg, p. XIII, 1181, under "Ochsenbach"; on page 912 also the literature on the management of Anabaptist property in Württemberg; E. Teufel, "Die Beschlagnahme und Verwaltung des Täufergutes durch den Fiscus im Herzogtum Württemberg . . .," Theol. Ztscht VIII (1952) 296-304; ML III, 290 f.

Ochsentreiber(in), Urschl (Ursula), an Anabaptist martyr of the Tirol, Austria. In 1528-29 the Anabaptists had won a strong following in Hall near Innsbruck. When the government of Tirol interfered, they moved to a meadow near Mils. At the head of this group was Peter Egger, the baker, the baker of Hall, who is described in the placard issued against him as a "man with a long red beard," with his young son, and also a cloth shearer of Hall, "the real leader, a stately, brave person with a short, thick red beard."

On Aug. 15, 1529, the judge of Hertenberg in a raid caught about 20 brethren and sisters, but those named above managed to escape. The government ordered the authorities of that region to search for them, so that they would not succeed in reaching the Ziller Valley. The mayor and council of Hall were commanded to guard Egger's house at night in order to catch him if he came to see his family. Meanwhile Erhard Haller had seized three women, Dorothea (Anna) Malerin (q.v.), Ursula Ochsentreiberin, and Katharina Braunin, who had taken part in the meetings, as the cross-examinations revealed. None would comply with the demand to name other participants in Hall. Nevertheless some other arrests were made. On Sept. 14 the Tirol government ordered the Hall authorities to bring Malerin before the criminal court as a backslider for breaking her pledge of loyalty (Urfehde), but first to torture her "in a manner suitable for a woman." At the same time the magistrate was censured because the prisoners were lodged together, so that they "with much singing, as they are accustomed to sing in their sect, make themselves heard, which is also listened to publicly by the common man, from which nothing good can come." Furthermore, this merely strengthened and consoled them, for which reason they were to be separated at once and placed in solitary confinement. Anna Malerin was drowned soon afterward.

Braunin seems to have been "converted," since an order of government of October describes the manner of her pardon. Ursula remained steadfast; therefore a mandate of Nov. 27 commanded the authorities of Hall to bring her also before the criminal court. Of her and Anna the Geschicht-Buch boasts that they "armed their feminine spirit with manliness and valor in God, so that many marveled at their steadfastness." She was also drowned in the Inn.

The chronicle of Hall reports for 1528-29 that many Anabaptists, young and old, men and women, were under cross-examination, some of whom let themselves be converted by the town parson; "two women were condemned to death and drowned, who would not leave the sect." This figure agrees with the list of martyrs in the Hutterite chronicles. The fate of the two became the theme of the song, preserved in the Pressburg Codex, "An unsern Frauen Tag geschah." P.DE.

Wolkan, Lieder, 16 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loesche, Tirolensia; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Mart. Mir. D 28, E 437; ML III, 291 f.

Ockenfuss, Hans: see Oggenfuss, Hans.

Odenbach, Johann, pastor at Moscheln, below Landsberg, which is the old name of the town of Obermoschel in the Palatinate, Germany, between Kreuznach and Kaiserslautern. The ruins of the Landsberg fortress still dominate the handsome little town. This was the scene of Johann Odenbach's preaching during the Reformation. His was a tolerant soul, extraordinarily rare at the time. This is shown in the letter he wrote in 1528 to the judges of Alzey (q.v.), when they were deciding on the life or death of several Anabaptists imprisoned there. The letter is titled, "Ein Sendbrief und Ratschlag an verordnete Richter über die armen Gefangenen in Alzey, so man nennet Wiedertäufer."

Odenbach opened the letter by reminding the judges that they must hold just judgment, citing Deut. 1:15-17 and chapter 17; they were inexperienced in the divine Scripture and had not learned responsibility for faith, therefore they could not conduct nor fathom this legal matter. The case must be conducted by instruction from the Word of God. "If one wanted to punish the error of faith of their heresy which is not founded on the Word of God, then priests, monks, Junkers, pope, and cardinals would be much more liable to punishment who have earned a thousandfold greater punishment before God than these poor Anabaptists, although I do not praise them either. One should provide better, more pious, upright, learned and good preachers, then all great and small errors would soon be removed. These poor Anabaptists have not committed such a great sin against God through their Anabaptism that He would condemn their souls for it, nor had they so wantonly disobeyed the government, that they had forfeited their lives. Neither true baptism or Anabaptism possesses such power that it can save or damn a man; for that pertains not to a man or to a symbol, but to God alone." "Therefore do not become guilty of presumptuous sin, that the wrath of God may not come upon you, greater than upon the Sodomites and all the evildoers upon earth. You have seen many thieves, murderers, and rogues treated more mercifully in prison than these poor people who have not stolen, murdered, robbed, burned, betrayed, or committed any shameful misdeed, but have only to the honor of God and to nobody's injury, but in good simplicity of intention and out of a slight error let themselves be baptized and have promised to desist from it if they could be shown from the Bible a better course. And how can you in your heart and conscience find a basis to say or to confess that they should be therefore beheaded or condemned? If you would deal with them as is fitting for Christian judges and if you knew how to instruct them from the Bible, no executioner would be needed; they would without doubt give place to the truth and would be severely enough punished with imprisonment." In conclusion Odenbach offered to come for a public examination, if he would be promised safe conduct, so that judgment would be passed not with fire and sword, but with instruction from God's Word.

Unfortunately this warm appeal was not heeded. The voice of the pastor of Obermoschel remained an isolated phenomenon in the general murdering and raging against the Anabaptists. Odenbach was arrested upon a complaint of Elector Louis V of the Palatinate, "because of some writings," but was soon released, for they were convinced of his "honesty and innocent teaching and life." But it was impressed upon him that he must publish nothing more without government permission. NEFF.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 53; Fr. Jung, Johannes Schwebel, der Reformator von Zweibrücken (Kaiserslautern, 1910) 199; Menn. Bl., 1876, 76 ff.; ML III, 292.

Odenkirchen, a village on the Niers near Düsseldorf, Germany, under the dominion of the Elector of Cologne (now belongs to Rheydt), was since the middle of the 16th century the seat of an Anabaptist congregation, in which Adam Pastor (q.v.) was preacher for a time. William III of Flodorf, Baron of Odenkirchen and Grevenbicht, favored the Anabaptists. In 1533 an Anabaptist on his way to Münster stopped in Odenkirchen in "Driessen's house by the castle." Since there was until 1549 a chaplain Hermann Drieschen in Odenkirchen, he became suspect of leaning toward Anabaptism. In 1534 two merchant apprentices journeyed from Dremmen to Maastricht and Odenkirchen, to proclaim the miracles of the Anabaptist prophets and to summon people to come to Münster, the "New Zion." The one who came to Odenkirchen was Peter Schumacher, the son of the Dremmen magistrate. For a long time thereafter there were Anabaptist traces in Odenkirchen; especially since after the removal of the Münsterite bogey the lord of Odenkirchen offered the persecuted refugees protection and shelter. Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) baptized four persons here about 1550. The pastor of Odenkirchen 1540-49 was "Herr" Wolter, who cried out in the church at Crefeld on March 25, 1545, while lifting the sacrament: "Alas, how blinded you poor people are! What you see here is nothing but simple bread." After his departure from Odenkirchen the pastors of Hüls, Anrath, and Kempen complained in 1550 that Anabaptist doctrine was on the increase. There was in Hüls a preacher, "a vagabond by the name of Wolter, with a long white beard, a resident of Crefeld, previously pastor of Odenkirchen and there had been a follower of Anabaptists." For 80 years the Anabaptists were tolerated in Odenkirchen. Odelia von Flodorf, who protected Calvinism in Odenkirchen, left the Mennonites in peace. A congregation was organized, for the Concept of Cologne (1591) was signed by Wolter of Wetschenwel as representative of the Odenkirchen Mennonites. But in 1628, when the Archbishop of Cologne restored his authority in and over Odenkirchen and took the church from the Reformed, the Mennonites could no longer stay here. The church records of the Reformed Church at Rheydt show several transfers of membership to that church. Other Mennonites presumably emigrated. Peter Davids, a Mennonite wheelwright, moved to Nijmegen, Holland, in 1655. A congregation was no longer possible here. By 1700 there were no Mennonites left in Odenkirchen. W.N.

DB 1890, 59; 1909, 109, 122, 125; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 59, 437; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 105, 107; P. C. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1846) 62; ML III, 292 f.

Odessa, a city located 25 miles northeast of the mouth of the Dniester River on Odessa Bay and the shore of the Black Sea, Ukraine, USSR, had a population of 604,000 in 1948. Odessa was founded by a Tatar chief, was later held by the Poles and Turks, and became Russian in 1789, the year during which the first Mennonites moved to the Ukraine. The first German colonies in the region of Odessa were established in 1803 primarily by immigrants coming from South Germany, among whom were many Pietists. At the beginning of the 20th century Odessa had a German population of 12,000 and a number of German organizations, schools, and churches. In the immediate vicinity of Odessa were the German settlements of Bessarabia and Liebental. Odessa became a German cultural center far beyond the immediate German settlements. Here Louis Nietzsche founded the Odessaer Zeitung in 1863 and the Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender in 1865, which were read all over the Ukraine and in other parts of Russia. There were a number of other publishing and printing enterprises in Odessa. The Mennonites had several books and publications printed here. Odessa was also a very significant export and import and trading center not only for the German population of Russia but also for Russia in general.

The "Fürsorge-Komitee" (q.v., Guardians' Committee) of the foreign colonists in southern regions of Russia was located in Odessa from 1821 to 1871, when it dissolved (see also Government of Mennonites in Russia). This was one of the chief attractions for Mennonites to visit Odessa, although their settlements were located some distance from the city. Starting around 1900 Mennonites frequently attended the University of Odessa. Under Communism the German cultural enterprises of Odessa suffered severely and were to a large extent discontinued. During World War II the German population of Odessa was evacuated. C.K.

Handbuch des Deutschtums im Auslande (Berlin, 1906) 183 ff.; Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (1913) 137.

Odon (Ind.) Beachy Amish Church was begun in 1948. In 1957 it had 165 members, with Jacob D. Gingerich, William Yoder, and Ben S. Wagler as ministers. H.S.B.

Oecolampadius, Johannes (1482-1531), reformer of Basel, Switzerland. He studied law at the University of Bologna, Italy, then theology at the University of Heidelberg, Germany, accepted a pastorate in Weinsberg in order to continue his studies at the University of Tübingen, where he became the good friend of Melancthon. Then he went to Stuttgart, studied Greek under Reuchlin, and then to Heidelberg, where he became acquainted with Capito and Brenz. In 1515 he became cathedral preacher at Basel, was won by Erasmus as a collaborator in his publication of the New Testament, lived a while in Weinsberg, returned to Basel in August 1518, then became preacher in Augsburg, where he entered the monastery of St. Bridgett for a year. After a brief sojourn on the Ebernburg, from April to November 1522, he returned to Basel and became an outstanding Reformer. He soon came into contact with the Swiss Brethren there. When Hans Denk came to Basel in 1523 he attached himself closely to Oecolampadius and attended his lectures on Isaiah, thus coming indirectly under the influence of Erasmian Bible interpretation. To a letter of recommendation from Oecolampadius to Willibald Pirkheimer Denk owed his appointment to the rectorship of the school of St. Sebaldus in Nürnberg. After Denk's expulsion from the city in 1525 Oecolampadius wrote Pirkheimer that he had been deceived in Denk. In November 1527 Oecolampadius again met Denk, who was mortally ill, hoping to win him to his views. He thought he had accomplished this when Denk, at Oecolampadius' insistence, shortly before his death presented to him a confession of faith; Oecolampadius had it published under the title, Hans Denken Widerruf (see Hans Denk).

Toward the close of 1524 or early in 1525 Thomas Müntzer made a brief visit to Basel. Oecolampadius received him kindly. In the presence of Hugwald they discussed infant baptism. Müntzer said that he was still practicing infant baptism, though not immediately after birth, but at longer intervals for a number of children, so that the ceremony would become more solemn, a procedure approved by Oecolampadius.

On Jan. 16, 1525, Oecolampadius received a letter from Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) requesting his view on infant baptism; he had abolished the practice and substituted the consecration of the children before the assembled congregation. Oecolampadius replied that he was holding to infant baptism, since the kingdom of heaven was closed to unbaptized infants on account of original sin. The faith of their parents would be reckoned in their favor.

Oecolampadius sent an excerpt from Hubmaier's letter to Zwingli. Evidently under Zwingli's influence Oecolampadius wrote a second letter to Hubmaier, definitely defending infant baptism, which, though not commanded in the Bible, was not forbidden. Even in the case of adults one could not see whether they had faith. Therefore the faith of the parents and godparents was sufficient.

In August 1525 Oecolampadius had a debate with the Anabaptists in his home (Loserth gives the date erroneously as June 5, in the church of St. Mary). He published an account of it, Gespräch etlicher Prädikanten zu Basel gehalten mit etlichen Bekennern des Wiedertaufs. The Anabaptists defended their position on the basis of the Great Commission, which sets teaching before baptism, and on the example of the chamberlain whom Philip baptized; baptism must not be equated with circumcision. They denied that they were introducing a second baptism, since in their eyes infant baptism was not baptism at all. Oecolampadius reminded them that they were founding a new sect which would end in separation and mob spirit, so that they could not be of one spirit. No agreement was reached in the debate. The Swiss Brethren felt themselves strengthened in their views. On Oct. 10 another disputation was to be held in the church of St. Martin, concerning which there is no definite information. The opposing views were more sharply in conflict, the struggle grew more and more bitter.

In two writings Oecolampadius presented his position on infant baptism: Unterrichtung von dem Wiedertauf, von der Obrigkeit und vom Eid auf Karlins N. Wiedertäufers Artikel, and Balthasar Hubmaiers Büchlein wider der Predikanten Gespräch zu Basel von dem Kindertauf (August 1527). The former booklet is an attack on Karlin (q.v.), who had stated the articles of his faith in writing and had planned to defend them against Oecolampadius and the Catholic clergy before the council. When this was not permitted, Oecolampadius composed the booklet mentioned, in which he attacked the Swiss Brethren with an unusual acerbity. He calls them Katabaptists (drowners); "for you murder the noble souls and good consciences in your baptism." In the second booklet he defended infant baptism against Hubmaier on the above grounds, while he attacked adult baptism on the ground that it offended faith and love. Nonetheless his position is gentler than Zwingli's. The difference between the two was that "Zwingli proved that the infants must be baptized, Oecolampadius that infants may be baptized."

On March 14, 1528, a sharp mandate was issued by Basel against the Swiss Brethren, threatening them with loss of property and life. On July 1, 1528, Oecolampadius wrote to Zwingli, "Recently there were over 100 together in the neighborhood, of whom several were brought to prison here, who had already been driven out from this place and that with rods."

Late in the summer of 1528 Oecolampadius instituted a church inspection which revealed the increase of the Anabaptist movement in the rural areas. Thereupon he issued the Shepherd's Epistle to the thirteen pastors of the canton and four of the Bishopric of Basel, in which he had Anabaptism uppermost in mind.

On Jan. 12, 1530, the Anabaptist Hans Ludi (q.v.) was drowned. The execution created a deep impression. This comes to light in a letter Oecolampadius wrote to Zwingli in that month: "Therein that they (the Swiss Brethren) die so steadfastly and pretend innocence, is a new danger; some namely, who are not founded on solid ground, are beginning to waver; for they regard the steadfastness more than the reason for it, and the cross more than the reason for it, as if faith were confirmed only by suffering." Other executions followed. The movement was violently suppressed. On May 29, 1531, Oecolampadius wrote to Konrad Sohm (Sam) in Ulm: "Hardly a place of refuge remains for the Anabaptists, the church is again respected, gradually all resistance is removed." But this rejoicing was premature, as the Reformer was to learn on a tour of church inspection for the city council in May 1531, when he was preaching in Läuelfingen in the church and an Anabaptist interrupted him, whereupon a tumult resulted. The representative of the council and the mercenaries accompanying him freed him from threatening danger. A few months later he died.

NEFF.

* * *

Ernst Stähelin wrote an outstanding biography of Oecolampadius (see bibliography below), which presents the disputes with the Anabaptists. Besides this biography Stähelin published the equally valuable volumes of letters and records concerning Oecolampadius. On the basis of these recently available sources Eberhard Teufel urged (Theologische Rundschau) a closer investigation of the influence of Oecolampadius' lectures on Isaiah upon the translation of the prophets by Denk and Haetzer in Worms (1527) than had hitherto been possible. As an expositor of the Bible, Oecolampadius was a student of Erasmus, and only in the second place of Luther. His Erasmian zeal as a translator of the Bible he transferred to his Basel auditors, including Haetzer and Denk. In so far as these Anabaptist leaders were versed in the Biblical languages, they also acquired more from Erasmus via Oecolampadius than from Luther. Erasmus is the instigating influence in the scholarly study of the Bible by the Swiss Brethren through the lectures of Oecolampadius.

E.T.

J. Loserth, Balthasar Hubmaier (Brno, 1893); Paul Burckhart, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 38; E. Stähelin, Das theologische Lebenswerk Johannes Oecolampadius ("Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte" XXI, 1939) pp. xxiv and 652; idem, Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oecolampadius (op. cit., X and XIV) I (1499-1526) 1927; II (1527-93) 1934; Theologische Rundschau XV, Nos. 1-3, pp. 60 f.; ML III, 296 f.

Oede Willemsdochter, the wife of Pieter Aelbrechtsz, an Anabaptist martyr of Hattem, Dutch province of Overijssel, was baptized in 1534 at Brielle, South Holland, in the house of Adriaen Jansz. She belonged to the revolutionary Anabaptists. In 1541 she was arrested at Utrecht, and on the charge of lodging Anabaptists she was sentenced at Utrecht and executed there by drowning on July 18, 1541. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 243; Mellink, Wederdopers, 228.)

vdZ.

Oedekerk, a former Dutch Mennonite family, which may have immigrated from Odenkirchen (q.v.) on the Niers near Düsseldorf, Germany. In the 17th century members of this family were living in the province of Overijssel, particularly at Enschedé. Pieter Oedekerk was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Kampen, Overijssel, in the first half of the 18th century. Whether this family is the same as the Oudekerk family found at Haarlem in the 18th century could not be ascertained. vdZ.

Oeder, Marx: see Eder, Marx.

Oelbronn, Maulbronn district, Württemberg, Germany, a village parish, located on the border of Baden. It was, like the entire vicinity of Maulbronn, a point on the route of many Anabaptists. Crossing the border also offered escape from persecution. Hans, a peasant of Oelbronn, who was baptized in Moravia, was found in a cross-examination at Strasbourg. In 1537 Elsa Messner, who had emigrated to Moravia with her husband, returned to Oelbronn and was imprisoned in Maulbronn. At her release she refused to render the oath, giving instead a simple affirmation promising not to return to the duchy for the rest of her life. "In case of return she forfeits her life and property." In 1574 the parson and mayor of Oelbronn reported to the abbot of Maulbronn that Oelbronn residents had taken part in the "nocturnal chatter-preaching of the Anabaptists in the forest between Bretten (q.v.) and Derdingen on Wednesday, July 30, 1574, who attended partly from curiosity, partly because they wanted to leave with them." Eight persons were named and given the severest sentence possible. Two wanted to emigrate, not because of religion, but because of the "fleshpots of Egypt." In 1583 the daughter of the sexton, Anna, in spite of the arrest she had suffered in punishment, did not come to communion in the state church.

In 1590-95 there are records of the legacy left by Dorothea, the widow of Bernhard Greglich of Oelbronn, a total of 1,336 guilders. Of the eight children, two sons with their families moved to Moravia. One son returned in 1594 to stay, and asked for his mother's portion, which he finally received. In 1597 there was again a case of inheritance, and at least the interest on the estate, which was in the hands of the state, was granted the petitioner. In these two cases the decision was reasonable; in others very harsh.

In a letter of 1602 an anonymous member of the Oelbronn parish complained to the pastor Georg Heinrich Bürcklin about some participants in an Anabaptist meeting in the Schilling forest, and gave some names, though the charge is not clear. The writer of the letter hoped that the matter would not pass unpunished and that the false prophets would be dispersed, so that no false guidance might ensue. If in this instance a single member of a parish takes sides against the Anabaptists without revealing his identity, there are numerous instances of the open sympathy and intercession of entire communities for the persecuted. (TA Württemberg; ML III, 298.)

E.T.

Oeschelbronn, Maulbronn district, Württemberg, Germany. The Anabaptist M. Zorlin, who came to Oeschelbronn from Moravia in 1577, had with him letters to various persons in the town. They were taken from him. About 38 persons of the parish attended Anabaptist preaching in 1577 and were cross-examined by the prelate and the magistrate of Maulbronn. Those liable to punishment were Jörg Kisselbronner and Claus Riebssam. They had lodged the Anabaptist Simon Kress. In 1592 the pastor of Oeschelbronn complained about the large number of Anabaptists in neighboring Baden. In 1598 a consultation was held concerning the request of Konrad Werts, who had emigrated to Moravia, for the inheritance of his parents. In 1606 Martin Bayer returned from Moravia in dissatisfaction, and was permitted to remain on probation. In 1616 Michael Nöstler requested the payment of his inheritance. In 1627 there was a similar case. (TA Württemberg, 1181; ML III, 312.)

E.T.

Oet(h)enbach, a tower at Zürich (q.v.), Switzerland, which served as a prison for many Swiss Brethren, particularly about 1640. Hans Landis was executed here in 1614. Another Hans Landis and his daughter Margaretha were imprisoned here for 60 weeks in 1638-39, Hans Müller for two years, Adelheyd Egli, the wife of Felix Landis, for four years. Rudolf Bachmann was imprisoned in the Oetenbach tower from 1640 to the end of his life. Some others died there during imprisonment.

vdZ.

Oetisheim, Maulbronn district, Württemberg (today belonging to Baden), Germany. Like Oelbronn and Oeschelbronn, situated on the border between Württemberg and Baden, Oetisheim was once on the route taken by many Anabaptists. In 1576 the Protestant abbot of Maulbronn, the prelate Mogirus, received instructions to examine and indoctrinate Hans Weisser, a tailor of Oetisheim, suspected of Anabaptist beliefs, in the presence of the local parson. In 1577 the tailor was again in the audience at an Anabaptist preaching service. Many of the attendants at this sermon had moved away from Oetisheim; some had returned. The latter were to be questioned about their reasons. Many of the members of the parish rarely went to church, to communion not at all; they were to be summoned and punished. In 1578 several had come back from Moravia in disappointment and had publicly recanted at Easter and communed. The frequently mentioned tailor was to be arrested when he came back from Moravia for a possible attempt to take his family.

In 1583 the old schoolteacher was replaced by his son, who had returned from Moravia, and was probably filling the children with heresy. The teacher was to hire a suitable substitute; his son was not to go to church if he wanted to live in Oetisheim. In 1596 Matthias Kappel, who had gone to Moravia sixteen years before, had without permission slipped into Oetisheim, stayed there and in the vicinity, found shelter with his father and brought letters from Moravia, finally held a meeting in the woods on Pentecost evening, and took some young people away with him to Moravia.

The supreme council in Stuttgart decreed the following penalties: a severe reproof to the father of Matthias; a fine of three pounds to the gatekeeper and to those who lodged the Anabaptist; the same fine and a twenty-four-hour arrest to those who had attended the preaching service in the woods.

About 1619 ff. the matter of the inheritance of the Anabaptist Franz Walter of Oetisheim came up. Walter was chosen preacher of his Anabaptist brotherhood in 1597 and died in 1621. Another lawsuit developed in 1629 on the legacy of the Anabaptist Katherine Fessler of Oetisheim.

A church inspection record of 1592 relates of Oetisheim: "Many children are hired out to the neighboring Palatinate where Calvinism is practiced; the children may be infected by this poison. But the Anabaptists are more dangerous." E.T.

The involved lawsuit regarding Franz Walter's inheritance is found in TA Württemberg, 89 ff.; also in Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, and Zieglschmid, Chronik; the Fessler lawsuit is found in TA Württemberg, 906; ML III, 326.

Oetting (today Altötting), a town in Upper Bavaria, Germany, a famous pilgrimage resort. In 1555 the Anabaptist Hans Mändl (q.v.), who was executed on June 10, 1561, at Innsbruck with Eustachius Kotter (q.v.) and Jörg Rack (q.v.), was working in this region.

During the period of persecution many Anabaptist refugees fleeing on the Inn River from Tirol to Moravia were arrested here. In 1578 Andree Schlosser and Adam Schneider were thus imprisoned; after they had been racked and remained constant, they were mocked with the comment that they were not like the apostles, or God would free them from prison. The guard, wishing to make an escape impossible, placed on his feet the heavier lock, which Andree had hitherto worn on his hands and which he could not open without the use of both hands, and placed on his hands the lighter lock, which he could open with one hand. The heavier lock, now on Andree's feet, the keeper attached to a chain which he drew through an opening in the door into the anteroom, the better to secure Andree. After a prayer Andree found a nail and succeeded in opening both locks, and after another prayer he was also able to release Adam Schneider from his bonds, since the keeper had forgotten to lock the heavy door between them. With praise and thanks for God's assistance they escaped over the city wall during a thunderstorm.

The Anabaptist prisoners who refused to return to the Catholic Church were executed. According to a compilation of the Hutterian Brethren of 1581 seven Anabaptists died a martyr's death in Oetting.

HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 227; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 182, 389-91; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 233, 503-5; their confession is found in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXVI (1929) 161-66; ML III, 326 f.

Oever, Den: see Wieringen.

Offenthal Conference, a meeting of representatives of the Amish congregations on May 20 and 21, 1867, in Offenthal near St. Goarshausen (until 1945 in Hesse-Nassau), Germany, dealing with a partial adaptation of the Amish to the other Mennonites in Germany. Seventeen representatives of the six Amish Mennonite congregations in the Palatinate, Hesse-Nassau, Oberhesse, and Neuwied were present. An agreement was reached on the basis of ten articles, which were unanimously signed. The most important were articles 5, 7, 8, and 9.

Article five deals with footwashing (q.v.) and says, "It shall be left to each congregation, whether it is to be literally carried out or whether it shall be spiritually interpreted as a sign of remembrance and as such impressed upon the communion guests." "But it shall not be the basis of a future division among us."

Article seven deals with nonresistance (q.v.) and designates: "How each congregation and each young man will preserve this ancient Mennonite principle to do justice first to his own conscience and then also to the government, we leave to the careful consideration of each one."

Article eight deals with mixed marriages (q.v.) and declares: "In accord with the express word of the Apostle Paul (I Cor. 7:14) we believe that such marriages as are called mixed because one part belongs to our brotherhood and the other to some other Christian body can be blessed; therefore we no longer feel authorized to maintain the church discipline to which mixed marriages have hitherto been subject."

Article nine limits the application of church discipline to exclusion from communion.

Though this beginning of a union with the Mennonites had promising prospects, the course of events did not correspond. The chief obstacle to unification was the objection by the congregations not represented in the conference to the attitude on mixed marriages. A conference of the French Mennonites at Einville near Lunéville on June 2, 1867, stated that they put a different interpretation on the quotation from Paul, namely, that such a mixed marriage is not permissible. The congregations in West Prussia and Baden were also sharply in disagreement with the decision on mixed marriages. Most of the congregations participating in the Offenthal Conference died out at the end of the 19th century. (Menn. Bl., 1867, 38-40; 1868, 28-31; ML II, 293.)

NEFF.

Offer des Heeren, Het, a compilation of reports on the martyrs, which, as far as known, appeared in 1562. The full title reads as follows: Dit Boec wort genoemt: Het Offer des Heeren, om het inhoud van sommige opghoefferde kinderen Gods: De welcke voortgebracht hebben wt den goeden schat haers herten, Belijdingen, Sendtbrieven, ende Testamenten, de welcke sy metten monde beleden ende metten bloede bezegelt hebben, Tot troost ende versterckinghe der Slachschaepekens Christi, die totter doot geschiet zijn, Tot lof, prijs ende eere des geens diet al in allen vermach, wiens macht duert van ewicheyt tot ewicheyt, Amen. This book contains descriptions of the sufferings of Dutch Anabaptists who were imprisoned, their letters to their next of kin and brethren, reports of eyewitnesses, and also hymns which were in part written by them in prison and in part written by others to describe their death. These contemporary reports give the book especial value. They offer important source material for the history of the persecution of the Mennonites in the Netherlands in 1527-92. The letters of their brethren offer the prisoners courage and comfort in their suffering, while the letters from the prisoners breathe a deep, earnest spirit, with the admonition to faithful endurance in a Christian walk amid all persecution. In all editions the Offer des Heeren is followed by a hymnal entitled Een Lietboecxken (q.v.), tracterende van den Offer des Heeren, int welke oude ende nieuwe Liedekens, wt verscheyden Copien vergadert zijn, om by het Offerboeck ghevoecht te worden. . . . Eleven songs from this Lietboecxken, translated into German, are found in the Ausbund (q.v.).

The book does not, however, report all the Dutch Mennonite martyrs, but only some of those who lived in the province of Holland, in Flanders, in Antwerp, and in Friesland. The first edition of the Offer contains accounts on 21 Dutch Anabaptist martyrs, while the last edition of 1599 includes 33 martyrs. Besides this the Lietboecxken mentions in the first edition 135 martyrs, the last edition 179. Of the German martyrs, the cross-examination of Michael Sattler (q.v.), who was burned at the stake in Rottenburg on the Neckar in 1527, is presented in excerpts, as was ascertained by G. Kawerau, who published the omitted text in the Göttingische Gelehrten-Anzeigen (1905, 493-96), having found in the library at Wolfenbüttel a copy not accessible to Cramer of Ain neues wunderbarlichs geschicht von Michel Sattler, by an anonymous eyewitness.

The Offer des Heeren was widely read by the Mennonites of the time and went through eleven editions: 1562 (the Lietboecxken of this edition being signed 1563), n.p.; 1566, n.p.; 1567, 1570, n.p.; two editions of 1578, both n.p.; 1580, n.p.; 1590, n.p.; 1592, n.p.; 1595, published by Willem Jansz Buys at Amsterdam; and 1599, published by Peter Sebastiaenszoon at Harlingen. There may have been other editions. Each edition amplifies the preceding one by adding information on the executions occurring in the meantime, especially under Alba's reign of terror.

In the literature on church history this martyr-book, in spite of its powerful examples of strong faith and courage, is scarcely mentioned. The letters with their expression of devotion to the Lord are reminiscent of the days of the early persecution of Christians under heathen governments. The Dutch authorities sought to suppress the distribution of this great source book, for the publication of such testimonies, in sharp contradiction to the suspicions of their enemies and the content of the numerous mandates, brought a stream of new converts to the Mennonites.

In spite of many reprints, also in the period of tolerance in Holland, only a few copies have been preserved. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a copy of the editions of 1562, 1567, 1570, 1578a, 1580, 1590, 1592, 1595, 1599. In the library of the University of Gent are found a copy each of the 1566 and the 1578b editions; a copy of the 1578a edition is found in the Royal Library in The Hague and the Utrecht University Library; the 1578b edition is also found in the Library of the University of Utrecht. The Goshen College Library has the editions of 1570, 1578, 1580, and 1595. For a long time this great book had disappeared entirely, and only in 1875 was a copy of the first edition found. In view of its significance in the evaluation of the Anabaptist movement in the 16th century S. Cramer (q.v.) published a new edition as the second volume of the BRN (The Hague, 1910, XII and 683 pages), based on the edition of 1570, and in his introduction called attention to the most important differences between the various editions and added information gleaned from old court records.

The Offer des Heeren was the foundation of the later Dutch Mennonite martyrbooks, including van Bragt's Martyrs' Mirror.

HEGE, vdZ.

DB 1870, 54-58; 1906, 53-92; Bibliographie des Martyrologes (The Hague, 1890) II, 441-99; ML III, 293 f.

Offerings. Information is lacking about offerings for church needs among the 16th-century Anabaptists in Switzerland and South Germany. Most likely the only funds needed, those for the poor and needy, were secured privately by the deacon as need arose. Money for church buildings and janitor service was not needed until the late 18th century or early 19th in the Palatinate and Alsace, and not until the late 19th century in Switzerland. Both there and in America the first method of "collecting" for church purposes was by placing the contributions in offering boxes placed at the exits of the meetinghouse. In a few congregations in the Franconia Conference (MC) in Eastern Pennsylvania this practice was continued until recently, and it is still standard practice among the Old Order Mennonites of Lancaster County who broke off from the main body in 1893, also among the Old Order Mennonites in other areas, such as Ontario.

In many American Mennonite churches funds are raised for regular expenses by assessments on an annual basis, sometimes per capita, sometimes on a property or income basis.

The taking of offerings during the church service by having the deacons, or most commonly ushers, send collection plates through the pews probably came in connection with offerings for special purposes such as missions, although the custom of taking offerings in Sunday school for expenses of that work was established at the very beginning of Sunday-school effort. In the Mennonite Church (MC) the mission offerings were first established on a monthly basis; only recently have weekly Sunday morning offerings become a regular practice.

H.S.B.

In the Netherlands, the Mennonites from the start contributed to their congregations, in particular for the support of the poor. This was done by two methods: (a) By collections at the religious services. In the early days the members gave their gifts to the deacons (armendienaren) before the beginning of the service; but after 1600 boxes (bossen) were placed at the exit to receive the offering. This method remained in use in conservative groups like the Groningen Old Flemish, in some of the churches until the present. Among the more progressive Lamists (q.v.) the Reformed way of taking collections was adopted about 1675; i.e., during the service, usually while the congregation was singing, a collection-bag attached to a long stick was passed. The method is still used in certain Dutch Mennonite congregations. In Leiden (q.v.) the latter method was introduced in 1674, because the "bossen" raised so little. At present the gift of charity is usually received by two deacons at the door after the benediction. Open offering plates are little used. (b) The second method is to receive the gifts at the homes of the members. In former centuries the deacons of a congregation visited the members, especially those in better financial circumstances, and encouraged them to make large donations, usually in the fall, and sometimes before Christmas. At present annual contributions are requested of the members and are sent in a modern businesslike way. Although these contributions are entirely voluntary, it is a common practice in many congregations that the members give one or one and a half per cent of their income.

As the expenses of the congregation increased, especially since c1820 when a salaried ministry became general, larger offerings have been asked of the members.

vdZ.

Office Holding: see State.

Offrus Greysinger, an Anabaptist martyr: see Griesinger, Onophrius.

Offstein, a village near Worms in Rhenish Hesse, Germany, once the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which was founded by Swiss refugees who settled here soon after the Thirty Years' War (1618-48). The lists of Mennonites in the Karlsruhe archives name three families in 1664; one of them was Peter Dahlem, and another was the preacher Heinrich Schneider. By 1685 the number of families had increased to seven. In March 1688 a conference of elders and preachers of the South German congregations was held in Offstein, and resolutions were passed on the attitude to be taken by preachers and elders toward transgressors. Only four families survived the French War.

The Amsterdam Mennonite Archives contain several letters written by Jonas, preacher of the Offstein congregation (from before 1670 until after 1714), which give information about the Mennonite refugees expelled from Switzerland in 1710, who had settled in Alsace and the Palatinate and who asked for financial aid from the Dutch Mennonites; this aid was given.

In 1742 the Johannes Dahlem and Jonas Schnebele families moved away from Offstein. Johannes Schneider joined the Reformed Church. In 1768 a Nikolaus Kägy family is mentioned. At the beginning of the 19th century the number of Mennonites in the village must have been larger.

On May 1, 1828, the Mennonites of Offstein presented a petition to the government at Mainz for the release of their children from obligatory attendance at religious instruction in the community school, "since we have our children learn in their youth what belongs to their religion." They objected to the books which were prescribed for instruction, and declared it to be a violation of religious liberty to compel their children to use these books.

On Nov. 13, 1835, representatives of the stricter wing of the Mennonites in Hesse and the Palatinate met in conference in Offstein and declared that the new catechism and also the hymnal of 1832 were not acceptable to them, and that they would not deviate a hair's breadth from the faith of their fathers.

For a long time the Mennonites of Offstein and Dirmstein (q.v.) belonged to the circuit Heppenheim-Obersülzen-Gerolshausen (q.v.), and later to the Kriegsheim (q.v.) congregation, as is recorded (about 1820) in the Kriegsheim city church building record.

In 1942 there were two Mennonites living in Offstein, members of the Monsheim congregation; in 1957 there were four Mennonite families and two part families.

NEFF, vdZ.

Mathias Pohl, "Geschichtliche Beiträge aus den Mennonitengemeinden," Gem.-Kal. 1906, 135-43; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1257, 1435-37; II, No. 2849; ML III, 294.

Ogemaw County (Mich.) Amish settlement, now extinct, was a small group of Old Order Amish living near West Branch, Ogemaw County, Mich., in 1908-30. Most of the early settlers moved there from Nobles County, Minn., including the Joseph N. Gerber, Daniel B. Gerber, and a number of Jantz families. They were followed by Miller, Eash, Swartz, Kropf, and Bender families from Oscoda County, Mich., and by a few Miller families from Elkhart County, Ind. The bishop in charge was Joseph N. Gerber, succeeded by Jacob Gascho. Other ministers were John B. Gerber, Klaus Jantzi, Jacob Swartz, and Solomon Jantzi. The group at its largest consisted of about twenty families. In 1925-28 the Amish families began to move away, most of them going to Ontario; by 1933 the congregation had died out. C.B.G.

Oggenfuss (Ockenfuss), Hans, a tailor of Stadelhofen near Zürich, Switzerland, who was in the Grebel (q.v.) group as early as 1524; Oggenfuss was one of the signatories of the letter of this group to Thomas Müntzer (Sept. 5, 1524). On Jan. 22, 1525, he was present at the first baptism which Brötli (q.v.) performed at Zollikon (q.v.) near Zürich. Soon after that he joined the Anabaptist congregation and was active in preaching and baptizing. He was imprisoned several times because of his activity, but released on his promise not to preach and baptize, which promise he did not keep. His name is found in the records of the Zürich city council for the last time in January 1528. Then he disappeared from history. Like all the other Anabaptists of the Zollikon group he may have given up Anabaptism. vdZ.

TA Zürich, passim; Fritz Blanke, Brüder in Christo (Zürich, n.d.-1955) 16, 22, 25, 50, 57 f., 61, 65.

Ohain, Belgium, the location of the Home of Hope, a children's home established in 1952 by the Belgium Mennonite Mission (MC). It serves some 25 abandoned children. H.S.B.

Ohio, bounded on the north by Lake Erie, on the south by the Ohio River, on the east by Pennsylvania, and on the west by Indiana, was the first state carved out of the Northwest Territory. It is part of the mid-continent area first settled by the French, who came up the Mississippi and explored its tributaries, and ceded by them in 1763 to the English. They in turn transferred it to the United Colonies in 1783. The Indians relinquished their claim to the Ohio lands by the Treaty of Greenville in 1795. But, encouraged by the English, they continued to make trouble for the early settlers until the end of the War of 1812.

The first Mennonite settlers to found a congregation within the state came to Fairfield and Perry counties from Lancaster County, Pa., and Rockingham County, Va., by way of southwestern Pennsylvania in 1799. Mennonites from Bucks County, Pa., settled in Mahoning County in 1806 and a group from Lancaster County and Rockingham County arrived in Stark County in 1811. Amish from Somerset County, Pa., settled in Tuscarawas County in 1808 and others from Somerset and Mifflin counties a little farther west in Holmes County two years later. But until the close of the War of 1812 made the Ohio frontier comparatively safe from molestation by the Indians, Amish and Mennonite settlements made slow growth. A short-lived settlement was begun in Trumbull County (q.v.) 1804-10.

The two decades following the end of hostilities witnessed the founding of most of the present large flourishing congregations of Amish and Mennonites in the state, and a few now extinct:

Date of Founding	Location	Origin
1817	Oak Grove, Wayne Co. (Amish)	Somerset and Mifflin Co., Pa.
1817	Leetonia, Columbiana Co. (Mennonite)	Bucks Co., Pa.
1819	Butler County (Amish)	Alsace and Hesse-Darmstadt
1819	Sonnenberg (Mennonite)	Jura, Switzerland
1823	Beech (Amish)	Jura, Switzerland
1824	Martins Creek (Amish)	Lancaster Co., Pa.
1825	Crown Hill (Swiss Mennonite)	Switzerland and Upper Alsace
1825	Kolbs (Mennonite)	Bucks Co., Pa.
1825-30	Longenecker (Mennonite)	Bucks Co., Pa.
1827	North Lima (Mennonite)	Bucks Co., Pa.
1829	Guilford (Mennonite)	Ontario, Maryland, and Bucks, Lancaster, and Lehigh Counties, Pa.
1831	Salem in Allen County (Mennonite)	Fairfield Co., Ohio
1832	Blanchard (Mennonite)	Maryland
1834	Central in Fulton County (Amish)	Alsace and Montbéliard
1834	Martins (Mennonite)	Lancaster Co., Pa.
1835	Putnam County (Swiss Mennonite)	the canton of Bern

Amish settlers began arriving in Logan County from Wayne County, Ohio, and Mifflin County, Pa., in 1840, and 8 or 10 miles southeast in Champaign County from Wayne and Fairfield counties, Ohio, and Mifflin County, Pa., in 1846. These two in the course of a few decades developed into the strong South Union and Oak Grove congregations.

Early Mennonite leaders in the state were Henry Stemen of Fairfield (later of Allen), Jacob Oberholtzer in Mahoning, Jacob Nold in Columbiana, Hans Lehman and Ulrich Gerber at Sonnenberg, Peter and Daniel Steiner at Crown Hill, William Westheffer at Martins, Jacob Koppes, William Overholt, and Martin Leatherman at Guilford in Medina County. Their Amish contemporaries were Christian Brandt and David Zook in Wayne County (Zook later in Fairfield), Moses Beachy in Holmes, John Schloneger in Stark, Benedicht King and Joseph Goldschmidt in Butler County, Frederick Hagi (Hege?) at Martins Creek, and Christian Beck and Christian Rupp in Fulton County.

Mennonite leaders during the middle and later years of the 19th century were John Thut, John M. and George Brenneman, and John M. Shenk of Allen County, Adam Kornhaus at Martins, Peter Imhoff in Ashland, Abraham Rohrer in Medina, and among the Swiss Mennonites, Christian Sommer at Sonnenberg and John Moser at Bluffton. Amish Mennonite leaders during the same period were Jacob and John K. Yoder, cousins, and Hanes Yoder of Wayne County, John Warye in Champaign, Jacob C. Kenagy, David Plank, and John P. King of Logan, and Eli and Jacob Frey of Fulton.

Coming from such varied backgrounds, it is not surprising that differences existed. These differences actually were not so great because all Amish and Mennonites spoke German, dressed in a plain modest garb, and practiced the simple life. But their small differences were at times magnified out of all proportion to their importance. On at least one occasion Mennonites and Amish refused to cross the Atlantic on the same vessel. And a congregation in Wayne County divided on whether it was necessary for a Mennonite who wished to unite with the Amish congregation to be rebaptized by an Amish bishop. One frequent cause of difficulty was that differences in congregational practice developed almost imperceptibly as the years passed. Few Amish and Mennonite settlers came to Ohio directly from Europe. The most striking exceptions were the entire colony of Swiss Mennonites who came to Wayne, Putnam, and Allen counties 1819-50; the Alsatian Amish families who came to Wayne and Stark counties and were assimilated by the Oak Grove and Beech congregations, the Alsations who founded the Fulton County Amish congregation, and the Alsations and Hessians who settled in Butler County in the southwestern corner of the state. Most of the Mennonite settlers in Ohio came from Pennsylvania settlements established 75-125 years earlier in Bucks and Lancaster counties, and most of the Amish from well-established congregations in Lancaster, Mifflin, and Somerset counties in the same state. These settlers sought farms or larger holdings in the newer lands in America's great western wilderness. A few later immigrants from Europe, both Amish and Mennonites, remained in the Pennsylvania counties only long enough to repay the passage money advanced for their transportation across the Atlantic, and then joined the general westward movement. Mennonite families established a line of settlements extending from east of Pittsburgh, Pa., westward to South Bend, Ind., many of them now extinct. The Amish, on the other hand, made fewer settlements, but with two notable exceptions, Knox and Fairfield counties, their Ohio congregations remain permanent. As their congregations developed in Ohio, their history becomes confusing and complicated. Satisfactory generalizations become well-nigh impossible.

One difference between Amish and Mennonite in cultural practice related to the plain garb seems to have affected the relative permanence of their congregations. Among the Mennonites the marks of "separation from the world" were put on by the individual on application for church membership which was frequently delayed until marriage. Then the young man laid aside his worldly clothes for the plain Mennonite garb, and the young woman made a radical change when she adopted the simple dress of the church. Especially in the small Mennonite churches of the Ohio frontier such a change set young people off into so small a group that satisfactory social fellowship was almost impossible. Few young people could bring themselves to such a radical change while their friends in their German-speaking social circle united with the Lutheran, Reformed, United Brethren, or Evangelical churches, all of whom conducted their services in German, but, in addition, provided for the religious and social life of their young people. Many small Mennonite congregations on the Ohio frontier consequently endured little longer than a generation or two. Amish children, on the other hand, wore the garb of their parents from early childhood. This costume was no barrier when they united with the church in their middle or late teens. Amish were more reluctant, too, to settle in a neighborhood that gave little promise of building a congregation strong enough to guarantee adequate intra-congregational social life. The Knox and Fairfield County Amish congregations, for example, did not die out through the loss of their young people to other denominations, but when it became evident that land values were already too high to attract Amish settlers the entire congregation moved to other growing Amish congregations.

Mennonite Settlements in Ohio. The Mennonites who settled in Fairfield and Perry counties at the beginning of the 19th century chose a hilly section because it was well drained. After the canal system several miles west opened level land more suitable for cultivation and more accessible to good markets, the group became dissatisfied and founded congregations in Franklin, Logan, and Allen counties. With them went some of their ablest leaders: John M. Brenneman (q.v.), first to Franklin and later to Allen; his brother George to Putnam, and two younger brothers, Henry and Daniel Brenneman (q.v.), to Elkhart County, Ind. The Logan County group moved on west after a few decades and founded the now extinct congregation in Clay and Owen counties (q.v.), Ind. The Fairfield County congregations, which had built two meetinghouses, Pleasant Hill and Turkey Run (q.v.), suffered further decline during the Civil War through the loss of whole families to the German Evangelicals ("Albrechtsleut") and by the end of the century were nearing the point of extinction. Recent attempts to revive the congregation have been only moderately successful. The Allen County settlement of 125 years ago, now three congregations: Salem, Pike, and Central under the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference, has survived serious internal difficulties and the loss of many individuals, even whole families, to neighboring non-Mennonite groups.

KEY TO MAP OF Ohio

- Mennonite Churches
- ▲ Mennonite Institutions

Old Order Amish Settlement Areas

See also detailed maps for Allen-Putnam Counties,
Holmes County, & Wayne County.

Scale of Miles

Congregation	Address
Mennonite Church
1. Beech	Louisville
2. Bethel	Wadsworth
3. Bethel	West Liberty
4. Burton	Burton
5. Central	Archbold
6. Dillonvale	Dillonvale
7. Fairpoint	Fairpoint
8. First	Canton
8a. Flatridge	Newcomertown
9. Friendship	Bedford
10. Gilead	Mt. Gilead
11. Oladestone Mission	Cleveland
12. Hartville	Hartsville
13. Hillside Chapel	Jackson
14. Huber	Cleveland
14a. Lee Heights	Leontonia
15. Leontonia	Stryker
16. Lockport	Hicksville
17. Lost Creek	Beaver
18. Lower Owl Creek	Columbiana
19. Midway	Wauseon
20. North Clinton	North Lima
21. North Lima	West Liberty
22. Oak Grove	Stryker
23. Pine Grove	Vinton
24. Pine Grove	Aurora
25. Plain View	North Lawrence
26. Pleasant View	Plain City
27. Sharon	West Liberty
28. South Union

29. Springfield Twp. Chapel	Holland
29a. Stoner Heights	Louisville
30. Tadmow	Tadmow
31. Turkey Run	Brown
31a. Warnerke Chapel	Pedro
32. Bancroft	Toledo
33. West Clinton	Pettisville
34. Rockview	Youngstown
35. Zion	Archbold
35a. Mexican Mission	Archbold
35b. Hi-Way Chapel	East Greenville
35c. Kennedy Avenue	Dayton
Conservative Mennonite
36. Akron	Akron
37. Johnsville	Johnsville
38. Maple Grove	Hartsville
39. Maple View	Middlefield
40. Marlboro	Marlboro
41. United Bethel	Plain City
41a. Sharon	Kagersville
41b. New Franklin (non-conf.)	New Franklin
Beachy Amish Mennonite Church
42. Canaan	Plain City
42a. Bunker Hill	Holmesville
43. Pleasant View	Hartsville
General Conference Mennonite
44. Apostolic	Trenton
45. First	Wadsworth
45a. First	Sugarcreek

Church of God in Christ, Mennonite

46. Pettisville Pettisville

Evangelical Mennonite Church

47. McWhild Archbold
48. Pioneer Pioneer
49. Wauseon Wauseon

Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite

50. Lower Wadsworth
51. Pleasant View Mahoning Co.

Old Order Amish Mennonite

52. Walnut Grove (King Amish) Hartville
Church districts

Reformed Mennonite Church

52a. Lauber Hill Archbold

Institutions

53. Adrial School (MC) West Liberty

[Churches and institutions not listed here are named on county maps in volumes I, II, and IV.]

The Mahoning-Columbiana settlement in the earlier years was entirely agricultural, but with the growth of heavy industry and the great increase of population in near-by industrial centers Mennonites are turning to truck gardening and poultry raising. The three congregations, Midway, Leetonia, and North Lima, long considered as one congregation, are now independent, each with its own organization and its own bishop. Under the conservatively progressive leadership of its aged bishop, A. J. Steiner, now retired, the congregation has maintained a high degree of stability. During the 1872 Wisler controversy in Indiana a considerable number of members left the main body and founded the Pleasant View (q.v.) Old Order Mennonite congregation.

The Wayne County Mennonite congregation, which founded the Martins (q.v.) church southeast of Orrville, also lost a number of members to the Wisler group in 1872. The Wayne County Wisler congregation is the largest Old Order Mennonite church in the United States. Some members of the Martins church who lived near Orrville united with the Salem congregation (q.v.) when it was organized by disaffected members of the Oak Grove Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1892. It has lost members also to the Orrville Mennonite Church (q.v.), founded by members of the Oak Grove congregation who engaged in business in this thriving railroad center.

The Medina County Mennonite group built the Guilford meetinghouse near Wadsworth and followed their bishop, Abraham Rohrer, into the Wisler branch in 1872, leaving a bare half-dozen members in the Ohio Conference. After a severe struggle for survival, aided by John F. Funk and others, the congregation began to grow and is now the Bethel congregation (MC, q.v.). Medina County also is the home of the Wadsworth First Mennonite Church (GCM), founded in 1852 by "Oberholtzer" (GCM) families from Bucks County, Pa., led by Ephraim Hunsberger. The Huber Mennonite Church (q.v.), also known as Medway, founded soon after 1830 in Clark County near Dayton, has suffered throughout its 125-year history the precarious existence of other small Mennonite congregations in the state. Torn by dissension, losing members to the Reformed Mennonite branch, and led sometimes by an unprogressive leadership or served by nonresident ministers supplied by Conference, it has several times been in danger of extinction.

The saddest picture of the original Mennonite settlements in Ohio is the number of extinct congregations. Each has left its neglected cemetery, the site of a small church building and many Mennonite names, some no longer on any church roll. Beginning with Pleasant Hill in Fairfield County and Canal Winchester and Stemens in Franklin County, the list includes a congregation in Trumbull County, Kolbs in Holmes County, Brubachers, Pleasant View, and Salemskirche in Ashland County, one in Richland and Crawford counties, and one each in Seneca, Wood, and Williams counties. This line continues westward with extinct congregations in Bronson County, Mich., and DeKalb, Lagrange, Elkhart, and St. Joseph counties in Indiana. Most of these followed Jacob Wisler in the O.O.M. movement in the 1870's and for reasons already mentioned lost their young people. From all of the extinct Ohio congregations, however, some of the more progressive members moved westward, many to the western part of Elkhart County, Ind., where their descendants are members of the Olive, Yellow Creek, Clinton Brick, or Old Order Mennonite congregations. A few moved farther west to Illinois, Kansas, or Iowa, where their descendants are making an appreciated contribution to the religious and institutional life of Mennonite congregations, both M.C. and G.C.M. The only one of the above-mentioned extinct Ohio Mennonite congregations to become G.C.M. was the Salemskirche (Salem Mennonite Church), whose last pastor was the German immigrant, Carl Justus van der Smissen (1879-90), retired theological teacher of the Wadsworth Mennonite School. His son had been pastor both of Salem and of the G.C.M. church in Cleveland. After Van der Smissen's death most of the remaining members together with a few members of the Pleasant View Church (MC) united with the thriving Stone Lutheran Church near the former site of Salem. Most of the Lutheran members of the congregation were descendants of Lutheran families who had come to the neighborhood with the Palatine Mennonites in the 1830's.

Amish Settlements in Ohio. In 1808-12, about a decade after the Mennonites settled in Fairfield County, Amish from Mifflin and Somerset counties, Pa., began to arrive in Tuscarawas and Holmes counties and a few years later in Wayne. The change from Amish to Amish Mennonite in 1840-60 affected both Holmes and Wayne counties. In Wayne County (q.v.), however, so small a number clung to the old order discipline and practices that the Amish wing disappeared entirely before 1870. The congregation, then numbering about 300, built the Oak Grove meetinghouse in 1862 and Pleasant Hill in 1881. Joined by Alsatian families in 1850-70, the congregation early became one of the most progressive in the state. A small group seceded in 1869 and later founded the Sterling (Ohio) Mennonite church (GCM, q.v.). By 1880 the congregation had a membership of 401. In 1947 when the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference adopted a new constitution the members at Oak Grove refused to accept it because they felt that it abridged their traditional congregational autonomy. The group at Pleasant Hill accepted the new constitution and is now a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. Oak Grove is an independent congregation without conference affiliation but a large majority of the members support the educational and missionary organizations of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference and the Mennonite Church (MC) in general. Its present membership is 401. The membership of Pleasant Hill is 190.

Soon after 1830 the first Wayne County Amish bishop, David Zook, moved to Bern Township, Fairfield County, with a number of his friends and relatives from Wayne County and Mifflin County, Pa., and founded a congregation which became extinct after a few decades when the members moved to Champaign County, Ohio, and to Topeka, Ind. A small Amish settlement founded near Martinsburg, Knox Co., Ohio, c1840 organized a congregation and ordained Isaac Schmucker preacher but moved as a group to Champaign County, Ohio, and Noble County, Ind., before the end of the decade.

About 1840 Amish from Mifflin County, Pa., and Wayne County began settling in Union Township, Logan County, Ohio, where they founded what is now the South Union church (MC). A few years later settlers from Fairfield and Wayne counties, including Jacob Hertzler, the bishop in Fairfield, founded the Champaign County congregation eight or ten miles southeast of the Logan County congregation. They were joined a few years later by John Warye, of Hesse-Cassel, Germany, ordained preacher in 1855, bishop in 1862 for what is now the Oak Grove church (q.v.) in Champaign County. For the first few years the two congregations met in each other's services on alternate Sundays as the North and South "districts" of the same congregation, a practice still followed by Old Order Amish congregations. Difficulties developed when Jacob Hertzler allowed certain deviations from the strict Amish requirements. When a considerable number of the members of the Logan County district advocated the same progressive measures, they withdrew and worshiped on alternate Sundays with the Champaign County district. They held their Logan County meetings in non-Mennonite meetinghouses on the intervening Sunday. In 1875 the Champaign district built the Oak Grove church and their friends in Logan County the Walnut Grove church (q.v.). The original Logan County congregation built a new church in 1876, South Union (q.v.). The two groups, Walnut Grove-Oak Grove and South Union, refused each other full fellowship until 1895 when a new bishop was to be ordained to serve the Logan County churches. South Union and Walnut Grove then agreed to place both of their leading ministers in the lot and to accept whichever one should be chosen, as bishop of the two congregations. David Plank (q.v.) of Walnut Grove was chosen and ordained. Under his beneficent administration the two groups drew together and at his death A. I. Yoder (q.v.), a son of the preacher who had served the South Union congregation for many years, was ordained bishop for the two congregations. After a few years the Walnut Grove church building was closed and sold.

The years have brought other experiences to the Logan and Champaign congregations, some good, some sad. In 1880 a small group seceded from Oak Grove and Walnut Grove over the issue of English preaching and the use of musical instruments in the homes. Locally they were known as the "Miller Church" because an Indiana Amish Mennonite bishop, Eli Miller, had organized the congregation. They were members of the Indiana A.M. Conference. The movement died out at Oak Grove in less than a dozen years but lasted a few years more at Walnut Grove. A Church of God camp meeting in the early 1890's raised emotions to a high pitch and drew away several members from Oak Grove and from the Miller church and resulted in the organization of the Church of God congregation in West Liberty. In 1890 a revival meeting held at the South Union church by John F. Funk and D. J. Johns of Elkhart County, Ind., led to the founding of the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.) in West Liberty in 1895. In the course of the next few years the English church and Sunday-school services at Bethel attracted a considerable number of young Amish Mennonites who otherwise might have been lost to the church. During the 1890's a stirring revival meeting at the Mt. Tabor M.E. Church led to the conversion of S. E. Allgyer (q.v.) and his wife in their home and profoundly affected his life and service in the Mennonite Church. At that time he was Sunday-school superintendent at Oak Grove. Later he was ordained preacher and bishop. After the death of A. I. Yoder, Allgyer served the three churches, Oak Grove, Bethel, and South Union, as bishop. The three congregations now have a combined membership of 682. These congregations, especially Bethel, have contributed an unusually large number of workers to the institutions of the church, especially in the areas of education and missions.

Old Order Amish Survival of Early Amish Settlements. Although the last "no-meetinghouse Amish" disappeared from the Green Township, Wayne County, Amish settlement before the end of the third quarter of the 19th century, the quiet remoteness of the Holmes County hills was particularly conducive to the persistence of the time-honored Amish social and religious practices. And, although a progressive Amish group under the leadership of their bishop, Moses Beachy, built a meetinghouse (Walnut Creek) in 1862 (the same date as the first such building of the Wayne County Amish), at least an equal number held firmly to the old customs. Beginning with this Holmes County nucleus, the state of Ohio, with 6,500 of the 17,000 baptized members of the Old Order Amish congregations in America, now has 71 congregations in 13 counties in the state, making Ohio the leading state in the Union from the standpoint of its Amish population. Major areas of concentration are located in the following groups of counties: (1) Holmes, Wayne, Stark, Tuscarawas, and Coshocton; (2) Geauga, Trumbull, and Ashtabula; (3) Madison and Union. Amish from Holmes County settled in Geauga County southeast of Cleveland in 1886 and in Madison County west of Columbus in 1896. After a number of Amish from Geauga County had united with the Plainview congregation (MC) in Portage County about 1930, the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference organized the Burton congregation (MC) in 1948, present membership 74. In 1926 after several members of the Amish congregation in Madison County had united with the Oak Grove congregation (MC) near West Liberty and had been expelled by the Amish for leaving their congregation, Oak Grove members organized a Sunday school at Resaca, and in 1933 the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference organized the Sharon Mennonite congregation (q.v.) near Plain City, which had 163 members in 1957. The first preacher ordained for this church has been ordained bishop and is serving as bishop also at Bethel and Oak Grove near West Liberty. In 1939 the Beachy Amish organized a congregation, Canaan, near Plain

City, membership 60, and in 1944 the Conservative Mennonite Conference organized the United Bethel congregation near the same place, membership 164. This active organization has established two mission points, one in Columbus, the other at Blue Creek. In spite of losing members or even an occasional congregation to one of the more progressive groups, the number of Old Order Amish in Ohio is constantly increasing. This is not due to missionary effort, but to the natural increase in population and the ability of the group to hold the interest of its young people.

The Swiss Mennonites. Two Swiss Mennonites from the Jura Mountain area in Switzerland arrived in Green Township, Wayne County, and united with the Oak Grove Amish congregation in 1818, but in the next year a number of their friends arrived and after a brief period of prospecting decided to settle in the rolling hills of Paint Township several miles farther south. Here during the next few years they were joined by friends from the Jura and founded the strong Sonnenberg congregation (q.v.). In 1825 others from the same region in Switzerland founded another settlement several miles farther north. For some time the two settlements were considered parts of the same congregation. Each built its own meetinghouse and the northern group (Crown Hill, q.v.) eventually joined the Ohio Conference (MC). The Sonnenberg congregation, long independent and without conference affiliation, owes its present conservative attitude to the firm but beneficent administration of its bishop, Christian Sommer (1811-91). As early as 1879 he severed all connection with the other Swiss Mennonite congregations in western Ohio and eastern Indiana because, he asserted, they had left their early pattern of simple life and faith. In 1886 a few members withdrew under the influence of the Wadsworth Mennonite School group to found the Salem Mennonite Church (q.v.) near by. In 1893-94 the "Russellite" heresy led several members away from Sonnenberg. During World War I when several young men who had been attending Bluffton College enlisted for military service with the support of the Salem congregation, the pastor and a group of supporters left Salem and founded the Kidron Tabernacle congregation. After 1926 the ministers of the Sonnenberg group worked more and more with the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference. The transition from German to English was not begun until the third decade of the 20th century and then only after a severe struggle. In 1936 more than three fifths of the 500 members of the Sonnenberg congregation withdrew to found the Kidron Mennonite Church (MC), 1957 membership 484. The original Sonnenberg congregation was admitted to the Virginia Mennonite Conference (MC) a few years ago, membership 174. About 40 members withdrew from the Sonnenberg congregation to found the independent Bethel congregation at Apple Creek, present membership 49.

Beginning in 1833 friends of the Sonnenberg group began a Swiss Mennonite settlement in Putnam and Allen counties, Ohio. Located in a rich agricultural region, the original Swiss settlement now consists of four congregations: Ebenezer, St.

Johns, Grace in Pandora, and the First Mennonite Church in Bluffton. Under the able, progressive administration of their bishop, John Moser, during the latter half of the 19th century, these congregations have made phenomenal growth. Their present combined membership is 1,670. Extremely plain in their general cultural pattern, they came under the influence of the Wadsworth Mennonite School during the 1870's and laid aside many of the marks of their earlier Swiss culture, but were able to do so without serious internal difficulty. In 1848 a former Swiss Mennonite, John Thut, who had been ordained to the ministry in the Kolbs congregation in Holmes County, settled in the neighborhood. But because this congregation did not practice footwashing he withdrew from them and founded the Riley Creek congregation (later Zion, MC). After his death one of the ministers with more than half of the congregation withdrew to found a Defenseless Mennonite (now Evangelical Mennonite) congregation, present membership 62. After a difficult period of rehabilitation the Zion congregation became a vital force in the educational, missionary, and charitable organizations of the Mennonite Church (MC). It was the home of Menno S. and Albert J. Steiner. Some of its members helped to organize the congregation at New Stark in adjoining Hancock County, the home of John Blosser, first president of the Mennonite Board of Education. The Zion congregation was reabsorbed by the First Mennonite Church of Bluffton in 1925 and the church building razed.

The Alsatian Amish in Fulton and Williams Counties. Beginning in 1834 an entirely new immigration of Amish direct from Europe founded what has now become a veritable cluster of churches (MC) in Fulton and Williams counties in northwestern Ohio, one of the most prosperous agricultural sections of the state. Coming from Alsace and Montbéliard many of them spoke and wrote both French and German. Of a different cultural background from the older Amish congregations in the state and of sufficient numerical strength to be self-dependent, they avoided close organizational ties with their American brethren but co-operated with them in a general way in conference activities. Until well into the present century the groups worshipping at their three meetinghouses—Central, Lockport, and West Clinton—were considered as one congregation with Elias B. Frey as their bishop and his brother, Jacob Frey, deacon. The rather large number of ministers preached at the different meetinghouses in rotation. The three congregations are now separate organizations each with its own bishop and church organization. In addition to these three there are now five other congregations: Lost Creek, Pine Grove, Tedrow, Zion, and North Clinton, each with its own church building and pastor, besides four mission outposts with a combined membership of 72. The total membership of the 8 congregations and their 4 mission stations is over 1900. These congregations are members of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference (MC). The original Amish congregations in this general area lost members to two other Mennonite conferences. The Reformed Mennonite Church (q.v.) established a congregation near Archbold in 1852, erected the Laubert Hill meetinghouse in 1864, and now has a membership of 71. The Evangelical Mennonite Church (q.v.), formerly known as the Egli Amish and later as the Defenseless Mennonites, organized a congregation in Archbold in 1870 and now maintains two thriving congregations at Archbold and at Wauseon with a combined membership of 650.

Ohio Mennonites have developed the following institutions: Bluffton College (GCM, known as Central Mennonite College 1898-1913); Orphans' Home (MC, 1896) at West Liberty, since 1957 called Adriel School; Home for the Aged (MC, 1901) near Rittman; Mennonite Memorial Home (GCM, 1945) near Bluffton; Camp Luz (MC, 1953) near Orrville. J.S.U.

STATISTICAL SUMMARY OF MENNONITE AND AMISH CONGREGATIONS IN OHIO BY CONFERENCES

Body or Conference	Congregations	Members
Mennonite Church (MC)	74	9808
Ohio and Eastern*	61	8111
Conservative Mennonite	9†	1037
Virginia Conference	2	212
Unaffiliated	2	448
Old Order Amish	71‡	6586
General Conference Mennonite	9	2591
Evangelical Mennonite	4	853
Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite	6	341
Beachy Amish Mennonite	3	225
Reformed Mennonite	6	150
Church of God in Christ, Menn.	2	58
Total		20,612

* Of the 65 organized and 37 unorganized congregations in the Conference, 70 are in Ohio.

† Also 5 mission stations.

‡ Districts rather than congregations.

Ohio and Canada West Mennonite Conference (GCM) was organized in 1855 under the leadership of Daniel Hoch (q.v.), of Jordan, Ont., under the formal name, "Conference Council of the United Mennonite Community of Canada West and Ohio." No list of member congregations is available, but in Ohio the only one apparently was the newly organized Wadsworth congregation, formed from families who came from the Oberholtzer Conference in Eastern Pennsylvania. The Canadians were small dissident groups from a number of congregations in Waterloo County and Lincoln County, possibly also in the Markham district north of Toronto. The chief purpose of the conference, which met annually at first, was the promotion of home missions and evangelism, and by September 1859, the conference had a fully organized "Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the Mennonites." Daniel Hoch was appointed traveling minister (Reiseprediger) at an early date. The conference joined with the Oberholtzer group in Eastern Pennsylvania and a small group in Iowa to organize the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America in 1860.

The Canada-Ohio Conference continued until about 1869. The group in Ontario disintegrated, most of the members ultimately joining the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.), a new schismatic movement which started in 1874. The Ohio churches ultimately joined the newly formed Middle District Conference. H.S.B.

H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference . . . (n.p., 1898).

Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference (MC), first known as the Ohio Mennonite and Eastern Amish Mennonite Joint Conference, was formed in 1927 by a merger of the Ohio Mennonite Conference (q.v.) and the Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference (q.v.). The new conference held its first full session in 1928. In 1955 it dropped the last vestige of the age-old separation by adopting as its official title the present name. At that time the annual report showed a total of 11,109 members, 78 congregations, 26 bishops, 109 ministers, and 96 deacons. The membership as reported in the 1958 Mennonite Yearbook is 65 organized congregations and 37 unorganized congregations or mission stations with a total of 10,893 baptized members. The apparent decrease is due to the withdrawal of several eastern congregations to unite with their nearer conference, the Southwestern Pennsylvania (q.v.), now known as the Allegheny Conference: Maple Grove at Belleville in 1944 and the following in 1957: Allensville, Otelia, Rockville, and Mattawana. The present combined membership of these congregations is 594. There are still 22 congregations in the conference east of Ohio, with some 2,400 members (mostly in Eastern Pennsylvania and Maryland), sufficient to warrant the name Ohio and Eastern. J.S.U.

Ohio Conference of the United Missionary Church was a part of the United Evangelical Mennonite denomination, which was organized in 1879. It was listed as a part of the Indiana-Michigan-Ohio Conference. In 1883 the union of the United Evangelical Mennonites and the Brethren in Christ created the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (which changed its name to United Missionary Church in 1947). Several churches of the Swankite Branch of the Brethren in Christ located in Clark County, Ohio, and in Westmoreland and Armstrong counties in Western Pennsylvania were added and formed a nucleus from which the district was localized in several areas. On Oct. 27, 1942, the General Conference Executive Committee granted the request for separation.

On April 11, 1944, the Ohio Conference met in its first annual session at Hubert Avenue Church in Springfield.

The Ohio Conference has conducted an annual camp meeting at Ludlow Falls for 35 consecutive years. Foreign missionary work is one of the primary objectives and the conference is represented by five missionaries at present.

The twelfth annual session, in 1956, reported 18 ministers, 1,268 members, and a total offering for the twelve-month period of $166,101. The estimated value of the property is $439,850. H.E.Bo.

Ohio Mennonite Christian Workers Conference, successor to the Ohio Sunday School Conference (known also for a number of years as the Ohio Sunday School and Young People's Bible Meeting Conference), served both Mennonites and Amish Mennonites as an outlet for united Sunday school, missionary, and young people's Christian activities, before and after the merger of the Ohio Mennonite and Ohio and Eastern Amish Mennonite conferences. Its first meeting was held at the Salem Mennonite Church near Wooster, Ohio, in 1895. It was probably the first conference to meet in a large tent, because of the large attendance, and owns a tent for use in its annual meetings.

The conference was from the beginning an excellent combination of lay and ministerial interest and activity and was autonomous in organization. Early efforts of some leaders of the Indiana Mennonite and Ohio Mennonite conferences to supervise and control the activities of the Ohio Sunday School Conference were ineffective for several reasons: (1) some of the most active early Sunday-school workers in the state were Amish Mennonites, such as David Plank (q.v.), D. S. Yoder, S. E. Allgyer (q.v.), C. Z. Yoder (q.v.), Jerome Smucker, S. H. Miller, and younger men, e.g., I. W. Royer, C. K. Hostetler, and E. J. Zook; (2) on one occasion when the Sunday School Conference was held in a Mennonite church and directed by the Ohio Mennonite Conference attendance was small and interest at a low ebb; (3) on a subsequent occasion after the Ohio Mennonite Conference had prescribed certain limits to the work of the Sunday School Conference, Sunday-school leaders in the state announced that the next conference was to be held at the Amish Mennonite Church in Logan County (Walnut Creek) and appointed David Plank corresponding secretary to arrange for the conference. This conference session was attended by so large a number of Sunday-school workers from both branches of the church and such a fine spirit of fellowship and co-operation was in evidence that the concept of an autonomous Sunday-school conference organization received added impetus. The constitution adopted in 1914 provided for an executive secretary, an executive committee, and a delegate body. The delegate body consists of all ordained men in the state and lay delegates elected by each Sunday school.

Soon after the constitution was adopted, I. W. Royer was elected executive secretary and served for more than a third of a century. His industry, tact, and co-operative spirit made the conference a vital force in promoting Bible study and teaching, missionary spirit, spiritual Christian activity among the young people, and unity among the brotherhood. Months before the annual conference he met with the executive committee and spent days arranging the conference program, then took it to the local ministry for their advice and counsel. Wherever local conditions were favorable, the program provided for special vocal music by young people's groups as an added inspirational feature. The conference has proved a powerful cohesive force in Ohio Mennonitism. It has regularly raised funds to support home and foreign missions, and recently established a fund to aid young men from the Ohio area preparing for the ministry by attending seminary.

The Ohio conference is the outstanding conference of its kind in the Mennonite Church (MC) and has made a major contribution to the life of that church in the 20th century. J.S.U.

John Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Goshen, 1941), written at the request of the Ohio Mennonite Sunday School Conference and subsidized by it, though published by the Mennonite Historical Society at Goshen College.

Ohio Evangel, the 7¼ x 10½ in. 16-page bimonthly organ of the Ohio Mennonite Mission Board, first called Ohio Mission News Bulletin (1947), then Ohio Mission Evangel (1949-52), Ohio Evangel (1953-), with an earlier subtitle and motto, "A Mission Outpost for Every Congregation." Editors have been Stanford Mumaw (1947-48), Harold Bauman (1949-53), David Hostetler (1953-55), and Edward Stoltzfus (1955-). H.S.B.

Ohio Mennonite Conference. Mennonite historians, following the lead of C. Henry Smith, have agreed on 1843 as the date of the organization of this conference, meeting annually in late spring at the Mahoning County or Oberholser Church (now Midway, q.v.) and later alternating with the Martins Church (q.v.) in Wayne County (q.v.). (Since, however, Mennonite ministers were holding conferences both in eastern Pennsylvania as early as 1750 and in Canada soon after 1800, and since at least 10 congregations were established in eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania before 1830, it seems unlikely that no Ohio conference was held before 1843.) According to John F. Funk the early Ohio conferences had no regular agenda, passed no formal motions, kept no written minutes, but reached decisions by general oral agreement after informal discussion. This was true for several decades, even after Funk began to print the annual reports in the Herald of Truth. After a number of congregations had been organized in Indiana, ministers from that state attended the Ohio conference sessions. Later (by 1856 at least) an annual fall conference was held at the Yellow Creek Mennonite Church in Elkhart County, Ind., but it did little more than agree to the informal decisions expressed at the spring conference in Ohio. The Indiana meeting had by 1864 become an independent Indiana-Michigan Conference. Toward the end of the century Mennonite ministers began to attend the annual conferences of their Amish Mennonite brethren and to labor for an organic union of the Amish Mennonite and Mennonite conferences. John F. Funk (q.v.), John S. Coffman (q.v.), and Menno S. Steiner (q.v.) were tactful but persistent leaders in the movement for unification.

Meanwhile the American Amish wing of the Swiss Brethren-Anabaptist movement continued the traditional practice of holding formal conferences, adopting rules and policies and keeping minutes of the proceedings. From manuscript copies of some of these minutes material has been printed in the Mennonite Quarterly Review (see bibliography). Without the slightest intention of uniting with the Mennonites the Amish gradually took several steps that led in that direction. Even before 1850 some Amish congregations on the Ohio frontier departed from some of their traditional practices and began to adopt the name Amish Mennonite. A Wayne County Amish congregation even ventured so far as to accept a Mennonite as a member without requiring him first to be rebaptized by an Amish bishop. The same congregation fellowshipped with later Hessian, Alsatian, and Palatine Amish immigrants, whose gradual acculturation in Europe had led them away from some of the earlier cultural practices. Toward the end of the 19 century Amish Mennonites and Mennonites gradually became acquainted and drew closer together, first through the columns of the Herald of Truth, then through using the same Sunday-school "Lesson Helps," 1889; meeting in a church-wide general Sunday-school conference (q.v.), 1892; engaging in a co-operative educational project (Elkhart Institute, q.v.), 1895; and finally organizing a general conference of Amish Mennonites and Mennonites in the United States and Canada, 1897. In 1904 the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference voted to unite with the Ohio Mennonite Conference "in establishing a mission post" in Canton. Even before that date the members of each conference attended the sessions of the other. At this 1904 Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference six of the sixteen bishops in attendance were Mennonites, as were ten of the twenty-two ministers and one of the five deacons. Even then, however, some of the Amish Mennonites were unfriendly toward too close collaboration with the Mennonites. They preferred their own type of congregational government. It was not until 1926 that each conference appointed a "merger committee" to work out a plan for an organic union of the two conferences. Each conference held a final separate session in 1927. Under the name Ohio Mennonite and Eastern A.M. Joint Conference, the merged conferences held their first meeting in 1928.

The Ohio Mennonite Conference reported the following congregations at the time of the merger in 1927: Midway, North Lima, East Lewistown, and Leetonia, together 390 members; Salem 32; Turkey Run 25; Martins 125; Kolbs, Longenecker, and Union Hill, together 40; Marion 12; Bethel and Guilford 100; Central 82; Pike and Salem, together 225; Mt. Pleasant 40; Medway 34; Bethel (West Liberty) 110; Lima 20; Crown Hill 126; Canton 75; Pleasant View 90; a total of 16 congregations with 23 meeting places and a membership of 1,526. At the time of the merger two of the congregations of this conference were in charge of bishops in the Ohio and Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference: Central at Elida and Bethel at West Liberty.

J.S.U.

H. S. Bender, "Some Early American Amish Mennonite Disciplines," MQR VII (1934) 90-98; XI (April 1937) 163-80; see also MQR XX (1946) 232-40, and XXII (1948) 94-115.

Ohio Mennonite Mission Board (MC) was organized in 1920 and held its first annual meeting in that year. The first president of the board was A. J. Steiner. Other officers were J. S. Gerig, S. E. Allgyer, Eli D. Yoder, and E. B. Stoltzfus. The Orrville Mennonite Church (q.v.) is the outgrowth of the first full-time mission project under the Ohio board. The Ohio Evangel (q.v.), which it publishes bimonthly, reports the activities of the organization as well as news from its mission congregations. In 1957 the Ohio Mennonite Mission Board had the following eight missions: Fairpoint (at Fairpoint), Hillside Chapel (Jackson), Kennedy Avenue (Dayton), Lower Owl Creek (Lucasville), Pine Grove (Vinton), Rockview (Youngstown), St. John's Chapel (Logan), and Warneke Chapel (Pedro). Outside of the jurisdiction of the board were 24 outposts of congregations which were members of the board. The Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities operated five additional missions in Ohio.

M.G.

Ohm or Onkel (German), Oom (Dutch), i.e., Uncle, is used by certain Mennonites as a title of affectionate regard or honor. The early Dutch Mennonites used the title "Oom" for ministers and other persons to be honored. This practice was transplanted by the Mennonites settling in Danzig and Russia, where it was "Ohm" in Low German and "Onkel" in High German. The latter was also used in South Germany although "Vetter" (cousin) is also common.

C.K.

Ohnenheim, a village in Alsace (q.v.), district of Schlettstadt (Sélestat), where the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) of April 1632 was signed on Feb. 4, 1660, in a conference of the Mennonite preachers of Alsace-Lorraine. Ohnenheim was the meeting place of the Mennonites who lived in the Bishopric of Strasbourg (see Colmar). (ML III, 295 f.)

NEFF.

Ohrloff: see also Orloff.

Ohrloff Mennonite Hospital, located in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Russia, was established by the heirs of H. H. Reimer in 1910. The first doctors were Fink (Dorpat University), Gerhard D. Dürksen (Odessa University), and J. J. Isaak (Medical School at St. Petersburg). The manager was H. D. Günther. The report for the year 1912 lists the following doctors in service: O. Pinker, P. Dück, and Gerhard G. Dürksen. During that year, 467 patients were treated and the average number of patients in the hospital at one time was 17. Some of the nurses received their training at Morija (q.v.). After the Revolution, the hospital was nationalized. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 58; Dirks, Jahrbuch 1913, 172.)

C.K.

Ohrloff Mennonitische Zentralschule was the first secondary school established among the Mennonites in Russia. It was founded in 1820 by an educational society (Schulverein) headed by Johann Cornies (q.v.), the great Mennonite organizer and colonizer. The first site of the school, which at that time had only one classroom, was between the villages of Ohrloff and Tiege in the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine. In 1847 the school building burned down, the following year J. Cornies died, and the school remained closed till 1860, when it was reopened in a new building at Ohrloff.

Like all other Zentralschulen in the Molotschna and its daughter settlements, the Ohrloff school had a three-year course of study, in contrast to this type of schools in the Chortitza settlement, where the course of study was four years. The first teacher was Tobias Voth, whom Cornies invited to come from Prussia. Because he could teach only in the German language and was not strict enough in his school discipline, Cornies dismissed him after seven years of service. He was followed by Heinrich Heese, another pioneer of education among the Russian Mennonites, who also came from Prussia. He had studied Russian for several years and now at the wish of Cornies this language was introduced into the curriculum of the school. Heese taught for 15 years, then also disagreed with Cornies, left the school, and went to Chortitza, where he founded the Chortitza Zentralschule. After its reopening in 1860 the Ohrloff Zentralschule had three classrooms with three teachers. Its curriculum supplied a very substantial higher elementary education. Some prominent teachers of the school were Hermann Janzen, P. H. Ediger, P. J. Wiens, J. Janzen, and especially Cornelius Unruh and Johann Bräul, two of the most prominent schoolmen among the Russian Mennonites.

In 1912 the school was moved into its new beautiful modern building. But soon, with the advent of World War I and after it the Russian Revolution, the Communist regime took over the school and it ceased to be a center of Mennonite education. (Friesen, Brüderschaft.) H.G.

Ohrlofffelderde: see Orlofffelderde.

Ohrloff-Petershagen Mennonite Church: see Orloff Mennonite Church.

Ojo de lad Yegua, a Mennonite settlement (north settlement) near Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico, was established by landless Old Colony Mennonite families in 1946 northeast of the Manitoba Mennonite settlement. The Buena Vista ranch, formerly occupied by J. E. Enns, is located in this settlement. The beginning of this daughter colony of the Manitoba and Swift Current settlement was a difficult one. In 1953 it had a population of 3,594. C.K.

Okeene Mennonite Brethren Church, also sometimes called the Ebenfeld Church, located at Okeene, Okla., was organized on April 20, 1903, with Adam Fischer as the first leader. Heinrich Rusch, an ordained minister, served the church 1903-32. The following have served as pastors: R. C. Seibel 1932-35, H. H. Hiebert 1935-37, Waldo Wiebe 1937, Dan Friesen 1939-44, Arthur Willems 1944-48, Henry Heinrichs 1948-52, E. C. Ollenburger 1952-. The membership in 1954 was 91, with J. C. Neufeld as leader. S.F.

Oklahoma, a southwestern state, bounded on the north by Colorado and Kansas, on the east by Missouri and Arkansas, on the south by Texas, and on the west by Texas and New Mexico, has an area of 69,919 miles, and a population 2,189,000 (1956). Originally Oklahoma formed a part of the Louisiana Purchase from France in 1803 and existed as an unorganized Indian Territory in 1820-40, reserved for Indians exclusively. A part was opened to general settlement in 1889 and the western part organized as Oklahoma Territory in 1890. The rest was gradually opened to settlement, and then by the Enabling Act of 1906 the Indian Territory and the Oklahoma Territory were merged and admitted into the Union as a state on Nov. 16, 1907.

Mennonite settlement in Oklahoma began as soon as the Indian Territory was opened for white settlement on April 22, 1892. The Mennonites who came to this territory were primarily those who had settled in the Great Plains of Kansas and Nebraska two decades before the opening of Oklahoma. Many of them did not have enough land for their children, or were lured by the prospect of vast unoccupied space in this area. However, the first Mennonites who came to Oklahoma did not do so for economic reasons. The General Conference Mennonite Church, which had been organized as a conference in 1860, and had been looking for an appropriate mission field, was attracted to the Indian Territory (Oklahoma) and opened a mission there.

Missions. In 1875 S. S. Haury was ordained as a missionary and the following year he was sent to the Indian Territory to look for a field. He became acquainted with the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians. Through the help of the Indian agent Miles, a Quaker stationed at Darlington, the General Conference Mennonite Church began its first mission work among the Arapaho Indians in 1880. A frame mission school building was established at Darlington (q.v.), northwest of the present city of El Reno, to accommodate twenty-five Indian children and the missionary family. S. S. Haury (q.v.) was the first Mennonite missionary to do work among the Indians of Oklahoma and possibly also the first Mennonite to enter the Indian territory. Later the mission work was extended to Cantonment (q.v.) (now Canton) and the Cheyennes (q.v.). Other stations were added.

The Mennonite Brethren began the Post Oak mission a few miles northeast of the present city of Indianola in 1894, when Henry Kohfeld (q.v.) started his work among the Comanche Indians. A. J. Becker, who came here in 1901, spent his whole life among the Comanches.

The first actual Mennonite settlement to be established in Oklahoma resulted from the establishment of the Darlington Mission. In 1891 some people who had settled between the present towns of Okarche and El Reno, Canadian County, established the Mennoville Mennonite Church (q.v.), the first Mennonite church in Oklahoma. On April 19, 1892, three million acres of land in the Cheyenne and Arapaho territories were opened to white settlement. Among the earliest homesteaders in the western part of the Oklahoma territory were numerous Mennonites, primarily from Kansas and Nebraska. Their settlements extended into the counties later called Blaine, Custer, and Washita. One group homesteaded near the present site of Geary, another in the vicinity of Watonga, and a third in the vicinity of Okeene. In 1893 the Cooper Mennonite Brethren Church was organized. In 1902 this settlement was disbanded. The first Old Order Amish settled in the Thomas community in 1893.

Through a study it has been estimated that some 100,000 people joined in the race to establish claims in the Oklahoma Territory; many Mennonites were among them, coming from Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and Missouri. They were the founders of the communities of Meno, Medford, Deer Creek, Orienta, Fairview, Lahoma, Kremlin, North Enid, Enid, etc. The first Mennonite (GCM) church founded in 1894 as a result of this "run" was located in the Fairview community. The North and South Hoffnungsfield Mennonite Brethren congregations were established here.

Mennonite (GCM) families from McPherson and Marion counties, Kan., organized the present Meno community on June 13, 1895. They established the New Hopedale Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the Ringwood West New Hopedale Mennonite Church (q.v.). The village of Meno (Menno) was founded in 1902. The Mennonite Brethren Church of Medford (q.v.) was organized on Feb. 4, 1897. J. F. Harms was the minister there and the editor and printer of the Zionsbote. The town of Deer Creek (q.v.) was founded in 1898 adjacent to a Mennonite settlement of persons primarily of South German background who organized a congregation in 1899.

Mennonites of the M.C. group settled in Alfalfa County and organized the Milan Valley Church. Other settlements were established near Manchester and Newkirk. A few families of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, settled near Fairview. The Church of God (Apostolische Brüdergemein- de), followers of Herman Peters (q.v.), established a small group (see Fairview Church of God). Mennonites also settled in Kiowa, Beaver, Texas, and Caddo counties in 1901-7. Two General Conference congregations and one Mennonite Brethren in the Gotebo vicinity were established shortly after 1901. In the Oklahoma Panhandle, Mennonites settled in Beaver County near Turpin, and in Texas County near Balko and Hooker.

Pioneer life on the Oklahoma plains was difficult, intensified by poverty and drought conditions. Pioneers lived in sod houses and dugouts. Many found lack of water a serious problem. After 1897, when bumper crops were harvested, conditions improved in many places.

By the close of the Territorial period in 1907 there were, according to Marvin Kroeker, 37 Mennonite congregations in Oklahoma, sixteen of which belonged to the General Conference Mennonite Church, twelve to the Mennonite Brethren, three to the Mennonite Church (MC), two to the Old Order Amish, one to the Amish Mennonites, one to the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and one to the Church of God in Christ, Mennonites.

Congregations. In 1911, Oklahoma had 33 Mennonite congregations with a membership of 1,944 in the following congregations:

MENNONITE CHURCHES IN OKLAHOMA IN 1911

Name of Church	County	Location	Members
American Indian Mission (GCM)	Blaine	4 m. NW of Canton	74
Berghthal (GCM)	Washita	11 m. NW of Bessie	51
Bethania (GCM)	Woodward	24 m. S of Cold Water	31
Bethel (MB)	Custer	5 m. SW of Weatherford	65
Bethel (GCM)	Caddo	8 m. W of Hinton	23
Caddo (GCM)	Caddo	8 m. W of Hinton	20
Cheyenne Mission (GCM)	Custer	6½ m. E of Hammon	12
Deer Creek (GCM)	Grant	Deer Creek	42
Ebenezer (GCM)	Kiowa	4 m. NE of Gotebo	86
Friedensau (GCM)	Noble	6 m. SE of Perry	23
Friedenthal (GCM)	Kiowa	6 m. SW of Gotebo	74
Geary (GCM)	Blaine	Geary	60
German Springs (OOA)	Alfalfa	Manchester	36
German Springs (MC)	Alfalfa	6 m. SE of Waldron	40
Guymon (OOA)	Texas	7 m. SE of Guymon	13
Gotebo (MB)	Kiowa	Gotebo	65
Herold (GCM)	Washita	5 m. SE of Bessie	125
Medford (GCM)	Grant	2 m. E of Medford	80
Milan Valley (MC)	Alfalfa	3 m. SE of Jet	33
Newkirk (MC)	Kay	5 m. SW of Newkirk	15
Neuhoffnungsthal (GCM)	Woods	½ m. N of Meno	175
Pleasant View (OOA)	Blaine	9 m. SW of Hydro	65
Salem (GCM)	Washita	5 m. NE of Cordell	20
Saron (MB)	Texas	11 m. SE of Hooker	65
Saron (GCM)	Woods	1 m. SW of Orienta	35
School House (OOA)	Grant	Medford	13
Sichar (GCM)	Washita	6 m. NE of Cordell	30
Springfield (GCM)	Caddo	17 m. S of Hydro	54
Thomas (OOA)	Custer	2 m. from Thomas	100
Washita (MB)	Washita	14 m. SW of Weatherford	350
Weatherford (MB)	Washita	Weatherford
Zemamovo (GCM)	Noble	5 m. SE of Canton	52
Zion (GCM)	Blaine	1 m. S of Lucien	17

(Taken from H. P. Krehbiel, Mennonite Churches in North America, published in 1911.)

The following is a list of congregations derived from the official conference reports of the various Mennonite groups of Oklahoma after World War II. The total number of recorded congregations is 40 and the total membership 4,985. The U.M.C. congregations are not listed in these tables.

*Mennonite Churches in Oklahoma
After World War II*

1. General Conference Mennonite in 1956, 17 congregations with 1,902 members: Herold (Bessie) 231, Greenfield (Carnegie) 88, First, of Clinton 49, Bergthal (Corn) 99, Deer Creek 124, Bethel (Enid) 25, Grace (Enid) 119, First of Geary (Geary) 64, Zoar (Goltry) 150, Ebenezer (Gotebo) 52, Bethel (Hydro) 57, Eden (Inola) 147, Medford (Medford) 98, New Hopedale (Meno) 308, Saron (Orienta) 128, West New Hopedale (Ringwood) 67, Friedensfeld (Turpin) 105; 2. Mennonite Brethren in 1954, 13 congregations with 2,260 members: Balco 131, Bessie 172, Collinsville 72, Corn 626, Enid City 189, Enid Country 203, Fairview 411, Hooker 116, Inola 15, Okeene 89, Weatherford (Indiahoma) 25, Lawton View (Mission) 47, Indiahoma 184; 3. Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, in 1955, three congregations with 406 members: Plainview (Chickasha) 125, Fairview (Fairview) 235, Pleasantview (Goltry) 46; 4. Mennonite Church (MC) in 1956, three congregations with 257 members: Zion (Pryor) 108, Pleasant View (Hydro) 130, Oak Grove (Adair) 21; 5. Old Order Amish in 1956, four congregations with 160 members: South District (Weatherford) 42, North District (Thomas) 66, Choteau District (Choteau) 52, and Mazie District (Mazie, no figure given).

Since World War I. The time preceding and following World War I was marked by definite economic progress for the Mennonites of Oklahoma. The problems and difficulties of pioneer conditions were overcome. During the war some Mennonites suffered because of the general anti-German feeling. Some towns and businesses posted signs, "Use American language only."

In their spiritual and educational efforts the Mennonites of Oklahoma were aided by their mother congregations of Kansas and other states. The Western Conference (GCM) helped to found the Oklahoma Convention (q.v.) which takes care of the specific needs and problems of the Oklahoma congregations, although the latter are members of the Western District Conference. The Mennonite Brethren congregations belong to the Southern District M.B. Conference. The M.C. congregations belong to the South Central Conference.

The Mennonite Brethren of Oklahoma established the Corn Bible Academy (q.v.) in 1902. The General Conference Mennonites established the Gotebo Preparatory School (q.v.) in 1910, and the Oklahoma Bible Academy (q.v.) in 1911, which is still functioning: An evangelistic mission-minded fervor is found in most of the congregations. The Mennonites of Oklahoma have supported the mission work among the Indians of the state. (See Arapahoe Mennonite Mission, Cheyenne Indians, Indiahoma.)

The Mennonite population of Oklahoma is still predominantly rural, although the number of those who seek employment in the city and establish businesses is constantly increasing. Some of the towns in and around which Mennonites are located are: Meno, Corn, Enid, Weatherford, Deer Creek, Orienta, Geary, Gotebo, Kremlin, Medford, and Fairview. Only a few, like Meno and Corn, are predominantly Mennonite. During the depression after World War I many Mennonites joined other inhabitants of Oklahoma in their search for better living conditions in California. Numerous Mennonite families established new homes in Los Angeles, Bakersfield, Shafter, Fresno, Reedley, etc.

Since the Mennonite baptized church membership is some 5,000, it can be assumed that the total Mennonite population including children is at present over 10,000 (1957). In the religious and cultural life the Mennonites of Oklahoma in general follow the pattern of the older Mennonite settlements in surrounding states in gradual adjustment to the environment. In most cases English is the primary spoken language, although Low German dialects are still used in some homes. In their worship services English is used almost exclusively, with the exception of the Amish. Although a distinctive ethnic culture in some of the groups can still be traced, many of these characteristics have been more assimilated to the general culture than is the case in the settlements of other states from which they came. Mennonites coming originally from Poland, Molotschna in Russia, Prussia, South Germany, Pennsylvania, and other states have found a new home in a territory which became a state only fifty years ago.

C.K.

Marvin E. Kroeker, "The Mennonites of Oklahoma to 1907" (unpublished M.A. thesis, University of Oklahoma, 1954); Christian Krehbiel, "Beginnings of Missions in Oklahoma," Menn. Life X (July 1955); Marvin E. Kroeker, "The Mennonites in the Oklahoma Runs," Menn. Life X (July 1955); P. C. Grunau, "North Enid Mennonite Brethren Church," Menn. Life IX (October 1954); Herbert M. Dalke, "Seventy-Five Years of Missions in Oklahoma," Menn. Life X (July 1955); Diedrich L. Dalke, "Oklahoma Mennonite Pioneers at Enid," Menn. Life XI (October 1956).

Oklahoma Bible Academy (GCM). In 1911 a group of the New Hopedale Mennonite (GCM) Church, located at Meno, Okla., contributed money to build the Meno Preparatory School. The school was of elementary rank, with much Bible and German in its course of study, and served primarily the local community. As the need for more advanced training became apparent, it was decided to establish a school to serve all the churches of Oklahoma. In the spring of 1917 at the Oklahoma Convention a plan was formulated for a two-year Bible and high school. A year later the Meno Preparatory School became the Oklahoma Bible Academy, using the original buildings, but with a more advanced course. In 1924-25 with the help of Adam Ratzlaff a new dormitory was built and later a larger school was built, with two dormitories. The school is a full four-year high school accredited by the state of Oklahoma. It also offers four units of Bible. Enrollment in 1951-52 was 58. (ML III, 296.)† H.U.S.

Oklahoma Mennonite Convention (GCM) (Oklahoma Konvention der Mennoniten-Gemeinden) was organized Sept. 12, 1899, at Shelly, Okla., initiated by representatives of the Western District Conference, patterned after the early Kansas Conference (q.v.). The first chairman and secretary were Christian Krehbiel and M. M. Horsch. Krehbiel in his opening address stated that the main purpose of this local conference was to emphasize the devotional and inspirational aspect, make arrangements for pulpit exchange, promote evangelistic services, and to make provision for worship services at places where only a few families were located. H. D. Penner discussed the question of how the educational facilities among the Mennonites of Oklahoma could be improved, suggesting the founding of a teachers' conference and a teachers' institute. The possibility of the establishment of a preparatory school was discussed. The following communities were represented: Washita and Weatherford 49 representatives, Geary 8, Mennoville 7, Omega 2, Cantonment 1, Medford 1, Cleo 1, Lahoma 1, Deer Creek 1, Holt 1, Kansas 17, and Berne, Ind., 1. Of the total of 260-70 who attended the meetings, 90 were registered.

The meetings of the convention were held annually at various places, usually in October or November, lasting from two to three days. At the 1901 session it was decided to change the name from "Oklahoma Lokalkonferenz und Sonntagschul-Konvention" to "Jährliche Konvention der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Oklahoma." The minutes often speak of "Oklahoma Mennoniten-Konvention" or "Sunday School Convention." Questions raised at these meetings concerned the Sunday-school materials to be used, and whether the sisters of the Sunday school were entitled to vote. It was decided that since they were teaching they should have the privilege to vote when teachers were elected (1903). The contact with the Western District Conference was lively. Representatives from it continued to be present and to appear on the program. The meetings usually started on Sunday with a mission festival and a children's program in the evening. On Monday and Tuesday lectures, discussions, and business matters followed. Deaconess work, the establishment of a Mennonite hospital in Oklahoma, home missions, missions among the Indians, and many other questions were presented. The ministers of Kansas congregations were encouraged to ask their members who had left for Oklahoma to join the Mennonite congregations of their communities. The conference of 1907 wrote to the governor of Oklahoma promising support in the enforcement of the prohibition clause. In 1917 it was resolved, "That a committee of three be created to take in hand the matter of starting an academy." This school was started during the same year in connection with the existing preparatory school of Meno established by J. B. Epp. This newly created school later became known as the Oklahoma Bible Academy (q.v.). Some of the outstanding leaders of the early Oklahoma Convention were P. R. Voth, John Lichti, H. Riesen, J. K. Moyer, Chr. Hirschler, Albert Claassen, J. J. Ratzlaff, and J. G. Baergen.

During World War I the Convention dealt with numerous questions pertaining to conscientious objection to war and the anti-German feeling of the day. During this time special sessions took place. For a while the meetings of the convention took place in spring. At present the meeting begins on the Friday of the last week of September. Matters pertaining to the Sunday school are discussed and the reports of the Go Ye Mission are given. On Saturday the reports on the Oklahoma Bible Academy, business sessions, and the Women's Missionary Society program follow. On Sunday afternoon a song festival is given and in the evening the young people's program. The convention has two major committees: the Program Committee and the Church Workers' Committee. The latter sponsors the Church Workers' Conference in spring and young people's retreat and camp at Hydro. C.K.

"Protokoll-Buch der Lokal-Konferenz der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Oklahoma" (1899-1923), BeCL.

Oklahoma Old Order Amish Mennonites numbered approximately 160 in 1957. They were located in two areas, the older western settlement in Custer County (q.v.), and the newer northeastern settlement in Mayes County (q.v.), with 108 and 52 baptized members respectively. Weatherford and Thomas are the addresses of the two congregations in Custer County, while the Amish of the northeastern Oklahoma have the addresses of Choteau and Mazie. The community is south of Pryor. There were two other O.O.A. settlements, now extinct, in the state, one in the southern part and another in the northeastern part of Oklahoma. M.G.

John A. Hostetler, Annotated Bibliography on the Amish (Scottsdale, 1951).

Ol, Adriaen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Adriaen Olieu(x).

Olathe Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in Olathe, the county seat of Johnson County, Kan., about 20 miles southwest of Kansas City, had its beginning in 1884, when the first Mennonite settlers arrived from Lancaster County, Pa. The original nucleus of the settlement was Samuel Ernst and three of his married children. In 1872 Ernst had founded and published the Weaponless Watchman in Lancaster, Pa. In 1884 he brought it to Olathe, where it was published until 1888. Additional settlers came from Pennsylvania, Nebraska, and Indiana. Among them were such Mennonite names as Zimmerman, Hershey, Gehman, Wanner, Plank, and Moyer. Originally the group worshiped in the Bethel schoolhouse located about one mile northwest of Olathe. About 1900 they purchased a Presbyterian church in Olathe. Jacob H. Hershey was ordained to the ministry about 1895, but moved to Roaring Springs, Pa., about 1904. The congregation never thrived and shortly after Jacob Hershey left it became extinct. G.G.Y.

Old Colony Mennonite Church is a name given to designate the ecclesiastical organization of the Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Mexico. The Old Colony Mennonites themselves do not use this name in English and others have started using it only recently. In the memorandum written by the Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba to the government in February 1919 they spoke of themselves as the "Reinland - Mennoniten - Kirche oder Alte Kirche." President Obregon addressed them on Feb. 25, 1921, as "Reinlaender Mennonitische Altkolonie." "Reinland" refers to the municipality in which the Old Colony Mennonites resided, and has become a part of their name. Even in Mexico the official church seal of the largest group contains it; viz., "Altkolonier Reinlaender Mennoniten Gemeinde." This would indicate that the Old Colony Mennonites went originally under the name "Reinland Mennonite Church," but have later incorporated the term "Old Colony." Old Colony Mennonite churches were located in Hague and Swift Current, Sask., in addition to Manitoba. In Mexico they are subdivided in the following independent churches: Manitoba Old Colony Mennonite Church, Swift Current Old Colony Mennonite Church, and Santa Clara Old Colony Mennonite Church (Loeppeke group), Cuauhtemoc, and Patos Old Colony Mennonite Church of Durango (see also Old Colony Mennonites; Manitoba; Mexico). C.K.

Walter Schmiedehaus, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott (Cuauhtemoc, 1948) 61, 81.

Old Colony Mennonites, a socio-religious group originating in Manitoba, deriving its name from "Old Colony" which was the name given to the Chortitza Mennonite settlement as the first (1789) Mennonite settlement in Russia to distinguish it from the "New Colony," viz., the Molotschna settlement, established later (1803). In the pioneer days of Russia the Chortitza or Old Colony Mennonites were poorer, less educated, and more conservative than the Mennonites who came to Russia later. This religious and cultural conservatism furnished the roots for the spirit and characteristics of the Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Mexico. In the total pattern of Mennonite history they can be compared in some respects with the Kleine Gemeinde of the Molotschna, the Hutterites, or the Amish, although more conservative and culturally retarded than any of these. Their utmost concern centers around the preservation of their way of life. From their point of view the total cultural pattern including language, clothing, education, furniture, self-government, mutual aid, village pattern, and all forms of customs are integral parts of their church concept. They have preserved the most extreme form of separation from the world and the practice of church discipline by means of the ban and avoidance. Contact with the outside world is kept at a minimum. As to the church concept and the idea of nonconformity to the world, there is a genuine Anabaptist concern preserved in the Old Colony Mennonite attitude, although largely in a petrified form. Not only is the contact with the outside world reduced to bare necessities, but also the challenge which comes through contact with the other religious groups and the outside culture has been neutralized. Contact with the German culture from which the Old Colony Mennonites stem has been completely lost, and contacts with the new environment are not permitted. Thus in the attempt to retain the Mennonite heritage the group deprives itself of the challenges and influences which come through contact with other groups. Even the best concept of the Christian church cannot be realized in a vacuum. New stimulations and a challenge of thoughts and practices by opposing forces and a revitalization through contact with like-minded groups is as important as a sound basic concept. Here lies the strength and the weakness of the Old Colony Mennonites and other conservative groups.

Russia. In comparison with the Mennonite immigrants from Danzig and Prussia to Russia who formed the later Molotschna settlement, the Old Colony settlers of Russia were in general of a less educated class. Those coming later had made greater adjustments to the environment of their home communities, i.e., the German culture. All Mennonites of this area were of Dutch background and used the Dutch language from the 16th to the 18th centuries. The Danzig church record of the early days is written in the Dutch language; the change from Dutch to German occurred throughout the book in 1783-84. At that time the Mennonites of Prussia and Danzig had adjusted to their German environment to the extent of replacing Dutch with High German in school and church, and Low German in their daily life.

The movement to Russia can be considered a protest against adjustment to the environment. When the cycle of adjustment to the German environment was nearly complete the migration to Russia set in, the first Mennonites to go having made the least adjustment, and those coming later being more progressive and more prosperous. This conservative attitude of the Chortitza settlers also prevailed in its daughter colonies, Berghthal and Fürstenland. When the new environment through school and other contacts began to challenge the Mennonite constituency the most conservative element reacted by withdrawing. There had already been severe criticism of the progress made in the realm of education in the days of Cornies. Now around 1870 the Russian government was introducing the Russian language into the schools, raising the requirement in the curriculum, and making the educational system of the Mennonites subject to the Department of Education of Russia. The self-government of the Mennonites in Russia was also being challenged. Complete isolation was becoming extremely difficult. In addition to this some form of service to the government was unavoidable. Thus the news about the possibility of finding a place in the New World where there would be complete freedom along these lines found both willing and attentive ears among the Mennonites of the Chortitza and daughter settlements.

It is interesting to note that the group which became most conservative, the Old Colony Mennonite Church, did not furnish any migration leaders. The elder of the Chortitza settlement, Gerhard Dyck, and his cominister, Heinrich Epp, went to St. Petersburg and attended the Mennonite meetings dealing with the question of compulsory service and the possibility of emigrating to America. Gerhard Dyck was still of the "old school" but does not seem to have considered emigration to America. His co-minister and successor as elder, Heinrich Epp, helped to usher in an era of progress in the Old Colony in Russia. He had received a good training and had taught at the Zentralschule at Chortitza for 19 years when he became elder. He did not favor the emigration. If there were any ministers of the Chortitza settlement who joined the immigrants to Manitoba they were not very influential. The leadership came from the elder of the Fürstenland settlement which had been established about ten years prior to the migration. He was Elder Johann Wiebe who was related to Elder Gerhard Dyck of Chortitza and also to Elder Gerhard Wiebe of Bergthal. However, even before Johann Wiebe left Fürstenland with a group in 1875, some of the Chortitza Mennonites had left in 1874, joining the Bergthal Mennonites of the East Reserve (q.v.) in Manitoba.

Manitoba. Evidently the Bergthal delegation had chosen the East Reserve during their inspection tour in 1873, leaving the West Reserve for the Chortitza and Fürstenland Mennonites, of whom the first arrived at the West Reserve in 1875. Thus the West Reserve became the settlement of the Chortitza and Fürstenland Mennonites, where they founded the Reinland Mennonite Church, which later became known as the Old Colony Mennonite Church. Originally the term was used to distinguish them from the Bergthal Mennonites of the East Reserve. Evidently there has never been any reason to distinguish between the Old Colony Mennonites coming from Chortitza, and the Fürstenland Mennonites, both settling on the West Reserve. The Fürstenland settlement had been in existence only about ten years in Russia and had developed no peculiar characteristics. It was a minority and was therefore included in the name Old Colony Mennonites, the name Fürstenland being dropped in Manitoba.

It has been overlooked by some historians that the majority of the Mennonites who settled on the West Reserve were of the Chortitza or Old Colony Mennonite background and that the Fürstenland group was a small minority. E. K. Francis (In Search of Utopia, p. 88) was of the opinion that all Old Colony Mennonites came from Fürstenland and therefore calls them Fürstenländer. D. H. Epp (Chortitza Mennoniten) gives information regarding the background of the immigrants, stating that the total number of immigrants who left for Manitoba during 1874-80 from the Chortitza settlement including Fürstenland was 580 families or 3,240 persons. Fürstenland was included because it belonged administratively to Chortitza. This could not possibly have been the number of people coming from Fürstenland, which had been established only about 10 years before, consisting of five villages with 154 family farms. When Johann Wiebe, elder of Fürstenland, wrote to the immigration agent of Hamburg on March 12, 1875, he stated that 169 families consisting of 1,009 persons were ready to leave Fürstenland alone. He must have included almost the whole population of the settlement. The statistics given by Jacob Y. Shantz correspond to the figures given by D. H. Epp. From this we conclude that by far the largest contingent of the total group of 3,240 persons came from Chortitza (Old Colony) proper, and that possibly a third of the total came from Fürstenland.

None of the sources available indicate that there was any basic difference in religious and cultural views between the Old Colony-Fürstenland group settling on the West Reserve and the Bergthal group settling on the East Reserve. The latter had been isolated for some time while the Chortitza Mennonites had been exposed to progressive leadership. If either one was more conservative than the other it would have been the Bergthal group. Differences that developed must have come through conditions in the Manitoba settlements. The roots probably lie in the following explanation. When a religious group adhering to a conservative cultural pattern breaks away from a mother settlement and proceeds to establish a new entity it is likely to make some adjustments in its economic, social, and cultural life to its new environment. For example, the Old Order Amish of Eastern Pennsylvania are somewhat more conservative than those of Ohio and Indiana, who originally came from Western Pennsylvania.

The first differences became evident when a large number of Bergthal Mennonites moved from the East to the West Reserve where they began to adjust themselves to the Canadian system of farming, government, school practices and other forms of culture. The Old Colony Mennonites on the other hand considered the village pattern of community life, self-government, and the parochial school system, which the infiltrating Bergthal Mennonites were willing to sacrifice, an integral part of their way of life and a test of church membership. (For details see Manitoba.)

The School Question. Before the Mennonites had come to Manitoba they had made certain that they would have the "privileges" which they had enjoyed in Russia. They obtained from the Canadian government "the fullest privileges of exercising their religious principles" and they had the same privilege extended to "the education of their children in school." The greatest change in matters pertaining to schools came during World War I. The School Attendance Act passed in 1916 did not prohibit private schools provided they conformed to the standards set up by the school administration. However, if a school was found to be inadequate it was condemned. Once a private school was condemned the Minister of Education had the right to appoint school trustees who would establish a public school with compulsory attendance. Naturally, the Old Colony Mennonites were unwilling to have their children thus driven into public schools, and the government was determined to achieve just that. Repeated delegations were sent to the provincial and dominion governments without avail. Numerous petitions were written to the proper authorities. Some of these throw valuable light on the situation and express the Old Colony idea of education very well. They called the attention of the government to the fact that they had had their own schools in Russia and that when this privilege was threatened the Dominion government had graciously granted them the same privileges in a letter dated July 23, 1873, understanding full well the great significance which the Old Colony Mennonites attached to the school question. This correspondence further reveals the Old Colony ideas about their own curriculum and equipment and also that they maintained 22 schools, which were in session 7 months in the year and were attended by all children from the ages of 7 to 13 for girls and 14 for boys. The ministers inspected the schools and enforced regular attendance, with the result that there were no illiterates among them. This petition of Jan. 18, 1917, was signed by Elder Johann J. Friesen and Oberschulze Franz F. Froese. The government was now determined to establish district schools for all, and teachers who hoisted the flag each morning and lowered it again in the evening without a single child attending the school, were hired for the Mennonites. When the Old Colony Mennonites continued to send their children to their own government-condemned schools, the government made public school attendance compulsory. An epidemic of fining and jailing Mennonite preachers started. The government was determined to force the Mennonites to compromise and the more liberal of them gradually did so. Not, however, the Old Colony and Sommerfeld Mennonites. The broken promise, and persecution and suffering for a conviction, were like oil on a fire.

On July 15, 1919, the Old Colony Mennonites decided to send Klaas Heide and Cornelius Rempel of Manitoba, Johann Wall and Johann P. Wall of Hague, Sask., and Julius Wiebe and David Rempel of Swift Current, Sask., to investigate South America for settlement possibilities. On Aug. 23, 1919, they left New York, arriving in Rio de Janeiro on September 9. After losing one of their companions, Johann Wall, and interviewing the authorities of Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina, they returned without the anticipated results. They were received very cordially everywhere and were made to feel that they were welcome, but when it came to putting in black and white the guarantees or privileges, they found that these countries were not what they were looking for. They wanted a complete exemption from military service and the assurance that they would have no problems pertaining to the schools. Next on the list of consideration were the states of Alabama and Mississippi in the United States. A number of delegations were sent to Mississippi during April and May of 1920. An agent by the name of Peters came to see the Mennonites in Canada, making the offer very appealing to them. In pressing the question pertaining to privileges they got in touch with Attorney-General Palmer of Washington, D.C. The files of the National Archives of Washington contain numerous documents pertaining to this case. The American Legion of the South got very much excited about the prospect of getting nonresistant Mennonites in their states.

At a meeting on June 1, 1920, although the Mennonites had not received the desired "privileges," it was decided to send a delegation of five to make the down payment of $2.00 per acre totaling $250,-

000. When the delegates arrived at the United States border they were sent back. David Harder, one of their chroniclers, reports, "We could not find out why the border was closed for us; we were compelled to accept it as guidance from God who wanted to spare us unforeseen hardships. Very likely the offer of freedom was the hoax of a land speculator." In addition to this the American Legion exerted pressure to stop the delegation at the border. But this did not stop the Old Colony Mennonites in their search for a new land. The State of Minnesota and the Province of Quebec were considered with similar outcome.

Mexico. On Jan. 24, 1921, a delegation including Julius Loewen, Klaas Heide, and Cornelius Rempel of Manitoba, and Johann Loeppke and Benjamin Goertzen of Saskatchewan, left for Mexico. At El Paso they met with J. F. Wiebe who brought them a welcome from the President and the Minister of Agriculture. Wiebe, a son of the founder of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, Jacob A. Wiebe, formerly mayor of Herbert, Sask., and an elder of the K.M.B. Church of that place, became a significant intermediary for the Old Colony Mennonites and the railroad and land agents in Mexico. On February 16 they met President Obregon, his brother-in-law Arturo J. Braniff, and the Minister of Agriculture in Mexico City. They presented their request for privileges and related in great detail their practices and way of life, which evidently found full approval with the highest government officials, so that Johann Loeppke thanked the President with tears in his eyes. They returned with the Privilegium approved and signed by the president, addressed to the Old Colony Reinland Mennonite Church, stating: (1) You will not be under obligation to do military service; (2) you will under no circumstances be compelled to swear an oath; (3) you will be given complete freedom to practice your religious principles and to live according to the rules of your church without being molested or in any way restricted; (4) you will have full permission to establish your own schools with your own teachers without any interference of the government; (5) regarding property, our laws are liberal and you are free to follow your own rules along these lines and the government will not interfere if the group will manage its property in its own way.

This statement was taken to Canada as the key that opened the gate to Mexico and became the most cherished document since the days when the Mennonites had received similar invitations and promises from Russia and Canada. Upon their return to Canada this Privilegium was hailed as an answer to prayer. Meetings were called immediately to make the necessary preparation to sell the property, to purchase the land in Mexico, and for the trip. After repeated trips to Mexico the delegation returned on Sept. 10, 1921, with reports that they had purchased 230,000 acres of land for the Manitoba Old Colony Mennonites for $8.25 an acre, making a down payment of $2.25 per acre. The land was located in the San Antonio Valley in the province of Chihuahua and was purchased through the agent Charles Newman of El Paso, and J. F.

Wiebe of Herbert, Sask. It was here that the Manitoba Old Colony Mennonites later settled. The Hague group bought 35,000 acres of land near the village of Patos in the province of Durango.

Now the integrity of the group and the spirit of their brotherhood was tested. It was the intention that the group would transfer from Manitoba and Saskatchewan to Mexico as a whole. Those who did not have the means would be helped through the brotherhood. The Waisenamt, a type of savings bank, and other agencies of mutual aid were to take care of this complicated task. The land was to be sold in blocks and not individually by the farmer. It was hard to find buyers of large tracts of land except speculators who tried to take advantage of the situation. At Swift Current 100,000 acres were sold for 44 dollars per acre. The sale, however, became so involved, that it had to be taken to court and resulted in a loss of 10,000 acres to the Old Colony Mennonites. In Manitoba McLeod, Black and Company was willing to serve as agent promising to sell the land by Aug. 21, 1921; but no land was sold by that date, and gradually the land owners began to sell the land individually. Other property, with the exception of that which was to be taken to Mexico, was being sold at auctions. Because of the many sales, prices declined rapidly.

By Feb. 11, 1922, the Oberschulze Franz Froese had a list of immigrants to fill four trains. On March 1 the first train left Plum Coulee, Man., followed by three from Haskett, Man., on March 2, 7, and 11. Two more trains left at this time from Swift Current, Sask. J. F. Wiebe made the arrangements for transportation. All trains arrived safely at San Antonio or Cuauhtemoc, where they were unloaded. Of the 4,526 Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba in 1922, 3,340 went to Mexico by 1926. This would indicate that about three fourths of the group participated in the migration. Only a little more than 1,000 of the 3,250 (or about one fourth) Swift Current (Sask.) Old Colony Mennonites (who settled right next to the Manitoba Mennonites in Cuauhtemoc) were willing to emigrate. The situation in Hague, Sask., was similar. Only 946 of 3,932 went to Mexico, establishing the Patos settlement in the province of Durango in 1925. Records show that this settlement had a population of only 770 the next year, indicating that some must have returned or transferred to the Cuauhtemoc settlement. (These figures are based on the official Old Colony church record made available through Johann P. Wall of Patos, Durango.)

The question should be raised why only approximately half of the 12,000 Old Colony Mennonites of Canada went to Mexico at that time, and also why the participation among the Mennonites in Saskatchewan was so much smaller. The latter question is answered in part by the fact that resistance to adjustment to environment is usually weaker in daughter settlements. It is also possible that the opportunities to sell their farms were not as good as in Manitoba. In general, failure to sell the land as a unit was a breakdown of an otherwise well-functioning organization and mutual aid system.

The resulting individual responsibility had a disintegrating effect on the morale and the united front of the Old Colony Mennonites. The departure of the strong conservative leaders to Mexico accentuated a slackening in discipline and practice among those who remained behind in Canada. Lack of unity among the leaders was also a disturbing element. Elder Loepcke, originally one of the staunch promoters of the migration, took up temporary residence in Mexico after World War II, and returned to Canada from time to time. Another reason why so many stayed in Canada was the approaching depression, which made it impossible to sell property at the expected price. Without strong conservative leadership the members gradually became accustomed to the prohibited innovations such as cars and other conveniences, and the willingness to pay the price and go to Mexico decreased. Thus there are really two Old Colony Mennonite churches since the departure of the most conservative element to Mexico. Those in Mexico today hardly recognize their Canadian brethren because of the adjustments the latter have made and their unwillingness to pay the price and make the sacrifice of joining them in Mexico. Unlike the Chortitz and Sommerfeld Mennonites the remaining Old Colony Mennonites in Canada made only a few attempts to migrate to a foreign country after World War II. Elder Johann Loepcke led a small group to Mexico, settling with the Kleine Gemeinde at the Los Jagueyes Ranch north of Cuauhtemoc. His successor as elder at Hague, Jacob Günther, attempted to reach Costa Rica with a few families in 1951. After an adventurous trip by truck to Mexico and New Orleans they returned, not having been admitted to Costa Rica. In 1934 some families including a number who had been in Mexico moved up the Peace River Valley in Alberta until they reached Fort Vermilion. Some 40 miles from town they established a settlement which has been joined since 1937 by numerous families from Manitoba and Mexico, so that in 1948 there were 65 families or about 400 persons, living far from civilization.

In 1948 a total of c1700 Sommerfeld and Chortitz Mennonites from southern Manitoba and Saskatchewan founded the two colonies of Sommerfeld and Bergthal in southeastern Paraguay. These colonies, like Menno Colony in the Chaco, are not true Old Colony Mennonites.

In Canada the adjustment of the Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba and Saskatchewan is noticeable not only to their environment but also toward the other Mennonite groups. According to Benjamin Ewert (Mennonitisches Jahrbuch 1951, p. 22) the number of Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba in 1950 was 1,165, of whom 551 were baptized members. They have 6 ministers and 4 places of worship. This would indicate that they have decreased in number. The total number in Saskatchewan is estimated at 2,000 with a membership of 1,000 with 10 ministers and 6 places of worship. If this figure is correct, there are only over 3,000 Old Colony Mennonites in Canada today, whereas there should be about 20,000 if they had increased like their brethren in Mexico. This makes it evident that many of the Old Colony Mennonites in Canada are no longer counted as such.

In 1936 the Manitoba group of Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico numbered 3,340. By 1949 the group had increased to 7,706. In 1953 the number was 8,768. The Swift Current group adjacent to the Manitoba group in Cuauhtemoc numbered 1,000 at the time of their settlement in Mexico. In 1949 it was 2,232 and in 1953 it was 2,694. The Durango group coming from Hague, Sask., originally 946, had 2,861 in 1949 and 3,281 in 1953. In 1946 the North settlement was established as a daughter colony to make provision for settlement by landless families from the Manitoba and Swift Current settlements. It had a population of 2,652 in 1949, and by 1953, 3,590. In 1949 the total population of all Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico was 15,451, which had increased to 18,333 in 1953, in spite of the fact that numerous families had returned to Canada during the years of drought after 1950. This return was particularly noticeable in the Swift Current settlement, which had a population of 2,232 in 1949 and 2,694 in 1953. This slight increase indicates that many of the families must have returned to Canada. No exact figures are available on this movement to Canada. It is likely that next to the Hutterites the Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico are the fastest growing Mennonite group in the world. The Old Colony Mennonites of Mexico aimed to preserve their cherished heritage and the institutions which are a part of it. They have continued the village system with the Schulze and Oberschulze, the Waisenamt, the school system, and the total way of life to which they were accustomed. Some seek better income by going to town or returning to Canada, which is not approved of by the leadership. There were times when the school system was in danger of becoming subject to the Department of Education in Mexico. The greatest problem, however, is how to maintain and inspire growth in spiritual and cultural values in complete isolation as Mexico offered it to the Old Colony Mennonites. Under the most primitive and sacrificial conditions the Old Colony Mennonites have reprinted the Bible, the Gesangbuch, and other educational means. Recently they collected $672.00 among their impoverished church members to purchase 120 copies of the German Martyrs' Mirror, which indicates their effort to help the congregation and its members in spiritual growth. However, their complete isolation from other Mennonite groups probably counteracts the few efforts made to improve the cultural and the religious life. In their cultural, home, and family life they illustrate at least outwardly, what Mennonite life in Russia was like 100 years ago. Worship services, singing, linguistic peculiarities, furniture, and family relationships have been preserved here with few changes.

The Manitoba Mennonites in Cuauhtemoc have their own church, the Manitoba Mennonite Church, and also their own civic organization. The same is true regarding the Swift Current group and the North settlement, the Ojo de lad Yegua Church, except that the latter is under the elder of the Manitoba settlement. The Durango or Patos settlement forms an independent civil as well as spiritual entity. These three congregations of Old Colony Mennonites of Mexico work in close harmony and consider each other in good standing. This is not the case with the Loeppe group settling at Santa Clara, north of the Manitoba and Swift Current settlement, nor with those Old Colony Mennonite congregations that stayed in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

(See also articles Manitoba, Mexico, Bergthal Mennonite Settlement, Bergthal Mennonite Church, Chortitza Mennonite Settlement. For bibliography see Manitoba.) C.K.

OLD COLONY MENNONITE CHURCH, 1958

Congregation	Location	Members	Souls	Elder
Manitoba	Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua	3,585	8,678	Isaak Dyck
Swift Current	Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua	1,089	3,059	_____
North Settlement	Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua	1,397	4,293	_____
Patos	Durango	1,277	3,673	Peter P. Wiens
Total in Mexico		7,348	19,703
Manitoba	Manitoba	521	1,165	Jacob Froese
Hague	Saskatchewan	_____	_____	_____
Swift Current	Saskatchewan	_____	_____	_____

Old Elm Hutterite Bruderhof at Magrath, Alberta, was founded in 1918 by Andreas Gross, who had been chosen as minister in South Dakota in 1911 (now deceased). Other ministers, with date of election and ordination, were Andrew J. Wurtz, 1936 and 1946; Jacob J. Wipf, 1947 and 1950; Isaak A. Wurtz, chosen in 1954. In 1947 this Bruderhof had a population of 140, with 60 baptized members. In 1953 Jacob J. Wipf branched out with 16 families, composed of 82 persons, 38 of whom were baptized members, and founded the Bunch Bruderhof at Shaunavan, Sask., which now has a population of 97, with 48 baptized members. Samuel Decker was chosen as minister here in 1954. The Old Elm Bruderhof in 1957 had a population of 100, with 38 baptized members. D.D.

Old Flemish (Dutch, Oude Vlaminghen), a former branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Flemish Mennonites.

Old Flemish Conference (Sociëteit van Oude Vlamingen): see Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit.

Old Folks' Singing, an annual New Year's Day singing from the Harmonia Sacra (q.v.) held at the Weaver Mennonite Church near Harrisonburg, Va., since 1903. This music festival developed as an afterglow of the great singing-school movement begun by Joseph Funk and continued by his son Timothy over a period of 50 years in the mid-19th century. It attracts more than a thousand music lovers of various denominations and stands as a symbol of a common musical heritage. Other churches in Rockingham, Shenandoah, and Page counties are similarly preserving the tradition. With a simple organization of moderator and secretary, the singing proceeds throughout the day with different leaders, each choosing two or more favorite songs. The noon intermission, during which a bountiful lunch is served by the local congregation, is an occasion for the renewal of old friendships and the enjoyment of Christian fellowship. C.K.L.

Old Jacob, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jacob, de Oude.

Old Mother Gochenour, one of the last surviving members of the early Mennonite settlement in Page County, Va., lived above Stony Man in the northern part of the county. Her home was one of the last preaching points for Mennonites in Page County at the close of the 19th century. H.A.B.

Old Order Amish, a segment of the Amish Mennonites (q.v.) distinguished by their nonconformist attitudes and resistance to social change, and characterized by worship in private homes, a strictly rural way of life, a horse-and-buggy culture, the use of a dialect of the German language, and "plain" dress resembling that of European peoples two centuries ago. They have no meetinghouses (with minor exceptions), and oppose not only higher education, but most forms of organized church activity, formal missionary work, evangelistic services, and many modern inventions including the ownership of automobiles and telephones and the use of electricity, and in some communities the use of tractors for farming. These attitudes and practices distinguish them from all Mennonite and other Amish bodies, although the Old Order Mennonites (q.v.), the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.), and the Hutterites (q.v.) to varying degrees share these attitudes and practices.

"Old Order" Amish is strictly an American term which came into usage as some Amish Mennonite congregations resisted "new" methods of church work as well as "new" forms of social organization and technology. One cannot properly speak of "Old Order" before 1850, and its usage came gradually after about 1870, or following the Amish Ministers' Conferences 1862-78, called Diener Versammlungen (q.v.), which finally crystallized the differences between the more progressive Amish and the Old Order groups. Since the Old Order Amish worship in private homes they are sometimes called "House Amish," to distinguish them from the "Church Amish," who worship in meetinghouses. About one third of the Amish Mennonites existing in 1850 continued in the Old Order, chiefly those in Pennsylvania, Holmes County, Ohio, Elkhart and Lagrange counties in Indiana, and Johnson County, Iowa. These were either (1) the descendants of the colonial Amish who arrived in Lancaster and Berks counties, Pa., 1738-56, from Switzerland and the Palatinate, or (2) part of the descendants of those who came from Waldeck and Hesse-Cassel to Western Pennsylvania 1830-50. The other two thirds, who followed the more progressive "new order," were either (1) almost all of the Amish immigrants of 1820-60 from Alsace, Bavaria, and Montbéliard who came to Waterloo County, Ont., Stark and Fulton counties, Ohio, central Illinois, Washington County, Iowa, and their descendants, or (2) a part of the settlements in Lancaster County, Mifflin County, and Somerset County, Pa., and Holmes County, Ohio, Elkhart and Lagrange counties, Ind., and Johnson County, Iowa, who separated from the Old Order in 1850-1900. These progressive groups formed Amish Mennonite conferences which ultimately merged with Mennonite (MC) conferences in 1916-25. A later separation from the Old Order (1927-50) resulted in what is called the Beachy Amish, who are not yet fully organized into a conference. All these separated groups manifested varying degrees of deviation from the Old Order at the time of separation, although one common mark was the introduction of meetinghouses for worship and the shift away from the Ausbund to more modern hymnbooks. They have also developed varying degrees and speed of change since the time of separation. In spite of these successive separations and the loss of many individuals to the more progressive Amish and Mennonite groups, the Old Order Amish have continued to grow, because of their high birth rate and high retention of children in the group. In 1956 they had approximately 17,000 baptized members, almost uniformly above the age of 18, with a total population of some 50,000.

There are currently about fifty geographic Old Order Amish settlements in North America. Each settlement is divided into autonomous "church districts" (congregations) having 15-30 families or an average of about 75 baptized members per district. When a district becomes too large for the management of worship in private homes it is geographically divided. Each new district as soon as possible institutes its own bishop, and each ordains by lot two to four preachers of its own and a deacon.

In 1956 there were a total of 229 Old Order Amish church districts with 17,054 baptized members, distributed in the following 19 states and one province of Canada, in the counties indicated: Ohio 69, with 6,378 members: Holmes, Tuscarawas, and Wayne together 44, Geauga 13, Stark 4, Madison 3, Trumbull 2, Defiance 1, Ashland 1, Hardin 1; Pennsylvania 52, with 3,979 members: Lancaster with Berks and Chester 32, Mifflin 6, Lawrence 4, Mercer 2, Lebanon 3, one each in Crawford, Somerset, Juniata, and Snyder; Indiana 48, with 3,068 members: Elkhart and Lagrange 24, Marshall and Kosciusko 10, Daviess and Martin 5, Adams 3, Allen 2, Howard and Miami 2, Jay 1, Newton 1; Iowa 11, with 794 members: Johnson and Washington 6, Buchanan 5; Illinois 9, with 672 members: Moultrie and Douglas 9; Kansas 6, with 343 members: Reno 5, Anderson 1; Ontario 5, with 260(?) members: Perth and Waterloo 3, Elgin 1, Grey 1; Michigan 5, with 226 members: St. Joseph 1, Hillsdale 3, Oscoda 1; Delaware 4, with 250 members: Kent 4; Missouri 4, with 131 members: Pike 2, Pettis 1, Daviess 1; Oklahoma 4, with 160 members: Custer 2, Mayes 2; New York 3, with 113 members: Chautauqua 2, Waterloo 1; Maryland 3, with 171 members: St. Marys 2, Garrett 1; Tennessee 2, with 88 members: Lawrence; Virginia 2, with 160 members: one each in Augusta and Fauquier; Wisconsin 2(?): one each in Taylor and Clark; Arkansas 1, with 12 members: Searcy; Florida 1 (seasonal): Sarasota; North Dakota 1, with 4 members: Rolette; Oregon 1, with 28 members: Yamhill. The Old Order Amish migrate readily and there are therefore a considerable number of extinct communities, and new communities constantly forming.

Technological inventions which radically changed American groups and institutions did not affect the Amish to a great extent until the present century. Because of their isolation and somewhat self-sustaining social, economic, and religious communities they were able to resist change or greatly retard it. Among the culture traits which the Old Order Amish have resisted in the past, and with which some communities have compromised only after a long struggle and others not at all even to the present day, are the following: buttons on coats and vests, wearing a mustache, men's suspenders in various forms, hats for women, "store" clothes, talon fasteners, "bosom" shirts, detachable collars, modern styles of underwear, patterned dress goods, fine shoes, low shoes, ladies' high-heeled shoes, parted hair, parted hair except in the center, meetinghouses, four-part singing, hymnbooks with printed musical notes, laymen's use of Bibles at preaching service, Sunday schools, revival meetings, high-school education, central heating, carpets, window curtains, storm windows and screens, writing desks, upholstered furniture, brightly painted farm machinery, painted wagons, top buggies, "falling" buggy tops, buggy springs, rubber-tired buggies, buggy steps, fancy buggies, whipsockets, dashboards, sausage grinders, lawn mowers, bicycles, windmills, sewing machines, steam threshers, tractors with tires, tractors for field work, tractors at all, elaborately decorated harness, musical instruments, telephones, electricity, automobiles, and many others. Various interpretations by local leadership on these material cultural items have resulted in numerous divisions among the Amish.

There is evidence that the Old Order Amish not only have retained many of the older traits in their entirety, but have even modified some of them in the direction of greater conservatism. The prescribed length of the haircut for men, for example, is longer today in some localities than it was fifty years ago. This phenomenon may be a kind of reactionary protest against change, which plays some part in cultural survival.

The most conservative of all contemporary Old Order groups are the two districts of "Old School" or "Nebraska" Amish found in Mifflin County, Pa. (see Gosper County, Neb.), who do not permit suspenders, colored shirts (they wear white only), traction engines of any kind, projecting roofs on their buildings, screens on windows or doors, curtains, lawn mowers; hair must be shoulder length for men; and women wear black kerchiefs and flat straw hats instead of white prayer caps and bonnets. Buggy tops must be white as distinguished from the yellow tops of the "Byler" group and the black tops of the "Renno" group. Other regional very conservative O.O.A. settlements are the one in Lawrence County, Pa., and five districts of the "Swartzendruber" Amish in Holmes County, Ohio.

Other traits that the Old Order Amish have preserved are a strictly uniform order of worship service, the use of the genuflection at the conclusion of the benediction, silent prayer, and the use of prayer-books by the ministers in public worship, silent prayer in the homes at the beginning and end of each meal, in some instances tombstones carved by their own members and burial of the dead without embalming, bundling during courtship (in a few local groups), and the "grandfather house," which means provision for retirement of the parents into a small house or wing on the farm which they owned and operated.

Among the 19th-century Amish ordained men known to have been most staunch in holding to the "old way" and adamantly opposed to change were David Beiler (q.v., 1786-1871) of Lancaster County, Pa.; Abram Pitsche (Peachey) (1800-84) of Mifflin County, Pa.; Abner Yoder (1814-83) of Somerset County, Pa., and after 1866 of Johnson County, Iowa; Moses B. Miller (1819-1902) of Somerset County, Pa.; Hannes (John) Yoder of Wayne County, Ohio, and others.

The Old Order Amish subscribe to the Dordrecht Confession of 1632 and in formal doctrine differ little from the other Mennonite groups of Swiss descent. They however practice the strict interpretation of avoidance or shunning (Meidung) of excommunicated members. At communion time in the spring and autumn they also practice footwashing. Women wear the prayer cap at all times, and small girls begin to wear the cap as soon as they can walk. The youth are admitted to the church at the age of about 17-20, with baptism, usually once a year in the spring after a period of formal instruction by the ministers. Worship services are held fortnightly in the homes of members; on alternate Sundays the families stay at home or visit relatives. Worship starts at about eight-thirty in the morning and dismisses at about one o'clock, followed by a light lunch served in the home. The time varies slightly between localities. The needed store of backless benches is moved from one home to the next.

In theology the Amish have retained the basic doctrines of their forefathers, but have certain characteristic emphases. One of these is the denial of assurance of salvation; they commonly hold that one can only hope to be saved, that it is pride to claim certainty of salvation. There is also little teaching or preaching of conversion, and no pietistic type of piety. There is a strong emphasis on living a righteous life, being and doing good, and obeying the rules of the church.

All the Old Order Amish speak the "Pennsylvania Dutch" dialect in their in-group conversation, but are also conversant in the English language. Most of them read Biblical High German, since German serves as the basis of their Bible reading and worship services. Their hymnbook is the German Ausbund (q.v.) of the 16th century, which is composed in part of verses written by martyrs and expressing triumphant prayers, sufferings, and wails of sorrow, sung soberly in unison to German folk tunes handed down from memory for hundreds of years but now modified into strange-sounding "slow" tunes. A smaller hymnal (Unparteiische Liedersammlung) with faster tunes is used in many places for the Sunday evening young people's "singsings."

The Amish ministers follow a traditional outline of Scripture passages and hymn selections from the Ausbund arranged for thirty Sundays (meetings only every other Sunday) and special days and events such as Christmas or weddings, Ein Register von Liedern und Schriften, die in den Amischen Gemeinden gebraucht werden, first printed edition Elkhart, 1913, but actually much older.

The Old Order Amish, with other Mennonite bodies, have maintained a reputation as excellent farmers, particularly so in Pennsylvania and in the larger settlements. However, this cannot be said for some of the smaller scattered groups. They maintain family-sized farms and do not engage in large-scale farming operations or invest in business enterprises outside their farming operations, except for a few industries related to farming such as mills, blacksmiths, wool carding, etc. Each father wants to own his farm and attempts to make it possible for each of his sons to acquire a farm. The better farms are therefore passed on to succeeding generations by inheritance. The Amish pay high prices to secure additional farms in their settlements and often supplant Mennonite neighbors.

Social scientists, e.g., Walter Kollmorgen, Charles P. Loomis, and Maurice Mook, have in recent years taken considerable note of the Amish as an interesting sociological phenomenon. Well over thirty graduate theses in university libraries treat some phase of Amish life. The most outstanding community research on the O.O.A. to date is probably that made by Walter Kollmorgen for the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, published in September 1942, dealing with the Lancaster County Amish. A number of writers of textbooks in sociology and anthropology have used the Kollmorgen report as the basis of their discussion, among whom are C. P. Loomis, John Gillin, Meyer F. Nimkoff, and Earnest W. Burgess.

The general findings developing out of past social research may briefly be summarized as follows: The Amish community maintains certain features of stability through isolation and in-group loyalty. Their stability is accredited to their strong positive interests, religion and farming. Though the group has successfully maintained a distinguished subculture of its own, one of the basic problems of this culture is adaptation to changing situations. There is a gradual slow infiltration of Amish culture by outside patterns, bringing about disintegration of the old values, with the prospect that if acculturation continues the Amish society will eventually disappear. This process is, however, exceedingly slow; more common is the process of breaking away.

The question is frequently asked why the Amish in Europe have completely lost their identity as Amish, while they at the same time survived in America as a group with a distinct and separate culture. (All the Amish in Europe have been assimilated into the Mennonite, Protestant, and Catholic religions.) The reason is not hard to see. The Amish Mennonites in Europe never lived in compact settlements. The scarcity of purchasable land prevented them from forming primary community groupings, since families who fled from one place to another rented or purchased property wherever they were given asylum. Each Amish family became a social unit unto itself, and geographic distance made intercourse between Amish families difficult. As family units (as against community in the New World) the Amish were in an unfavorable position to withstand the pressure toward conformity to the general culture and to European governments in their programs of national unification. However, the European Amish did earlier have a strong sense of separation from the world and its culture in general.

The Amish deviation from Swiss Mennonitism in Europe was largely an ideological difference; in material culture the differences were slight. It was not until their development in America that sharp differences in cultural practices appeared between Mennonites and Amish. The Amish have survived in the New World chiefly because they found freedom—freedom to purchase land, to develop their conservative religion, and to form primary communities where families lived in close proximity to each other. The dominant form of social organization in America is therefore community rather than family.

That the community in America has been an important factor in the maintenance of Amish tradition is well illustrated in the development of a distinct O.O.A. costume. In Europe where family instead of community organization was dominant the Amish wore much the same general style of clothes as their rural non-Amish neighbors. They were seldom conscious of a distinctive costume, except for hooks and eyes. In general appearance and dress the Amish were somewhat similar to thousands of other emigrants from their homeland at the time of their emigration, although there is evidence from the reports of travelers who visited Amish families in Alsace that the Amish were in general culturally backward and looked different in dress to some extent. In America they found themselves for the first time conscious of a really different dress from their frontier neighbors, the Scotch-Irish, Huguenots, Quakers, and the English. This consciousness of difference from others in dress gave them new ground on which to recognize their own kind from others. As protection against change in the strange environment of the New World they traditionalized the dress styles they brought with them, while the world about them accepted the changing styles.

The practice of wearing a beard was common in Europe until about the 18th century, and the Amish who questioned innovations kept the beard as a symbol of something sacred after it disappeared from the general culture. The same was true of hooks and eyes; buttons were first used by the ruling classes as ornamentation, and so it was quite natural that the Amish should retain the old and shun the new. The Amish dress coat, the Mutze, broadfall trousers, and black wide-brimmed hats, are adaptations from the ordinary dress of the Palatines a century and longer ago. By comparing old drawings of regional costume in Europe the similarity in dress is established beyond doubt.

The dress of the Amish woman is almost identical with examples in Palatine museums. The white Häubchen (prayer cap) of the Amish, the Halsdusch, Leppel, and the "scoop" hat, were the ordinary dress of the common people in Alsace, the Palatinate, and other parts of Europe. The Amish bonnet of today is an exception; since the Amish migrations to America preceded the bonnet era they adopted this headpiece apparently from a New World source. Both men and women refuse to wear the newer type of overcoat. Amish women still wear only shawls, or in the case of some of the younger women, short coats. Older men and ministers wear the cape overcoat.

It has been pointed out that the Amish attitudes of hostility toward change and their reverence for past traditions is a function of the primary community group. Another principle of Amish survival which seems to be a function of the community has been the perpetuation of the original protest between the Swiss Mennonites and leaders of the Amish division in 1693-97. One of the original protests of the Amish was and still is whether expelled members should be banned in domestic relations or only from the communion table. There is scarcely a community of O.O.A. in America where there are no Amish Mennonites or former O.O.A. members near by, and so the "Meidung" controversy has been a perpetual one in local communities. The many divisions and variations of practice even among the O.O.A. themselves are the result of various interpretations of Meidung. In small Amish communities, particularly in the midwestern states, where associations with non-Amish neighbors are numerous, strict Meidung has been discontinued in favor of a more moderate practice: if the excommunicated member joins another Christian (usually Mennonite) denomination the Meidung is dropped.

Even though their practices differ on some points, the O.O.A. nevertheless maintain certain generalized attitudes of tolerance toward the Mennonites. The Amishman is more sympathetic and socially nearer to the Mennonite faith than to the larger Protestant or Catholic bodies. This explains why Old Order Amish parents frequently permit their nonconforming sons and daughters to become members of the Mennonite Church. By leaving the Amish church entirely, the nonconformist not only obtains freedom from traditional practices, but the O.O.A. group in turn is protected from any further "harmful" association with him. This has probably been an important factor in the survival of the very conservative groups of Amish.

Even though a large proportion (probably one third) of the offspring of Old Order Amish parents do not join the church of their parents, the Old Order Amish are still listed as one of the fastest growing religious bodies in the United States. This is, of course, due to their high birth rate and high retention of children in the group. The Amish do not keep written records of their members, and there is no official enumeration of their own giving membership statistics. The Mennonite Yearbook published annually at Scottdale, Pa., lists Amish ministers and congregations with membership. However, since the Yearbook bases its census upon voluntary reports from the local informants the figures are not always reliable and can only be taken as estimates. Memberships in the yearbooks for 1935, 1945, 1955, and 1957 were given as 7,746, 13,407, 15,695, and 17,045. Since membership is restricted to adults, no one knows exactly what the Amish population is, including children and unbaptized young people. Research done in Pennsylvania communities in collaboration with Maurice A. Mook, Professor of Anthropology of the Pennsylvania State University, suggests that actual population is three times the membership.

Amish families are considerably larger than those of the general population in rural areas, as evidenced by the few studies that have been made. A study of Mifflin County, Pa., Amish revealed that the average number of births for O.O.A. families was 7.0, while in a near-by non-Amish rural area the figure was 5.5. Mook reports that in the Atlantic community in Lawrence County, Pa., the average number of births was 7.4, and Howard Good found that in Elkhart County, Ind., the figure was 8.7 births per completed family; there was no noticeable decline in the number of births per family when three generations were compared.

The only major conflict of the Amish with the state has been their refusal to comply fully with the compulsory school laws. O.O.A. parents send their children to elementary schools but object to having their youth enter high school. In recent years parents have gone to jail in support of their stand and a large number of local parochial schools have been built in areas where school consolidation has been put into effect. Amish insistence upon the one-room country school is based upon their desire to maintain the integrity of their way of life, to keep their youth from secular influences such as movies and radio, and to keep them from influences beyond the control of their family and community. They contend that farming and housekeeping do not require higher education and that too much "book learning" is not good for their youth.

The Old Order Amish co-operated with the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference in publishing Herold der Wahrheit in 1912-55, when the latter transferred its interest to the Unaffiliated Amish Mennonite group (Beachy Amish). The present editors are Raymond Wagler for the O.O.A. and Ervin Hershberger for the Beachy group. Some individuals among the O.O.A. have shown considerable interest in missionary work, and following several Amish missions conferences a monthly periodical entitled Witnessing was begun in 1953 with Harvey Graber as editor. Bookstores are operated by O.O.A. members as follows: L. A. Miller, Arthur, Ill.; J. A. Raber, Baltic, Ohio; and Benjamin Esh, Ronks, Pa., all of whom do mail-order business and initiate reprints. Because of the widespread use and regular demand for five German books, the O.O.A. of Lancaster County, Pa., have purchased the plates for these books and engage a printer and book-binder as needed. The five are Ausbund (q.v.), Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.), Lustgärtlein (q.v.), Unpartheisches Gesangbuch (q.v.), and the Holman Bible.

The Old Order Amish are regular contributors to the foreign relief program of the Mennonite Central Committee. Members on this committee have been Eli J. Bontreger 1942-54 and Abe Yoder 1954.

In the matter of nonresistance the Amish have been very stable. Their record on refusal of military service in any form has been almost 100 per cent. In World War II they accepted Civilian Public Service and even operated one camp of their own. Since 1950 there has been some tendency in a few localities by the ministers to discourage acceptance of the I-W service, partly because of their experience in World War II when some undesirable influences toward progressivism were felt.

The Old Order Amish have long practiced mutual aid, both by lending without interest to young farmers starting out, and by organized fire and storm insurance societies. The first of the latter was apparently the Amish Mennonite Aid Society of Iowa, founded in 1885. The Amish Aid Society of Eastern Pennsylvania started in the early 1890's, and the Amish Aid Plan of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Oregon in 1890. The largest aid societies are those of Ohio and Indiana-Michigan.

(For further information about the Old Order Amish and their practices see the pertinent information in such general articles as describe church organization, ordinances, etc. For the history of the origin of the Amish in 1693-97, see Amish Division, and for the later history Amish Mennonites.)

J.A.H.

J. A. Hostetler, Annotated Bibliography on the Amish (Scottsdale, 1951); Calvin G. Bachman, The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County (Proceedings of the Pennsylvania German Society XLIV, Norristown, Pa., 1942); Walter Kollmorgen, The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania (U.S.D.A., 1942); J. C. Getz, "Economic Organization and Practices of the Old Order Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania," MQR XX (1946) 53-60, 98-127; John Umble, "Research on the Amish and Source Materials for the Study of the Amish," MQR XXV (1951) 128-32; idem, "Old Order Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania," MQR XVII (1943) 207-36; idem, "Amish Ordination Charges," MQR XIII (1939) 233-50; H. S. Bender, "Some Early Amish Mennonite Disciplines," MQR VIII (1934) 90-98; Grant Stoltzfus, "History of the First Amish Mennonite Communities in America," MQR XXVIII (1954) 235-62; Maurice A. Mook, "Extinct Amish Mennonite Communities in Pennsylvania," MQR XXX (1956) 267-76; D. Paul Miller, "Amish Acculturation" (unpublished M.A. thesis, U. of Nebraska, 1950); J. B. Mast, The Letters of the Amish Division (Oregon City, 1950); idem, Facts Concerning the Beachy A.M. Division of 1927 (Meyersdale, 1950); ML I, 56.

Old Order Mennonites, a name applied to certain conservative groups which separated from the Mennonite Church (MC) in the United States and Canada 1871-1900, maintaining the "Old Order" of customs of worship and church life. When the Great Awakening, as H. S. Bender has termed it, came to the Mennonite Church (MC) in the last third of the 19th century, four "Old Order" divisions occurred in the following areas: (1) Indiana and Ohio, led by Jacob Wisler, 1872; (2) Ontario, led by Abraham Martin, 1889; (3) Lancaster County, Pa., led by Jonas H. Martin, 1893; and (4) Rockingham County, Va., led by Gabriel D. Heatwole, 1900. These groups recognized each other as being one brotherhood, and became known as the Old Order Mennonites, although they had no formal general organization bearing this name. Sometimes the name "Wisler" is applied to the entire group. Locally often the names of the leading bishops are given to the several groups such as "Wenger Mennonites," "Weaver Mennonites," "Martinites," etc., and in Ontario the groups are often referred to under the name of the township in which they reside, e.g., "Woolwichers" (for Woolwich Twp., Waterloo Co.) and "Markham people" (for Markham Twp., York Co.). Subsequent subdivisions occurred in the first three bodies as led originally by Wisler (q.v.), Abraham Martin, and Jonas H. Martin. These four groups originated through a reluctance to accept cultural change, and the determination not to adopt the newer agencies for Christian education and evangelism such as the Sunday school, series of evangelistic meetings, and similar new activities and institutions.

Jacob Wisler (1808-89), ordained preacher in Columbiana County, Ohio, in 1833, removed to Elkhart County in 1848, and the year after the death of the aged Martin Hoover (c1761-1850) he was ordained bishop by Abraham Rohrer of Medina County, Ohio, the bishop who had ordained Hoover in 1845 just before he migrated to Elkhart County. Wisler, of a conservative turn of mind, was opposed to any change in the life of the church. Joseph Rohrer (1801-84), a preacher of Stark County, Ohio, came to Elkhart County in 1850, and served for some time in the ministry with Wisler. But Wisler did not like the exuberance manifested by Rohrer as he preached, and accused him of having too much of a "Methodist" spirit. Rohrer finally left the church and united with the Evangelical Church, whose house of worship stood one-half mile north of the Yellow Creek Mennonite meetinghouse, 8 miles west of Goshen. In 1864 Daniel Brenneman (q.v.), also a preacher, moved from Ohio to Elkhart County, a man similar in spirit to Joseph Rohrer, and was soon, like Rohrer, more popular than the bishop. Brenneman was happy to preach in English and he did not hesitate to sing a strong bass in the Yellow Creek services, although he knew that Wisler favored the old unison singing. A deacon of the Holdeman congregation, Joseph Holdeman, was also critical of Wisler as well as of a number of other leaders through the years. There was considerable dissatisfaction in the church by 1867, the year when John F. Funk (q.v.) located in Elkhart County. In October 1867 a committee of 16 leaders from Ontario, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Virginia attempted to adjust the difficulties. The first signer of the Committee of Sixteen was Joseph Hagey of Ontario. The next year, 1868, Tillman Moyer of Ontario made another effort to iron out the difficulties, and he signed his statement "In the presence of Joseph Hagey." In 1869 Tillman Moyer was back again, accompanied by two Ontario and two Ohio Mennonite leaders, and another effort was made to establish permanent peace. In 1870 Bishop John M. Brenneman of Ohio, the strongest leader in the state, came to Elkhart County with the express approval of Bishop Rohrer, who had ordained Wisler and who had served on the Committee of Sixteen in 1867, and Brenneman succeeded in once more effecting peace. But Wisler's dissatisfaction with the Indiana Conference's approval of Sunday schools in 1870 led to fresh trouble in 1871, and in October 1871 a committee of six bishops headed by John M. Brenneman suspended Wisler's bishop function, with the approval of the Yellow Creek congregation. Wisler rejected the decision of the Committee of Six, and on Jan. 6, 1872, the Elkhart County ministers announced to the Yellow Creek congregation that Wisler and his followers, including preachers John Weaver and Christian Bare, were no longer members of the church. It was probably John F. Funk who made the announcement. Thereupon Wisler began to hold separate services and to seek support elsewhere. This support he found in eastern Ohio (Wayne, Medina, and Columbiana-Mahoning counties), where the church divided and the conservative group followed Wisler. In 1907 the Wisler Mennonites of Indiana divided into the more progressive Ramer or Wisler Mennonites and the more conservative Martin or Old Order Mennonites. By 1920 the Ramer and Martin groups had respectively about 150 and 60 members, in 1957 150 and 102. The Ohio congregations in the Wisler group totaled 345 members in 1957, all of the more progressive group. The Indiana and Ohio progressive Old Order congregations constituted a conference which has met annually in June since 1907.

In 1889 a similar schism occurred in Ontario, led by Bishop Abraham Martin of Woolwich Twp., Waterloo County. The other bishops of his group were Christian Gayman of South Cayuga and Christian Reesor of Markham. The issues were the same as in Indiana: Sunday schools, evangelistic meetings, and the like. In 1917 a more conservative faction split off in the Waterloo County area, the "David Martin group," having in 1957 a membership of 116 and listed in the Mennonite Yearbook as "not under Conference." In the 1889 meeting to organize the Old Order Mennonites of Woolwich Township, Bishop Christian Shaum of Elkhart County, Ind., Wisler's younger colleague, was present. In the late 1920's a more progressive group broke away from the Woolwichers to found what is now known as the Markham-Waterloo Conference, and which had a membership of 748 in 1957. The original Woolwich Conference had a membership of 1,061 in 1957. (For an account of the O.O.M. in Ontario, see Burkholder, History.) Tension had existed between Christian Gayman and the Mennonite Conference of Ontario a number of years before the division of 1889.

Michigan also suffered some schisms. In 1886 the Mennonite congregation of Brutus, Mich., which had its roots in Ontario, divided into the Wisler and non-Wisler group. The Wisler group was for many years much stronger than the remnant which remained with the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC). A few scattered Wisler members lived at Brutus until the 1950's but scarcely any services were held after 1930. There was also a small group of O.O.M. in Tuscola County, Mich., under the leadership of a preacher Daniel Lehman, who died soon after 1920. They settled in Tuscola County c1880, coming mostly from Ontario. Lehman was one of the last members there.

The third area in which a group of O.O.M. arose was in Lancaster County, Pa. George Weaver, a bishop who had served on the Committee of Sixteen in Indiana in 1867, was of a conservative turn of mind, and did not favor Sunday schools. He sympathized with Wisler. When Weaver in his old age wished to ordain a bishop as his successor (in 1881) he rejected Benjamin Horning (1827-1907), an able preacher in his Weaverland-Groffdale District; although Horning received sufficient votes to pass through the lot, Weaver discarded them, saying that he lived too far from the center of the district. Horning continued his ministry, but his preacher-friend Emanuel Newswanger (c1833-1905) stopped preaching in protest against the injustice done Horning. A preacher (ord. 1875) named Jonas H. Martin (1839-1925) was ordained bishop to assist Bishop Weaver. He was of the same convictions as George Weaver and somewhat out of harmony with the Lancaster Conference, which in 1871 had approved Sunday schools, and which in 1872 had endorsed the action of the six bishops in the case of Jacob Wisler. The old custom of the Mennonites in Lancaster County and elsewhere had been to have a table in place of a pulpit, around which the song leaders and preachers sat, and behind which the preacher stood (on a level with his people) to deliver his discourse. When the new Lichty meetinghouse was built in 1889 near New Holland a small pulpit was put into it. A few weeks before the first services someone removed the pulpit from the church by night, arranged the seating in the older arrangement, and installed a neatly constructed table. Bishop Jonas Martin was blamed for secretly approving of the act. Tensions continued to build up because of Martin's conservatism, and he was accused of a lack of integrity. After many efforts to settle the difficulties he announced at a Lancaster Conference meeting in October 1893 that he was withdrawing because (a) he and his followers did not favor the bishops and preachers performing marriage ceremonies for non-members; (b) they were not in favor of Sunday schools; and (c) they opposed any Lancaster Conference congregation obtaining a charter from the state. The other bishops of the Conference reciprocated by revoking his ordination. He then proceeded to set up what is now known as the Weaverland Conference. In 1926, the year following Martin's death, Preacher Joseph O. Wenger led a more conservative schism from the Weaverland Conference, and in 1927 Wenger was ordained bishop of his group, which is now known as the Groffdale Conference or Wenger Mennonites. The original Weaverland Conference had a membership of 1,731 in 1957, and the Groffdale Conference had 1,450. There are also other splinter groups of the

O.O.M. in the Weaverland area. (See Lancaster County.)

The fourth group of Old Order Mennonites, near Harrisonburg, Va., has always been weak numerically. The founder in Virginia was Gabriel D. Heatwole (1834-1922), a preacher ordained at the Weaver church in 1870 who seceded from the Virginia Conference (MC) in 1900. After his death the leading minister of this group was John Dan Wenger, who served for many years as bishop. In 1922 Bishop Wenger was assisted in the ministry by preachers Lewis P. Good and Emanuel Heatwole. At that time services were being held in the Pleasant View meetinghouse at Dayton, Va., where there were 75 members, at the Pike School in Rockingham County where there were 12 members, and at Mt. Pleasant where there were but three members. In recent years a division occurred, one group being led by Russell Cline. In 1957 there were only two meeting places, Pleasant View and Oak Grove, both near Dayton, with a combined membership of 325, in two factions, one led by Bishop Wenger and one by Bishop Cline. The Virginia group corresponds to the most conservative of the major O.O.M. groups in Indiana, Ontario, and Pennsylvania.

The total for all areas and groups of Old Order Mennonites in 1957 was 5,800 members in 44 congregations. A general cultural and religious conservatism characterizes the entire group. The most conservative groups use only horse-drawn vehicles. The more progressive bodies permit the use of automobiles; traditionally, however, they paint the chrome bumpers black. In most areas the more conservative groups attempt to maintain the use of German for at least parts of the service, but this is becoming increasingly difficult. All groups are still opposed to evangelistic meetings and Sunday schools. By rearing large families the Old Order Mennonites are growing; they have about doubled their membership in the last quarter century.

J.C.W.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Markham, 1935) 197-216; M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottsdale, 1931) 130, 139, 148, 385-95.

Old Order Mennonites of Virginia. The "Middle District Trouble," involving questions of leadership and methods in church work, resulted in a schism in the Virginia Mennonite (MC) church in 1900. About that time 69 members out of c500 total, including the three preachers Simeon, Emanuel, and Gabriel Heatwole, all living near the Bank church, refused to identify themselves with the church and were "published off," i.e., were declared out of fellowship or excommunicated. In 1902 Bishop Jonas Martin of the Old Order group in Lancaster County, Pa., was called in by this group. The Wisler Discipline was read and accepted. A new congregation was organized, and in 1902 the Pleasant View meetinghouse was built 2 miles northwest of Dayton in Rockingham County. The division may be thought of as primarily occurring in the Bank (q.v.) church.

On Nov. 15, 1902, Simeon Heatwole was ordained bishop, and at the same time John Dan Wenger was named preacher. Bishop Heatwole, due to the infirmities of old age, was replaced as bishop by John Dan Wenger in 1912. Wenger has been the most important leader since that time. Another meetinghouse, the Oak Grove church 1½ miles south of Dayton, was built in 1921.

In recent years Bishop John Dan Wenger called into question the preaching and leadership of one of his ministers, Russell Cline. Those who sympathized with Cline sought and acquired recognition for him on the part of the Old Order Church in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, and Cline was ordained bishop for the new group. Warren Showalter and Justus Showalter were ordained to serve as ministers. The membership of this group in 1957 was 200.

John Dan Wenger, the aged O.O.M. bishop in Virginia, believes that he is the rightful leader of the O.O.M. of Virginia. He has ordained his son Paul Wenger as bishop, and Oscar Martin serves as minister. The membership of this group in 1957 was 125. In recent years about 25 of the O.O.M. of Virginia have joined with the "Horning People" (Groffdale Conference) in Pennsylvania. They have purchased an old Baptist church several miles southeast of Mt. Crawford, Va., where they are served occasionally by ministers from Pennsylvania.

H.A.B.

Old People's Home: see Homes for the Aged and Mennonite Old People's Home.

Old Road (or White Horse) Mennonite Church (MC), located near an early family cemetery one mile east of White Horse, Lancaster Co., Pa., is a part of the Hershey circuit of the Lancaster Conference. Until 1841 the congregation met for worship in private homes and in the Pequea Presbyterian church. In 1841 a stone meetinghouse was built along the Old Philadelphia Pike. In 1892 a frame building farther from the road and larger replaced it. This meetinghouse was remodeled in 1947. Martin R. Hershey and Sanford E. Hershey are the ministers, and Clair Eby bishop. The membership in 1957 was 104.

I.D.L.

Old Swiss Mennonites: see Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.

Old Testament. From its very beginning the Christian church has been faced with a dilemma in its use of the Old Testament. As long as the apostles were alive their authority was accepted on an equal status with the writings of the O.T., but when the church began to wrestle with the formation of a canon of New Testament Scriptures, the problem of authority and place of the O.T. became acute. Jesus, in His teachings, particularly in the Sermon on the Mount, had made His position clear. Paul, following Jesus, used the O.T. freely, but also went beyond it to show that Christ's fulfillment of the O.T. was complete.

The most drastic solution to the problem of the O.T. was advocated by Marcion in the second century, who not only rejected the O.T. entirely, but also expurgated those sections of the New Testament which had a strong Jewish background. All that was left in his N.T. was a drastically revised Luke-Acts, and an "edited" Pauline corpus. Needless to say, the church rejected Marcion as a heretic. Marcion, however, made a contribution by calling attention to the lack of a clearly defined position with respect to the O.T. The Epistle of Barnabas and the Clementine literature were extremely allegorical in dealing with the O.T. and this Marcion rightly rejected. It remained therefore for Irenaeus to develop a "Biblical theology" which took account of the fact that God worked both in the O.T. and the N.T. The theology of Irenaeus represents the first conscious attempt to define the relationship between the O.T. and the N.T. on a historical and not allegorical basis, although the recently discovered Homily on the Passions by Melito of Sardis shows that individual preachers had used certain motifs to bridge the gap between two Testaments, rather than succumbing to abstruse allegory.

Adolf Harnack states that the retention of the O.T. in the church's canon was justified in the early church, but a mere historical accident in the time of the Reformation. Any student of the Reformation will hardly agree with this statement, since in many ways the battles of the first two centuries were again taken up in the 16th. Certainly this is true with respect to the O.T. The Reformers were faced with the problem of the O.T. repeatedly, and part of the reason was that the Anabaptists were critical of the degree of authority given to the O.T. by the Reformers. Unfortunately the issue was obscured by Thomas Müntzer, who breathed deeply from the apocalyptic and vindictive sections of the O.T., thus misreading its true intent, and by the Münsterites who patterned their kingdom at Münster upon the O.T., instituting polygamy, royalty, etc. These events had little to do with the essential development of Anabaptism, but served to obscure the true Anabaptists. At Münster the daily Scripture reading was taken from the O.T., generally from the Prophets. This O.T. Biblicism was criticized by Corvinus, who tried to define the relationship between the O.T. and the N.T. in his attack against Münster.

The Anabaptist estimate of the O.T. was a result of their discussions with the Reformers. It is significant that at each major disputation (e.g., Frankenthal, q.v.) the problem of O.T. authority was discussed at length, especially with reference to its relation to the N.T. As far as the records indicate, the Reformers made no original contribution in these discussions and their solutions have not been accepted by Protestantism. It is quite clear that their arguments about O.T. authority are colored by their desire to retain infant baptism and the state church, as well as to weaken the Anabaptist position on the oath (q.v.), etc. Roland Bainton has shown that with regard to the problem of the immoral deeds of the patriarchs the exegetes of the Reformation developed a number of interesting techniques to justify them, but the end result of this kind of exegesis, seen most clearly in Luther's defense of Philip's bigamy, is that the O.T. can be used as an attenuating ethical standard. On this point the Anabaptists had a much more consistent and clearly defined position.

The enemies of the early Swiss Anabaptists charged them with rejecting the O.T. Bullinger wrote: "The Anabaptists believe that [in regard to salvation] one should not prove anything from the O.T.; the transactions of the O.T. are finished and do not concern us" (Ursprung, 73). Zwingli wrote in his Elenchus of 1527: "In this country they deny the entire O.T., which I have seen with my own eyes. For they wrote to our magistrate that the O.T. has been done away with." Schwenckfeld accused the Anabaptists of living only in the N.T. and disregarding the O.T. Gast, in his Exordio of 1544 (p. 33), attacked the Anabaptist position on the O.T. Wigand, in his De Anabaptismo of 1582, put these words into their mouth: "The O.T. cannot in all respects be held equal to the N.T., but only where it agrees with the New." Since then others have repeated the charge, calling the Anabaptists Marcionites, at least in tendency. An investigation of the sources does not, however, support this charge.

There is first of all the work done by Hans Denk and the marginal Anabaptist Ludwig Haetzer in translating the prophets from the Hebrew into German at the very outset of the Anabaptist movement. Hans Leupold (q.v.), of Augsburg, at his hearing in 1527 asserted that at their meetings the Anabaptists considered God's Word, principally the Gospels and the Prophets. Leonhard Schiemer urges his flock to gather together often and to read mainly from the N.T. and the Psalms. The hidden things of the O.T. will be plain to them in the N.T. It should be noted that Schiemer does not tell his people that they should ignore the O.T., but only urges them to read the O.T. (called shadow) through the eyes of the N.T. (called light). He feels that the Psalms contain everything in the O.T. but that the books of the Kings and the Pentateuch could also be read with profit. However, all things are contained in the N.T., for the apostles are the summary (Auszug) of all the prophets.

The influence of Schiemer continued in the Marpeck brotherhood, which was the only group among the Anabaptists to work extensively on the relation of the O.T. and the N.T. In several aspects of its position the Marpeck group differed from other Anabaptists. This is particularly true of certain exaggerations made by Marpeck in order to establish his point. Already in his confession of 1532, Marpeck referred repeatedly to the difference between the Old Covenant, a covenant of servitude, and the New Covenant, a covenant of sonship. This same distinction appears at some length in the Anabaptist tract of unknown authorship or origin, Von zweierlei gehorsam, and shows that the Anabaptists were interested in a responsible type of Christianity which was not compelled by legalism, but rather based on a vital relationship of sonship. This was viewed as the basic distinction between the two Testaments. In his two booklets of 1531 Marpeck uses the O.T. extensively, explaining that he was compelled to do so because the false prophets whom he was opposing used it wrongly. One of the false prophets was Bunderlin, who repeatedly rejected historical exegesis, explicitly condemning the Antiochian school of exegesis. The alternative which he suggested is an elaborate allegory influenced by neoplatonic values. The same is true of Schwenckfeld, but to a lesser degree. In contrast, Marpeck restricted his use of allegory to examples of allegory in the Bible itself, e.g., Hagar and Sarah, and the Song of Solomon. The historical material was always treated as historical by him, and his greatest objection to both Schwenckfeld's and the Reformers' treatment of the O.T. is that the historical lines of distinction are not observed. He begins with the book of Hebrews and insists that the shadows have now been driven away and the essence has come. The essence, however, is not defined in Platonic terms, but always as a historical person, Jesus Christ. The difference between the two Testaments lies in the Incarnation. The pre-existent Christ was present in the O.T., but not in such a way as to give man the benefits which the N.T. saints experienced. To place the O.T. saints on the same level as those of the New, seemed to Marpeck a blasphemy on the work of Christ as found in the N.T. This theme is most fully elaborated in the Testamentelerleuterung (q.v.).

Beyond and behind the theological issue stood the ethical issue. In the Clare verantwortung Marpeck makes it clear that while the O.T. tolerated revenge, the New definitely forbids it, and that the law of love controls the behavior of the Christian. This same principle was carried into the discussion of the oath when the Reformers insisted on the oath because it was tolerated in the O.T. Over against this the Anabaptists had the clear word of Christ which insisted that the Christian should not swear. The Anabaptist attitude toward the O.T. can be described as desiring above all to give Christ the honor due Him, and not stressing the O.T. revelation except where it is in accord with the New. Darkness is not used to interpret light, but rather light is used to interpret darkness.

Studies of both Marpeck and Menno Simons indicate that they used the O.T. extensively; it is out of the question to consider them Marcionite even in tendency. Their use of the O.T. was, however, such as to draw inspiration from the acts of God in the history of His people, and not to draw an ethic from a time when God's fullest revelation had not yet appeared. The extensive use of the O.T. Scriptures is seen especially in the Ausbund, the Codex Geiser, Riedemann's Rechenschaft, and in the devotional literature, particularly that which had a strong martyrological strain. At a time when they themselves were asked to lay down their lives, the Anabaptists drew inspiration and comfort from the sufferings of the people of God in the past, and were sustained by the conviction that the same God who had worked His purpose through His people in the past would also fulfill it in them, no matter how dark the days in which they lived at the time.

It is significant that it was an Anabaptist who in 1531 complained that the Strasbourg preachers were not preaching the Law (O.T.) before preaching the Gospel, and that in the 16th century the Anabaptists rejected the virtual identification of the two covenants seen in Zwingli, Bucer, and Bullinger. In doing so they were ahead of their time in seeing elements of continuity and discontinuity in the two covenants. Perhaps they were inclined to see too clearly the elements of discontinuity, but they did so because they saw what a virtual identification of the two covenants leads to in the area of ethics, and what happens to groups who seek to base a social order on the O.T. Lydia Müller's assertion that the Anabaptists lived strongly in the O.T. must be correctly understood. It was for them literature of edification (Erbauung), but the standards of the Christian life were to be drawn from the N.T. Related to this was the conviction that the power to live the Christian life had come only with the New Covenant. Jacques d'Auchy (q.v.), a Dutch martyr of 1559, is a good example, in saying that "we are no longer under the law, but under the gospel" (Mart. Mir. E 904) and declaring that the O.T. is to be valued only as it is understood by Christ and the apostles. Conrad Grebel had already declared in his letter to Müntzer in 1524, "We are no longer under the Old Covenant." Hans Denk said in his Von der wahren Liebe: "It stands thus with the teaching and work of Moses, David, and the Fathers: wherever love, i.e., Jesus, has surpassed them with something better, one must for the sake of the better consider them bad."

In later years descendants of the Anabaptists have not always taken a wholesome view of the O.T. Legalism, expressed in terms of restrictions on women's dress (not wearing men's clothes) and the beard (q.v.), has been drawn from the O.T. apparently not aware that such arguments run directly counter to the essential Anabaptist position. The difficulty some recent Mennonite theologians have had in reconciling the O.T. ethic with a non-resistant ethic has led to a disparagement of the O.T., while some Mennonite educators even advocate not telling children the story of Goliath because of what it may do to them. These approaches fail to see the essential nature of these narratives, and do little to assist Mennonites in forming a positive opinion of the O.T. in the future. There is no doubt that the O.T. confronts the Christian church with some gnawing problems, but they are not overcome by relegating the O.T. to an irrelevant position. Rather, the church, from Irenaeus through the Reformation even to our time, has seen that the best approach is a historical one in which God is progressively working through His people, preparing them for the fullness of revelation. The O.T. stands as a brilliant testimony to God's working in history to fulfill His purpose among men who yield themselves to His plan. His ways of working have changed, but He still seeks to gather a people around His name. The N.T. insists that everything in the O.T. must be judged in the light of Christ. It is a testimony to the Anabaptist devotion to Christ that they saw this point clearly and insisted on it with courage and steadfastness.

W.K.L.

Hayo Gerdes, Luthers Streit mit den Schwärmern um das rechte Verständnis des Gesetzes Mose, 1955; Adolf Harnack, Marcion, Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott (Leipzig, 1921) 248 f.; W. Klassen, "Pilgram Marpeck's Hermeneutics with Special Reference to His Understanding of the Old Testament" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1959); Roland Bainton, "The Immoralities of the Patriarchs According to the Exegesis of the Late Middle Ages and of the Reformation," Harvard Theological Journal XXIII (1930) 39-49; Corpus Schwenckfeld. VIII, 221:10 ff.; X, 925; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse I, 45 (Schiemer); idem, Der Kommunismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1927) 25; Heinrich Bullinger, Von dem ewigen und ewigen Testament oder Punct Gottes (s.l. 1534); idem, Der Wiedertöufferen Ursprung; J. Gastius, De anabaptismi exordio (Basel, 1544); H. Zwingli, In catabaptistarum strophas elenchus (Zürich, 1527); J. Wigand, De anabaptismo (Leipzig, 1582); ML I, 40.

Oldambt, a region in the Dutch province of Groningen, east of Noordbroek, touching the German border. In the 17th century the southern part was called Wold-Oldambt, the northern part, consisting of polders reclaimed on the Dollard, then was called Klei-Oldambt. In this territory are found the Mennonite congregations of Noordbroek, Winschoten (a union of the former congregations of Beerta, Midwolda, and De Meeden), Pekela, and Veendam. In the 17th century these congregations are sometimes mentioned under the names of Wold-Ampt and Klei-Ampt (also Klein-Ampt). It is not clear which of the now existing congregations formed the Wold-Ampt congregation and which the Klei-Ampt, though it is probable that Beerta and Midwolda were identical with the Klei-Ampt congregation. vöZ.

Tegenwoordige staat der Vereenigde Nederlanden XXI, Part I (Amsterdam, 1793) 207-36; Naamlijst, passim; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II; DB 1879, 5, 86.

Oldeberkoop, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. There is little information about this congregation. It had no meetinghouse, services being held in a private home; the membership must have been very small and it died out about 1700. (DB 1879, 3, 91.) vöZ.

Oldeboorn, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where there have been Anabaptists since very early times. Eelke and Fije of Boorn (Oldeboorn) suffered a martyr's death in Leeuwarden, the Frisian capital, in 1549. Eelke had gathered the "God-fearing people and read the New Testament to them." In 1556 five persons were baptized by Lee-naert Bouwens in Oldeboorn and soon afterward an additional 21. In 1573 Reyts Ayses, who lived in the adjacent village of Beetsterzwaag, was seized in Oldeboorn where he had spent the night with fellow believers in his father's house; he was executed by drowning at Leeuwarden on April 23, 1574. The letters that he wrote in prison reveal that his parents, his brothers and sisters, and his wife were also members of the congregation, and that there were numerous "friends," so that we may assume that there was at that time already a congregation of considerable size in Oldeboorn.

Concerning the Oldeboorn congregation in the 17th century not much is known. In 1695 it joined the Frisian Conference, founded in that year. In 1700 there were 118 members who were not supported by the church. In 1738 there was a division (it is not quite clear whether the cause of the division was disharmony). For another 150 years two congregations, the "Oude Huis" and the "Nieuwe Huis," existed side by side. In 1838 the former had 142 members, the latter 46; in 1868 the corresponding figures were 251 and 179. The Oude Huis congregation acquired a new church in 1856. The relationship between the two congregations had gradually become quite friendly. In 1882 when the Nieuwe Huis found itself without a minister the two congregations decided to merge; this took place on Jan. 1, 1887. K. Schuiling, the minister in the Oude Huis at that time, became the minister of the united congregation which at that time had about 400 members. The church building (the original Nieuwe Huis) was sold and is now a Reformed church. The membership which in 1900 was 483, is at present (1957) only 182. In 1936 the congregation built a new parsonage to replace the one of 1861.

Both the Oude and the Nieuwe Huis congregations were served by lay ministers chosen from the members of the church until shortly after 1800. S. E. Wieling, called in 1805, was the first educated pastor of the Nieuwe Huis congregation; in the Oude Huis all the untrained preachers retired in 1810 and Jan ter Borg, who had been educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, became its preacher. After the merger of 1887 K. Schuiling served until 1889. He was followed by P. Botke 1890-1920, Jacob Hulshoff 1920-30, A. P. van de Water 1935-39, Miss C. Soutendijk 1939-42, E. Daalder 1942-47, H. C. Valetton 1948-50, J. P. Jacobszoon 1951-56, and A. Veldstra 1957-. The church records go back to 1755. The congregation has a Sunday school for children and a ladies' circle. vöZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2177-83; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim; Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur 1858, 7; DB 1887, 147; Mart. Mir. D 84 and 677, E 484 and 994; ML III, 298.

Oldehove, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen, was shortly after 1530 a center of Anabaptist activity. Later on there were a number of Mennonites here, who with Mennonites of some neighboring hamlets formed the congregation of Humsterland (q.v.), also called the Oldehove (DB 1861, 152) congregation. According to tradition there was a small meetinghouse at Oldehove. Now the Mennonites living here belong to the Noordhorn (q.v.) congregation, a special Mennonite circle of Oldehove-Saaxum-Ezinga having been founded in 1947. vöZ.

Oldeklooster (or Bloemkamp), a monastery near Bolsward in the Dutch province of Friesland, was seized on March 30, 1535, by about 300 Anabaptists of Friesland, both men and women, led by Jan van Geelen (q.v.), an emissary of the Anabaptists of Münster. They thereby won a strong position and from here tried to conquer the entire province—an absurd idea! The imperial stadholder Georg Schenk van Tautenburg was put in charge of capturing the old monastery from the Anabaptists. He supposed that he would be able to do so by a mere turning of the hand, but found himself compelled to conduct a regular siege. On April 1 he decided to bombard the monastery with heavy artillery and tried to storm it. Four times he had to lead his soldiers into the fire. On the third assault they succeeded in taking several positions. Some of the fortifications and the church remained in Anabaptist possession. On April 7 the monastery was finally stormed after a severe battle. Eight or nine hundred Anabaptists are said to have lost their lives, but this number is a gross exaggeration; there were 300 at the most. Of these who did not lose their lives in the storming, 37 were at once beheaded and 132, both men and women, taken to Leeuwarden, of whom 55 were executed there after a short trial. Jan van Geelen escaped. Among the victims of Oldeklooster was Peter Simons (q.v.), who is erroneously said to have been a brother of Menno Simons.

NEFF, vDZ.

Ludwig Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reiches zu Münster (Münster, 1880) 2 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 166-68; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) particularly 228 f., with a list of the persons executed at Leeuwarden; Mellink, Wederdopers, 247-49; ML III, 298.

Oldemarkt, a village in the Dutch province Overijssel. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized seven persons here in 1563-65. Later there was here a small congregation of the Danzig Old Flemish (q.v.), as there was likewise in Blokzijl, Zuidveen, and Giethoorn, all of which maintained relations with the Flemish congregation at Danzig, Prussia. Roelof Agge Joncker (q.v.) was preacher of the Oldemarkt congregation 1699-1712; his father and grandfather had served in the same office. The Oldemarkt congregation had died out by 1744. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2184; DB 1878, 12; ML III, 298.)

vDZ.

Oldenburg, a province of Germany (until 1918 a grand duchy), area 2,479 sq. miles, population over 500,000, once consisted of the gravure of Oldenburg and the city of Jever. Anabaptism found its way into this region at an early date from the adjacent province of East Friesland (q.v.). Direct information about Anabaptism here is missing until the middle of the 16th century, but government regulations and statements of Protestant preachers clearly show their presence. In the city of Jever a debate with six Anabaptists was held on Feb. 13 and 14, 1576; they were Hermann Brunsfeld, a scholar, Johannes Gerdes of Hohenkirchen, Nikolaus Hermann of Altenburg, Henricus Henrici of Wüppels, Jankenius of Sillenstede, and Sara, a pregnant woman (see Schauenburg, 36-43, where the interesting discussion is printed). These Anabaptists were expelled from the country; their case was lost.

In the old gravure of Oldenburg the Anabaptists were apparently mostly of the Münsterite type, such as Bernhard Krechting, a brother of Heinrich Krechting, the chancellor of Jan van Leyden (q.v.). Also David Joris (q.v.) stayed here a short time in 1538. They were expelled. The quiet Anabaptists, who had a large following in the city and the country, finally disappeared.

NEFF.

L. Schauenburg, Die Täuferbewegung in der Grafschaft Oldenburg-Deinenhorst und der Herrschaft Jever zur Zeit der Reformation (Oldenburg, 1888); ML III, 298.

Oldersum, a village in East Friesland, Germany, situated on the Ems, south of Emden, was during the Reformation the seat of Wiard von Oldersum. In 1494 Ulrich von Dornum (q.v.) married Essa, Wiard's daughter. Thus Ulrich obtained half of the castle of Oldersum and some property. He became not only a staunch promoter of the Reformation but also a protector and sponsor of the Anabaptists and spiritualists. The co-owner of the Oldersum castle, Hero, shared his views. Ulrich sponsored a disputation at Oldersum between the Catholic Dr. Laurenz and Jürgen Aportanus, a Protestant minister of Emden, and had the report published in Wittenberg in 1523. In 1530 he wrote to the reformers of Strasbourg regarding the Reformation.

Edzard and Enno, the counts of East Friesland, were strongly influenced by Ulrich. In the controversy as to whether East Friesland was to become Reformed or Lutheran, he followed an independent course and made Oldersum a refuge for the persecuted. When Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) arrived in East Friesland in May 1529, i.e., prior to his association with the Anabaptists, he was in touch with Ulrich von Dornum at Oldersum. During the following year Hofmann dedicated two of his writings in Strasbourg to Ulrich. During the same year Carlstadt (q.v.) found refuge with Ulrich at Oldersum and dedicated one of his writings to him. Because of these contacts Carlstadt was enabled to spend some time and do some work in East Friesland. He was still writing to Ulrich von Dornum from Basel on Dec. 10, 1530, sharing with him his views and problems. In May 1530 when Hofmann reached Emden to start the Anabaptist movement, his former contacts with Oldersum were of help to him, although there seems to be no indication that Ulrich supported him in a special way.

Peter Janss reported that he was baptized by Menno Simons at Oldersum in 1536, which would indicate that Menno Simons found shelter in Oldersum soon after his withdrawal from the Catholic Church in Witmarsum early in 1536. According to tradition Ulrich von Dornum granted Menno shelter for a longer period. Whether that was in the castle (the last part of which was torn down in 1954) or in one of the villages is not known. However, it is likely that Menno Simons had shelter here even after Ulrich's death in 1536. Christoffer van Ewsum (q.v.), who married Ulrich's oldest daughter and lived in the province of Groningen, was also referred to as a "Mennonist," but this is an overstatement. However, Ulrich's daughter Essa married an Anabaptist.

According to Kochs Anabaptists continued to find refuge at Oldersum under Hero after Ulrich's death. Even Sebastian Franck had followers at Oldersum. Johan van Bekesteyn of Oldersum visited Franck in Basel in 1541/42. On this occasion Franck wrote a letter to the Christians of Oldersum who "live like sheep among wolves," admonishing them to seek Christ within themselves and not in creeds and churches. This writing was likely addressed to the Reformed members of the church who had difficulty in maintaining their identity under the influence of Lutherans. Leenaert Bouwens performed baptisms in Oldersum in 1580. Hendrick Derks (d. 1652) was an elder of this congregation, which belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. By 1700 it had either died out or merged with a neighboring congregation.

C.K.

E. Kochs, "Die Anfänge der ostfriesischen Reformation," Jahrbuch d. Gesellschaft f. bild. Kunst ... XX (Emden, 1920); Gerhard Ohling, "Aus den Anfängen der Reformation. Ein Brief des Sebastian Franck . . . an die Oldersumer Gemeinde," Ostfriesland, 1954, 111-15; Groningsche Volksalmanak, 1919, 139 f.; Gerhard Ohling, Junker Ulrich von Dornum (Aurich, 1955); Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (1496-1561) (Karlsruhe, 1936) 36; ML III.

Oldesloe, a town of 15,000 (1954) in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, situated between Hamburg and Lübeck. Oldesloe played a role in the history of Mennonites in that province. In 1554 an Anabaptist printer and his apprentices coming from Lübeck were stopped here by authorities who aimed to suppress their activities. They found with them ten tons of Bibles which were investigated by Balthasar Schröder and Claus Wensin of Segeberg. On Nov. 28, 1554, they reported to Christian III of Denmark that the Anabaptist owner had printed a Bible based on Luther's and a Dutch translation, with a concordance from the Zürich Bible. The Anabaptist insisted that only the death of Christ could save and not baptism. From here he proceeded with his printing press to Fresenburg (q.v.), where Bartholomäus von Ahlefeldt (q.v.) was a protector of the Anabaptists. Whether this Anabaptist was Menno (q.v.) Simons himself, who wrote and printed his books at Fresenburg, has not been established.

Evidently there was never a large number of Mennonites in Oldesloe. The members residing here possibly attended the worship services at Fresenburg. Menno Simons himself ordained Michael Steffens and Dirk Eggerat, who resided in Oldesloe, as ministers. Paul Roosen, the father of Gerrit Roosen, learned the trade of tanning from Dirk Eggerat at Oldesloe. Willem Govers and Karsten von Sintern were other members living there before 1600. With the dispersion of the Fresenburg Mennonite settlers in connection with the Thirty Years' War the Mennonites of Oldesloe must also have moved away. Fr. Bangert, in Die Geschichte der Stadt und des Kirchspiels Oldesloe (Oldesloe, 1925), does not mention the Anabaptists.

C.K.

Robert Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930) 4, 29; Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (1496-1561) (Karlsruhe, 1936) 82 ff.

Oley Mennonite Church (MC), located in Oley Valley, Berks County, Pa., a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference, is the outgrowth of both an agricultural extension and an evangelical outreach from the Conestoga Mennonite Church near Morgantown, Pa. The first family moved into the valley in 1938, and by 1942 there were thirteen families. Sunday-school services were begun in May 1942. On Jan. 3, 1943, Omar Kurtz was ordained as the first pastor. On July 18, 1946, John L. Glick was ordained assistant pastor. For 8 years the services were held in a rented union chapel; but in September 1950 a new church was dedicated. A number from the community have been received into the church, and from here have gone at least six missionaries. The membership in 1957 was 115, with Ira A. Kurtz of the Conestoga congregation serving as bishop.

O.A.Ku.

Olgafeld, a Mennonite village name transplanted from the Russian Mennonite settlement at Fürstenland, Ukraine, to Hague, Sask., and Cuauhtemoc, Mexico.

C.K.

Olgafeld, a village in the Fürstenland Mennonite settlement, province of Taurida, South Russia, founded on the lands of a prince; its inhabitants were members of the Fürstenland Mennonite Church, a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonites; in 1905 it numbered 242 members with 139 children. (ML III, 299.)

Olgino, name of several Mennonite villages in Russia. In the province of Ekaterinoslav (now Dnyepetrovsk), volost of Novosofiyevka (formerly called Nikolaithal), Schöndorf was founded, later called Olgino, in 1865; in 1910 it had a population of 96. In the province of Semipalatinsk, Siberia, one of the sixteen villages in the Pavlodar settlement was named Olgino. The settlement was made early in the 20th century between Slavgorod and Pavlodar.

In Stavropol province, North Caucasus, a Mennonite settlement was founded in 1895 as a daughter colony of Tempelhof-Orbelianovka, which was a daughter colony of Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, and was named Olgino. There were originally two villages: Olgino with 30 families from the Tempelhof, and Romanovka with 50 families from Orbelianovka. In 1905 and 1910 daughter colonies of these villages were founded and named Loshkarevo and Miropol. The population of the two mother villages was 500 at the time of the founding, with 12-150 acres of land; in 1926 the two villages numbered 600 persons with 10,368 acres of land. The principal occupation of the settlement was agriculture. By introducing the system of fallow, which served as a model for the surrounding native farmers, the yield of land was raised and good crops harvested. Of special interest were fruit growing and viticulture, in which the Mennonites were pioneers. A well-developed social sense is indicated in the organization of institutions such as "Fram" and a credit association. Religiously these settlers were Templers (q.v.). (ML III, 299.)

T.B., HEGE.

Olijftacxken (Olive Branch), a Dutch Mennonite confession of faith (q.v.) composed in 1627. The contents are described as follows: "Scriptural instruction, upon what people the Spirit of God rests, also how they are obligated and bound to peace and unity, given in reply to the question: Which are the fundamental, sure, distinctive signs, whereby the children of God and the disciples of Jesus Christ (the Church of God) can and must be identified according to the testimony of the Word of the Lord."

This query is briefly answered: Above all they recognize that Jesus Christ alone is the only cause of the; justification of man, of sonship, and the foundation of eternal salvation; the means, however, through which man becomes partaker of the merits of Christ is faith, is derived from God's Word, and is vitalized in man through the Holy Spirit (Rom. 10:17; II Cor. 4:13; Rom. 8:16). And thus man is born of God as he has God as his Father, and Christ as his Brother. These children of God possess all the good and kind gifts of the New Testament, as forgiveness of sin, peace with God, and eternal life. From this follows that the unalterable sign of the children of God and of the disciples of Jesus Christ is the true and only saving faith, which is effective in love (Gal. 5:6; Acts 8:36; 15:11; Matt. 16:18). This faith, which is a firm and sure confidence of the heart, not doubting the things that are promised of God in Christ, is stated in detail on pages 21 to 33. It discusses baptism, its benefit and purpose, communion, the servants of the church, their choice and ordination, footwashing, marriage, secular office, the oath, separation and shunning, the resurrection of the dead and that in their own bodies in which they lived, and finally the last judgment and eternal ruin.

This confession of faith of the Dutch Mennonites was formulated by the four Amsterdam preachers of the Flemish (Lamist) congregation, Tobias Govertsz (van den Wijngaert), Pieter Jansz (Moyer), Abraham Dirksz (Bierens), and Dirck Dirksz. Inspired by the Waterlander Elder Hans de Ries (q.v.), who had given much thought and effort to reuniting the discordant and divided body of the Mennonite church in Holland, they sent a letter to the Dutch congregations in 1626, in which they asked three questions: (a) What are the basic marks of a Christian church? (b) Are these distinctives only found in Flemish congregations? (c) Is making peace forbidden by the Scriptures? When the congregations failed to give adequate answers the four Amsterdam preachers answered the three questions themselves and drew up a confession which was sent with a presentation of peace and a Brief tot Vreed-Bereydinge (Letter for Preparing Peace), dated Sept. 16, 1627, to the congregations in the provinces of Groningen, East and West Friesland, Overijssel, Utrecht, Holland, Zeeland, and Flanders. This confession was printed in 1629 and separately reprinted at least four times (Haarlem 1631, 1636, Amsterdam 1647, 1661), and also published in Algemeene Belijdenissen (Amsterdam, 1665) and Handelingen der Vereenigde Vlaemse en Duytse Doops-gesinde Gemeeynten (Vlissingen, 1666). The complete Dutch title is Christelijke Geloofs Belijdenisse des Olijftacxken: of Schriftuerlijke aenwijsingh over wat lieden den Vrede Godts staet, oock hoe deselve tot Vrede en Eenigheyt verplicht ende verbonden zijn.

The Olijftacxken was a messenger of peace. On the basis of this confession of the Flemish and a confession compiled by the Frisians and High Germans (Confession of Jan Cents 1630) an attempt was made to bring about a union between the two factions. A conference was held to that end in Amsterdam, Oct. 2-5, 1630, and after thorough preparation the Flemish and the Frisian High German congregations were united. On April 26, 1639, a meeting was held in the Singel Church of Amsterdam, which was attended by more than 3,000 persons. NEFF, vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 184-200; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 171 f., where an account is given of the use of this confession in the Hamburg-Altona congregation; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 572; II, No. 1242; ML III, 301 f.

Olijftak, a Mennonite home for the aged at Heemstede near Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, opened on Sept. 15, 1956. (DJ 1957, 26-29.) vdZ.

Olijftak, the name of a new Mennonite church at Amsterdam-Slotermeer, Netherlands, dedicated on Oct. 28, 1956. (DJ 1957, 30-33.) vdZ.

Olive Mennonite Church (MC), formerly called the Shaum congregation, a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, is located in Olive Twp., Elkhart Co., Ind., 5 miles north of Wakarusa, 1 mile south of Jamestown, and 8 miles southwest of Elkhart. Before 1861-62, the date of the erection of their first Mennonite meetinghouse in this area, the congregation worshiped in a log building along Baugo Creek about one-half mile north of the present meetinghouse. The first preachers were in the Elkhart County Circuit, the center of which was Yellow Creek. Daniel Moyer (1812-64), originally of Bucks County, Pa., moved from Ashland County, Ohio, to a farm west of Jamestown in 1848. He was killed in a train wreck near Hillsdale, Mich., on a preaching trip to Canada on Dec. 21, 1864. Daniel Brenneman served in the Yellow Creek Circuit for ten years, until his expulsion in 1874. In 1871 Henry Shaum (1826-92) was ordained preacher at Olive, and Henry Christophel deacon. In 1888 a new brick meetinghouse was built, which was rebuilt in 1948. In 1896 Jacob Shank (d. 1905), a son of Michael Shank, a preacher living at Lakeville, St. Joseph Co., Ind., and the father of Clarence Shank (ord. 1917), a retired preacher of the congregation, was ordained preacher at Olive. In 1908 the congregation imported D. A. Yoder, a young preacher, from the near-by Holde-man congregation to serve as pastor. In 1910 he was ordained bishop. In 1951 J. C. Wenger, in the North Goshen congregation, was called as pastor and ordained bishop here in place of D. A. Yoder, who was retired at that point, and Elno Steiner, the present pastor, was ordained to the ministry. The membership in 1957 was 260. In 1933 the Olive Mennonite Church established a mission outpost at Crumstown (q.v.), which later became independent, and in 1950 at Hudson Lake near New Carlisle, Ind. The deed for the land on which the church stands was granted by Jacob and Mary Shaum to "The Old Menonite Church" in 1872, ten or more years after the erection of the meetinghouse. Olive is said to have had the first Mennonite Sunday school in Indiana, the organizer being John F. Funk (q.v.). J.C.W.

Oliver United Mennonite Church (GCM), located near the town of Oliver, B.C., a member of the Conference of the United Mennonite Churches in B.C., began in 1933, when the settlers, Johann Harms, Jakob Harms, and Abraham Spent, came from the prairie provinces of Canada. The first preacher, Jakob Thiessen, came in 1938. The congregation was organized on June 19, 1938. The first meetinghouse was dedicated in November 1939; it was enlarged in 1942 to seat 100. The members are immigrants from Russia in 1874 and 1923. In 1954 the congregation had 43 members, with G. A. Neufeld as pastor. C.G.T.

Olivier Willemsz (Willemsens), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 24, 1574. He was a native of Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland. He had been a Catholic priest at Leeuwen near Nijmegen. When he left the Catholic Church he moved to Antwerp, opened a bookshop in the Steenhouwersvest, and joined the Mennonites. After some time both Willemsz and his wife were arrested. Willemsz was sentenced to death because of his "heretical faith," but his wife escaped from prison and died at the age of 85. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 692, E 1007; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 192, 200; XIV, 96 f., No. 1081.

Olmütz (Czech, Olomouc), until 1636 the capital of Moravia, during the Reformation a bishop's see, as well as the most important fortress of the land. From this town Ferdinand issued his mandate of April 21, 1527, to the government of Tirol, Austria, to guard against the spread of the Anabaptists, to search them out secretly, and to bring them to punishment. Of the Hutterian chronicles that have been preserved, the Codex Managetta, the Breslau Codex, and the Codex Dreler, as well as the Schad Chronicle mention executions in Olmütz and Znaim in 1528. One of these was probably in Olmütz if the total figure of four given in the martyr list of the Hutterite chronicle is correct, for in 1538, according to the Olmütz city chronicle, three additional Anabaptist executions took place there; on April 17, 1538, three Brethren were burned at the stake, "one was a tinsmith, the other a maltster, the third a renegade monk." The records of this trial have unfortunately been lost. A special role was played in the movement in Nikolsburg by the suffragan Martin Göschl (q.v.) of Olmütz.

The sessions of the Landtag, meeting alternately in Olmütz and Brno, repeatedly dealt with the Anabaptist problem. Thus the Three Kings Landtag in Olmütz ordered the estates not to tolerate any Anabaptists on their lands, a resolution that was frequently renewed, as in the Reminiscere Landtag in 1546, but never carried out. In the 1570's, when the Moravian nobles levied more and more burdens on the Brethren in return for freedom of worship, Olmütz was often the scene of these decisions.

The taxation of the Anabaptists had begun at the Brno Landtag of 1570 with a property tax, to which a poll tax was soon added. This tax was increased by the Olmütz Landtag in 1576, so that for the next ten years an annual tax of five Groschen was levied on all the Anabaptists, male and female. The Brethren found themselves in a difficult position in regard to taxes; they were of course willing to help meet the needs of the country, but did not want to put their means at the disposal of the emperor for military purposes, since this was contrary to their religious principles. They therefore refused to pay any taxes that were destined for military needs, and in their place paid the equivalent in goods. The Olmütz Winter Landtag, 1582, imposed a special tax of two Groschen on every male over twenty years of age to defray necessary national expenses. In addition, the Brethren were forbidden to buy grain in the villages except on the market days. The Three Kings Landtag of 1584 assessed all Anabaptists above eighteen years of age with four Groschen per person, payable in two installments; but at the Olmütz July Landtag the tax was reduced by the magistrate Hynek von Waldstein. The Geschicht-Buch writes about it: "Therefore we thanked God not a little and took it for a dispensation and intervention of God. For the brotherhood bore much burden of their conscience and worry for a time. Which we often made known to our lords and actually told them that we could not let such a thing happen any more, but would abandon all our farms and would dare to endure a great tribulation for that reason, before we would any longer accept these taxes and let them be taken from us, as they have hitherto themselves taken and reduced the debt, because we would not pay it."

The Olmütz Landtag of 1592 again considered the prohibition of buying and selling grain through the Brethren as well as the serving and sale of wine in their houses. The former should be permitted only on market days; if they disobeyed, the grain was to be confiscated. In respect to the latter, the lords should see to it that the Brethren paid the fee determined for the sale of wine. The January Landtag of 1594 in Olmütz decided that "since the Anabaptists of this land enjoy enough and contribute little in comparison with the national demands," they were to be assessed eight guilders in addition to the twenty already imposed upon each house in which they had a kitchen. But it was left to the lords to collect this fine from their Anabaptist tenants or pay it themselves. Concerning the May Landtag at Olmütz in 1599 the Geschicht-Buch reports that since they were unable to pay this tax for conscience' sake, the lords took from them in this year oxen, grain, wine, fat hogs, cows, and sheep.

Further Landtags at Brno and Znaim increased the taxes still further. The July Landtag of 1614 assessed each Bruderhof 100 guilders, together with additional extra taxes. Again the equivalent in goods was taken, since the Brethren, who "a few years ago gave cheerfully, now refused to pay." At the June Landtag of 1618 at Olmütz the tax was raised to 150 guilders per Bruderhof in order to raise money for armies. The Anabaptists did not pay this tax "destined for a wicked war and bloodshed," and therefore "in many places cattle, grain, wine, and other wares were taken, but cheaper than we would have sold them," so that the sorely pressed Brethren, already impoverished by the quartering of soldiers, were burdened anew.

At the Olmütz Landtag of 1625 Cardinal Dietrichstein wished to have the few Anabaptists expelled who were still retained in the service of the nobles on the border of Lower Austria and Hungary. But he did not have his way this time; he therefore requested an imperial mandate to accomplish that end.

The final trace of the Anabaptists is found in the baptismal records of the parish of St. Mauritz in Olmütz, which state that several Anabaptists, probably returning from Hungary, were baptized according to Roman Catholic ritual. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Paul Dedic, "Die Gesch. d. Protestantismus in Olmütz," in Jahrbuch für die Gesch. der Protestanten im ehemaligen Oesterreich LII-LVII (1931-36); Franticek Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXX (Leipzig, 1933-34); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 300 f.

Olyverynken 's Keyzers, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake with Martinken Meere and Janneken Dhanins on Aug. 19, 1573, at Gent, Belgium. Olyverynken was a daughter of Joos van Deinze and a sister of Marie 's Keyzers (q.v.), who died in prison at Gent on May 13, 1573. During the execution of Olyverynken and her comartys, who were gagged to prevent their speaking to the bystanders, an insurrection arose, when the soldiers tried to drive the crowd, which was in sympathy with the victims, from the Vrijdagsmarkt. (Verheyden, Gent, 64, No. 230.) vdZ.

Ombu, El: see El Ombu.

Ommelanden, the region around the city of Groningen (q.v.), now together with this city forming the Dutch province of Groningen, where Anabaptism found entry as early as 1530. Menno Simons stayed here from the end of 1536 or early 1537 until 1540. Later on there were a number of Mennonite congregations in this area, nearly all belonging to the (Groningen) Old Flemish. (See also Groningen, Province of.) vdZ.

DB 1906, 28 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis, 143 ff., 167, et passim; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 64 f.; ML III, 302.

Ommelands(ch) is a Dutch dialect spoken in the Ommelanden (q.v.), the area around Groningen. It is very similar to Low German, spoken in North-western Germany. vdZ.

Omsk, a city in the Omsk Region, Siberia, located at the confluence of the Irtysh and Ob rivers, a significant railroad center on the Trans-Siberian Railroad, was founded in 1716 and was formerly the capital of Western Siberia and of Akmolinsk province. With the expansion of Siberian trade it became the meeting place of European businessmen and Asiatics seeking an outlet for their products.

Omsk became the gateway of the Mennonites into Siberia. Contrary to their tradition in European Russia, the first Mennonites in Siberia settled in the city of Omsk. Peter J. Wiens, the first Mennonite known to have settled in Siberia, started a business there in 1897, maintaining a general store and a store for farm machinery in Mokraya. In addition he farmed some land. Later he also established a branch of his farm implement store in the city of Slavgorod (q.v.). His business in Omsk grew rapidly and he built a large two-story building on the Vtoroy Vsvos in Mokraya. All of his property was confiscated during the Revolution of 1917.

In 1902 Johann P. Isaak and his brother bought some land south of Omsk in Kulomzino on the Irtysh River. Later, when Novo-Omsk, the railroad station of Omsk, located a few miles south, was established here, he sold some of his farm land very favorably. A. A. Lepp sold his mill at Barvenkovo (q.v.) in the Ukraine and came to Kulomzino, where he purchased land from Johann P. Isaak on which he built a five-story steam-driven flour mill. Later he sold the mill and built a factory. One of the Mennonites who found their way to Omsk was a banker, Jakob Hildebrand, the son-in-law of P. J. Wiens. Dr. Johann Isaak was an oculist there (1914-20). Some Mennonites found employment in Russian and foreign business enterprises. Jakob Epp of Ivanovka worked in Omsk after the Revolution of 1917 and represented the Mennonites there. In 1911 the Mennonites established a Zentralschule in Kulomzino (see Omsk Mennonite Zentralschule).

Omsk was also of significance for the Mennonite settlers in Siberia as the center for agents trying to serve land-hungry Europeans. In this respect Omsk was the gateway for the Mennonites looking for cheap land in Siberia. Some of the land agents tried to take advantage of the inexperienced land seekers (Hildebrand, 28).

During and after World War II Omsk very likely became the residence of Mennonites in exile and dispersion. Numerous letters have come from the city in recent years indicating this. Aganetha Klassen wrote from Omsk that she and her family, formerly of Nieder-Chortitza, were living in the city (Bote, April 15, 1955, p. 7). Peter Bärg, formerly of the province of Ufa, also reported that he and his family were living in the city of Omsk (Menn. Rundschau, Feb. 24, 1954, p. 5, 8). C.K.

J. J. Hildebrand, Sibirien (Winnipeg, 1952); Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957).

Omsk Mennonite Brethren Church: see Tchunayevka Mennonite Brethren Church.

Omsk Mennonite Church was established in the Omsk Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Western Siberia in 1906. The church was first known as the "Sibirische Mennonitische Kirchengemeinde" and later as the Alexandrovka Mennonite Church, since the church building was located in the village of Alexandrovka. Originally the Mennonites and Mennonite Brethren settling along the Trans-Siberian railroad west of Omsk forming the Omsk settlement, and who came from the Ukraine and Samara, worshiped together in private homes. When the Mennonite Brethren organized the Tchunayevka M.B. Church (q.v.) steps were taken to organize a Mennonite church. B. Fast and Jakob Gerbrandt (q.v.) took the initial steps at a meeting held in Margenau in 1906 under the leadership of Jakob Peters, where B. Fast was chosen as the leading minister. Twenty-one baptismal candidates were given instruction and were baptized by Gerbrandt in 1907. On September 22 at a meeting attended by the elders H. Unruh and H. Peters of the Molotschna settlement, a constitution was adopted, and a decision taken to erect a church. On September 24 Jakob Voth was ordained minister. Under the leadership of B. Fast, who visited the scattered members of the large settlement, the congregation grew. P. Bergen, W. Funk, P. Isaak, Käthler, and P. P. Fröse were added as ministers.

On Nov. 27, 1911, the congregation decided to elect its own elder. Peter P. Bergen was elected and ordained by Elder Boschmann. In Kiryanov, the center of the "Apostolische Brüdergemeinde" (q.v.), an Adrian was elected minister. Enns and Wiebe were added to the ministry to serve in the area of the city of Omsk. By 1913 a total of 97 persons had been added to the Omsk Mennonite Church by baptism. On Oct. 6, 1913, the first meetinghouse in Alexandrovka was dedicated.

Unser Blatt regularly carried reports of the work of the Omsk congregations from 1926-27. During this time B. Bergen was the elder. Ministers named are A. Isaak, P. P. Fröse, Harder, B. Fast, and Johann Teichgräf. The congregation was very active in Bible conferences, song festivals, and mission work. It supported the Ob Mission (q.v.). In 1927 the congregation had a membership of over 400. The church observed a harvest festival on Oct. 2, 1927. In addition to the Alexandrovka church there were numerous other smaller congregations about which little information is available. In the smaller communities the Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren continued to worship together.

P. P. Fröse of Ekaterinovka, reporting on his visit to the scattered members of the church during the winter of 1925, relates that he preached in Neu-Datchino north of Omsk, from where he proceeded to Kiryanovka, Trussovka, Deveterikovka, Khaldeyevka, and Ivanokva, all of which belonged to the followers of Hermann Peters, the "Apostolische Brüdergemeinde" (q.v.), at that time under the leadership of Heinrich J. Warkentin. He found a good reception and had an opportunity to preach in the churches. He particularly visited the Chortitza village in which members of various groups resided but which had no minister.

During the 1930's the organized religious activities had to be discontinued and most of the religious workers were exiled. After Stalin's death in 1953 a revival of interest in religious and church work was noticeable. Helena P. Petkau near Luzino, Omsk Region, wrote that Mennonites have started to meet and worship together because of hunger for the Word of God, although they had no minister (Menn. Rundschau, August 1955, p. 14). (See also Omsk Mennonite Settlement.) C.K.

"Ueber Gründung, Stand und Arbeit der sibirischen mennonitischen Kirchengemeinden 1906-1913," Menn. Jahrbuch, No. 10, 1913, p. 125 ff.; Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 142 ff.; Unser Blatt I, 29, 129, 174; II 373; III, 11, 73.

Omsk Mennonite Settlement, formerly in the Ak-molinsk Region, now partly in the Omsk Region and Kazakh SSR, Western Siberia, is located between the cities of Petropavlovsk (q.v.) and Omsk (q.v.), extending some 100 miles east to the railroad station of Tatarsk. This was the first Mennonite settlement in Siberia, expanding gradually some 300 miles on both sides of the Trans-Siberian Railroad between Petropavlovsk and Tatarsk, centering primarily around Omsk. Omsk and Petropavlovsk became the gateways for the establishments of this settlement as well as for the establishments of other Mennonite settlements in Siberia, such as Slavgorod (q.v.) and Pavlodar (q.v.). The first Mennonites to settle in this area and in Siberia in general came to the city of Omsk (q.v.), where Peter J. Wiens started a business in 1897.

(1) Kulomzino. Kulomzino was the station on the left side of the Irtysh River near the city of Omsk. Johann P. Isaak had bought some land here in 1902 which was later incorporated into the city of Omsk (q.v.).

(2) Tchunayevka. In 1899 the families of Johann Matthies, Franz Balzer, Julius Dick, and Peter Dick, of the province of Taurida, and H. Ewert and Gerhard Ewert, of Samara, bought 4,680 acres of land south of the Trans-Siberian Railroad a few miles west of the city of Omsk, and established the village of Tchunayevka. These were the first Mennonite families to settle on land in Siberia. One end of the village was called Orloff because the owner, Heinrich Warkentin, preferred this name. Gerhard Ewert and Peter Engbrecht established a steam-driven flour mill in this area.

(3) Tchukreyevka was a Mennonite village located north of the Trans-Siberian Railroad, about three miles west of the city of Omsk. Among the early settlers were Franz, Peter, David Thiessen, and the sons of Johann P. Isaak. In addition to grains the settlers raised vegetables, for which they found a profitable market in the city.

(4) Maryanovka was a railroad station west of Omsk. North of the railroad station and five miles east was the village of Sharapov, which had been bought in 1904 by Jakob and Heinrich Dück, Crimean Mennonites. Other families living there were Jakob Goossen, Abram Wiens, and Jakob Schierling. The village had a school. Worship services for the Mennonite Church were conducted by Johann Teichrieb and for the Mennonite Brethren by Jakob Fast. Teichrieb later emigrated to Paraguay. This village achieved considerable prosperity. During the Revolution of 1917 a number of Mennonites were killed. Four miles east of Sharapov near the station of Alonsk was the Renpenning estate, owned by the manufacturer Jacob Renpenning, formerly of Fabrikewiese, Molotschna. Further east near the station of Luzino was a Mennonite village which bore the same name.

(5) Moskalenko is located west of Maryanovka, east of Isil'-Kul, and south of the Trans-Siberian Railroad. This was a business center in which some Mennonites had located. A steam flour mill was owned by a number of Mennonites. A Mennonite village named Ekaterinovka was located in the vicinity of Moskalenko. This was a scattered village with a school. The ministers of the Mennonite Church were Peter P. Bergen, elder, and Peter P. Fröse, who perished in exile. A number of Mennonite estate owners lived in this area, including Johann Rahn and Jakob Konrad.

(6) Margenau is located twelve miles east of Isil'-Kul and one mile south of the station of Gorkoye. According to a Russian map of 1946, the station is now called Margenau and not Gorkoye. North of the railroad was the village of Hamberg (Puchkovo). Both villages were located on rented land.

Margenau was the center for a number of smaller hamlets and estates. One mile away was the estate of Ivanovka owned by Heinrich Epp and his children. Three miles south of Margenau was the village of Nikolaifeld, where the ministers Johann Kähler and Peter Isaak were located. Five miles from Margenau was the village of Alexanderkrone with a school taught for a while by H. H. Friesen. In the vicinity was the large estate of Alexeyevka owned by a Reimer. The station Kuyanbar was located six miles east of Margenau (Gorkoye). South of it was the village of Korneyevka named after Cornelius Siemens. The minister of the community was Jakob Heide. South of this village was the large estate of Johann Heinrichs. East of this estate was another, named Grigoryevka after the owner Gerhard Dück. Another place occupied by Mennonites was Bogunovo.

(7) Isil'-Kul, a larger railroad center half way between Omsk and Petropavlovsk, attracted a number of Mennonites who established businesses there. Numerous estates and villages were also established in the vicinity. Among them was the estate owned by Peter Funk, who had a large orchard. His married children also lived in the vicinity. Six miles north of Isil'-Kul were the following villages: Friedensruh, Tiegerweide, Rosenort, Feodorovka, Petrovka. The settlers came mostly from Zagradovka. Bückert, the Mennonite Brethren minister, lived in Rosenort.

(8) Bulayevo, a railroad station 25 miles east of Isil'-Kul, north of which a number of Mennonite families settled.

(9) Tokushi is a railroad station between Bulayevo and Petropavlovsk. Four miles north of Tokushi was the Mennonite village of Friesenov (q.v.), founded by Peter, Johann, Nikolai Friesen and others in 1901. This place was sometimes called Friesenhof or Perflyevka after the former owners. Four miles from Friesenov was the Mennonite village of Mikhaylovka. Some of the settlers here were Johann Dück, Wilhelm and Gerhard Janzen, and Peter Harder, ministers. They worshiped in school buildings. East of Tokushi, next to the railroad town of Asanovsky, was located the Mennonite village of Osanovo.

These are the major Mennonite settlements, villages, and estates established by the Mennonites along the Trans-Siberian Railroad between the cities of Petropavlovsk and Omsk. The city of Petropavlovsk also had some Mennonites, among them Johann Friesen, who was the proprietor of a steam flour mill.

North and east of the city of Omsk some additional Mennonite villages and estates were located, as follows:

(10) Apostolic Brethren (Hermann Peters group); Apostolische Brüdergemeinde (q.v.), a group founded by Hermann Peters (q.v.) in the Molotschna settlement as an independent branch of the Mennonite Brethren, who lived for a while in Crimea, and then moved to Siberia in 1900-1, where they established the village of Trussovka (q.v.), 25 miles north of Omsk and Ivanovka. Another group settled northeast of Omsk on the Om River, six and one-half miles from Valerino, and established Kiryanovka, Khaldeyevka, and Devyeterikovka. Numerous additional smaller and larger estates and industries were established. The settlers here were industrious and successful farmers, some of them engaging in dairying and the production of barley, oil, milling. Another village of Mennonites and Mennonite Brethren in this area was called Chor-titza.

(11) Maslyanovka and Smolyanovka were located about eight miles north of the station of Novolubino on the Omsk-Tyumen Railroad east of the Ob River. This land was not purchased like all other land of the Omsk Mennonite settlement, but was obtained through a government grant similar to the Slavgorod settlement land. Maslyanovka was a regular Mennonite village with a school and with its own worship services. The minister was Peter Wiebe. Smolyanovka was located six miles distant. The farmers lived on their own land and had their own school. The ministers were Martin Hübert and Nikolai Siemens.

(12) Other Settlements. There were some Mennonites at Kremlov, 20 miles from Omsk. Near Barodin not far from Kremlov were some Mennonite estates owned by Philipp Wiebe, Jakob Rehann, David and Peter Unrau, Dietrich Kröker, and others. North of Omsk near Devyeterikovka (Deyatirikovo) there were some Mennonites who had come originally from Crimea. Neu-Dachnoye, south of the Trans-Siberian railroad station of Karatkansk, was the easternmost Mennonite village of the Omsk settlement.

The total population of the Omsk Mennonite settlement was 3,512 in 1926. The amount of land owned and farmed by the Omsk Mennonites is hard to determine. It is variously estimated at 81,000 to 1,080,000 acres. This settlement prospered economically and overcame its pioneering difficulties much more rapidly than did the Slavgorod settlement. This was partly due to the fact that the settlers came with money, and above all that they settled along the railroad lines and did not encounter the severe pioneer difficulties of the Slavgorod settlers. They were as a rule close to the markets, some of them engaging in industry, milling, and business. The cultural level of the settlement was also higher than that of Slavgorod. Although they had difficulties in maintaining schools for smaller groups since they were much more scattered, they usually had qualified teachers and adequate teaching facilities. By 1911 a school board and a Zentralschule had been created in Kulomzino, the railroad station of Novo-Omsk. Among the teachers were Gerhard Gäde, Benjamin Schellenberg, and Jacob Hübert. After World War I a Mennonite secondary school was established in Margenau. Some of the teachers were Abram Schierling, Wilhelm Wilmsen, Jacob Epp, Aron Rempel, Suse Löwen, Agatha Friesen, Hans Braun, and Hans Legiehn. The school building burned down around 1923 but was rebuilt. The school was soon taken over by the Soviets but continued to function.

In 1921 there was a teachers' conference of all German teachers of West Siberia, in which the Slavgorod Mennonite teachers also participated. Some German professors of the University of Omsk were among the speakers. During and immediately after the Revolution the Mennonites of the Omsk settlement suffered severely, particularly those who had attained a certain status of prosperity as estate owners, businessmen, or industrialists. Many were put to death or exiled. In the 1920's some gradually found their way to Canada or later in the 1930's to South America. During the NEP period the economic life of the Omsk Mennonites was revived. They took active part in the program of the All-russischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein (AMLV). A. J. Unger reported (Der Praktische Landwirt, June-July 1926, p. 11) that their co-operative had established a cheese factory which was functioning satisfactorily, that they had purchased some mills and were going into the milling industry, and that their seed selection program and other business operations were successful. In the same issue J. Epp reported that their co-operative had purchased 25 Fordson tractors and that they had made tremendous progress since 1921 when they had reached the lowest ebb; conditions had improved so much that the "American fever" was gradually disappearing, although some had left for Canada. P. F. Fröse, of Moscow, who visited the settlement during the winter of 1925-26, reported good progress. The AMLV had 500 members in Omsk. Soon collectivization, exile, and the suppression of organized religious activities were similar to those of the other Mennonite settlements. (See also Omsk Mennonite Church, and Tchunayevka M.B. Church.)

Before, during, and after World War II many of the Mennonites who had been evacuated and exiled from the Ukraine were brought to the Omsk Region, some of whom are now located in the city of Omsk (q.v.). Mrs. M. Friesen, formerly of Nieder-Chortitz, reported that she and others were living in Zontsovka, Isil'-Kul, Omsk Region (Bote, Aug. 17, 1955, p. 7). Helena P. Petkau wrote that they are living near Luzino in Petrovka, Omsk Region, with other Mennonites; they meet to sing and worship, but have no minister (Menn. Rundschau, Aug. 8, 1955, p. 14). C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957); J. J. Hildebrand, Sibirien (Winnipeg, 1952); Unser Blatt I (1926) 129, 155, 174, 247, 308; II (1927) 333, 373; III (1927) 11, 15, 42, 73.

Omsk Mennonite Zentralschulen. The Mennonites of the Omsk settlement in Siberia early recognized the need for a secondary school. A school board created for this purpose established a Zentralschule in Kulomzino, later called Novo-Omsk, which became the railroad center of the city of Omsk (q.v.), in 1911. The first teachers were Gerhard J. Gäde, B. J. Schellenberg, and Jacob Hübert. The school was closed in 1915, during World War I. Whether it was reopened after the Revolution is not clear.

After World War I a Zentralschule was opened in Margenau. Margenau is located on the Trans-Siberian Railroad between Omsk and Isil'-Kul. The following teachers taught there: Abram Schierling, Wilhelm Wilmsen, Maria Wilmsen, Jakob Epp, Aron Rempel, Suse Löwen, Agatha Friesen, Hans Braun, and Hans Legiehn. The Soviet government later took over the school and adjusted it to its educational system. C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 143; A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1949) 332 ff.

Onckel, Aleydt van, a noble lady of Amsterdam, the widow of Vrederick van Onckel, had joined the Anabaptists. In 1536, or even before, she was drowned at Amsterdam because of "Lutheranism" (i.e., heresy) and Anabaptism. Her considerable property was confiscated. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 100 f.) vDZ.

Oncken, Johann Gerhard (1800-84), the founder of the European Continental Baptist movement, had been influenced considerably by an American Baptist professor of theology, Barnabas Sears, who was attending a German theological school, and so developed the conviction of baptism by immersion as the correct form which should constitute a prerequisite for church membership. He and a group of sympathizers were baptized in the Elbe at Hamburg. He began his service with Pastor Rautenburg at Hamburg, where the first German Sunday school was started in 1825. These influences led Oncken to become the founder of the European Continental Baptist movement in 1834.

During his activities in Hamburg Oncken became acquainted with Jacob Gysbert van der Smisen, a deacon in the Mennonite Church, who freely supported various Christian movements even beyond his own denominational boundaries. Oncken also visited some of the Mennonite churches in Poland (q.v.) in 1833, preaching among them six weeks and greatly enjoying their spirituality and their well-attended church services.

When the new movement of the Mennonite Brethren Church began in the Chortitz settlement of Russia, their leader, Abraham Unger, had already become acquainted with Oncken and solicited his visit and influence upon the new movement. Oncken accepted the invitation, and spent ten days visiting some of the newly established, but yet unorganized groups in 1869, and assisted in the ordination of Elder Abraham Unger as elder, and Aron Lepp as minister, and Cornelius Unger and Benjamin Nickel as deacons. Oncken continued his influence upon this group of the Mennonite Brethren Church by correspondence. His influence upon the moral standards of this group, however, was not quite as effective, for Oncken is known to have used tobacco, which several of his admirers in the newly established Mennonite Brethren Church continued to do. Aron Lepp opposed this to the extent that the church excommunicated all those who persisted in the use of tobacco, thus losing ten to twelve influential members. J.J.T.

J. Lehmann, Geschichte der deutschen Baptisten (3rd ed., 1922-23); J. H. Rushbrook, Some Chapters of European Baptist History (London, 1929); Ed. Scheve, Dem Herrn hintennach sehen (1908); Rudolf Donat, Wie das Werk begann. Entstehung der deutschen Baptisten-gemeinden (Kassel, 1958); ML III, 302 ff.

O'Neal (Ark.) Mennonite Brethren Mission Chapel, a frame building 28 x 42 feet, was erected by the Southern District M.B. Conference and dedicated on Feb. 24, 1957. The workers in charge are Mr. and Mrs. George H. Klassen. G.H.K.

Onecho Mennonite Church (GCM), originally known as the First Mennonite Church of Colfax, located at Colfax, Whitman Co., Wash., was organized in July 1893 by J. B. Baer with 24 members of Swiss origin. Paul Aeschliman, the first elder, served for 44 years. He was followed by W. Harley King in 1936 and by P. D. Unruh in 1946. The first church erected in 1895 was replaced by the present building in 1926. The congregation is a member of the Pacific District Conference. In 1954 it had a membership of 134. P.D.U.

Ones, Foppe: see Foppe Ones.

Onnes, a Mennonite family of Groningen, Netherlands, to which belonged Michiel Onnes Mz, b. March 14, 1879, at Groningen, d. June 2, 1950, at Veendam. He was a Mennonite pastor, serving at Hippolytushoef and 't Stroe on the island of Wieringen in 1905-9, Warga 1909-11, Westzaan 1911-29, and at Zutphen from 1929 until he retired in 1946. During his Westzaan period he also took care of the newly founded congregation of Bussum (q.v.), and after his retirement served as temporary pastor at Veendam. In Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1907 he published an important historical paper on Jan ter Borg. (DJ 1951, 15 f.) vDZ.

Ontario, a province of Canada (pop. 5,405,000). In 1791 the British colony of Quebec, which had been won from the French in 1759, was divided, and the vast area of wild bush country lying west of the Ottawa River became "Upper Canada." The following year some counties were laid out in each of the four districts. Settlement along the lakes and at the points of entry had already begun, and continued over the next fifty years until all available land in the southern part of the province had been occupied. The physical features and natural resources of the province appealed to immigrants. But the rolling land, heavily timbered and well watered by many streams and small rivers suitable for mill sites and as waterways for the settler's small boat or raft, lay for the most part unseen by the white man.

"In 1783 large numbers of United Empire Loyalists flocked to Canada from the United States. The earliest ones went to Nova Scotia. The principal centres around which these immigrants located, however, were in Upper Canada, at Kingston, York (Toronto), and along the Niagara River. It has been estimated that nearly 50,000 came to Canada between 1783-86. The Loyalists who applied for land grants in Canada at this time were required to prove that they had been attached to the British cause and had suffered, as a consequence, the loss of property, and other abuses. The claim was accepted when supported by a single witness. The grants were made very generously. Governor Simcoe (Nov. 6, 1794) made even more generous offers to attract a class of desirable settlers. The immigrant should receive 200 acres of land and some other assistance. He must profess the Christian religion and he must have a good reputation in the country from which he came. In the first years of his regime Simcoe had advised the British Consul in Philadelphia that Quakers and like societies should be admitted from Pennsylvania, and would be accorded exemption from bearing arms as had been allowed hitherto by the British government. These inducements from Simcoe and the desire to be under the English king (as will be shown later) caused numerous Mennonite families from Pennsylvania to migrate to the fertile wilderness lands in the Home District and along the Grand River. Possibly the difficulty of securing cheap land in the thickly populated settlements in the older Mennonite communities of Eastern Pennsylvania also played a part in the movement" (Burkholder, 14).

The first Mennonites to settle permanently in what is now the province of Ontario came from Bucks Co., Pa., and in 1786 took up land on the "Twenty Mile Creek," so called because of its distance from the Niagara River. This colony was settled among the present towns of Jordan, Vineland, and Campden, and about 1800 may have numbered about one hundred. It was without a minister until 1801 when, upon the advice of the ministers at Deep Run, Pa., to whom they had appealed for help, Valentine Kratz was chosen minister and John Fretz, deacon. The first meetinghouse was built on the farm of Jacob Moyer in 1810.

At about the same time Mennonites from Lancaster and York counties were settling farther south on the north shores of Lake Erie in what is now Welland County. This colony, also known as the "Black Creek" and Bertie settlement, seems to have been more numerous than that on the "Twenty." There were at least three regular places of worship used by the Mennonites here in these early days: in Bertie Township near Sherckston, near Stevensville known as the Black Creek Church, and on the Niagara River near Chippewa, known as the Miller Church (Riverside). There were also Quaker families in this region. In 1837 there were twenty-five Mennonite and two Tunker families in Wiloughby Township, Welland County. However, through the years the picture has reversed and the Brethren in Christ have flourishing congregations here while the Mennonites have died out. Lack of capable church leadership in this community seems to have been the reason for its decline.

The largest settlement of Mennonites in the province was made in what is now Waterloo County, in the west central part of southern Ontario. Quoting Burkholder, "The first settlers, Joseph Schoerg and Samuel Betzner, left their homes in Franklin County, Pa., in the fall of 1799 and travelled as far as the Twenty where they wintered. In the next spring, 1800, they, with their families, followed the Indian trail as far as Brantford, and then went north, along the Grand River and settled on its banks in what is now Waterloo County. The location of their farms is now marked by the Waterloo Pioneers' Memorial Tower erected in 1926, four miles south of Kitchener. These two families were the first white families to settle in what is now Waterloo County. During the early spring of the same year, 1800 (according to Ezra Eby), Samuel Betzner, Sr., and John and Christian Reichert came with their families from Lancaster County. David Gingerich of Lancaster County visited the new settlement in 1800 on a tour of investigation and in 1801 came with his family and effects. The same year seven Montgomery County families arrived—three Bechtels, a Kinsey, a Rosenberger, and a Biehn. With them were also several unmarried persons, one of whom was George Clemens. In 1802 a number of other families came from Montgomery, Cumberland, and other Pennsylvania counties. Later in the same year came another company among whom was Joseph Bechtel, who as an ordained man became the first Mennonite minister in the colony, and his family, and John and Samuel Bricker. The general location of these first families was on the east bank of the Grand River near what is now Preston. They organized the first congregation of Mennonites in this part of Ontario, the Hagey (now Preston) church. A little school was started in 1802 near Blair with a Rittenhouse as teacher. The settlement now consisted of at least 25 families with a number of children and young adults.

"These settlers had purchased their lands from Richard Beasley. These farms were part of Block No. 2 of the Six Nations Indians lands. Mr. Beasley was only joint owner, and payment for this land to the Indians, through trustees, was secured by power of mortgage. The titles issued by Beasley were defective because of existing mortgage. Early in 1803 this defect in the deeds was discovered and the movement to Waterloo immediately stopped. When Mr. Beasley found that his deception was known and that he could not continue to sell the land to the Mennonites, he agreed to sell 60,000 acres of land, practically the whole of the present Waterloo Township, for 10,000 pounds. The matter was taken up by certain Mennonites in Lancaster County and a company was formed and the necessary money was raised. This 60,000 acres was called the German Company Tract. It was divided among the shareholders, by lot, into 134 parcels of 448 acres each. The Company was formed at a meeting held in a home of 'Hannes' Eby, at Hammer Creek, near Litzitz in Lancaster County. At this meeting it was urged that the harassed brethren in Canada be given assistance, not for the purpose of material gain, but as a brotherly act. This spirit of helpfulness, without prospect of personal gain, has ever been an outstanding trait in the life of the Mennonites. The Pennsylvania shareholders now became the possessors of lands in Canada. The first installment of $20,000 was carried from Lancaster in solid silver cash in the spring of 1804 and paid over to the proper persons on May 23, 1804. The balance was paid about a year later and clear title was given to the lands of the German Company.

"During the period of uncertainty relative to the land titles, the immigration to Waterloo was halted.

Scarcely any families came during 1803 and 1804. It was during these two years that the Markham settlement north of Toronto began. The Beasley difficulty seems to have been the cause. This difficulty removed, the settlers came again in increasing numbers to Waterloo. Those in Pennsylvania, who had so recently come into possession of fertile lands in the Grand River basin, were desirous of locating upon their holdings. The Lancaster families now predominated among the immigrants. During the years 1805, 1806, and 1807, the Mennonite population more than doubled by immigration. Benjamin Eby, who became the leading figure in the young church in Canada, came from Lancaster in 1807. With him came a large number of Lancaster settlers. This stream of settlers continued with vigor until interrupted by the War of 1812-15" (Burkholder, 34-36).

The Markham settlement was located in York County, north of present Toronto. Henry Wideman, a minister from Montgomery County, Pa., settled near Markham in 1803. In the early years a meetinghouse was erected on his farm and a burying ground begun. Caspar Schoerg (Shirk), brother to the Joseph Schoerg who settled on the Grand River in 1800, came to Markham in 1804 from Franklin County, Pa. Reesors, Hubers, and Stouffers came from Lancaster County the same year. A few years later the Groffs and Barkeys followed. The townships of Vaughan, Pickering, Scarborough, and Whitchurch received some settlers, but the main group was in Markham Township.

"The church in this colony never was large. There were as many as eight regular places of worship, but a few have not been used for some time. Mennonite Brethren in Christ and Wisler divisions decimated the numbers in this county. Neither of the three sections of the church in this area has enjoyed a very marked prosperity following these schisms. Large numbers of the younger generation have gone into other churches. At the present time the three bodies are holding the young people of their families fairly well" (Burkholder, 41).

Other scattered Ontario settlements include Zurich in western Ontario near the shore of Lake Huron, which was established in the 1830's and has continued until the present with both Amish and Mennonite churches. Most of these families came from Waterloo County. In Haldimand County on the shore of Lake Erie, was the Rainham (q.v.) settlement founded by David Hoover of York County, Pa., in 1792. Other Pennsylvania families arrived here, but the group never became large. In 1835-40 numerous families from Welland and Lincoln counties moved into the township of South Cayuga (q.v.) in Haldimand County, while others left for Ohio and Indiana.

Through the years that followed early pioneering, the small, struggling communities grew. The inherent qualities of thrift and industry enabled these Swiss-Germans to prosper and become well-established. Their quiet and simple way of life, coupled with a sense of stewardship of the land they cultivated, very often saved them from mistakes and errors made by their less cautious neighbors, for their own fathers and grandfathers had only lately hewn homes from the wilderness of Pennsylvania.

During the first half century of Mennonitism in Upper Canada (Ontario), agriculture was the predominant occupation. Some operated grist, flour, and saw mills in conjunction with their farms, and a few went into manufacturing enterprises, but they left their mark mainly in the province's agricultural picture. The large bank barn with its deep stone walls, and the neat, well-kept orchard with its variety of fruit trees are only two examples.

However, while good farming and business practices built up the brotherhood in a material way, spiritual zeal and aggressiveness seems to have been often lacking. It is true there were many leaders, Benjamin Eby (q.v.), Jacob Groff, Jacob Moyer, and others, some whose names are not remembered, who were no doubt truly concerned for the well-being and purity of the church. The Methodist and Evangelical churches were very active and they were quick to see that young people with good Mennonite background were desirable members. So over the years there was a gradual, but telling, loss to the Mennonite church. There were also several schisms that divided and weakened the church body. In 1849 Daniel Hoch of Jordan, a minister, separated from the Conference and had sympathizers in each district. In 1855 the Ohio-Canada West Conference was organized at the Carlisle School, Waterloo County. Hoch identified himself with John H. Oberholtzer of Pennsylvania. Hoch's plea for a new life and clean conduct was commended by spiritual people generally, but his method and personality were not acceptable. He worked with the General Conference of Mennonites until 1869, after this with the M.B.C. group; in forming the G.C.M. branch in Canada, he made little progress and his membership dwindled. In 1875 another division took place. Four ministers, three deacons, and several hundred members withdrew and at a conference at Bloomingdale, Ont., formed the United Mennonites. Later, after union with the Pennsylvania (1879) and Ohio (1883) groups, the name "Mennonite Brethren in Christ" was adopted. Some who had harbored dissatisfaction with the parent church from the time of the Hoch schism united actively with the new group. They have been very active in evangelistic work and have grown numerically. In 1949 the name was changed to United Missionary Church. In Ontario (1955) they have 47 congregations and a membership of over 2,400.

Burkholder comments (197), "In the year 1874, when Solomon Eby and John Baer, ministers, and Wm. Hembling and Joseph Schneider, deacons, and many others began what later was known as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ movement, the most aggressive element in the Church was removed. This group desired protracted meetings, prayer meetings and other activities for which the church as a whole was not yet ready, although prayer meetings had been sanctioned by conference in 1847. This schism taught the Church that more active interest must be taken in the gathering of the young into the fold. Some of the methods of the M.B.C. group, in a modified form, would have been acceptable to a large section of the Church, but there were others of a more conservative type who opposed any measure or method to which they had not been accustomed. This conservative group was strongest in Woolwich Township in Waterloo County, but had sympathizers in all the other districts also."

The situation came to a head in 1889 when three bishops and ten ministers and deacons withdrew. They are the "Old Order" Mennonites, sometimes called "Woolwichers" because of their location, sometimes called "Wisler" because of their similarity to the Wisler (q.v.) Mennonites in Indiana, although there never was an organic union or common conference. In 1955 they had 18 congregations and a membership of about 1,800. In 1955 a similar group split off in the Markham and South Cayuga districts.

In 1924 a division took place in the First Mennonite church, Kitchener. About 125 members and their minister, U. K. Weber, withdrew and built their own building on Stirling Avenue, objecting to some of the stricter regulations of the old group. In 1950 they were affiliated with the Eastern District of the General Conference Mennonite Church and had a membership of 475.

Around the turn of the century, a few families from Ontario began to migrate to Western Canada, settling in Southwestern Alberta. Elias W. Bricker left Waterloo County with his family in 1891. Others followed and the colonists became quite numerous. The Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference appointed S. F. Coffman to spend the year 1901 among the Alberta brethren assisting them in congregational organization. When the congregations had increased sufficiently in number in 1903, a conference was organized known as the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference, having a present membership of 778.

In Ontario there were also several other immigrant groups besides the Pennsylvania Mennonites, the European Amish, Amish Mennonites, and the Russian Mennonites. Christian Nafziger from Bavaria was the first Amishman to arrive. In 1822, after landing in New Orleans and making his way up through the States, he came to Waterloo and selected a tract of land which comprises the present township of Wilmot. He went to the Governor of Upper Canada who consented to sell 150 acres to each Amish family for a small price and give an additional 50 acres free in return for cutting the trees in the road allowance. Nafziger returned to Germany, coming back to Ontario in 1824, which was the actual beginning of the Amish settlements. Within a few years Amish families from Europe began locating in Wilmot Township. They came from both Bavaria and Alsace Lorraine. The colony grew and spread west into Perth County and south into Oxford County. Some who originally settled in Ontario later moved to the U.S.A., especially Iowa. However, there are at the present time twelve strong congregations with a total membership of around 2,400. The official name is Amish Mennonite Conference.

In 1886 a division took place in this group. It was decided to build a meetinghouse for worship purposes. Some were not in agreement with this, desiring to continue worship in the homes. They withdrew and are called the "Old Order" Amish Mennonites. They have five congregations and a total membership of about 650.

Russian Mennonites. Another group of Mennonites who are a part of Ontario's history are those who came from Russia in the migrations of 1873 and 1923. During the years from 1874-80, 1,246 families arrived at Toronto en route to Manitoba. Burkholder reports (174), "The immigrants arrived in the summer months, but too late in the season to commence their farming operations in the new country. Because of this, the newcomers were usually distributed among the Ontario Mennonite homes. Large numbers were quartered in Waterloo, 'The Twenty,' and in Markham. In this way opportunity was afforded the newcomers to become partly acquainted with Canadian conditions. It also enabled them to add a little to their capital with which they were about to set up their homes in the western prairie. Contacts were made during this temporary residence in Ontario that were both pleasant and helpful on both sides and lasted for many years." However, these people all went on to Manitoba, none remaining in Ontario. Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.) of Kitchener rendered great aid to the settlement in Manitoba. Ontario Mennonites raised a large loan for them and furnished the guarantee for a Canadian government loan ($400,000).

After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 many more Mennonites were desirous of emigrating. The first group who came to Canada in 1922 went directly to the West. The next year a larger group came and about 800 remained in Ontario, some for only a short time; others made their homes here, settling in the Niagara peninsula and in Essex County in the extreme southwestern corner of the province. Some also settled in Waterloo County and others established a colony in Northern Ontario and named it "Reesor" in appreciation of the help rendered them by Thomas Reesor, Markham, who, with S. F. Coffman of Vineland, met these immigrants in Quebec and assisted them greatly. After the second World War (1948-52) many refugees who fled Russia with the retreating German armies were assisted by their relatives and friends in Ontario, and found new homes in the fair province. Most of them have become integrated into existing Russian Mennonite communities. The same is true of the smaller number who came from Paraguay 1950-57. The Ontario Russian Mennonites are in two groups: the Mennonite Brethren, with a total membership of 1,687 in six congregations, and the United Mennonite Church (Canadian District of General Conference) with ten congregations and 2,841 members (1957).

There are also several smaller groups of Mennonites in the province. The Reformed Mennonites have members at several points in Ontario. Their total membership is about 150 in four regular places of meeting. The Hutterian Brethren, whose history parallels that of the Mennonites, also have one "new" colony in the province located near Bright, with a membership of 50, composed largely of Hungarians.

Differences and divisions have lessened the effectiveness of the Mennonite testimony. However, each group has made progress and at the present time there seems to be a greater unity of purpose and more willingness to co-operate with one another than in the past. The main body (Mennonite Conference, MC) has increased numerically, at the present time number 3,840, distributed among 34 congregations. The total membership of all branches of Mennonites in Ontario was 13,333.

The following institutions were operated by the Mennonites in Ontario in 1957: Schools—Ontario Mennonite Bible School and Institute at Kitchener (MC, founded in 1907), Rockway Mennonite School (MC, founded in 1945), Eden High School of Virgil (MB, founded in 1945), Mennonite Brethren Bible School at Kitchener (founded in 1943 at Virgil, moved to Kitchener in 1955), United Mennonite Educational Institute at Leamington (GCM, founded in 1946), Emmanuel Bible College at Kitchener (UMC-MBC, founded in 1940); Homes for the Aged—Fairview Mennonite Home at Preston (MC, 1943), United Mennonite Home for the Aged at Vineland (GCM, 1955); three rest homes for the aged operated by the Ontario Amish Mennonites: The Maples Rest Home at Tavistock (1952), Craigholm at Ailsa Craig (1953), Milverton Nursing Home at Milverton (1954); Ailsa Craig Boys Farm (1955) operated by the MCC; Mental Hospitals—Bethesda Mental Hospital at Vineland (MB, 1937).

Early Ontario Mennonite history has received literary treatment of good quality in two novels by Miss B. Mabel Dunham, the long-time librarian of the Kitchener Public Library: The Trail of the Conestoga (Toronto, 1924) and Toward Sodom (Toronto, 1927). (See Literature, ME III, 372.)

P.H.Bu.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935); A. Eby, Die Ansiedlung und Begründung der Mennoniten Gemeinschaft in Ontario (Milford Square, 1872); Jahrbuch der Ver. Menn.-Gemeinden in Ontario, 1954 ff.; Vereinigte Mennoniten Gemeinden in Ontario, 1956; B. Mabel Dunham, "Beginnings in Ontario," Menn. Life V (October 1950); Andrew R. Shelly, "Mennonites of Ontario Today," Menn. Life V (October 1950).

Ontario Amish Mennonite Conference is composed of the congregations of the A.M. settlement in Waterloo County, Ont., established in 1824 by immigrants from Alsace-Lorraine and Bavaria, and one small daughter settlement at Zurich, Ont. In 1957 the Conference had 12 congregations with 2,440 members, 7 bishops, 17 ministers, 6 deacons. Although occasional meetings of the ministers of the settlement had been held in the 19th century, these meetings were discontinued about the turn of the century. Attempts at revival in 1918 and 1923 finally resulted in 1925 in a full organization of an annual conference with a constitution adopted June 16, 1925. Not all the congregations in the settlement joined the Conference, the Old Order Amish congregation and the Nafziger and Lichti groups remaining outside. The Rules and Discipline of the Conference was adopted in 1926. A small schism was suffered in 1956 when a conservative group withdrew at Milverton under Bishop Valentine Nafziger.

The Conference-sponsored activities include: (1) the Winter Bible School under the administration of a Bible School Board appointed by the Conference (first session 1932); (2) the Mission Board (q.v.) organized in 1946, which operates three rest homes and three city missions. A Sunday-school conference has been held annually since 1922. The Amish Mennonite Storm and Fire Aid Union has long been operated (since 1865) for the benefit of conference members in co-operation with the other Amish groups in the district.

The Conference has not yet become a member of the Mennonite General Conference (MC), although it is eligible. However, it supports generously all the general activities of the Mennonite Church (MC) including the general boards and institutions, and it elects a member on the General Council of the Mennonite General Conference. The Conference does not elect delegates to the General Conference, although a number of its ministers usually attend its sessions. Proposals have at times been made for a merger with the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference, but while good relations obtain between the two, there is at present no serious trend in this direction. O.G.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (n.p., 1935); C. Gascho and J. R. Bender, Bericht der Verhandlungen einer Diener Versammlung der Amischen Mennoniten Gemeinde (1923).

Ontario Amish Mennonite Mission Board, the home mission agency of the Ontario A.M. Conference (q.v.), was organized in 1946. It operates three city missions: the Good Will Rescue Mission in the city of London, Ont., called King Street (1951), the Wellesley Gospel Mission (1953) in Wellesley, Ont., and the Stratford Mission (1952) in Stratford, Ont. It also operates three homes for the aged: Maples Rest Home at Tavistock (1952), Craigholm at Ailsa Craig (1953), Milverton Nursing Home at Milverton (1954). It publishes a joint organ with the Ontario Mennonite Mission Board, the Ontario Mennonite Evangel (q.v.). H.S.B.

Ontario Conference of Mennonite Brethren Churches. In 1924 a small group of immigrants, members of the Mennonite Brethren and Evangelical Mennonite groups from Molotschna, South Russia, arrived in Waterloo, Ont. They settled in six communities, Kitchener, Hespeler, New Hamburg-Essex County, Port Rowan, and Vineland. On May 24, 1925, these two closely connected faiths amalgamated under the name "Molotschna Mennonite Brethren Church." J. P. Friesen, J. W. Reimer, and J. P. Wiens were instrumental in bringing about this union. Only baptism by immersion was practiced, but other forms of baptism were accepted for transfer members, provided the candidate in question had experienced regeneration.

At first all major transactions of the five affiliated congregations were carried out in Kitchener, even to the extent of having a large annual business session at that church. This arrangement continued until Jan. 31, 1932, when five of these churches united to form a conference, which was registered on July 8, 1932, with the Provincial Government in Toronto as "The Ontario Conference of Mennonite Brethren Churches." These churches, now autonomous, were as follows: Kitchener 144, Leamington (formerly Essex County) 50, New Hamburg 37, Hespeler 29, and Vineland 27, making a total membership of 287.

The conference showed steady growth and Port Rowan with 33 members was admitted in 1933, Niagara with 48 in 1937, and St. Catharines with 65 members in 1943. In 1952, because of the diminishing size of Hespeler and New Hamburg congregations, and their proximity to Kitchener, they were dissolved, and the members were accepted into the Kitchener church.

The need of belonging to a greater organization was recognized, and on Oct. 25, 1939, the Conference was accepted as a member of the General Conference of Mennonite Brethren Churches of North America as the Ontario District Conference. On June 29, 1946, a change of status took place when the Conference joined the Northern District Conference to form the Canadian Conference of Mennonite Brethren Churches.

The Conference has enjoyed the moderatorship of H. H. Janzen 1932-46, I. H. Tiessen 1946-54, and I. T. Ewert. In August 1955 the Conference noted the following memberships: Kitchener 393, Leamington 181, Port Rowan 123, St. Catharines 399, Vineland 264, and Virgil (formerly Niagara) 483, making a total of 1,843 members. These churches are all located in Southern Ontario not more than 235 miles apart. Since the aims of the Ontario Conference are chiefly directed toward missions, permanent mission stations have been established at Coldwater and Stoney Creek, and a daily vacation Bible school program is actively supported. Services in all six churches are conducted primarily in German, and mission Sunday schools are operated from each center for the benefit of English-speaking children in the surrounding districts.

The Conference sponsors numerous annual conventions, although it convenes semiannually for regular business.

In 1944-47 the Conference owned and operated the Bethesda Home for the Mentally Ill. The institution grew beyond the scope of a small conference; therefore in 1947 the Canadian Conference assumed the responsibility for the project. In 1947 the Conference undertook to administer and finance the Eden Bible and High School at Niagara-on-the-Lake. This school was divided in 1955 and the Bible school moved to Kitchener, while the high school continued at Niagara as Eden Christian College.

J.A.Ku.

Ontario Hebrew Mission (MC) is an organized work under the Ontario Mennonite Conference, established in 1954, directed by J. Ross Goodall, with headquarters in Downsview, Ont., near Toronto. It operates Camp Sholom, a Jewish Mission Camp for family groups, located at Kearney, Ont.

H.S.B.

Ontario Mennonite Bible School and Institute (MC), located in Kitchener, Ont., is an outgrowth of the Bible conference movement. The first extended Bible study class was conducted in 1907 for one week by S. F. Coffman and L. J. Burkholder, with an attendance of 50-60. The Ontario Conference in 1909 appointed the Bible Study Board to have charge of these classes. The Bible Study Class (later called Bible School) has met annually with the exception of one year, with sessions at first of one or two weeks and later of four weeks or more. In 1918 a course of study was arranged covering the entire Bible, and training in Sunday-school and Christian work extending over a period of six years, and requiring an annual session of six weeks. Attendance and interest in the work were increased by this more regular form of study. In 1929 the course was rearranged to increase the class periods to twelve weeks and shorten the cycle of study to three years. Every year since that time a number of students have finished this course. In 1929 an annex was built to the Kitchener Mennonite Church for the Bible school. Previously the classes had been conducted in the church or in rented quarters in the city. The school is still conducted in the further remodeled First Mennonite Church of Kitchener.

Before 1951 an advanced course was offered to Bible school graduates and others which led the Bible School Board to recommend to Conference the launching of the Ontario Mennonite Bible Institute. It was the conviction of church leaders that there was a need for a Bible course shorter than the regular college Bible course, but more thorough than the Bible school could offer in three months, to meet the need of mature young people who could not attend college. The first session of the Institute was held in 1951-52 for five months, two months before Christmas and three months following.

The teachers who have served or are serving are S. F. Coffman, L. J. Burkholder, Oscar Burkholder, C. F. Derstine, J. B. Martin, Merle Shantz, J. F. Garber, R. S. Koch, Mrs. Arlin Snyder, Osiah Horst, H. S. Bauman, Paul Martin, Arnold Cressman, and Newton Gingrich. Principals in succession were S. F. Coffman for 40 years (1907-47), Oscar Burkholder for 7 years (1948-55), Roy S. Koch 1955-57, and J. B. Martin 1957-. The Ontario Bible School and Institute is well known in Western Ontario and the border states. Its activities, such as tract distribution, singing, and church programs, have been well received for years. The highest enrollment was 226 (1939). The 1957 enrollment of the Ontario Mennonite Bible School (OMBS) was 68; that of the Ontario Mennonite Bible Institute (OMBI) 38, making a total of 106.

O.B.

Ontario Mennonite Brethren in Christ (since 1948 called United Missionary Church). One of the most important sections of the M.B.C.-U.M.C. has been the Ontario Conference, which was in effect in the beginning a separate movement though closely related to the Indiana movement led by Daniel Brenneman. Its real founder was Solomon Eby (1834-1931), a Mennonite (MC) minister ordained at Port Elgin in 1858, who had an unusual spiritual awakening in 1869 which he called his conversion. He immediately began prayer meetings and the promotion of "conversion" among his members with great success. Since his bold advocacy of the new piety and insistence upon the type of conversion experience which he held essential was unacceptable to the Ontario Mennonite Conference, of which he was a member, he was excommunicated (May 1874), followed by the Waterloo County ministers John Bear, Samuel Schlichter, Daniel Wismer, and Moses Erb (the last two soon returned to their former loyalty) and Waterloo deacons William Hembling and Joseph S. Schneider. In the Markham district ministers Abraham Raymer and John Steckley, who had been introducing a similar prayer meeting and revivalistic emphasis and were probably by the 1860's completely outside the Mennonite Church (MC), joined forces with Eby. Daniel Hoch (1806-78) at Vineland, who had been working in the same direction since c1843 and was in difficulty with the old church and who was affiliated with the Oberholtzer group (GCM) 1851-69, together with three small congregations in Ontario (Markham, Vineland, Waterloo), seems to have been drawn into the new Eby movement together with his following.

On May 15, 1874, Eby called a conference to meet in the Kitchener church (MC), which may be considered the actual origin of M.B.C. church in Canada. Daniel Brenneman, who had visited Eby in 1873, was expelled from the Indiana Mennonite Conference in 1874 also, followed by a substantial group of members; they were called New Mennonites. In 1875 the Eby and Brenneman groups formally united at a meeting held in the Snyder Mennonite meetinghouse near Bloomingdale, Ont. (the only congregation that went over completely with meetinghouse to the Eby group, except Port Elgin), on March 23, 1875, calling themselves United Mennonites. The organization formed in May 1874 had been called "Reformed Mennonites." It had two districts, Ontario and Indiana. The Ontario District had its first meeting at Port Elgin on Sept. 18, 1874.

The Dordrecht Confession of Faith was specifically adopted as the doctrinal platform of the group although it did not of course include the specific doctrinal emphases which caused the division. The new body was immediately organized into two conferences—Canada and the United States, with Eby as Presiding Elder for Canada and Brenneman for the United States. In 1879 a merger of the United Mennonites with the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v., Gehman group) of Pennsylvania resulted in the Evangelical United Mennonite Church, which in 1883 became the Mennonite Brethren in Christ when the small Swank faction of the Brethren in Christ (River Brethren) in Ohio joined the E.U.M.

Throughout the years of growth and merger described above the Ontario Conference remained the largest. In 1880 the conference had nine congregations and 19 ministers, with a total of 37 preaching places. By 1955, however, Ontario with 2,471 members in 35 congregations was the second in size in the denomination, having been passed by the Indiana Conference with 2,694.

The proportion of members who left the old conference in Ontario to join the "New" Mennonites is not clear, but possibly at least a third. It was a serious blow to the Mennonite Church (MC) in Ontario. L. J. Burkholder, the historian of the conference (MC), says, "At least four able ministers and three deacons were lost to us. A much larger number of promising young men who became active ministers of the new branch might well have been used had they remained. A great many devoted families were carried away," among whom was the noted Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.).

The Ontario M.B.C. Conference showed great spiritual vitality and evangelistic zeal. Much work was carried on in the older Mennonite settlements, and during the 1880's congregations were established at the following places: Berlin (Kitchener), Blair, Bethel, Bright, Breslau, Bloomingdale, Conestoga, Wallace or Maryboro, Port Elgin, Jordan (Twenty), Sherston, Markham, Scott, Stayner, and Puslinch, largely at the expense of the old church. Among the chief leaders were Solomon Eby, Noah Detwiler, John Bear, Menno Bowman, Amos Eby, Joseph Raymer, John McNally, H. S. Hallman, Henry Goudie, Samuel Goudie, C. N. Good, Ward Shantz, P. G. Lehman, and Michael Houck. In 1908 a group of over 100 left to join the Pentecostal movement, among them the leading ministers Solomon Eby and Amos Eby.

Berlin (Kitchener) has always been the center of the conference; its Bethany congregation is the largest (1957, 320 members). In 1885 the denominational printing plant was moved from Goshen, Ind., to Berlin, and with it the church paper, the Gospel Banner, where it remained until 1909. In 1940 Emanuel Bible College was established in Kitchener as the Bible Institute of the Ontario district.

H.S.B.

J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, Ohio, 1920); L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (n.p., 1935); Conference Journal, Proceedings of the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church (MBC); E. R. Storms, History of the United Missionary Church (Elkhart, 1957).

Ontario Mennonite Conference (MC), formerly known as the Canada Conference, was organized about 1820 soon after the settlements of Mennonites began in the three main areas of Ontario (York, Waterloo, Niagara). It included the congregations in western New York and in eastern Michigan as these were organized. The records of 1831 show that the gatherings were held annually in October. "Die grosse Zusammenkunft" followed a three-year cycle in the areas mentioned. From about 1840 the conference was held on the last Friday of May. In 1889 this became the occasion of dispute and contributed to a division into two conferences, the Old Order (Wisler) Conference and the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference.

In the earlier years the conference session was a gathering of bishops, ministers, and deacons. It was the practice to hold communion at the place of conference on the Sunday following, with provision for public gatherings on contiguous days. These conferences were concerned with encouraging order in the churches, temperate living, restraint from forms of worldliness, and godliness in conduct and witness. Council meetings known as semiannual conferences were arranged in each of the three districts. In 1847 the conference authorized the holding of prayer meetings with the caution that the spirit of love and good-will be evident. During the present century two days have been devoted annually to the church conference. Bishop district meetings for counsel on matters of local interest and autumn ministers' inspirational sessions have in the last decade taken the place of semiannual conferences. By 1954 the conference session had become a three-day period. Questions to be considered in open session are arranged in a private session preceding. The year's work of the executive committee is reported for ratification. Since 1949 lay delegates have been included in the conference membership. A conference charter was adopted in 1909. In 1951 the conference was incorporated and now can hold the properties in connection with its institutions. The Finance Committee consists of the treasurers of the various organizations. The deacons of the conference compose the Welfare Board. They meet twice a year and aim to equalize the burdens of the congregations for all major needs, a fund is perpetuated by annual congregational offerings. Child Welfare work is a part of this organization. The Braeside Home Association consists of representatives from all organized churches of the conference and is responsible for the care of the aged. The Association operates through an executive committee of three and a management committee of seven, who meet monthly. Crowded conditions by 1955 led to the erection of an enlarged new building. The outreach of the Conference is made the responsibility of the Mennonite Mission Board of Ontario, organized in 1929. Her teaching program has advanced through the Sunday schools and their conference, established in 1890; through the Ontario Mennonite Bible School since 1907, and through young people's Bible meetings and summer Bible schools of later date.

A major schism affecting the unity of the Conference was experienced as early as 1847, when Bishop Jacob Gross of the Twenty (Vineland) and a number of adherents withdrew to join the Evangelical Association. It was at this time also that Daniel Hoch of the same congregation separated with some following to help form the Ohio-Canada West Conference of Mennonites. This movement caused loss in some twelve congregations of the Conference. Another movement in 1872-74 led to the organization of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ group. The division of 1889 gave rise to the branch known as the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites of Ontario. In 1924 differences within the First Mennonite Church of Kitchener led to the organization of the Stirling Avenue Mennonite Church, which later joined the General Conference Mennonites.

The bishops who served before the division of 1889 were, in the Waterloo area, Benjamin Eby (ord. 1812), Henry Shantz (1842), Joseph Hagey (1851), Abraham Martin (1867), Amos Cressman (1875), Elias Weber (1879), and Daniel Wismer (1887); in the Markham area, Abraham Grove (1808), Jacob Grove (1837), and Christian Reesor (1867); in the Niagara area, Jacob Moyer (1805), Jacob Gross (1834), Jacob Krehbiel (1839), Dilman Moyer (1850), John Lapp (1862), and Christian Gayman (1875). The present conference body consists also of 47 ministers, 30 deacons, and 42 lay delegates.

The membership of the 42 churches in 1957 totaled 3,928. J.C.F.

Ontario Mennonite Evangel, a 6 x 9 in. 12-page monthly, the joint organ of the Ontario Mennonite and Ontario Amish Mennonite mission boards, published at Kitchener, Ont., beginning November 1956, editor Merle Shantz. The paper was preceded by Church and Mission News (q.v.), the organ of the above Ontario Mennonite Mission Board 1940-56, and before that by the Mission News Bulletin 1936-39. Merle Shantz was editor from January 1945, preceded by Oscar Burkholder who served from the beginning. H.S.B.

Ontdekte veinzing der hedendaeghsche Gheestdrijvers en Socinianen, I and II (n.p., n.d., Amsterdam, 1655), are two pamphlets written against Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) during the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v.) among the Dutch Mennonites. The author (s) hide their identity under Latin pseudonyms; one of them was probably Salomon van Alderwerelt. (H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz, Haarlem, 1954, pp. 54, 201 f.) vdZ.

Ooltgensplaat, a village in the Dutch province of South Holland on the island Overflakkee, where there was once a Mennonite congregation in conjunction with near-by Bommel. The Mennonites of Ooltgensplaat had some difficulty in 1622 in performing their marriages, which had hitherto been done according to their old customs. By 1676 the congregation had died out (see Bommel). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 298 f.; DB 1899, 183; 1908, 114; ML III, 305.) vdZ.

Oom Jacob Dirksz: see Dirksz, Jacob.

Oortman, a Mennonite family, formerly living at Utrecht (q.v.), Netherlands, where they were found from the 17th century, while other members of this family are found at Leiden, Amsterdam, and other places. Many members of this family served as deacons (eleven at Utrecht during the period 1699-1909). Andries Oortman, who obtained his medical degree at the University of Utrecht in 1735 and soon after became city physician of Utrecht, was a deacon of the Utrecht Mennonite congregation, as was his son Andries Oortman, Jr., also a physician. Andries Oortman, Jr., was one of the four members of the Utrecht congregation, who in 1765 gave a pipe organ for the Utrecht church; this was the first organ in any Mennonite church. He also promoted and led the building of a new church in Utrecht, which was dedicated in 1773. Jan Oortman, d. 1887, bequeathed 100,000 Dutch guilders to the A.D.S. (General Mennonite Conference). Johannes Oortman of Utrecht was a minister of the Waterlander congregation at Alkmaar 1734-37. Thereafter he served at Gouda 1737-39 and at Rotterdam from 1739 until his early death in 1741. vdZ.

H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d. 1926); Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1794; Verslag (report) of the A.D.S., 1888, 5; 1891, 23.

Oortwijn, a Dutch Mennonite family name; members of this family, many of them having served as deacons, are found in a number of North Holland congregations, e.g., Oostand West-Graftdijk, De Rijp, and Zaandam. vñZ.

Oostburg, a town (pop. 2,313) in the Dutch province of Zeeland (formerly Flanders), between Aardenburg and Groede, where Anabaptist refugees from Flanders were active in 1624 and 1635, giving alms and establishing several new places of meeting. (DB 1883, 101-3; 1889, 102; ML III, 305.) E.C.

Oosten, Jan, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hans Marijnsz.

Oostende (Ostende), a seacoast town in West Flanders, Belgium, was a Mennonite center; there may have been a congregation here in the 16th century; there is, however, no information about it. Claes Leks (q.v.) and Lucas de Groot (q.v.), both natives of Oostende, were executed there as martyrs in 1548 and 1568. (ML III, 14.) vñZ.

Oosterbaan, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland. According to tradition its ancestors, Claes Aryaens and his wife, both Mennonites, residents of Flanders, fled from Brugge, Belgium, to Harlingen because of persecution about 1575. In Harlingen their son Arjen Clasen (d. 1623), a deacon of the Flemish congregation, lived as a merchant. He was married first to Geertie Everts (d. 1614), then to Antie Ijsbrands (d. 1655). His descendants too were usually merchants, many of them also serving the church as deacons. The family name of Oosterbaan does not appear before the end of the 17th century. By marriage they were related to other well-known Harlingen Mennonite families such as Roorda, Dreyer, Hanekuyk, Styl, and Stinstra. A member of this family was Heere Oosterbaan (q.v.), a Mennonite minister and professor in the Amsterdam Theological Seminary, as well as the following Mennonite pastors: Jacob Everts Oosterbaan, who served 1819-24 at Woudsend, 1824-29 at Den IJp, and 1829-39 at Workum, in which year he retired. Jacob Oosterbaan, d. 1872, serving at Pieterzij 1860-66 and Midwolda 1866-72. Johannes Arnoldus Oosterbaan (b. 1837 at Harlingen, d. 1901 at Makkum) was pastor of Mensingeweer 1863-66, Giethoorn-Zuid 1866-76, Staveren-Molkwerum 1876-78, and Makkum 1878-1901. His son Pieter Oosterbaan (b. 1873 at Giethoorn, d. 1941 at Hilversum, married to J. Leverland) served at Sint Anna-Parochie 1898-1901, Uithuizen 1901-7, and Huizen-Hilversum 1907-38, in which year he retired. Johannes Arnoldus Oosterbaan, son of the former (b. 1910 at Hilversum, LL.D. 1934, and Th.D. 1953, married to R. C. Lugt), has been a pastor at Broek op Langendijk 1938-40, Barsingerhorn 1940-51, and Haarlem 1951-54. In 1954 he was appointed professor at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and in the same year also at the University of Amsterdam as professor of philosophy of religion and ethics. vñZ.

Oosterbaan, Heere, a Dutch Mennonite theologian, b. Jan. 3, 1736, at Harlingen, d. there Sept. 18, 1807, the son of the merchant Evert Oosterbaan and Grietje Simons Stinstra. As a consequence of scarlet fever he was deaf from his eighth year; but this did not prevent him from becoming a distinguished preacher. Taught at first by his uncles Johannes and Gooitgen Stinstra (respectively preacher and physician), he attended the Latin school and the Athenaeum at Franeker, obtaining his Ph.D. degree in 1757; then he studied under Professor Tjerk Nieuwenhuis (q.v.) at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. In January 1760 he became the preacher of the Mennonite church in Makkum (q.v.). In 1761 he was appointed to succeed Nieuwenhuis as professor in the seminary. After the death of Klaas de Vries (1766) he also gave instruction in the natural sciences at the seminary. In 1786 he resigned his professorship and followed his uncle Johannes Stinstra as preacher at the Harlingen congregation, serving until his death in 1807. He was repeatedly one of the delegates of the Friesche Sociëteit (Mennonite Conference of Friesland) and chairman in 1788. His influence in Harlingen and his fatherly attitude in a quarrel in the congregation concerning the management of the "twelve men" is described by Pieter Cool (DB 1880, 11-38). He was the author of the missive sent by the Friesche Sociëteit to the Mennonites of Russia at the request of Trapp, the plenipotentiary of Catherine II (printed in Blaupot t. C., Friesland). In 1795 he was elected by the popular representation of Friesland to the committee on drafting a constitution. When the Dictionnaire antique Encyclopédique (Paris, 1769) published an erroneous article on the Mennonites, he managed to have a better one produced. He wrote the Epistola de Mennonitis in the Bibl. Hagana IV, 133-50 (Amsterdam, 1769); and also Leerreden ter aanprijzing van het Instituut tot onderwijzing van dooven en stommen (Harlingen, 1792); Ontwerp van eenige schikkingen raakende den openbaren godsdienst (1792). His lectures (Latin) held at the Seminary, titled Systema theologicum (five volumes), are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. Pastor Freerk Hockstra, his student and from 1792 his colleague in Harlingen, preached his funeral sermon, Lijkrede op H. Oosterbaan (Amsterdam, 1807). In 1760 Oosterbaan was married to Aagjen D. Hanekuyk of Harlingen. K.V.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 228, 230, 236 f.; idem, Holland II, 102; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd II (Amsterdam, 1866) 289-92; Naamlijst 1808, 78 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 680; DJ 1850, 113-21; DB 1880, 1-41 passim; N.N.B.Wb. II, 1211; ML III, 305.

Oosterend, a village name: see Burg and Texel; also Vlieland.

Oosterhout, a village in the Dutch province of North Brabant. The Mennonites living here joined with those of Geertruidenberg and Breda (q.v.) in the 17th century to form the congregation of Brabant. Jan Jansz van de Langerijt and Augustijn Gerritsz Hulstmans as delegates of this congregation in 1664 signed the "Oprecht Verbondt van Eenigheydt" (q.v.), which brought about the union of the conservative Mennonites in the Netherlands, later called the Zonsche Sociëteit (Zonist Conference). Of the Mennonites of Oosterhout there is no further information. The congregation of Brabant apparently had died out before 1700. vñZ.

Oosterveer in Friesland: see Witveen.

Oosters and Oosters gekleurd ("Eastern" dialect and language with an "eastern" coloring) are two forms of language found in the works of Menno Simons (q.v.) and other Anabaptist leaders who migrated from the Netherlands eastward into the German provinces. Menno Simons wrote his Foundation Book (q.v.) immediately after his withdrawal from the Catholic church when he was living in the province of Groningen and possibly also East Friesland. His native language at home in Witmarsum had been Frisian and the literary Dutch. The language of the earliest writings in his new environment is referred to as "Oosters gekleurd" (having an "eastern" coloring). This implies that the language east of the Netherlands was considered by the Dutch as having been colored by eastern influences. Later on, after 1550, when Menno Simons settled in Presenbourg (q.v.), Schleswig-Holstein, his adjustment to the German environment was even more complete and the writings which were published at this time by his own press are referred to as in "Oosters." Toward the end of his life and after his death, pure Dutch editions of his writings were prepared and published in 1562 and later. They were particularly designed for distribution in the Netherlands.

C.K.

G. E. Frerichs, "Menno's tal," DB (1905) 72-111; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 272, 296.

Oosterwij(c)k (Oosterwyk), Matthijs, d. Dec. 8, 1729, at Leiden, Holland, was a preacher of the Leiden Waterlander Mennonite congregation (serving before 1682), and an elder from 1694. After this congregation had merged with the Flemish congregation he served the united congregation until his death. He was an untrained minister. In 1682 the Waterlander church board of Leiden decided that Oosterwijk should learn some Latin, which was thought necessary for his education, the costs of which were to be paid by the congregation. Matthijs Oosterwijk also preached and baptized at The Hague (q.v.), e.g., in 1711. He represented the Leiden congregation (e.g., in 1710) in the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs. His son François Oosterwijk served the Leiden congregation as a deacon a number of times. vdZ.

L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van ... de Doopsgesinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) passim; DB 1895, 55; 1908, 100; 1918, 53 f.; ML III, 306.

Oosterwij(c)k, van, a former Dutch Mennonite family found in a number of towns in Holland. Most of its members were merchants; some were bankers. Willem van Oosterwijk was a deacon in the Mennonite congregation at Utrecht in 1651-56 and 1661-63. In Amsterdam members of the van Oosterwijk family were found in both the Lamist and Zonist congregations, a number of them serving as deacons. A lateral branch of this family was the well-to-do van Oosterwijk Bruyn family, which is descended from Jan Bruyn and Georgina Josina van Oosterhout, who lived at Amsterdam in the 18th century; Willem van Oosterwijk Hulshoff (see Hulshoff) also belonged to this family. vdZ.

Oosterwolde, a village in the southeastern part of the Dutch province of Friesland, where a Mennonite circle was organized on May 24, 1949, which now (1957) has a membership of 20. This group belongs to the congregation of Gorredijk (q.v.), whose pastor holds monthly services at Oosterwolde. vdZ.

Oost-Graftdijk: see Graftdijk.

Oosthuizen, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. After the Beemster polder had been reclaimed (1608-12), most members of the Oosthuizen congregation, being farmers, gradually settled on this polder; thus a new meetinghouse was built in Midden-Beemster in 1785. Thereupon in 1787 the old meetinghouse at Oosthuizen was sold. The congregation was then known as Beemster and Oosthuizen. Now it is called Beemster (q.v.). vdZ.

Oostzaan, near Zaandam (q.v.), in the Dutch province of North Holland, was for a few years the seat of a Mennonite circle organized in 1946, which belonged to the Zaandam congregation. From the earliest times Anabaptist-Mennonites lived at Oostzaan; Anabaptist activity here is mentioned as early as 1534. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 125.) vdZ.

Oost-Zaandam, a name formerly given to the congregation of Zaandam-Oostzijde (q.v.), i.e., the part of Zaandam situated on the east side of the Zaan River in the province of North Holland. vdZ.

Ootsa Lake, a village in central British Columbia. In 1940 Old Colony Mennonites from Mexico and from other parts of Canada moved to this vicinity. The settlement is extremely isolated. In 1949 John W. Martens was the bishop in charge. J.A.HAR.

Oostzee-Collecte (Baltic Sea Collection) was a collection of money raised in the Dutch Mennonite congregations for the relief of a number of West Prussian Mennonite congregations, particularly Rosenort (q.v.), Markushof (q.v.), Thiensdorf (q.v.), and Elbing-Ellerwald (q.v.), severely struck by floods on March 17-25, 1888. vdZ.

Opal Union Mennonite Church, now extinct, located in Fauquier County, about 15 miles south of Warrenton, Va. Henry L. Rhodes of Augusta County moved to Fauquier in the late 1880's and asked the Virginia Conference (MC) to send ministers to serve his family and evangelize the community. Other Mennonite and Amish families located here. Land was purchased for the Opal Union Church in September 1892. In 1900 E. J. Berkey, a son-in-law of Henry L. Rhodes, was ordained to serve this church. H.A.B.

Opalinski, Kasimir Johann (d. 1693), Bishop of Culm, Poland (West Prussia from 1772 to 1918), the scion of an old Polish family which was named for the town of Opalencia near Posen. His father was Voivode of Kalisch. He entered a monastery at an early age. His first opportunity to demonstrate his zeal was in driving all the heretics from the estates of the Cistercian monastery at Blesen, of which he was abbot. In 1681 he was appointed Bishop of Culm. To the Mennonites of the Culm (q.v.) Marsh, who were needed to drain the land, he issued a document of protection on June 27, 1689, promising the toleration of their religion. H.WI.

Diecezja Chelminska (Pelplin, 1928); Niesiecki, Herbarz Polski VII, 113 (Leipzig, 1841); Orgelbrand, Encyklopedia Powszechna II, 99 (Warsaw, 1901); ML III, 306.

Open Bible Mennonite Brethren Church, Wichita, Kan., began in connection with the weekly child evangelism Bible classes for children conducted in some of the public schools and homes of Wichita in 1946 under the sponsorship of the Board of Home Missions of the M.B. Southern District Conference and the Wichita M.B. Church. The Supreme Court ruling of 1948 changed the work more to home and release-time classes. In 1957 the Conference discontinued this work as its project. The work was then continued under the support of several M.B. churches of the area. The Open Bible M.B. Church is an outgrowth of the child evangelism classes in the Orienta section of Wichita. In 1957 the membership was 26, with Paul Klierer as pastor. O.Ha.

Opening, a colloquial expression used in many Mennonite (MC) and Amish congregations in America for the introductory part of a regular Sunday morning worship service, usually called in German "Einleitung" but sometimes "Eröffnung." It included the reading of a portion of Scripture with comments, sometimes brief, sometimes longer, followed by the call to prayer, a prayer which was formerly always kneeling and silent and still is among the Lancaster Conference Mennonites and certain other eastern congregations and the Old Order Amish. The choice of the minister to "make the opening" is made by the assembled ministry in the ministers' anteroom of the meetinghouse, who then after prayer proceed in a body to the bench behind the pulpit. The Amish ministers gather in an upper room to make this decision. H.S.B.

Ophoorn (Ophoren), Hans (Johan, Jan), a Mennonite elder: see Jan van Ophoorn.

Oppelsbohm, a town in the Winnenden district of Württemberg, Germany. The magistrate at Backnang in 1562 presented to Christoph, Duke of Württemberg, a written report of the oral information he had received from the pastor of Oppelsbohm concerning the Anabaptist Lienhardt: Lienhardt had never come to church nor to communion, had stated that all church ordinances are of the devil, had been four or five years with the Anabaptists in Moravia, and had been in prison as a deceiver several times. His wife was a member of the church and had the children baptized. According to the "Anabaptist Calender" of 1570 the ducal chancellor had admonished Margarethe, the wife of the Anabaptist Feierabend of Oppelsbohm, who had left the country. Adam Epplin of the Oppelsbohm parish was to be locked up and admonished. His daughter had promised obedience before the pastor. Franz Feierabend, though banished from the country, let himself be seen in Oppelsbohm without fear, was therefore to be seized. Feierabend's wife would go to church but not to communion, felt unworthy because she could not keep the Ten Commandments, was to pay three shillings for every sermon she had missed, denied the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the communion emblems. In 1574 Hans Hieber charged his wife Maria with Anabaptism.

The pertinent dean had "refuted her." She would come to church and communion, and would then be watched. In 1575 Franz Feierabend's wife attended church because of the fine, but not to communion, was unteachable. In 1576 her exiled husband slipped into the village again, was seen by the pastor. In 1577 Leonhard Payer and Görg Feurlin had not communed for four years. The latter gave as his reason the hostility of one of the villagers. He was the chosen representative of the community, but was unable to forgive. Margarethe Feierabend had rudely declared to the dean that she would come to communion only under compulsion, "walked out of the room defiantly, said she wanted to be left alone." She also rejected infant baptism. The shoemaker Caspar Mack had not been to communion for three years and declared to the parson that on Sunday he had to deliver shoes and went to church elsewhere. In 1582 Hans Feierabend, Sylvester Siglin, Görg Feurlin, who had not taken communion for six years, offered as excuses their unworthiness, quarrels, and anger, promised to reform, were thereupon watched, and did better in 1583. In 1584 Bartle (Bartholomäus) Weiss had again communed after a lapse of thirty years and had recanted. Marginal note of the church inspector, "Deo Gratias!" In 1586 Margaretha, the wife of the Anabaptist Görg Kurtz, according to her own confession, rarely went to church, and had for ten years not gone to communion; the reason was her husband's exile. For she could not pardon those who had helped to drive away her husband. Besides, she knew of much frivolous living which was not punished, but her pious husband was nowhere tolerated; he was being treated unjustly. To the dean who had spoken to her the fourth time about baptism and communion she refused to answer. The inspector recommended diligent attendance at church and communion, or she would be sent after her husband! In 1587 she took communion.

In 1609 Philip Pfeil, who had gone to the Anabaptists for a year but had returned, could not be found. The dean ordered that he was to be sent to the office if he was seen. In 1611 Konrad Faut, the Swiss Anabaptist, kept all other commands and prohibitions, but neither went to the sermons nor to communion, led no one astray, but persisted in his opinion in spite of all instruction. The 70-year-old man was to be threatened with prison and if he died unrepentant he would be buried without a sermon or church bells. In 1614 Maria, Jakob Faut's wife, was under suspicion of being an Anabaptist, seldom went to church, had not taken communion for three years, had presumably been confused by her father, an Anabaptist. After admonition by the parson she declared that she would avoid sermon and communion. Thereupon she was summoned to the consistory in Stuttgart as a stiff-necked Anabaptist. She was ordered into a women's prison and was there asked pastoral questions. "She answered that she was not misled by any one, but had been instructed by her father. What he believed she believed too. Where her brethren met she did not know and would not betray any one. Judas' betrayal of Christ did him no good." She had five small children, had not been rebaptized, had also had her children baptized. She acknowledged that she was a great sinner. He who does the right is saved. Of a justifying faith she would know nothing. Obedience is due the government. Upon payment of the costs she was released and put in chains at home. Konrad Fauust, still "obstinate" in 1615, offered a public recantation in 1617 and went to church and to communion. Maria was still obstinate in 1618, was to be brought to church by the beadle, and if she died impenitent, should be buried without song or bells. TA Württemberg; ML III, 306.) E.T.

Oprecht Verbondt van Eenigheydt (1664): see Verbondt van Eenigheydt.

Opwekkende Liederen: see Liederen en Gezangen.

Oraibi (Ariz.) Mennonite Mission (GCM) was established among the Hopi Indians in northern Oklahoma in 1893. H. R. Voth was the first missionary. Others serving in the formative period of the mission were J. B. Epp and J. B. Frey. Later the work was expanded to include the two villages of Hotevilla (q.v.), 7 miles west of Oraibi, and Moen Copi (Tuba City), 45 miles west of Hotevilla. By 1929 the membership of the Hopi missions had reached 32 and by 1935 the number was 42. In 1957 12 missionaries were serving in the three stations, 8 of whom were at Oraibi. M.G.

Orange (Oranje), the royal house ruling in the Netherlands. The following members of the house of Orange had previously been stadholders of Holland and Zeeland in the Netherlands: William I 1572-84, Maurice 1584-1625, Frederick Henry 1625-47, William II 1647-50, and William III 1672-1702, while a side branch of the house of Orange ruled in Friesland. William IV 1747-51 and William V 1766-95 were stadholders of all the Netherlands provinces. All of them, but particularly William I (q.v.), Maurice (q.v.), and William III (q.v.), were favorable to the Mennonites. voZ.

Oranjeappel, De (The Orange), is the name of a Dutch orphanage, founded in Amsterdam in 1675. The founders were Collegiants (q.v.), most of them being at the same time members of the Mennonite Lamist congregation at Amsterdam. The first governors of the orphanage, Anthony Rooleeuw (q.v.), Willem Bruin, Adriaan Pieters Dekker, Gerrit Jacobsz Derramout, and Pieter Rijndertsz, were all Mennonites, except Derramout. Until 1920 the orphanage was located on the Keizersgracht in Amsterdam; in this year a building was acquired at the De Lairesestraat. In 19— the orphanage was moved to Hilversum.

Until the end of the 18th century the orphanage was purely Collegiant, but in 1811 an agreement was made between the governors of the Oranjeappel and the deacons of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation. Henceforth, the foundation of the Oranjeappel remaining independent, two of the four governors were to be nominated by the Amsterdam Mennonite church board, and all governors were to be members of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation. After this agreement was made the Mennonite orphanage of Amsterdam was closed and its 17 orphans were taken into the Oranjeappel. voZ.

A. Loosjes, Het weeshuis der Collegianten, "De Oranjeappel" 1675-1925 (n.p., n.d., -1925).

Oranjewoud, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where a Mennonite circle was organized on Jan. 23, 1951. The group, with about 50 members, belongs to the Bovenknijpe (q.v.) congregation. Services are regularly held in a rented hall, and catechetical instruction is given by the pastor of Bovenknijpe. There is also a ladies' circle. voZ.

Orchard Park K.M.B. Church, located in Hutchinson, Kan., was begun in 1954. In 1957 it had 31 members, with Edwin F. Walter as pastor. H.S.B.

Order of Service: see Worship.

Ordinances. A term used in nonliturgical churches to designate what is referred to in liturgical churches as "sacraments." There is considerable difference in meaning between these two terms. A sacrament is defined by Thomas Aquinas as a "sign of a sacred thing in so far as it sanctifies man." Augustine referred to it as "the visible form of an invisible grace." "The sign" and the "visible form" became more and more significant and a prerequisite for the appropriation of the "invisible grace." The 16th-century Reformers broke with the medieval concept, although the term "sacrament" was retained in the liturgical Protestant churches; only two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, were retained. In the Anglican and Lutheran churches a reinterpreted Catholic tradition was retained, while the Reformed, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, and other churches altered the meaning completely, giving usually only a symbolic meaning.

None of the other nonliturgical churches of the Reformation broke as radically with the tradition as did the Anabaptists and Spiritualists. The latter were forerunners in a way of the Quakers, who spiritualized the ordinances completely. But the Biblical Anabaptists retained baptism and the Lord's Supper, and in Holland footwashing, as ordinances of the Lord. The term "ordinance" emphasizes the aspect of institution by Christ and the symbolic meaning. For this reason the use of the term "sacraments" by Mennonites is misleading. Nevertheless, it is being used at times particularly by ministers who have received training in non-Mennonite institutions of liturgical leanings, and was also used at times by the early Anabaptists (see Sacraments).

Bernt Rothmann in his Restitution stated that the Antichrist had through "his witchcraft" made an idol of baptism. Menno Simons agreed with this statement (Krahn, 131 ff.). Constantly he fought the concept of magical implications and power in baptism and emphasized that only an "inward baptism" can save. After the spiritual baptism of regeneration has taken place, water baptism as a sign of obedience follows. If salvation lay in the outward form, God would have made water, not the blood of Christ, necessary for forgiveness of sin. God has not elevated the elements of water, bread, and wine above other elements but uses them merely as symbols of His forgiving grace.

We use them to demonstrate our obedience and faith. Menno Simons warns, however, against the spiritualization of the ordinances to the point where they become obsolete as was the case among the Spiritualists, e.g., Sebastian Franck and to some extent Hans Denk. Since baptism and the Lord's Supper are symbolic and not absolute conveyors of God's grace, little significance is attached to their precise form. For the early Anabaptists the questions whether baptism should be administered by pouring, sprinkling, or immersion and whether in the Lord's Supper wine or unfermented juice should be used could never have led to controversy.

Dirk Philips spoke of the ordinances as witnesses of the love of God and the deeds of Jesus Christ. However, both he and Menno Simons were very cautious in avoiding the words "signs of grace" for the Lord's Supper and baptism, because they feared that outward forms would again take the place of the atoning death of Christ. The power of the ordinances is not in the sign or symbol but in what these two stand for (Hoekstra, 277).

In addition to the two generally accepted ordinances, most Dutch Anabaptists (not Swiss) and Mennonites, and the Amish as well as the Mennonite Church (MC) and related groups, have practiced and retained footwashing (q.v.) as another ordinance, performed either before or after the Lord's Supper. Menno did not emphasize the ordinance character of footwashing as strongly as that of baptism and the Lord's Supper; it was for him a symbol of unselfish love, hospitality toward the brethren, and humility.

Within the Mennonite churches of later centuries the forms of the ordinances gained in significance and at times obscured their deeper meaning. Controversies about the form of baptism arose because the outward sign had become more important than God's gift and its inward experience. (See also Baptism.)

In the Mennonite Church (MC) in the 20th century, largely through the influence of the writings of Daniel Kauffman (q.v.), the idea of seven ordinances arose and has become quite common, though not fixed in any confession of faith or conference disciplines. The seven are listed as baptism, communion, footwashing, prayer veiling for women, anointing with oil, the kiss of charity, and marriage. But J. C. Wenger's Introduction to Theology (1954), a widely accepted and influential book, returns to the concept of only two full ordinances, baptism and communion. (See Communion, Baptism, Footwashing, Prayer Veiling, Kiss, Anointing, and Sacraments.) C.K.

S. Hoekstra, Bz, Beginnelsen en leer der oude Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1863) 276; Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (1494-1561) (Karlsruhe, 1936) 129; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 115; S. F. Ruess, Aufrichtige Nachrichten von dem gegenwärtigen Zustande der Mennoniten (Jéna, 1743) 50; Daniel Kauffman, ed., Doctrines of the Bible (Scottsdale, 1928); idem, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottsdale, 1937).

Ordinances, Hutterite: see Gemeindeordnungen.

Ordination of ministers is an act of the church in which the minister-elect (or bishop or deacon) receives confirmation to his office by a ceremony of laying on of the hands of a bishop (elder) and the intercession of the congregation, which gives him the right to lead the congregation in worship and life as pastor, to perform the duties of his office, whatever they may be, to preach the Word of God, to perform marriages, to ordain, to administer baptism and communion, to administer discipline, to administer the alms fund, etc.

Originally and until well into the 19th or even 20th century the Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition everywhere called for an ordination for each level in the ministry, bishop-elder, preacher, or deacon. Hence it was possible for one man to be ordained three times. In Holland formal ordination to all ministerial offices including that of deacon was usual in the 16th and early 17th centuries, and among the Groningen (q.v.) Old Flemish, until c1760, and in a few small conservative groups until the end of the 18th century. But as early as about 1610 the Waterlanders (q.v.) had abolished the laying on of hands for deacons, and by 1665 also for preachers and deacons. But that time the Lamists (q.v.) had also abolished the ordination of deacons. In the 19th century all formal ordination in Holland was discontinued. Since then pastors have been instituted by another minister, usually an older one or a friend. It is customary to ask only whether the new minister will promise to serve the church faithfully. The promise is followed by a prayer. Since c1940 a kind of formal ordination of pastors with laying on of hands has occasionally been reintroduced. In some Mennonite groups in America deacons are no longer ordained. Recently the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference has decided to have only one ordination with charges to the several offices as they are assumed and as may be necessary.

Normally women are eligible for ordination only among the Dutch Mennonites. However, some Mennonite groups in effect give ordination to women missionaries, and the consecration of deaconesses is akin to ordination.

Ordination normally confers a lifetime status. In the older practice, and still in the more conservative group, ministers removed from office for causes such as heresy, or gross sin, or insubordination, or even for lesser causes, were not considered to have lost their ordination, but to have been "silenced," i.e., no longer allowed to preach, and could be restored to office without reordination. Normally also ministers have been accepted on transfer from other Mennonite bodies or from non-Mennonite denominations without reordination. However, when the Kleine Gemeinde elder in Manitoba, Peter Toews, transferred to the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, in 1882 he and the three ministers who went with him were required to be reordained (also rebaptized). (See Ministry, and Ministry, Call to the.) H.S.B.

Ordnungsbrieife (Church Disciplines). The strict Biblicism of the Mennonites logically led to a strict exercise of discipline. In private and family life the fathers sought to regulate matters in such a way as to maintain, to the highest degree possible, the "pure church." For the purpose of formulating their church regulations the elders and preachers of the congregations in Alsace-Lorraine and South Germany met in conference a number of times. (See Strasbourg Conferences and Essingen.) A record was kept of these meetings and the resolutions passed were announced to the brotherhood as Ordnungsbrieife, understood as the norm to be followed as conscientiously as possible. They dealt mostly with matters of congregational life, ministerial service, and church discipline, but reached into the private life of the members. These Ordnungsbrieife were never published but were handed down by the elders in writing. Copies of most of them have been preserved in GCL.

The list of known Ordnungsbrieife follows:

(1) Abrede und Verordnung der Diener und Aeltesten in der Versammlung zu Strassburg, im Jahr Anno 1568 und 1607 (with appendix and supplement of Obersülzen and Offstein in 1688). (See Strasbourg Conferences.)

(2) Ordnungsbrief of April 28, 1752, at Steinselz. (See Alsace.)

(3) Ordnungsbrief of May 1, 1759, at Essingen near Landau in the Palatinate. This is a supplement to the Steinselz Ordnungsbrief. By way of introduction it says, "Today May 1, 1759, we the undersigned have been together at Essingen in order to see how we agree in faith and other opinions, because in the conference at Steinselz on April 19, 1752, we agreed on certain points and have found them offensive to the brotherhood."

(4) Ordnungsbrief of Nov. 21, 1779, at Essingen. (See Alsace.) This Ordnungsbrief (and the previous one of 1759) is printed in full in Gesch.-Bl. III (1938) 52-55. The document has the title, Abrede der Diener und Aeltesten aus vielen Orten und Ländern in der Versammlung zu Essingen bei Landau, den 21. Wintermonat 1779 Jahres. The sixteen articles of this discipline borrow much from the Strasbourg discipline of 1568. It is in part a repetition of these articles, though in a different order. An addition is the reference to the confession of faith contained in the Martyrs' Mirror, and also Article six, which says, "The preachers and elders shall faithfully perform the service laid upon them by the Lord and His church, not in pride or haughtiness, but in lowliness and humility, according to the content of the holy Gospel and shall introduce nothing new or unusual, that they may not be moved aside from the simplicity in Christ."

Also the prescriptions concerning costume and coiffure, from Article 13 on, are not found in the Strasbourg discipline. Responsible preachers and elders were especially admonished in the final article, "to be more careful in preaching and admonition, in baptism and communion in Christian order according to the content of the Gospel." Thirty-nine preachers from 19 congregations signed the document. The Swiss congregations were not represented in these Essingen conferences, but held rather closely to these decisions, including the regulations on dress, etc., until the end of the 19th century. The Ibersheim (Rheinhausen) Conference (q.v.) of 1803 had much the same character for the Mennonites of the Palatinate as did the Essingen Conference of 1779 for the Amish.

The European conferences to establish similar regulations (Ordnungen) were essentially continued by the Amish in the United States, and the resolutions passed were treated as the Ordnungsbrieife had been though not so called. The Amish conferences of 1809 (held in Lancaster County, Pa.), 1837 (Somerset County, Pa.), and 1865 (Holmes County, Ohio), minutes of all of which have been preserved (in GCL), are illustrations. The resolutions are almost identical in form and concern with the earlier Ordnungsbrieife, though oriented to the problems of the 19th century in America. To some extent the Mennonite (MC) conferences of the 18th and 19th centuries were essentially the same; their concerns were more in the line of church discipline than theology or church activity. The 20th century broadened the concerns of the conferences when new life and progress came in.

All the Ordnungsbrieife and later conference resolutions were conceived basically as guides for the elders to follow in their administration of the congregations and maintenance of the faith and practice handed down from the past. Though not formally binding they had great weight and contributed much to stability, uniformity, unity, and somewhat to rigidity in the congregations.

The Offenthal (q.v.) Amish Conference of 1867, by its decision to relax or even discard the older Ordnung, was a symbol of the disintegration of the Amish congregations in Hesse and the adjoining territory.

S.G.

Paul Schowalter, "Die Essinger Konferenzen 1759 und 1779," Gesch.-Bl. III (1938) 49-55; H. S. Bender, "Discipline Adopted by the Strasbourg Conference of 1568," MQR I (January 1927) 57-66; idem, "An Amish Church Discipline of 1779," MQR XI (1937) 163-68; idem, "Some Early American Amish Mennonite Disciplines," MQR VIII (1934) 90-98; ML III, 308.

Ordnungsgemein (Ortnungsgmee in Pennsylvania German), the Old Order Amish term for the "counsel meeting" (q.v.) held preliminary to holding the communion service, when all matters of discipline needing attention were dealt with and the congregation brought into accord with the "Ordnung" or regulations of the church. H.S.B.

Oregon, a state in the United States since 1859, area 96,350 sq. miles, pop. 1,521,341 (1950). West of the Cascade Range, where all the Mennonites are located, the climate is mild and moist. Except for the mission churches (MC) in Portland, Grants Pass, Roseburg, and Blaine, all the Mennonite congregations are located in a strip 40 x 60 miles extending north and south, largely in the Willamette Valley, with Salem, the capital of the state, at the center. Nine tenths of the 3,804 baptized Mennonites in the state live within 30 miles of Salem. Half of them are farmers raising grain, vegetables, and fruit. A few are engaged in lumbering in the foothills of the Cascades, while many are engaged in business and industry.

The first and largest group in Oregon is the Mennonite Church (MC) with 17 congregations and 1,860 members. The first congregation of this group, now extinct, was Eugene, established in 1887. The other old congregations are Zion (1893) with 286 members, near Hubbard; Fairview (1894) with 401, near Albany; Hopewell (1899) with 56, near Hubbard; Albany City (1909) with 227; Bethel (1912) with 54, near Canby; and Sheridan (1923) with 302, near Sheridan. Since 1938 10 smaller congregations have been established, partly as missions, and the Portland Mission, established 1922, has become a substantial congregation with 94 members. Following are the ten congregations: Sweet Home (1938) with 120 members; Porter (1939), near Estacada, with 20; Blaine (1940) with 29; East Fairview (1948), near Lebanon, with 29; Western (1948), in Salem, with 78; Tangent (1950) with 55; Grants Pass (1954) with 27; Winston (1955), at Roseburg, with 18; Lebanon (1957) with 32; and Logsdon (1957) at Nashville. The Firdale congregation near Airlie existed 1914-24. The church also has 8 additional missions in the state including a rescue mission and a Jewish Mission in Portland. The M.C. group has established three institutions: Western Mennonite School (1945) near Salem, Mennonite Home for the Aged (1946) at Albany, and Lebanon Community Hospital, operated since 1948 (but not owned) by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities.

The second Mennonite group to come into Oregon were the General Conference Mennonites, who established the Emmanuel Church near Pratum in 1890, now with 239 members; Grace Church at Dallas, which now has 343 members, was in 1932 essentially composed of members who withdrew from the M.C. in the area. Grace Church at Albany, established in 1931, now has 70 members. The remaining three smaller congregations are Calvary at Barlow (1944), with 121 members; Community Chapel at Sweet Home, with 62; and Alberta Community in Portland, with 74. The G.C.M. total in Oregon was 909 in 1957.

The Old Order Amish settlement established in 1895 at McMinville has remained small; in 1957 it had only 28 members. The other two Amish congregations in the state are classified as Beachy Amish: Harrisburg (1911), with 96 members, a Sleeping Preacher (q.v.) group congregation, and Pleasant Valley at Yoncalla, with 23 members.

The Mennonite Brethren established a congregation at Dallas in 1906, which in 1957 had 319 members. A daughter congregation, the Kingwood Bible Church, was established in Salem in 1940, which had 188 members in 1957. The large Evangelical Mennonite Brethren congregation in Dallas, with 368 members, had its first pastor in 1912, although E.M.B. members had moved into the area by 1890. The Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, very recently (1956?) established a small congregation at Scio, called Evergreen, with 13 members in 1957. The Cloverdale congregation near Creswell, established in 1945, died out in 1957.

The Salem Deaconess Home and Hospital (q.v.) was established in 1917 under the auspices of the G.C.M., E.M.B., and M.B. congregations in the area, but in 1949 it was transformed into a community hospital called Salem Memorial Hospital.

Salem Academy (q.v.) grew out of a Bible school established in 1945, as an inter-Mennonite school representing G.C.M., E.M.B., and M.B. congregations following intergroup Bible study classes conducted from 1930 on. H.S.B.

Orenburg Mennonite Settlement. The province of Orenburg, now Chkalov region, its capital having the same name, is located on the Ural River in Eastern European Soviet Russia. The region has an area of 47,787 square miles and a population of 1,677,013 (after World War II). The city of Orenburg (Chkalov), established in 1735, is located on the railroad from Samara (Kuibyshev) to Tashkent; its population was 172,925 after World War II. The population of the province consists of Russians, Bashkirs, Tatars, and many minority groups including Germans. The capital of Orenburg is a significant trading center between Asiatic and European Russia.

Beginning of the Settlement. In 1892-93 the Mennonites of the Chortitza (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in the Ukraine sent a commission to the Deyev, landowning Russians, in the province of Orenburg, who had offered some land for sale. Since the commission made the visit during the winter they did not even see the land, which was located some 35-45 miles from the railroad station and about 50 miles from the city of Orenburg. The price per acre was 9 rubles. The land purchased amounted to 67,500 acres, to which 2,700 acres were added later. The purchase was made by the Chortitza Mennonite volost (administration) and the land was distributed among the landless Mennonites of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement. Each farmer was to have not less than 110 acres and was to be exempt from payment on the land and taxes for two years. One of the Chortitza villages gave each of its families 200 rubles additional aid. The first settlers were already organized into five villages before leaving. They left on four trains from the station of Alexandrovsk (q.v.; now Zaporozhie).

The Orenburg settlement is located on the Tchuran, Uran, and Gusicha rivers. At least 25 villages were established. Karl Fast reports that there were 28 before World War II. In 1894-97 Chortitza, Petrovka, Kantserovka, Kamenka, Deyevka, Nikolayevka, Romanovka, and Feodorovka were established. Starting in 1900 the following additional villages were established: Pretoria, Suvorovka, Dolinovka, Rodnichnoye, Dobrovka, and Kitchkas. All these founded by settlers were from the Chortitza settlement.

Starting in 1895 the Molotschna Mennonite settlement established the following villages adjacent to the Chortitza Mennonite villages: Kubanka, Klubnikovo, Stepanovka, Aliessovo, Karaguy, Kameshevoye, Chernozeroye, Zelenoye. Additional villages were Zabangul, Lyubimovka, and Pogoroye.

The Orenburg settlement never received an "official" name. Sometimes it was known as the Deyevka Mennonite settlement and sometimes the Orenburg Mennonite settlement. After 1917 the settlement was known as Uran Volost.

The first years of the settlement were very difficult. Many of the settlers returned to their mother

Orenburg Mennonite Settlement, Russia

According to P. J. Dyck, Orenburg am Ural settlements. Their reports did not raise the reputation of the new settlement. Poverty, long winters, poor soil, remote markets, theft by the surrounding nomadic population, and other factors made the beginning extremely difficult. Crop failures were frequent, but the mother settlement was unable or unwilling to make the necessary loans to give the settlement a good start. The cycle of crop failures was as follows: 1901, 1906, 1911, 1916, 1921. The worst of all was 1906, when the mother and sister settlements helped by collecting food, clothing, and money for the settlers. Feed for the livestock had to be bought in the vicinity.

In 1907-8 many of the Orenburg Mennonite settlers joined the Mennonites from the Ukraine in establishing the Slavgorod (q.v.) and Pavlodar (q.v.) settlements in Siberia. Some of the land of those who left the Orenburg settlement was distributed among those who remained.

Gradually the economic life of the settlement became more normal. A number of minor industries were established. About five mills powered by wind and water were operated to grind the necessary flour. One of the better-known water-powered mills was operated by Jacob A. Eckert. The necessary food oil was produced in the mill operated by Johann J. Löwen. In the carpenter and smith shops the necessary furniture and tools were made and repaired. Implement and machinery stores were operated by Jacob Bergen of Klubnikovo and others. Other business enterprises were set up in the villages of Pretoria, Klubnikovo, Dobrovka, and Deyevka. After the Revolution co-operative stores were introduced.

Administration, Education, Health. The administration of the settlement was the traditional one. Each village had a Schulze (q.v.), and the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements each had an Oberschulze (q.v.) or Vorsteher. The Chortitza administration was responsible to the Bashkir volost (q.v.) in Akhmerovo, and the Molotschna villages to the Russian Abramov volost. At first the position of the Oberschulze was somewhat unique. He was not only a servant to the villages, but also to the mother settlement in the Ukraine, whose interests he had to represent since the settlement was sponsored by the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements. Later the Orenburg settlement became more independent. Among the officeholders of the Chortitza villages at Orenburg were Dietrich Lepp, Joseph Friesen, David Froese, Anton Günther, and Isaak Penner. In 1913 under Isaak Penner the Chortitza villages received title of land ownership and thus became independent of the Chortitza settlement. The officeholders of the Molotschna villages were Bernhard Matthies 1895-99, Abram Fast 1899-1907, and Johann Spent 1907-17.

After the Revolution the 25 Mennonite villages were organized into an independent volost with its seat in the village of Kitchkas. H. H. Löwen became the secretary and Jacob W. Pries the Oberschulze. The volost was subdivided into smaller districts.

During and after the Russian Revolution of 1917 the settlement underwent the same changes as other communities. In the immediate vicinity of the settlement the Bashkir and Kirghiz republics were created, the boundary between the two cutting across the Mennonite settlement. Both republics claimed the Mennonite settlement within their boundaries. The controversy between them was settled when the Bashkirs occupied the Mennonite settlement and took it over. The Mennonites were constantly open to exploitation under this arrangement until they were transferred to the Kirghiz Republic. Later developments have been the same as in the rest of Russia.

Other public activities of the settlement were the customary fire insurance, with separate divisions for the Chortitza and Molotschna villages, as well as the Waisenamt (q.v.; i.e., orphanage office). Medical care was primitive in the early days. The usual midwives and bonesetters (Knochenarzt) took care of the basic needs. Among the midwives were Mrs. Jacob Giesbrecht and Mrs. Cornelius Kehler. Johann Braun, who settled in Orenburg in 1902, had some training and experience in the care for the sick and became known as "Dr. Braun." He did much to relieve suffering in the settlements. For a while he was assisted by Dr. Michel from St. Petersburg. After Braun's death in 1911 a Pole by the name of Yunovitch practiced medicine until the outbreak of World War I (1914). In 1922 Dr. Rudolph A. Klassen, under the sponsorship of American Mennonite Relief, served the community until he emigrated to Canada. He was succeeded by Dr. Lassmann. In 1925 the Soviet government opened a hospital in the Mennonite village of Rodnichnoye with Dr. Shostakov in charge.

The settlers established an elementary school in each village. Some of the teachers, e.g., Isaak G. Krahn, David H. Löwen, and Johann B. Mathies, had received a normal teacher's training. The annual salary of a teacher in the early days was 350-650 rubles. Some of the young boys went to the mother settlements for secondary school training. In 1919 twelve of the elementary schools had two rooms.

In 1907 a Zentralschule (q.v.) was established at Pretoria, a secondary school which helped to raise the educational and cultural level of the settlement. One of the outstanding leaders of the school board was P. P. Dyck. Among the teachers of this school were R. A. Riesen, Franz, F. Lehn, Dietrich J. Gossen, P. P. Sawatzky, Fr. F. Froese, P. P. Dyck, D. H. Loewen, D. H. Koslowsky, and F. F. Klassen. In 1918 and 1920 respectively the settlement established additional secondary schools in Deyevka and Klubnikovo. By 1925-26 all the schools were taken over by the Soviet government and administered according to the Marxian philosophy, which is vividly described by Karl Fast.

In 1923 a Bible school was established in Orenburg by an organization of 61 members. Isaak J. Töws was the chairman, Peter Paethkau secretary, and Gerhard Braun treasurer. Jakob Rogalsky was the first teacher and the instruction was given in the home of G. Derksen in Karaguy. During the second year the school had 47 pupils and Jakob Rempel and Peter Koehn were added as teachers. The instruction was given in the home of David Rempel of Kantserovka. During the third year (1925-26) 67 pupils attended the school and the instruction was given in the Mennonite Brethren church of Kamenka. The pupils came from various other settlements besides Orenburg. The government closed the school in 1927.

World War I and After. During World War I many of the men were drafted for forestry service (q.v.) and hospital work. In many instances the women had to do the work in the home as well as on the farm. In 1915 some six thousand German nationals were interned in the Mennonite and surrounding villages. The novel Das sibirische Tor by Hans Harder deals at length with this incident. After the war most of them returned to Germany. Only a few Mennonite girls married German nationals and went along to Germany.

During and after the Revolution the Orenburg Mennonites suffered severely, although not as much as some of the Mennonites of the Ukraine. Requisitions of property, grain, horses, etc., were common. In 1921 the settlement experienced a crop failure and starvation set in. In some of the surrounding villages a large percentage of the population perished. The Mennonites organized a relief committee to collect food for distribution among the starving. An attempt was made to take clothing to Siberia in return for food, but it failed. Some help came in 1921 when the American Mennonite Relief reached Orenburg. D. R. Höppner reached Orenburg in March 1922 and supervised the distribution of relief until August 1924. Some fifteen carloads of food supplies were distributed, not only among Mennonites. In addition to this much was done to improve health conditions among the settlers. American clothing was distributed in 1923-24. American Mennonite Relief also established a tractor service to boost agriculture. Thus the crisis of 1921-22 was gradually overcome.

A great problem for the settlement during the Revolution and the years of civil war was the attacks made by the surrounding nomadic population. Some of the young Mennonites organized a Selbstschutz (q.v.) to defend their lives and property, although this action was officially condemned by the churches.

In the early days of the Soviets the Mennonites of Orenburg were permitted to do alternative service, supported by the settlement. In 1920-22 they worked on a large near-by estate. Later exemption from military service became impossible.

After the Revolution, during the NEP period, the Orenburg Mennonite settlement revived its economic and religious life (as is recorded in the pages of Unser Blatt and Der Praktische Landwirt). The results of the crop failures of 1921-22 and the following years were gradually overcome. In 1925 a co-operative was founded to raise the quality of the seed and livestock of the settlement. The co-operatives, which proved to be a success, established tractor stations, dairying, etc. From January 1 to September 1, 36 tons of cheese were produced. Great progress was made in agriculture as well as in the cultural and religious activities of the communities. The total population of the Orenburg Mennonite settlement was 5,767 on Feb. 1, 1926. In 1913 the congregations were centered in Deyevka (since 1899) with 1,103 members and 1,615 minor children, in Klubnikovka with 594 souls, and in Karaguy with 286 souls. The last two belonged to the Mennonite Brethren.

During the NEP period the elders of the Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren Church, Heinrich Rempel and Kornelius Vehr, died and were succeeded by Isaak Krahn and David Janz. The relationship between the two churches improved. One writer states, "As never before the children of God are striving toward unity." Bible studies and song festivals were jointly conducted. Plans were under way to construct one large church for use by both groups. Soon the great change came and religious activities were suppressed and survived only in the hearts of individual believers. Rigid collectivization set in.

Some 300 persons migrated to Canada in 1926 under the leadership of Peter P. Dyck. On Sept. 9, 1926, the group left Orenburg in nine freight cars, arrived at Moscow on Sept. 15, and at Riga on Sept. 18, and proceeded to Canada.

When the NEP period came to a close in 1928-29 and the new collectivization program was inaugurated many regretted that they had not left Russia. Among the thousands of refugees reaching Moscow in the fall of 1929 there were many from Orenburg. Most of them, however, were returned; some reached Paraguay and Brazil. Many of those remaining in Russia were exiled. Walter Quiring lists nineteen leading settlers, teachers, and ministers who were exiled at this time.

When the German army invaded Russia, the Orenburg settlement, unlike most of the other Mennonite settlements of European Russia, was not evacuated. This, however, did not mean that the settlement did not suffer. The exploitation of the settlers during the dark years of the Revolution continued. Again in 1951 the region of the Orenburg settlement experienced a drought. All religious services were forbidden. In 1951 a letter says, "Religious funeral services cannot be conducted but we are permitted to sing. Nothing is offered to the children" (by way of spiritual life) (Menn. Rundschau, July 30, 1952, p. 5, 16).

Conditions changed considerably in 1955. Reports reached relatives in America about conversions, religious revivals, and worship services. Not only did the surviving ministers start to preach, but also many of the converted but unordained young men began to conduct meetings and preach. Worship services and Bible study are conducted in the homes and barns of the various villages. It even became permissible to teach some German in the elementary schools. Baptismal services are held. One report states that 98 persons from eight villages were baptized at one time in the village of Petrovka. Numerous ministers were ordained. The writers are enthusiastic about the privilege of worshiping again.

A letter published in Der Bote (Jan. 4, 1956, p. 7) reports that a group met regularly for worship services and that the congregation was growing. Abram Dyck is the leading minister. Another letter published in the Rundschau (Feb. 1, 1956, p. 6) reports that a group met regularly for worship in the home of Heinrich Unruh at Kubanka and that David Günter was the minister. Thus far seemingly none of the former meetinghouses have been reopened for worship services. In Romanovka the former schoolhouse became a clubhouse and the church was converted into a schoolhouse.

The economic life has changed and improved considerably since World War II. All farming is done on a collective basis. One of the letters of 1955 reports that women do not need to work outdoors during the winter. An old couple by the name of Peter Braun is supported by the collective. A letter published in Der Bote (Oct. 12, 1956, p. 8) states that three men have married Russian women, that they have enough food and clothing, and that they had just received electric lights and radios. The correspondence shows that the young men are drafted into the Russian army. There are no indications that this is not taken for granted. C.K.

Peter P. Dyck, Orenburg am Ural (Yarrow, 1951); Hans Harder, Das sibirische Tor (Stuttgart, 1938); Karl Fast, Gebt der Wahrheit die Ehre (North Kildonan, 1950); J. Rempel, Der Sowjet Hölle entronnen (Kassel, 1935); P. C. Hiebert and Orie O. Miller, Feeding the Hungry (Scottsdale, 1929) 353 ff.; Adolf Ehrh, Das Mennonitentum in Russland (Berlin, 1932); Der Bote (Rosthern), Feb. 10, April 7, May 12, 1954; Aug. 17, Sept. 21, Oct. 12, 1955; Jan. 4, Jan. 11, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, April 25, May 2, 1956; Jan. 23, 1957; Menn. Rundschau (Winnipeg), June 9, 1948; Jan. 18, 1950; April 18, 1951; Feb. 6, July 30, Aug. 6, 1952; April 14, May 12, Aug. 4, Sept. 15, Sept. 29, Oct. 15, 1954; April 15, April 27, May 18, June 22, July 27, Aug. 10, Aug. 17, Aug. 24, Oct. 12, Nov. 23, Dec. 7, 1955; Feb. 1, March 7, April 11, April 18, May 30, July 18, Aug. 8, Oct. 24, 1956; Jan. 9, Jan. 30, 1957; Unser Blatt I (1925) 44; II (1926) 23; III (1927) 91 and 146; Der Praktische Landwirt (Moscow, 1926) No. 1, p. 10 ff.; No. 10-11, p. 14; ML III, 308.

Oreville (Pa.) Mennonite Home: see Mennonite Home, Lancaster, Pa.

Organs: see Musical Instruments.

Orienta Mennonite Church: see Fairview (Okla.) Church of God.

Original Sin. In the New Testament the term "original sin" does not appear, although the basic idea of the doctrine is found in Paul's epistles, Rom. 5 and I Cor. 15. But it should be noted that Paul nowhere overemphasized this idea; he asserts that men, if reborn in Christ, "will die to sin." It was not until the days of Augustine (d. 430) that the idea became a central issue of Christian anthropology and soteriology. Augustine taught that man became completely corrupt by the fall of Adam; that is he can do no good whatever (denying any freedom of the will), hence has to rely wholly upon God's forgiving grace, which the believer received undeservedly through the atoning death of Christ. Augustine defended this thesis against Pelagius (a British monk), who denied the sinfulness of man and thus asserted that man can do good of his own volition.

The Reformation, both Lutheran and Calvinistic, renewed definitely the Augustinian position of total corruption (or depravity) and of man's inability to do any good, mainly in opposition to both the Catholic doctrine of "Semi-Pelagianism" and the teachings of the humanists, above all Erasmus, who taught that man has a completely free will to decide for or against the good.

The Anabaptists were for the most part outside of all these controversies. With few exceptions they read neither Augustine nor Luther nor Erasmus; therefore the issue of original sin was for them of significance only as they found themselves in religious debates or polemics where they had to defend their position against their Catholic and Protestant opponents. In the rather extensive doctrinal literature of the Anabaptists of the 16th century there are scarcely more than a dozen pages dealing with the issue of original sin; in fact, most doctrinal tracts of the Anabaptist brethren completely by-pass this idea or doctrine. John C. Wenger in his Doctrines of the Mennonites (1952) presents only one quotation from Menno Simons in his chapter on "Sin"; and Christian Neff in his article Erb-sünde in the Mennonitisches Lexikon says that the Anabaptists avoided the term "original sin" because it is not found in the Scriptures. Hans Denk declined outright to speak about original sin (with its implication of depravity of man) since he strongly felt that an urge for the good is present in every man. The man who could write the tract Concerning True Love naturally had little use for a lamentation concerning man's inability to love. In fact, even Pilgram Marpeck, one of the few Anabaptists who developed specific ideas in this area, also stressed what he calls the Gegenerb (counterinheritance), meaning the promise to mankind of the coming reconciliation of man through Christ and the message of brotherly love.

It is therefore fitting to ask how Protestantism and Anabaptism, both deriving their doctrines from the Bible, could develop their teachings in such divergent directions. The clue to this puzzle may be found in two arguments: (a) The Anabaptists believed in the freedom of the will, though to be sure not of the Pelagian type but rather in the sense that with the help of divine grace man may overcome evil tendencies in his character and obey the divine commandments. Without this freedom of the will discipleship, the heart of Anabaptism, loses its meaning. (b) The Anabaptists believed in and strongly emphasized spiritual rebirth (John 3:3), the transformation of "natural" man into "spiritual" man who now can see his new way, and likewise feels his power (received through a spiritual experience) to resist evil, sin, disobedience to God, pride, and selfishness, which formerly might have dominated his character. Of course, such newly gained strength is never a complete guarantee against possible backsliding (see below, Felbinger's Confession), and life remains a continuous struggle between the two natures of man.

On both points the Reformers took a different direction, remembering Paul's cry of desperation: "For I know that in me dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. 7:18, and similar words), but overlooking his assurance that the believer has actually died to sin. Thus the controversy developed between the Augustinian position on the one hand and the evangelical on the other: the awareness of one's basic corruption versus the divine call to discip-ship, something which the Reformers considered well-nigh impossible and indeed held to be a sort of pharisaical self-righteousness and pride.

To understand the Anabaptists' position one must consider their scattered utterances concerning man and his predicament. "One must discriminate between having sin and committing sin," said Claus Felbinger (q.v.) in 1560. Of course, as careful Bible readers the Anabaptists knew very well Paul's thesis that all mankind has inherited from its first parents some corruption, some evil tendencies, and an inclination toward disobedience to God, in short "sin." But this inheritance must under no condition be taken as an inescapable fate which cannot be mended. Hubmaier's booklet Concerning Free Will (1527) refers expressly to a passage by the prophet Ezekiel (18:4, and 20) that "the soul that sins shall die" (i.e., the soul may either sin or not die), and he quotes Ezekiel's dictum that "the son shall not bear the iniquities of the father nor shall the father bear the iniquities of the son." This reference to Ezekiel is particularly significant for Anabaptist thought because it removes the fatalistic character of "inherited" sin which became so oppressive in Protestant orthodoxy and so hopeless as to life's possibilities. Later Peter Riedemann (q.v.) used the same argument in his great Rechenschaft (q.v.) of 1540. The Handbüchlein wider den Prozess (see Bedenken) of 1558, which elaborates on this issue, repeats Riedemann's quotation from Ezekiel.

It is quite probable that the idea of original sin came into Anabaptist thought not so much through the Apostle Paul's writings (where the idea is by no means dominating), but rather through the apocryphal book known as "The Fourth Book of Ezra," which was a favorite of the Anabaptists. In chapters 3 and 7 of this volume, often quoted in Anabaptist and Mennonite tracts, the idea of original sin is elaborated upon and lamented. "O thou Adam, what hast thou done! For though it was thou that sinned, thou art not fallen alone but we all that come of thee" (IV Ezra 7:48). But inasmuch as the Anabaptist brotherhoods were gatherings of "reborn" souls who in accepting baptism upon faith had pledged themselves to walk the narrow path and to fight sin, and to help each other in this fight both by discipline and order, this recognition of man's fall did not at all lead to despair and an exclusive "sola fide" theology, as with the Reformers. "We should fear God," wrote Jakob Hutter (q.v.) in 1535, "and be careful concerning our inherent sin and inborn weakness, so that we do not allow that sin any longer to dominate in our mortal body, and also that we will no longer be obedient to sin and the devil and may not use our limbs any longer for sinning." This was the meaning of the pledge given at the time of the believer's baptism.

In dealing with the problem of original sin—mainly on the occasion of debates with authorities or when rejecting accusations—the Anabaptists appropriately distinguished between two separate problems: (a) the function of original sin in infants who do not yet know the distinction between good and evil, and (b) the role and working of original sin in the life of adults before and after conversion.

(a) The first problem deals of course also with infant baptism as considered necessary by the Catholic Church to save these infants from hell. On this point all Anabaptists were unanimous. Although sin, handed down through the generations through the Adamic nature, inescapably leads to temporal or physical death ("The wages of sin is death"—an oft-quoted verse in Anabaptist tracts) of both children and adults, it does not mean condemnation to eternal death or hell, since Christ has died for all mankind (no predestination!) and thus reconciled God and man. Thus He died also for the innocent children. In this regard they were sure of God's bountiful grace made efficacious through Christ's supreme sacrifice. Whether we read Riedemann or Marpeck or Menno Simons or the Hessian Confession of 1578, there is no difference on this point: infant baptism as a saving sacrament has no justification in evangelical faith. Indeed to claim that unbaptized children should be eternally lost was in their eyes a climax of blasphemy and an expression of lack of faith.

(b) Quite different is the understanding of the brethren concerning sin in adult life. They did not deny its presence or power in the body, the inclination or tendency toward evil (Neigung or Neiglichkeit), in a still stronger term also "temptation." It is helpful to remember that the Anabaptists shared the radical dualism of the writers of the New Testament, that is, the contraposition of the world of the devil and darkness and the world (or kingdom) of God and of light. Similarly they accepted the Pauline dualism of flesh and spirit, nature and supernature. "Through conversion," Pilgram Marpeck asserts, "man came from nature into supernature (aus der Natur in die Uebernatur) and became a spiritual being." Without such dualism the experience of true conversion and rebirth would completely lose its existential meaning. As soon as man enters the new "covenant of a good conscience with God" (I Peter 3:21), that is through baptism, he is determined to resist this inclination to sin, and will bring his flesh under the discipline (Zuchtrute) of the spirit. Only thus can he try to be obedient to God's commandments and be assured that it is possible "to be as pure as the newborn babes" (Ulrich Stadler, 1536, quoting I Peter 2:2).

This was the opinion of practically all Anabaptists and it appears that teachings of this kind must have developed in many places at a rather early date. Sebastian Franck's (q.v.) famous Chronica, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel of 1531 contains exactly these ideas as the gist of the Anabaptist position concerning original sin. In the section "Chronica der Römischen Ketzler" (Fol. 447) he says:

"Concerning original sin nearly all Anabaptists teach as follows: just as the righteousness (Gerechtigkeit) of Christ is of no avail to anyone unless he makes it a part of his own being through faith, so also Adam's sin (i.e., original sin) does not impair anybody except the one who makes it a part of his own being through faith, and likewise brings forth fruit of this sin. For, as foreign righteousness does not save anybody, so will foreign sin not condemn anybody either. [See below, the reference to Ezek. 18.]

"On the other hand, if Adam's sin condemns all men at once merely by its (inherent) nature, it necessarily follows that Christ's righteousness would save all men at once. But if Christ's righteousness saves only those believers who by faith have become transformed into Christ Himself, that is, who no longer live themselves but Christ lives in them, then it follows clearly that Adam's sin likewise condemns only nonbelievers who became Adam not by the mere fact of having been born but by their particular faith or rather unfaith, and by the fact that they bring forth fruit of this kind of faith; in other words, that they are rooted and planted in Him and He in them. That is how they speak of that matter."

On Fol. 446, he says, "Nearly all Anabaptists consider children to be of pure and innocent blood, and they consider original sin not a sin which of itself condemns both the children and the adults. They also claim that it does not make anyone unclean except the one who accepts this sin, makes it his own, brings forth fruits of it and is unwilling to part from it. For they claim foreign sin does not condemn anybody, and in this they refer to the 18th chapter of Ezekiel."

We shall now discuss in greater detail this concept of original sin as held by the southern Anabaptists, examining first several Hutterite doctrinal writings (1536-58) since they furnish relatively the richest yield, and shall then undertake a similar study in the writings of Pilgram Marpeck, the man whom Horst Quiring rightly claimed to have been one of the very few Anabaptist leaders to develop a real doctrine of original sin.

The earliest Hutterite documents on this point are Ulrich Stadler's two epistles of 1536 to the brethren in Crasnitz in Poland. In them he states categorically, "What does not derive from faith is sin." His first letter has clearly two parts: a gloomy one dealing with God's wrath and punishment, and a hopeful one showing that there is a way out. "The spirit in us that does not consent to sin has pleasure in the Law and agrees that it is good." And then he continues that the new man will certainly receive the strengthening help of Jesus Christ so that the spirit will rule in him and compel the flesh to become obedient to this spirit.

It is interesting to find exactly the same phrase in Peter Riedemann's Rechenschaft. Repentance brings about a real turning point, after which man begins to "bring his flesh into subjection." But of course this is by no means the entire story. As mentioned above, Riedemann affirms that no one may attain what is good unless he is born again. If Christ had not come into the world, there would be no more hope for life. But now, since He became the reconciliation for the whole world (Col. 1:20; I John 2:2), He has brought it about that original sin, "before it stirreth within man, leading to further sin, now causeth physical death only and not eternal, that the word might be fulfilled:

the children shall not bear the iniquities of the fathers but he who sinneth shall himself die. Ezek. 18."

Further, he who is genuinely sorry for his sin must henceforth guard himself against it and flee from it as from a serpent. Ecclesiasticus 21. Do not misinterpret, however, this Hutterite position as gloomy and puritanically stern. Right after this chapter concerning original sin, Riedemann deals joyously with the New Covenant and assures the reader with words taken from the Epistle to the Galatians: "This then is the covenant of childlike freedom of which we also are the children, if and when we submit and surrender ourselves to its working."

In 1558 a Hutterite brother, probably Peter Walpot, drew up a reply to Melancthon's (and other Lutheran theologians) pamphlet of 1557, called Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden, titled Handbüchlein wider den Prozess. In its seventh book or chapter, answer is given to Melancthon's claim that the Anabaptists teach that children have no original sin. In this tract three different connotations of the idea of original sin are presented, which is perhaps the most succinct exposition of the Anabaptist "theology of sin." (1) Adam fell and drew with him all posterity (IV Ezra 7:48), including infants. The result is temporal death for all, infants and adults. But Christ is the reconciliation of the whole world, hence children will gain God's eternal grace, to be sure without any merit on their part. (2) Other original sin is the sinful inclination of man in general which is found in all. However, if this inclination is not yielded to (nicht ins Werk gebracht wird), then it does not condemn or lead to eternal death. "There is . . . now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1). (3) "Inheritance" has no power over the one who believes in Christ (apparently he is thinking here of temptations and Anfechtungen). "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin" (I John 3:9). The Handbüchlein repeats once more the reference to Ezekiel, obviously borrowing from the Rechen-schaft.

In a more practical vein Claus Felbinger repeats the same ideas in his trial before Bavarian authorities at Landshut in 1560. As the child grows, his inclinations to sin will likewise become stronger. "Therefore one must teach them the fear of the Lord and keep them with the rod until they reach understanding." The adult finally, if he desires to enter into the bond of God and to spend his life in godliness, and if this desire is well proved, will be baptized upon confession of faith. But even the devout are never exempt from original sin, that is, the rising urge in the flesh, evil occurrences, and sinful thoughts. It will trouble and sadden them. Although we have died to sin (Rom. 6), original sin still remains with us; as long as man is in the flesh he must fight against it ceaselessly.

Pilgram Marpeck does not add much to the above "theology" except that his presentation is slightly more intellectual. According to Jan Kiwiet, Marpeck followed strongly the line of Hans Denk (a sort of mysticism of love), mainly in his anthropology. He taught that even after Adam's fall

God remained a gracious God and did not withdraw His breath from man. In other words, the "image of God" (also called "breath of God") remains with man and distinguishes him from the rest of creation. Man, created in God's image and capable of loving, therefore has the freedom of conscience to deliberately accept or reject God's commandments, that is, the freedom to either obey or disobey. Not the flesh, not procreation, not any natural process as such is sinful; rather sin must be understood as being rooted in "knowledge": Die Sünde steht im Wissen.

Man is born with a tendency toward evil (as we now know), which tendency can be observed even in a young child, but such a tendency may not yet be called "sin," as it has not become a conscious act of the will. Only conscious acts have the quality of obedience or disobedience, faith or sin, and it is only when we are sinning consciously and deliberately that this inborn tendency may be understood as "original sin." It is at the same time that man is called to repentance and conversion. Baptism upon faith is dying to sin, for it means that we have freely decided for Christ.

Original sin draws its inevitable consequences: a troublesome and sorrowful life, and eventually natural death. And it is universal. Marpeck emphasizes the power and inevitability of sin in man as he comes to the time of knowledge. Marpeck therefore rejects Schwenckfeld's charge that he is a Pelagian, and indeed as Bergsten says, his emphasis on the power and universality of sin "saves him from any Pelagian optimism in his concept of man." Marpeck however also holds the idea of the real image of God in man even after the Fall (which was also an idea in Hubmaier's writings). Whatever heritage we have received from Adam does not deprive us of our own final responsibility before God: "The old heart is of no avail, therefore God must give us a new heart." Marpeck like all the other Anabaptists refers expressly to Ezekiel 18 as his main locus against an overworked doctrine of original sin. In the Vermanung of 1542 we read: "Inasmuch as Ezekiel says that neither the child shall bear the iniquities of the father nor the father the iniquities of the child, who then will charge the unknowing children with sin?"

Horst Quiring, who analyzed Marpeck's anthropology for the first time, concluded from the fact that Marpeck speaks so seldom of man's sinfulness that there is a certain "optimism" in him with regard to his evaluation of man (somewhat like Hans Denk); in other words, Marpeck believes in man's basic capacity to overcome sin and to return to God as God's child. What characterizes Marpeck in particular is his refusal to identify sin and flesh (as many Hutterites seem to have believed), and to center the concept of sin in the "knowledge of good and evil." Even though fallen, man has never lost sight of God, and the way back, though it may be a hard one, is yet a glorious possibility. R.F.

The Dutch Mennonites of the present time do not hold the doctrine of original sin. This is not a consequence of predominant Liberalism (q.v.), but of Mennonite aversion to this doctrine from the earliest period of Anabaptism. In the numerous accounts written by or about the Dutch 16th-century martyrs, original sin is rarely mentioned. When the doctrine came up for discussion during the trials, as in the cross-examination of Jacques d'Auchy (q.v.) and Adriaen Cornelis (q.v.), the martyrs rejected the Roman Catholic view. This Mennonite position may have been due in part to the fact that they were usually not scholarly theologians and did not understand fine theological distinctions, but it was still more due to their fundamental aversion to this doctrine. Their denial of the effects of original sin was one of the principal themes during the great disputations held with Calvinists (Frankenthal 1571, Emden 1578, Leeuwarden 1596). Calvinist theologians writing against the Mennonites in the 16th-18th centuries regularly charged them with the heresy of not accepting the doctrine of original sin.

Mennonite authors in general do not give this doctrine much attention. Even Menno Simons and Dirk Philips, the basic "theologians" of 16th-century Mennonitism, only incidentally deal with original sin. Menno uses the term in his Foundation Book and says, "We confess and believe that we are all born of unclean seed, that we through the first Adam became wholly depraved and children of death..." The Catholic Church, he continues, claims that we obtain remission of original sin by baptism; but we do not accept this view, since we believe that we receive forgiveness and remission by the death of the Son of God, the second Adam. "By him we have obtained grace, favor, and the forgiveness of our sins" (Writings, 130). In his Een Weemoedige ende Christelycke Ontschuldige (Reply to False Accusations) (Writings, 563), Menno argues similarly: We are all conceived and born in sin and have a sinful nature, and "this is not ineptly called original sin"; but we have been reconciled by Christ and thus "for Christ's sake [the original sin] is not counted as sin unto us."

Dirk Philips (q.v.) is somewhat more minute in his expositions on this theme, but basically takes the same view as Menno. He admits the fact—at least theoretically—of total corruption (according to Psalm 51:7; Rom. 5:12, 18 f.). In Van der Doope he writes, "Man has become wretched, poor, and bare by Adam and has thus been born from him..." but the Lamb of God has "removed and covered the sin of Adam and of the whole world. For this reason now the sin of Adam and Eve will not condemn nor damn anybody, because Jesus Christ by His death and blood has removed it." At present children are "still" conceived and born in sin, but this "original sin, as it is called, is not imputed to them to damnation for Christ's sake. Children are somewhat like Adam and Eve before the fall, namely, they are simple and good and know neither good nor bad."

The Dutch Mennonite confessions scarcely deal with original sin. Jan Cents' Confession (1630), without mentioning the term original sin, simply states that mankind has fallen in Adam and has been reconciled by the mercy of God (Article 3). The Dordrecht Confession (1632), likewise avoiding the term, writes similarly (Articles 2 and 3).

Only the Cornelis Ris Confession (1766) is somewhat more circumstantial on this topic. Although Ris was somewhat influenced by Calvinism, he nevertheless rejected the consequences of the doctrine of original sin as taught by the Calvinists.

About 1700, when some Dutch Mennonites were leaning toward Calvinism, even adopting the Calvinist views on original sin, e.g., Lambert Bidloo (q.v.) and Douwe Feddriks (q.v.), influential Mennonite leaders both among the Zonists (q.v.) and the Lamists (q.v.), such as Herman Schijn (q.v.), Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, and Jan Klaasz (q.v.), plainly rejected the doctrine of original sin. In Verdediging der Christenen (1699) Galenus formulates his concept thus: We believe that man, created good and right by God, has by his own trespass and fault fallen from this good estate, but that all has been abundantly restored by the Lord Christ. . . ; that consequently innocent children are not born with damnable and deadly guilt; and nobody will be punished by the righteous God except for his own trespasses and his own sins (Korte Grondstellingen, No. XXV). In the 19th century a few Mennonites, influenced by the Reveil (q.v.), like Jan de Liefde (q.v.), showed some leaning toward the strict Calvinist views on original sin.

In summary it may be said that Dutch Mennonitism has rejected the doctrine of original sin for these three reasons. (a) because the term is unscriptural, (b) because Christ has removed the consequences of original sin, (c) because they could not admit that "the new life" (conversion) was hindered by an unfree will corrupted by original sin.

vdZ.

Torsten Bergsten, "Pilgram Marbeck und seine Auseinandersetzung mit Caspar Schwenckfeld," (Uppsala, 1958, reprint from Kyrkohistorisk Arsskrift, 1957 and 1958, 135 pp.), section "Die Erbsünde," 74-82; Heinold Fast, "Pilgram Marpeck und das oberdeutsche Täuferium," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XLVII (1956) 212-42; Hans Fischer, Jakob Huter, Leben, Frömmigkeit, Briefe (Newton, 1956) VI, 47; R. Friedmann, "Claus Felbinger's Confession of 1560," MQR XXIX (1955) 158; idem, "Peter Riedemann on Original Sin and the Way of Redemption," MQR XXVI (1952) 210-15; Jan Kiwiet, "The Theology of Hans Denck," MQR XXXII (1958) 3-27; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938) 228-34; Horst Quiring, "The Anthropology of Pilgram Marbeck," MQR IX (1935) 155-64; Peter Rideman, Account of Our Religion, Doctrine and Faith (n.p., 1950) 57; Theodor Sippel, "The Confession of the Swiss Brethren in Hesse, 1578," MQR XXIII (1949) 33; John C. Wenger, The Doctrines of the Mennonite Church (Scottsdale, 1952) 10 f.; George H. Williams, ed., Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (Philadelphia, 1957) 127; W. Wisweld and Robert Friedmann, "The Anabaptists Answer Melancthon," MQR XXIX (1955) 159; C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 23, 60, 130; Menno Simons, Opera Omnia, 18, 507 f.; Writings, 130, 563; BRN X, 74 f.; ML I, 603-5.

Orland Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the Capay District of Glen County, near Orland, Cal., a member of the Pacific District, was begun in 1922 when a number of families moved to this area from the Dallas, Ore., community, and later that year other families came from Canada. Services were held in a home and later in a schoolhouse. The same year the congregation was organized and a church building was started, which was completed in 1924 and is still in use after some remodeling.

The membership in 1957 was 111, with M. R. Schimnowski as pastor. M.R.S.

Orloff: see also Ohrloff.

Orloff, the name of settlements made by Mennonites in Europe and America. In Russia the spelling has been in some cases changed to Orlow, Orlovo, and Ohrloff besides Orloff.

In West Prussia Mennonite immigrants from Holland founded the village of Orloff in 1550 in what was then Polish territory; until the collapse in 1945 it was still inhabited by Mennonites who belonged to the Ladekopp (q.v.) congregation. Mennonites from this village were among the first emigrants to Russia, who in 1789 founded the Chortitza settlement in Ekaterinoslav province, Ukraine. In later settlements the Mennonites frequently transferred the name of the home village to the new one, as they did in the settlement of Deutsch-Wymysle founded in 1762 in Poland, which in 1905 numbered 105 members and 51 children.

One of the oldest villages with this name in Russia is Orloff (Ohrloff) in the southwest of the Molotschna settlement (q.v.) in the province of Taurida. It was founded in 1807 by 21 Mennonite families from West Prussia and developed into one of the most important Mennonite communities in South Russia. The number of families had grown to 127 by 1910 in spite of emigration to daughter colonies, and the population to 548. The Orloff congregation, to which the neighboring villages of Tiege, Rosenort, and Blumenort belonged, had a membership in 1905 of 980, with 508 children. Johann Cornies (q.v.) was instrumental in having one of the first Zentralschulen built here in 1848, which was later replaced by a splendid new building (picture, ML III, 156). In 1908 a girls' school was opened here, and in 1910 a hospital (picture, ML III, 157). From Sept. 27-29, 1894, representatives from all the Mennonite congregations in Russia met in conference here, in which it was urged that a theological division be added to the Zentralschule (Ediger, 55). A village in the Rückenau settlement of the Mennonite Brethren in the province of Taurida in 1860 was also named Orloff.

After the introduction of universal military duty in Prussia in 1848, one hundred Mennonite families in West Prussia received from the Russian government the permission to immigrate and to settle on the middle Volga in the province of Samara. Here they founded the Am Trakt settlement in 1855, which grew to 10 villages, and the Alt-Samara settlement (Alexandertal) in 1859 with 8 villages, one village in each settlement receiving the name Orloff. In the province of Kherson Mennonites from the Molotschna settlement founded the Zagradovka settlement in 1871, with 16 villages, one of them bearing the name of Orloff. Here a Zentralschule was built. In 1911 the village had a population of 297.

In the province of Ekaterinoslav, volost Golitsinovka, Bachmut (q.v.) district, the Memrik (q.v.) settlement came into being in 1885, with 10 villages on the Woltchya, a tributary of the Samara, which flows into the Dniepr. The settlers were Mennonites from the Molotschna, who built the village Orlovo (originally called Bahndorf, q.v.) with (1910) 189 inhabitants. Besides agriculture they were engaged in cattle raising, especially the German red cow.

Since 1907 Mennonite settlements have also been made in Siberia. The largest settlement in the province of Omsk is Slavgorod, formerly Barnaul (q.v.), with 58 villages, one of which is called Orloff (map, ML I, 126). And in the Tchunayevka (q.v.) settlement near the city of Omsk a village was given the name Orloff.

In South America the name Orloff in the Fernheim colony was given a village in Paraguay, which was settled in 1930 by Mennonite refugees from the Russian Amur region; in 1935 the village had 20 families. HEGE.

Dirks, Statistik (Gnadenfeld, 1906); Heinrich Ediger, Beschlüsse der von den geistlichen und anderen Vertretern der Mennonitengemeinden Russlands abgehaltenen Konferenzen (Berdjansk, 1914); D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdjansk, 1910); Christlicher Familien-Kalender (Halbstadt, 1914); Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913); Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, No. 10 (Berdjansk, 1914); Jakob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); ML III, 309 f.

Orloff (Ohrloff), a common Mennonite village name which originated in Prussia and was transplanted to the Molotschna and Zagradovka settlements, Ukraine; Alexandertal and Trakt settlements, Samara; Barnaul and Omsk, Siberia; and Fernheim, Chaco, Paraguay. It is likely that the Russian Mennonite village names Orlovka and Orlovo (Memrik) are related to the German Orloff. C.K.

Orloff, a Mennonite village of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia, established in 1908, became the administrative and cultural center of the settlement. In addition to the volost building, a post office and a hospital were erected. The latter was transferred to Halbstadt in 1928-29 where a district hospital was erected. For a while Orloff was the center of the Slavgorod Mennonite Church (q.v.). Orloff had a brick factory. A monument was erected in Orloff in 1912, to its benefactor Peter A. Stolypin (q.v.). (Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens, Rosthern, 1957, pp. 29 ff.) C.K.

Orloff Evangelical Mennonite Church, Zagradovka Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Ukraine, Russia, was established on Feb. 27, 1907, when Franz Martens (q.v.), elder of the Nikolai field Mennonite Church (q.v.), withdrew from the congregation with 11 ministers and 2 deacons. Twenty-eight families, consisting of 63 members, established the Altonau, later Orloff, Evangelical Mennonite Church under his leadership. The church emphasized baptism by immersion and the Lord's Supper administered to believers only. The congregation met for seven years in a former store building in Orloff, building a meetinghouse in 1914. In 1932 the congregation had 214 members and a total population of 466. It disintegrated like the others under the pressure of communism, and many members were exiled or went to America. (G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka, North Kildonan, 1947, pp. 74, 80.) C.K.

Orloff Mennonite Brethren Church, in Fernheim Colony, Paraguayan Chaco, in 1957 had a membership of 122 with M. August as leading minister.

H.S.B.

Orloff (Ohrloff) Mennonite Church, oldest congregation in the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, then known as the Orloff-Petershagen congregation, was founded in 1804, the first year of the Molotschna settlement, with Jacob Enns as elder, followed by Jacob Fast, then Bernhard Fast as elders. Because of the progressive attitude of Elder Bernhard Fast and some other ministers, the greater conservative part of the congregation in 1824 abandoned Orloff and founded the Lichtenau congregation. What was left of the former was now known as the Orloff-Halbstadt congregation and after 1877 as the Orloff-Halbstadt-Neukirch congregation, until 1895, when Halbstadt also became independent. Thereafter it was called the Orloff-Neukirch congregation, with two places of worship, one at Orloff, the other at Neukirch, a village about 10 miles from Orloff.

After the departure of the large Lichtenau group in 1824 the Orloff congregation was for a long time spiritually and culturally the most advanced congregation of the Molotschna as well as the most tolerant. It favored higher education, and the first Zentralschule, known as the Vereinsschule, was established at Orloff. Johann Cornies (q.v.), the noted Mennonite administrator and cultural leader, was all his life a member of this congregation. During the 1860's, when the Mennonite Brethren Church came into being, Orloff with its elder Johann Harder was the first congregation to recognize it and to enter into friendly relations with it. Three elders of the Orloff church, Bernhard Fast 1821-60, Johann Harder 1860-76, and Abram Goerz 1876-1913, were all outstanding and strong personalities.

The greater part of the population of the following villages belonged to the Orloff church: Orloff, Tiege, Blumenort, Rosenort, Neukirch, Friedensruh, Tiegerweide, and some members from other villages. It was therefore a rural congregation consisting of farmers, numbering about 1200-1500, including children. The language of worship was German; for singing, the Gesangbuch zum Gebrauch in den Mennonitengemeinden Russlands was used. As in almost all Mennonite churches in Russia no instrument was used to accompany the singing, but choir singing was introduced at a comparatively early date. Church discipline was applied for moral misconduct.

The Orloff church was built in 1809, the first in the Molotschna settlement, with the money donated by Czar Alexander I. It was later considerably enlarged. The Neukirch church was erected in 1877.

The last elder, Jacob Wiens of Tiegerweide, emigrated to Canada in 1924. In 1926 P. D. Nickel was elected and ordained elder jointly of the Lichtenau and Orloff congregations. He served until 1930, when increasing religious persecution compelled him to leave Orloff. But worship continued until 1932, when the church was closed by the authorities. Even after that meetings were held for some time in private homes, until the last minister, W. H. Janzen, was arrested and banished. The building was then used as a Communist children's home. H.G.

Orloff (Schönsee) Mennonite Church, located in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia, was organized in 1908. This was one of the five congregations of the Slavgorod settlement and the mother church of the others. The congregation served the following seven villages: Schönsee, Lichtfelde, Orloff, Schönwiese, Schönau, Rosenhof, and Friedensfeld. The first leading minister was Peter J. Wiebe, followed by Kornelius D. Harder, who was ordained elder. When Harder (q.v.) left for Canada in 1927 he was succeeded by Gerhard Warkentin. Other ministers were Gerhard A. Wiebe, Abram Töws, Cornelius Dück, Johann Fast, Heinrich Wiebe, Bernhard Derksen, Wilhelm Raabe, and Peter G. Wiebe. In 1922 the congregation purchased a house and remodeled it into a church. To what extent the religious life and activities of the congregation, which had to cease in 1932, were revived after 1953 has not become apparent. (See also Slavgorod Mennonite Church; Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens, Rosthern, 1957, p. 69.) C.K.

Orlofffelderde (Ohrlofffelderde), one of the oldest Mennonite congregations in West Prussia, Germany, at first Polish, from 1772 Prussian. It was situated in the Great Marienburg Werder, in the former "Oekonomie" of Tiegenhof. It originated in 1562, when the Loysen banking firm (q.v.) had Mennonites settle on the marshy land in the region of Tiegenhof, which the firm had received from the Polish crown in return for a loan, to drain and cultivate it. They settled about 12 miles north of Marienburg in 20 villages and organized a congregation, holding their services in the homes and barns of the members. Not until two centuries later did they receive the consent of the authorities to build a church in Orlofffelderde, in which Cornelius Grunau, an elder from Ohrloff, conducted the first service Dec. 5, 1751. The congregation belonged to the Frisian branch (q.v.) and was very active. The number of communicant members rose to more than 500. In the last part of the 18th century their elders Heinrich Donner (q.v.) and Johann Donner (q.v.) were among the leading personalities of the West Prussian Mennonite brotherhood. In the 18th century the Dutch Naamlijst call this congregation Waterlander. The following ministers are mentioned in the Naamlijst: Aldert Aldertsz, Klaes Bestevader, Hendrik Quiring, David Mekelborger, elder c1740-72, David Horn 1753-75, Gerd Albrecht 1754-c60, David Bestevader 1753-c75, Jan Bestevader 1760-87, Cornelius Grunou 1760-c95, Hendrik (Heinrich) Donner 1766, elder 1772, Jacob Penner 1766-73, Hans Horn 1775-after 1802, Jan (Johann) Quiring 1775-after 1802, Peter Dan 1794-?, Cornelis Fröse 1794-?, Jacob Berghthold 1799-?. Repeatedly the congregation had contacts with the Dutch Mennonites. In 1709 and again in 1788, when its members were severely struck by floods, it received financial support from the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1570, 1657, 1739-45; II, Nos. 2646, 2650; II, 2, Nos. 801, 856 f.). In 1852 the baptized membership numbered 315, in 1882, 256.

Besides the-Frisian congregation there was also a Flemish congregation with its seat at Ladekopp (q.v.), whose members lived in some of the same villages as the Frisians. When the Prussian law on the corporation rights of the Mennonites of June 1874 was published, which stipulated that the area of the congregation must be geographically defined, David Fröse, the elder of the Frisian group, attempted to co-operate with the Flemish in defining mutually favorable boundaries; after initial failure, these efforts resulted in the union of the two branches in 1882, which Fröse, however, did not live to see. The Orlofffelderde congregation yielded its independence in some respects; the treasury and the economic care of the members were united. But the pastoral care and religious services and preaching remained unaltered in the two branches.

Fröse's successor as elder of the Orlofffelderde congregation was Jakob Penner, a preacher of Platenhof, ordained Feb. 12, 1882, who made it his duty to give the young people of the congregation more thorough baptismal instruction, better suited to the needs of the time. To this end he wished to supplement the Donner catechism, which was also used by the Flemish congregation, in order, as he wrote, "to impress upon the hearts of the children the necessary explanations and admonitions in answering the questions of the catechism presented to them." The conference in Tiegenhof decided in 1886 to publish a unified catechism for the "United West Prussian Mennonite congregations," and Penner was one of the leading authors of this booklet. But the union did not come to pass. In 1906 the Ladekopp-Orlofffelderde group published a second edition of Heinrich Donner's Unterricht von der heiligen Wassertaufe of 1792 under the same title, with the additional phrase, "sowie über das Verhalten der Täuflinge vor, bei und nach der Taufe."

The baptized membership of the Ladekopp-Orlofffelderde-Pordenau congregation (its official name at that time) numbered 756 in 1882, 707 in 1888; there were 1,141 souls in 1927, 1,021 (739 baptized members and 282 children) in 1940. The congregation possessed three meetinghouses, one in Ladekopp (built in 1768), one in Orlofffelderde (1751), and one in Pordenau (1800), and two old people's homes. In this congregation the Orlofffelderde branch had a degree of independence, with its own elder (Bruno Ensz of Tiege, preacher 1933, elder 1935) and preachers.

For the last ministers and the extinction of the congregation, see Ladekopp. (ML III, 310.) HEGE.

Orlovo (German, Bahndorf), a Mennonite village in the Ukraine, Russia, in the Memrik settlement, post office Zhelannaya, Michailov village council (formerly volost Golitsinovka, Bachmut district, province Ekaterinoslav). In 1885 the village was founded by Mennonites from the Molotschna, province Taurida (see Bachmut). The inhabitants were farmers, and formed an artel named Astra with the villages Nikolayevka (Ebental), Marinovka (Nordheim), and Neu-Kalinovo. Orlovo had 2,268 acres of land. Besides agriculture the village also raised cattle. It had a school with thirty-two pupils and a pedagogically trained teacher. Most of the people belonged to the Mennonite Church, the rest to the Mennonite Brethren. The language spoken was Low German. In the school German and Ukrainian were taught (formerly German and Russian). The soil is black, and is well suited to farming. (ML III, 310.) J.C.

Orono (Maine) Civilian Public Service Unit No. 125, attached to the University of Maine, had a unit strength of ten men engaged in dairy service. Some of the men worked in the university dairy barns, while others worked on experimental farms. The unit was opened in December 1943 and was closed in May 1946. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 210.

Orphanage as an Anabaptist prison in Bern: see Waisenhaus.

Orphanage Society of the Eastern District Conference (GCM) was organized Nov. 9, 1905, by the conference Ladies Aid societies for the purpose of creating a fund for the care of orphans and the assistance of mothers. Active members consist of members of Mennonite churches who enroll in the society and support the work by freewill offerings. The original purpose, to create a fund to establish an orphans' home, was later changed to provide for orphans' and widows' support to keep families together in their own homes. Little progress was made until the fifth convention held in 1909 at Souderton, when a constitution was adopted and the first officers were elected.

By the time of the 29th convention, held in Quakertown, Pa., on Nov. 11, 1933, a total of $5,000 had been accumulated. It was decided to create a permanent endowment fund with this money, using the interest for the welfare work of the society. The Orphanage Society has given much aid to needy orphans and widows within the membership of the Eastern District Conference. Contributions have been given to local orphanages. Orphans, nurses, and orphanages abroad have been supported as mission projects. Gifts have relieved war and famine sufferers in Europe and Asia, such as over 1,000 pairs of new shoes for war sufferers. G.G.S.

Orphanages (Children's Homes, Child Welfare Work, German Waisenanstalt). Because of the strong family and group solidarity among Mennonites, few orphanages have been established to care for Mennonite children except in Holland (see below); where established in modern times they have been service institutions to care for children from orphaned or broken homes outside the brotherhood.

In Europe, except until very recently in France, orphanages were established only in Holland and in Russia. In Russia Abram Harder established an orphans' home at Grossweide, Molotschna, in 1906, including a school, and in 1910 was caring for 27 children. About 1900 Franz Klassen established a school for poor children (Armenschule) at Berzovka near Davlekanovo, Ufa province, which Friesen says was "essentially the same" as the Grossweide institution. When Klassen left for America, Jacob J. Martens took over the school. Both institutions were located on farms with residence homes, operated schools, and were supported by donations.

In France the MCC established two children's homes: Mont des Oiseaux (q.v.) or Weiler near Wissembourg, Alsace, established in 1945, transferred to the French in 1951, and Valdoie (q.v.), near Belfort, established in 1950, transferred to the French in 1955. The Valdoie home had been operated in 1945-50 at Nancy by the MCC. The Association Fraternelle Mennonite (q.v.) was organized in 1950 by French Mennonites to operate the children's homes and other charitable institutions, and now owns and operates both Valdoie and Weiler. The MCC has operated a children's home at Bad Dürkheim in the Palatinate, Germany, since Oct. 15, 1949. This home and the two in France are not true orphans' homes since they normally take children only for shorter terms, and from broken or impoverished homes. All three receive substantial grants per child per day from the state, without which they could not operate.

In America the first Mennonite orphanage was established by the Leisy Orphan Aid Society (q.v.; GCM) in 1884 on the "Orphan Farm" 1½ miles south of Halstead, Kan., although the work was primarily to place orphans from home mission areas into Christian families. The Mennonite Orphan and Children's Aid Society (q.v.), organized in 1893 primarily to raise funds, was merged with the Leisy foundation in 1905 which still exists. The Orphanage Society of the Eastern District Conference (q.v.; GCM), organized in 1905, was established as a fund-raising agency, and has never operated an orphanage or placement service. In 1919 the Home Mission Board (GCM) began an orphan placement service which continued for a few years only.

In 1890 the Industrial School and Hygiene Home for Friendless Children (q.v.) was chartered in Kansas under a board of directors predominantly K.M.B. and located near the K.M.B. Gnadenau Church near Hillsboro. In 1910-15 it gradually changed into a home for the aged and in 1915 was called Salem Home (q.v.). In 1898 the Defenseless Mennonites (now Evangelical Mennonites) established the Salem Orphanage, now called Salem (q.v.) Children's Home, on a farm 2½ miles southeast of Flanagan, Ill., given for that purpose.

The Mennonite Church (MC) has established three orphanages: the Mennonite Orphans' Home (q.v.) at West Liberty, Ohio (1896-1947), operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, since 1957 turned into a school for retarded children called Adriel School; Mennonite Children's Home (q.v.) at Millersville, Pa., established in 1911 and operated by a local Lancaster Mennonite board; and the Mennonite Children's Home (q.v.) at Kansas City, Kan., established in 1917 and operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The only other children's home in North America is the Grace Children's Home (q.v.) at Henderson, Neb., established in 1936 and operated by an interdenominational Mennonite board, strongly E.M.B.

Orphans' homes have been established on numerous Mennonite mission fields. The Mennonite Church (MC) has done this in India, where the mission had its beginning in a sense with work done for famine orphans. The M.C. program which began in 1899 resulted in two orphanages, the Boys' Orphanage in Dhamtari and the Girls' Orphanage in Balodgahan, with a maximum total of nearly 500 orphans. The G.C.M. Mission in India, also located in the Central Provinces, began in a similar way two years later and also developed two orphanages, a Boys' Orphanage in Janjgir and a Girls' Orphanage in Birra. The M.B. Mission, begun about the same time but located further south in Madras Presidency, did not develop orphanage work in India. The M.B. board has had an orphanage in Brazil since 1947, located 8 miles from Curitiba, and took over and operated for 10 years, until 1949, the orphanage for Lengua Indian infants, which was started by the Paraguay Mennonites to rescue infants from the infanticide then commonly practiced by the Indians. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ in 1899 established an orphanage in Hadjin, Turkey, to care for Armenian children orphaned by the terrible massacre of 1896, taking a maximum of 305 orphans by 1905, with a home for boys and a home for girls. In 1910 the Boys' Orphanage was transferred to Everek about 25 miles from Caesarea in Cappadocia. The work was closed in 1914 and briefly reopened in 1919-20. The Mennonite (MC) mission in Argentina established an orphanage at Pehuajo in 1926, which was moved to Trenque Lauquen in 1927 and finally was settled in 1936 in Bragado with a new building. The Mennonite (MC) Belgium Mission has operated the Home of Hope at Ohain near Brussels since 1952 as a children's home.

The MCC has operated a home for delinquent boys at Ailsa Craig, near Stratford, Ont., since 1952, called Ailsa Craig Boys Farm. The Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities has since 1949 operated Youth Village, a summer camp near White Pigeon, Mich., for children from city and mission churches. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 663.) H.S.B.

Netherlands. Formerly a large number of Dutch congregations had their own orphanages—not only the largest ones, like the Flemish congregations of Haarlem and Amsterdam, but also smaller ones like Harlingen and De Rijp, and even Ouddorp. Concerning the history of most of these orphanages, except in a few cases, there is not much information and in a number of cases no information at all.

Most of the orphanages were founded in the 17th century: Haarlem (Flemish congregation) 1634, Harlingen 1663, De Rijp 1676, Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1677, Leiden Waterlander congregation before 1681, Zaandam Nieuwe Huys 1712, Groningen 1847. Often in small congregations the orphans were lodged in the old people's home of the congregation. In the first quarter of the 19th century most of the orphanages were closed (Harlingen 1767 or shortly after, Ouddorp earlier), but others sheltered orphans until recent times: Zaandam until about 1900, and De Rijp until 1912. The Amsterdam orphanage was closed in 1800; after this the orphans of the congregation were cared for in the Oranjeappel (q.v.) orphanage, among the trustees of which from this date there were always representatives of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church. The reason for closing the orphanages was twofold: through better hygienic conditions and the elimination of epidemics the number of orphans steadily decreased; and gradually the idea prevailed that orphans could be better cared for in private homes than in sheltered orphanages.

At present there is only one Mennonite orphanage in the Netherlands, in which orphans are actually reared. It is the large orphanage building of the Haarlem Mennonite Church. The present building was opened on June 14, 1874. In 1860 the Vereeniging van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten, commonly called "Haarlemsche Vereeniging," also concerned itself with the Mennonite orphans. Later, when the Haarlemsche Vereeniging was dissolved, a part of its work was taken over by the newly organized Association on Behalf of Mennonite Orphans. Mennonite orphans of several congregations are now placed in homes, in the Haarlem Mennonite orphanage, or sometimes in De Oranjeappel.

The only Mennonite children's home in the Netherlands is operated by the Stichting (q.v.) voor bijzondere Noden, and was located at Oud-Wulven (q.v.) in 1947-58 and at present at Schoorl. vdZ.

The history of several Mennonite orphanages at Haarlem is described in De Weeshuizen der Doopsgezinden te Haarlem 1634-1934 (Haarlem, 1934); for those of De Rijp and Zaandam see DB 1918, 20-29, and (S. Lootsma), Het Nieuwe Huys, Friesch-Doopsgezinde Gemeente West-Zaandam, 33-43, 139-60.

Orphans' Home (MC), later known as the Mennonite Children's Home, established in 1896 on a private basis by David Garber and S. K. Plank on their farm near Weilersville (not far from Orrville), Ohio, was moved in early 1900 to West Liberty, Ohio, with a formal opening on May 14, 1901. In 1899 it was placed under the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes established in that year to own and operate this home and the Old People's Home at Rittman, Ohio. This board was merged into the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1906. It was continued as a standard orphanage for many years, in the 1940's was modified to emphasize orphan placement, was temporarily closed, to be reopened in 1957 as the Adriel School for retarded children. Abram Metzler (1854-1918) was the first and long-time superintendent of the West Liberty orphans' home. H.S.B.

L. L. Swartzentruber, The Child, A History of the Mennonite Orphans' Home, West Liberty, Ohio (Scottsdale, 1931).

Orrville, a city (pop. 5,153) in Wayne County, Ohio, is the seat of a Mennonite (MC) congregation with 265 members, founded in 1909, and the partial shopping center for an additional Mennonite membership of 1,772 including six M.C. congregations—Kidron, Martins, Pleasant View, Crown Hill, Oak Grove, and Salem—and one G.C.M., viz., Salem, all within a six-mile radius. H.S.B.

Orrville Mennonite Church (MC), in Orrville, Ohio, was established in 1909 as a mission co-operatively by members of the Oak Grove (q.v.) Amish Mennonite Church and the Martin (q.v.) Mennonite Church. In 1909 the group took over the former Reformed Church building, which had been bought in 1907 by interested Mennonites. In 1911 the mission was taken over by the Mennonite

Board of Missions and Charities who operated it until 1921 when it was turned over to the Ohio Mennonite Mission Board. On April 2, 1922, the congregation was organized as the Orrville Mennonite Mission Church with 100 charter members. On Nov. 22, 1936, it was organized as the Orrville Mennonite Church, and became for the first time an independent congregation, a member of the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference, no longer under a mission board. Up to this time it had been treated as a child of the two Ohio conferences who furnished joint bishop oversight. A new brick meetinghouse was erected in 1950. I. W. Royer served as pastor from June 1, 1912, to 1953, when Harold Bauman, who had been associate pastor since 1947, assumed full charge, followed by Lester Graybill in 1958. The membership in 1957 was 265. H.S.B.

J. S. Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Goshen, 1931).

Ortenburg, a village in Upper Carinthia (q.v.), Austria, in which a small Anabaptist congregation was founded in the 16th century. Its preacher was Michael Matschidl (q.v.), who was seized there with his wife and Hans Gurtzham (q.v.) in 1546, examined by the parson of Villach, and put into prison in Vienna. In a poem of twenty stanzas, published by Beck (131-36), Matschidl describes his seizure in Ortenburg and the execution of his fellow captives Hans Staudach (q.v.), Leonhard Schneider (q.v.) of Kaufbeuren, Blasius Beckh (q.v.), and Anthoni Keim (see Glait, Oswald) of Gunzenhausen. Beck (121-23) gives two moving letters written by Matschidl on Nov. 21 and Dec. 5, 1546, from his prison to the brotherhood in Moravia. The congregation in Ortenburg was dissolved after the death of its preacher. HEGE.

J. Beck, "Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Kärnten," in Archiv für vaterländische Geschichte und Topographie XI (Klagenfurt, 1867); ML III, 311.

Ortlep, Christoph, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed for his faith at Reinhardtsbrunn, a monastery in Thuringia, Germany, on Jan. 18, 1530, together with Andreas Kolb (q.v.) and four women—Katharina König, Katharina Kolb, Elsa Kunz, and Barbara Unger. Ortlep was arrested in 1529 and subjected to a cross-examination on his faith; after indoctrination by Lutheran theologians he recanted and was released. But he again joined the Anabaptists and was arrested and cross-examined with other Anabaptist prisoners. He declared that he would stand by his faith in all points, in the conviction that the Anabaptist doctrine was the most fundamental truth, from which he would not again depart, even if he must lose his life for it. He did not regret having suffered the penalty imposed on him as shame for the sake of Christ; but he did regret that he had once denied the truth he knew and recanted. A few days later he was sentenced to death and executed at once with the other steadfast prisoners.

The execution aroused general attention, since the condemned were the first blood witnesses in matters of faith under Lutheran government, and there were no civil charges brought against them. The Gotha superintendent Friedrich Myconius, who conducted the hearing and therefore knew the earnest mind of the victims, was shocked by the death sentence and expressed his qualms in a letter to Melancthon; Melancthon (q.v.) replied in February, trying to quiet his doubts, thereby reversing the attitude of the Wittenberg theologians on the death penalty in matters of faith. HEGE.

N. Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Freiburg i.Br., 1911) 31 ff.; P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910) 137; ML III, 311.

Ortmann, Friedrich C. (1868-1949), born in Adelhof, Russian Poland, Sept. 20, 1868, immigrated with his parents to near Freeman, S.D., in 1874. On July 24, 1892, he was married to Helena Schmidt, with whom he had one son, and in a second marriage on Mar. 14, 1895, to Maria Schmidt, with whom he had eleven children. He was a lifelong member of the Bethel Mennonite (GCM) Church where he was very active as a layman. He also took a great part in community life. In 1944 he opened his home for other old folks. His daughters are still managing the Home for Aged. A.F.Or.

Orvel, an Anabaptist martyr. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 286, E 654; ML III, 311) contains an account of three martyrs, Orvel, Jan, and Pleunis, who were drowned in the Rhine at Cologne, Germany, in 1561. This account is inexact and incomplete. Orvel and Jan were very likely the same person, with the name Johann von Orvel. He was a cobbler. On Nov. 29, 1561, after severe torture, he was drowned in the Rhine at Cologne with the tailor Plonius from Emmerich. vdZ.

Ernst Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 1, p. 11.

Orville, Pieter d', and his son Jacob Philippe d'Orville, Dutch merchants and bankers (non-Mennonite) at Frankfurt, Germany, who in 1689 and 1710-14 often intermediated between the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs at Amsterdam and the Mennonite refugees from Switzerland who lived in the Palatinate. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1226, 1272, 1281, 1421, 1425.) vdZ.

Os, Antony van der, b. 1722 at Zierikzee, d. April 12, 1807, at Zwolle, was a clergyman in the Reformed churches of 's Gravenland in 1746, and Zwolle in 1748, where he soon came into difficulties because he questioned the Reformed doctrine of predestination and in general wanted to accept only the Holy Scriptures and not also the doctrines of the Dordrecht Synod. When he refused to refute Remonstrant views he was suspended on Dec. 21, 1750. Unrest overtook the whole congregation in Zwolle, so that the government had to intervene. The passion with which van der Os carried on this matter caused much offense. In 1755 he was deposed from his office. In 1758 he received a call to the Mennonite congregation of Beverwijk in North Holland, was baptized by Cornelis Loosjes, the minister of the Zaandam Oostzijde congregation, and became its minister. He served Beverwijk until 1764 and then Zaandam-Oost. He was the cause of much disturbance in the Mennonite brotherhood. More than thirty polemics appeared, mostly anonymous, for and against van der Os. Among the opponents were the ministers G. ten Cate Thz of West Zaandam, Jan Beets of Hoorn, and Michiel de Bleyker of Twisk. The stricter Mennonites, especially Cornelis Ris, the elder at Hoorn, feared the influence of van der Os, who had in his confession said that he wished to adhere only to the "Twelve Articles" (the Apostles' Creed) and concerned himself little about the Mennonite confessions. Not until 1767 was he accepted as a member of the Rijper Sociëteit (the Waterlander conference in North Holland). In 1795 he resigned his services among the Mennonites and returned to Zwolle, where he lived until an advanced old age and usually attended the Reformed Church.

vdZ.

Naamlijst 1808, 83-85; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 58-60; DB 1872, 69 f.; 1897, 167; 1909, 100; ML III, 311 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 684, 937; Catalogus Amst., 140-46.

Osage County Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, near Linn, Mo., was started when the Philips family, members of the Pea Ridge congregation in Marion Co., Mo., moved into Osage County, where they were followed by the occasional pastoral visits of J. M. Kreider of Palmyra, Mo. Evangelistic effort in the community brought a few additions. Ezra Bowman, ordained in the Wilson Bend congregation near Carver, Mo., served at Linn until his health failed. Leroy Gingerich of Versailles, Mo., filled appointments for the last few years, and J. R. Shank was given bishop oversight after the death of J. M. Kreider, when only two families were left. These moved to Illinois and the work at Linn came to a close in 1947.

J.R.S.

Osborne County, Kan., the location of a Mennonite church (MC), organized before 1880 under Bishop Abraham Newschwanger (Hartzler and Kauffman, Mennonite Church History). In 1893 R. J. Heatwole reported 14 members, many of them Canadians. Through crop failures and dissension the church died out, probably in the early 20th century. M.G.

Osceola County (Iowa) Stauffer Mennonite Church, now extinct, was founded by Stauffer Mennonites from Waterloo Co., Ont., and from Lancaster and Snyder counties, Pa., who wished to establish a congregation far removed in distance from other Mennonites. The first of these families arrived in Osceola County in 1887. Among the early settlers were Jesse S. Bauman, bishop of the congregation, Josiah Martin, minister, and Elias Bowman, deacon, with their families. Other family names in the congregation were Brubacher, Weaver, Stauffer, Auker, Gingerich, and Gehman. These settlers made an attempt to follow a uniform style of architecture in the construction of all of their buildings. This distinctive style marked the location of the former Mennonite community years after the settlement had disappeared. Attempts to enforce uniformity in many areas of life brought about disagreements and the eventual extinction of the congregation. The church was dissolved in 1911, and during the next four years some families moved to Ontario and Michigan, but most located in Lancaster and Lebanon counties, Pa.

M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 337-41.

Oscoda County, Mich., in the north-central part of the state, is the location of three groups of Mennonites: the large Fairview (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC), the small Comins (q.v.) Mennonite Church (GCM), and the very small Old Order Amish group. The Amish began to settle in Oscoda County soon after 1900 and rapidly built up to two congregations, both served by the same ministers. But soon a decline set in, and the group has now dwindled (1957) to 10 or 12 members. Three bishops have served: David Slabaugh, Jacob Gascho, originally of Canada; and Levi S. Troyer. Troyer's death in 1954 was a serious blow to the Amish congregation; Ezra Kauffman, unordained, has been appointed to preach for the group. The Amish now often worship with the Fairview Mennonite Church (MC).

J.C.W.

Oscoda County (Mich.) Old Order Amish settlement dates back to 1900, when four families, Sam Weaver, Jerry Troyer, John Weaver, and Christ D. Miller, moved into the neighborhood of Mio in Oscoda County from Geauga County, Ohio. A congregation was formed in 1901 with the following as ministers: Emanuel Schlabach, David Nissley, Jacob Gascho, Yost Yoder, and David D. Schlabach (ordained as bishop in 1903). The following have served in the ministry since the beginning: Jacob Gascho (ord. 1908) and Levi S. Troyer (1939), bishops; Daniel Miller, Sam Weaver, and Ben Schlabach, preachers. About 60 families both from eastern and western states moved to Oscoda County. In recent years the Amish have been moving away. The membership in 1956 was 20.

L.S.T.

Osiander, Andreas (Hosemann) (1498-1552), a Lutheran preacher in Nürnberg (q.v.), Germany, where he became very influential and participated in all the major church affairs. He violently attacked the Anabaptists from their first appearance, so that they were unable to gain a foothold there. One of the first victims of his hostility was Hans Denk (q.v.), who was the rector of the school of St. Sebaldus and had joined a group who were dissatisfied with the small improvement in religious and civil life brought about by the Reformation. At Osiander's instigation a course of action was adopted that ended in Denk's expulsion on January 21, 1525, and the later prohibition of the sale of the translation of the Prophets made by Denk and Haetzer (q.v.), even though there was as yet no other German version and the translation was free of anything objectionable.

In the official opinion concerning the punishment of the Anabaptists which jurists and theologians presented to the council in July 1528 Osiander advocated the death penalty for Anabaptist preachers, because they were deceivers. To his opinion he added false and garbled statements on the doctrine of the Anabaptists, asserting that they denied the Trinity and therewith the Deity of Christ; in their teaching nothing is found about Christ, except that "we should do and suffer like Him, as if He were merely an example." They would recognize only works, which "Christ has, however, made unnecessary." It is therefore justifiable before God and man "to punish such error with the sword. . . . In addition, imperial law forbids such Anabaptism upon penalty of beheading; therefore it is clear that it is justifiable before God and man." Baptized persons might be given milder punishment as the deceived, such as prison sentences, branding, or exile. Some of the other theologians also favored branding, but not the death penalty.

Nevertheless, Osiander had had some misgivings as to the effect of such a course upon his own co-religionists, and therefore advocated that "in this time" it was not useful and good "to apply the severest penalty. In the first place, because I know that if their doctrine and their error really came to the light of day, they are so unchristian that I do not doubt that they would fall of themselves. In the second place, because we have among the Catholics errors just as serious as those of the Anabaptists, . . . it would be a bad state of affairs to punish one party with the sword and not resist the other; for it is well known and evil spoken of, what the Papists still do in corners, and that they are not punished for it. In the third place, because it is evident that the Anabaptists die steadfast; that gives their teaching great respect."

Osiander's position on the death penalty for Anabaptists was no doubt further affected by the attitude of Catholic princes, who frequently made no distinction between Anabaptists and other Protestants, killing both alike. When the decision was made by the Swabian League (q.v.) on Feb. 16, 1528, to have the Anabaptists hunted and captured by cavalymen furnished by Ulm, Kempten, Heilbronn, and Bamberg, Volckmar, the delegate from Nürnberg, protested that "the Protestants would be thrown together with the Anabaptists, and pointed out Würzburg as an example. The door would thereby be opened to all manner of cruelty toward Protestants living in Catholic countries. Also there were many simple misled souls among the Anabaptists, who could be won over by indoctrination." (See Wenzeslaus Linck.)

In a further opinion of May 30, 1531, on the punishment of two imprisoned Anabaptists Osiander expressed the opinion that it would be dangerous to punish them by worldly means, since the intention of these people was good. They should be taught with the Word of God. But if they persisted in their obstinacy, and consequently in their faith, they should be expelled from the country. In case they were preachers the authorities in charge should take a different course.

After the reproaches made against the Nürnberg council following the execution in 1527 of the Anabaptist Wolfgang Vogel (q.v.), the pastor of Eltersdorf, the councillors did not inflict the death penalty on any Anabaptists for refusing to join the Lutheran Church, merely sentencing them to prison and to indoctrination by the clergy. Thus Osiander and his colleagues held many unsuccessful religious discussions with Peter Riedemann (q.v.), who was held in prison in Nürnberg. After a prison term of four years Riedemann was expelled in 1536.

Not many years later Osiander's views on capital punishment for matters of faith underwent a radical change. One of the influences bringing this change about was probably his association with the astronomer Copernicus (d. 1543), whose discovery that the earth revolves around the sun was just as objectionable to church circles as was Anabaptist teaching. Osiander became a sponsor of Copernicus' famous work, De revolutionibus orbium coelestium, which was completed in 1530, but was not published until later. This change is seen in Osiander's booklet, Unterricht und Vermahnung, wie man wider den Türken beten und streiten soll (1542), which expresses views held by the Anabaptists. It is possible that the conversations he held with imprisoned Anabaptists were a factor in bringing this change about. "When God permits the Turks to rule and rage over the Christians, He does nothing other than to deprive by violence the false Christians of the holy Christian name which they still unreasonably keep and bear, who by a wild, rough, and heathenish life have long since despised Christ and through false doctrine lost and rejected Him, just as the badges are torn from a nobleman who has disgraced himself," says Osiander in the booklet. Then he enumerates the sins of Christendom: despising, falsifying, and persecuting the holy Word of God, abuse of the sacraments, false human doctrine, immorality, and unrepentant persistence therein, which are not adequately punished by secular or spiritual authorities. Therefore the Turk must be regarded as "the sharp disciplinary rod of God; one must earnestly repent, and pray God for enlightenment, that all the bishops and preachers preach His holy Word unadulterated, abolish all superstitious practices, spread the Word of God with gentleness and not with the sword and bloodshed, halt offenses by using the ban, give a good example by spotless living, and that all might humbly bow before His divine holy kingdom."

After the Augsburg Interim Osiander moved to Königsberg, Prussia, in January 1549, and became professor of theology at the university founded there five years earlier. Here the debate on his doctrine of justification absorbed his attention to the end of his life (1552).

HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 40; Wilhelm Heberle, "Johann Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre," in Theologische Studien und Kritiken XXVIII (1855) 835; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 25 ff. E. Hirsch, Die Theologie des Andreas Osiander und ihre geschichtlichen Voraussetzungen (Göttingen, 1919); Keller, Reformation, 411-17; W. Möller, Andreas Osiander, Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Elberfeld, 1870) 116, 204, 245 f.; TA Bayern II, 260; G. von Selle, Geschichte der Albertus-Universität zu Königsberg in Preussen (Königsberg, 1944); Wiswedel, Bilder II, 26-28; ML III, 312 f.

Osiander, Lucas, Sr. (1534-1604), a Lutheran divine, the son of Andreas Osiander (q.v.), court chaplain in 1567, was councillor to Louis (q.v.), Duke of Württemberg, 1568-93. Osiander took part in the introduction of the Swabian Concordia Formula drawn up by his brother-in-law Jakob Andreae (q.v.) in 1574 (see Formula of Concord), and in disputes with imprisoned Anabaptists in Württemberg. Thus he cross-examined Paul Glock (q.v.), the Hutterite missionary from Moravia, who had been in the Hohenwittlingen prison for 15 years, in the presence of the court chaplain M. Johann Stecher, the pastor of Urach, the Landhofmeister and four councillors of the chancellory, and tried to persuade him that the Anabaptist doctrines on infant baptism, communion, and the oath, and their views on Christian government were "not godly"; but he could not refute the Biblically grounded Anabaptist preacher.

Several years later Osiander published a book in defense of infant baptism, titled Ein Predig Von dem Widertauff. Sampt angehenckter Historien, Welcher gestalt sich die Widertauffer Anno 1534 zu Münster gehalten. Wie selbige geschichten H. Dorpius . . . beschrieben (Tübingen, 1582; in GCL). In an opinion on Jan. 28, 1584, he opposed all others at the session by sponsoring gentler treatment of Anabaptists on the ground that there were various wings among them, some erring only in matters of faith, and otherwise obedient to authority (Bossert, 579-81). In his Bauernpostille of 1597 he warns against "bothering rural churches with subtle disputations."

His son Lucas Osiander, Jr. (1571-1638), was professor of theology and from 1620 chancellor of the University of Tübingen. He also published a book against the Anabaptists titled Enchiridion controversiarum quae Augustanae Confessionis Theologis cum Anabaptistis intercedunt (Tübingen, 1605; second edition 1614, in GCL).

HEGE.

TA Württemberg, 350-58; Chr. G. Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon III, 1751; J. von Walter, Die Geschichte des Christentums III (Gütersloh, 1935) 439; Mart. Mir. D 714, E 1024; ML III, 313.

Osnabrück, a town in Westphalia, Germany. Six Anabaptist emissaries, one of whom was Dionysius Vinne (q.v.), traveled from Münster (q.v.) to Osnabrück in October 1534 in order to convert this town. They were all arrested before they could begin their work; four of them were executed at Iburg, one died in prison, while Heinrich Graess (q.v.), who forsook the Anabaptist principles, was released. Nothing is known of Anabaptism in Osnabrück. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 48 f.)

vbZ.

Oswald von Jamnitz: see Glait, Oswald.

Ossweil, a town in the Markgröningen district of Württemberg, Germany. In 1559 the Anabaptist Simon Kraushaar of Neckargroningen confessed in cross-examination at Kirchheim-Teck that his baptized daughter Walburga was serving at Ossweil in the home of his brother's son Joseph Kraushaar. In 1570 the Wiedertäuferkalender appeared and named some recanting Anabaptists of Ossweil, including Godelburga, an old, ill, unteachable Anabaptist woman; in 1571 the Urfehde of Jakob Gantz of Ossweil, who promised diligent attendance at church; likewise Alexander Widmann, called Weber. In 1573 Ossweil is "still the same old nest. The known Anabaptists cannot be found, slip out and in secretly" in spite of all surveillance. In 1574 the pastor of Zuffenhausen announced, "In Ossweil several Anabaptists are staying," and the prelate of Maulbronn reported: "Last summer nearly all sectarian persons moved away." In 1575 he wrote that Maria Weber attended no church, much less communion, was unteachable. In 1576 the prelate named several others who disregarded communion; the dean had summoned them to the Rathaus and had received several promises to recant. Similarly in 1577 two women were still "stiff-necked"; in 1578 they were summoned to Stuttgart. In 1583 Maria Weber was attending no church; in 1586 after a term in prison she promised to reform. In 1608 she was again arrested, in 1609 likewise, in 1610 was given up as unteachable, in 1612 she finally recanted. (TA Württemberg; ML III, 314.)

E.T.

Ostens, Jacob, b. 1625 probably at Utrecht, d. Oct. 23, 1678, at Rotterdam, whose ancestors had moved from Flanders to the Netherlands because of persecution, was a physician, who in 1653 was appointed preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Rotterdam, Holland. Since he was a man of liberal ideas (he is said to have been an anti-Trinitarian, a Spinozist, and a supporter of Collegiant doctrines) trouble soon arose with some of his copreachers. In 1655 he and three other preachers of the Flemish congregation, Jan Ariaens van Raemburgh, Gerrit Jans Veerom, and Huygh Jans Corenhart, left this church and joined the Waterlander Mennonite congregation in Rotterdam. Here Ostens served as a preacher from 1655 until his death. In the Waterlander congregation too he caused some trouble because some members did not agree with his ideas and accused him of Socinianism (q.v.). Ostens published Liefde-son, omstralende de Hoedanigheyt der tegenwoordige genaamde Christenheyt (Utrecht, 1651).

vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 369-413; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (1907, reprint) 17 f., 23, 42 f.; K. O. Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn Kring (The Hague, 1896) 228, 341-43.

Osterfeld, one of ten villages in the province of Samara in the Mennonite settlement Am Trakt, which was settled in 1854-73 by Mennonites from West Prussia, Germany (see Malyschna). Osterfeld was founded in 1872; its inhabitants were members of the Köppental-Orloff congregation, which had 1,535 members and 760 children in 1905. (ML III, 314.)

HEGE.

Osterwick, a common Mennonite village name. One of the first of the villages settled by the Mennonites of West Prussia in Russia was Osterwick in the Chortitza (q.v.) settlement. It became the seat of one of the largest congregations, with a membership (1905) of 1,571 besides 839 children. In 1812 a village in the same settlement was named Neu-Osterwick. From Russia the name came to the East and West Reserves of Manitoba, to Hague, Sask., and from Canada to Cuauhtemoc, Mex. In Paraguay (q.v.) Canadian Mennonites from Manitoba and Saskatchewan founded the village of Osterwick in the west of the Menno (q.v.) Colony. In 1932 the first church in the colony was built here, with a seating capacity of 500. In Osterwick there were in 1934 twenty-seven families with a total of 163 persons. (ML III, 327.)

HEGE.

Osthofen, a market village in Rhenish Hesse, Germany, three miles north of Worms, where there were Mennonites soon after the end of the Thirty Years' War. The register of Mennonite families for 1664 in the archives at Karlsruhe names Peter Schuhmacher, Walruf König (?), Wilhelm Kegi, Thiel Rings, the last as having no property, but employed on the estates. In 1680: Johann Engers, Johann Weber, Johann Rings, Peter Rings, Peter Schuhmacher, Peter Grob (?). The two Rings families are day laborers, Johann Engers a weaver, the other two perhaps hereditary tenants on near-by farms. In 1738: Daniel Schneider, Daniel Engers, Christian Weiss, David Jutzi, Johann Geber, and Johann and Abraham Nold (?). In 1743: David Jutzi, three sons and three daughters; Michael Weiss, one daughter; Ulrich Hackmann, one daughter; Jakob Weiss, Daniel Engers, one son. In 1752: David Jutzi—Katharina 9, Peter 4, Maria 9½ years old. On the Mühlheimerhof Ulrich Hackmann—Barbara 10, Anna Maria 6, and Elisabeth one year old; Jakob Weiss—Jakob 9, Christian 7, Barbara 4 years old. In 1759: David Jutzi widow, 3 children, has her son-in-law as a servant with her. Michael Weiss of Mühlheim—Katharina, Peter, Christian, Elisabeth, Michael; Jakob Weiss of Mühlheim—Jakob, Christian, Barbara, Elisabeth, Maria; Ulrich Hackmann, three children as above; Jakob Engers, linen-weaver, single. In 1768: Jakob Weiss, Georg Schneider, Johann Seutz, Jakob Engers, David Jutzi widow. In 1773: six families, seven sons, four daughters.

The Osthofen families had some difficulties. About 1670 they were summoned before Alzey officials, where they were told that all who had entered the country since 1664 must leave within two weeks and pay a fine of 50 Talers in addition. Thereupon they sent an ardent petition to the elector (undated) not to compel them to leave in winter, since they had cultivated and sowed considerable land. The petition was apparently granted.

The Mennonites of Osthofen have from the first belonged to the Ibersheim congregation. In 1939 three families were living there, two named Weiss and one Stauffer. (ML III, 321.) NEFF.

Ostorodt, Christoph (d. 1611), a Socinian (anti-Trinitarian) minister of the "Polish Minor Church" (see Polish Brethren) who had several significant contacts with Anabaptists in an attempt to have them unite with his church. He was the son of a Lutheran pastor at Goslar, Germany, and was educated at Königsberg, East Prussia, where he seems to have come into contact with Unitarians. He was converted to Socinianism and in 1585 joined the Polish Minor Church (the only existing church body of that persuasion). He learned the Polish language and soon after became minister of the important church of Smigiel in Greater Poland, near Poznan. In 1598, he accompanied the Polish nobleman Andreas Voydovsky on a missionary journey to Holland, which (according to Wilbur) marked the first introduction of Socinianism into that country, destined to become later the very refuge of that type of Christianity. A few years later he became a minister at Buskov near Danzig. In 1604 he published his Unterrichtung von den vornehmsten Hauptpunkten der christlichen Religion, a major dogmatic work of his church, preceding the better-known Racovian Catechism (1605) by one year, and almost on the same level of importance. Wilbur claims that this Unterrichtung became a standard manual of Socinian doctrines, and accordingly was also widely attacked by German Protestants. In 1611 Ostorodt died in Buskov.

His activities with regard to influencing if not proselyting Anabaptists may be described according to the three main branches of Anabaptism:

(a) Swiss Brethren. In 1590 Voydovsky had made contacts with the Swiss Brethren in Strasbourg in the hope of gaining some footholds there. Returning to Poland, he carried with him a letter of the Strasbourg Swiss Brethren which contained a number of questions as to the Polish beliefs. In 1591 Ostorodt answered this inquiry with a lengthy epistle (16 pages in print), preserved in the State Archives in Bern, Switzerland, and published in full by Theodor Wotschke in 1915. It is a most remarkable source, revealing the spirit of Socinianism as well as the gulf which separated it from the Anabaptists. The tone is irenic and exceedingly warm. "We know all too well," Ostorodt writes, "that prompting factions is just as much a work of the flesh as other sins (Gal. 5:20). For that reason we suffer others and would not shun them if they want only to be obedient to the Lord Jesus Christ [something which Anabaptists always wanted to do] and are ready to recognize us as brethren." The doctrine of the Incarnation, however, was and remained the stumbling block for such a recognition by Anabaptists. "Christ is the son of God in no other sense," Ostorodt confessed, "than that all men are children of God in the spirit." The Strasbourg Brethren studied this document carefully and answered it in 1592 by a lengthy tract entitled "Concerning the Incarnation and Deity of Jesus Christ" (extant in a Dutch print of 1666; see John Horsch in MQR 1931, 26, note 136). It states very decidedly that "believing is not a decision of human reason but the acceptance of that which is incomprehensible to reason."

(b) Dutch Mennonites. A few years later, in 1598, Ostorodt went to Holland to spread his faith to this country and to try to get a permanent foothold in Western Europe. Naturally, he sought to establish contacts also with the Mennonites of this country, all the more since Mennonites and Socinians had almost identical viewpoints concerning adult baptism and nonresistance. In Amsterdam he debated with the Frisian elder Pieter Jans Twisck (q.v.); he probably also had contact with the Flemish elder Jacques Outerman of Haarlem. In particular he hoped for some success with the most liberal wing of these Mennonites, namely, the Waterlanders (q.v.). Wilbur in his History of Unitarianism devotes a lengthy section to this visit of Ostorodt with Hans de Ries (q.v.) of Alkmaar, the spiritual leader of the Waterlanders, and so do also J. S. S. Ballot, the biographer of de Ries (DB 1864, 38), and other Mennonite historians. This visit, as could have been assumed, yielded very little in results, in spite of de Ries's spiritualistic, nondogmatic tendencies and certain similar viewpoints on practical matters. In fact, de Ries refused to consider any closer dealings with the Socinians, the main argument being that "the Polish Brethren grossly reduce the glory of Christ" (de Ries, Ontdeckinghe der dwalingen, 1627). Soon after the visit of Ostorodt, de Ries wrote a complete refutation of the Socinian position, entitled Klaer Bewijs van de Eewigheydt ende Godtheydt Jesu Christi. With this exchange of views the contact of Socinians and Dutch Mennonites came to an end for the time being. Later, more successful contacts and influences, however, do not belong to the scope of this article (see Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan; also Anti-Trinitarianism and Socinianism in the Netherlands).

(c) Hutterites. It is known that the Polish Socinians showed a strong tendency toward communal living, hence their interest in the experiment of the Moravian Hutterites (q.v.) in this regard. Three or four times in the 16th and early 17th centuries visitors from Poland came to study these Anabaptist farm Bruderhofs, but in spite of much friendliness on both sides no real meeting of minds was possible: the genius of Anabaptism and Socinianism was too different as to allow such a rapprochement.

In his letter of 1591 to the Strasbourg Brethren, Ostorodt mentions also that two Polish Brethren went to Moravia in 1590 and there talked "with your brethren" (!) in Auspitz and Pausram. They presented to them a Socinian Confession of Faith but "never received any reply to it." The Hutterite chronicle does not mention this visit at all. It was apparently the report brought back to Ostorodt by these two visitors which prompted him to refute the Hutterite position more elaborately than any Polish brother had done before. Chr. Sand's well-known Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum sive Catalogus (1684, p. 91) shows that Ostorodt had written a pamphlet entitled Contra Hutterianos seu Moravensis Communistas Libellus (no date), to which entry Sand adds: "manuscriptum post obitum ipsius a Joanne Franco possidebatur." The content of this polemical tract is not known. Perhaps it was against this book (or another of Ostorodt's fifteen books and tracts) that the outstanding Hutterite head-bishop Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) wrote a rejoinder, Kurze Widerlegung des grossen Streites von Christo Jesu, dem Sohne Gottes, wie er von Christoph Ostorodt in einem im Druck ausgegangenen Büchel samt seinem Anhang als Polnische Brüder oder Arianer schimpflich und nachteilig verkleinert ward (Sobotiste, 1654). Unfortunately, also this reply is known only by its title. An old manuscript copy of it is supposed to exist with the Hutterian Brethren in Canada, but at present its location is unknown. How did Ehrenpreis ever come into the possession of Ostorodt's booklet? It may be reasonably assumed that Ehrenpreis received it from Dr. Daniel Zwicker (q.v.), a Socinian physician of Danzig, who had temporarily joined the Hutterite brotherhood in Slovakia. That happened in 1654, the year when Ehrenpreis replied to Ostorodt's dogmatic theses, forty-three years after Ostorodt's death.

(d) Frisian Mennonite congregation at Danzig. The Polish Brethren also made contacts with the Frisian Mennonites of Danzig in order to try to form a union between the Mennonite church and theirs. An undated letter of about 1609 (Inv. Arch.

Amst. II, No. 2926) written by Jan Gerrits, elder of the Danzig Frisian Mennonites, to Hans de Ries, says that the Brethren requested a conversation between Ostorodt and the Mennonite leaders, which was refused by the Mennonites, but the Brethren were urgently insistent on a conversation. Two members were inclined to leave the church and join the Brethren, many of whom were regularly attending the Mennonite meetings. In this letter Ostorodt is said to have denied that Jesus had instituted the ordinance of baptism, rejected the doctrine of satisfaction, and demanded that every preacher know Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. R.F.

W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 53-57, 106-11; E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism, Socinianism and its Antecedents (Cambridge, 1945); Theodor Wotschke, "Ein dogmatisches Sendschreiben des Unitariers Ostorodt," in Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XII (1915) 137-54; Robert Friedmann, "The Encounter of Anabaptists and Mennonites with Anti-Trinitarianism," MQR XXII (1948) 139-62.

Ostra, a Moravian village on an island in the March River south of Hrádisch and Bilowitz (Velké Billovice), in which the Hutterian Brethren had a Bruderhof. Its inmates fled to Hungary at the end of December 1620 because of the brutality of the Bouquoy troops. In desperation one woman threw her child into the river, and the Brethren with difficulty prevented her suicide. In the general withdrawal Ostra and Neudorf had to be abandoned. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 43; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; G. Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren (Brno, 1855-66); ML III, 35.

Ostrovo Kampe, near the hamlet of Ehrental, situated on the east side of the Vistula in Poland, was settled by Mennonites, who were members of the Przechowka (q.v.) Old Flemish Mennonite congregation and had their own Mennonite school in the Ostrovo Kampe. Repeatedly struck by floods, most of them left this area about 1765, settling in the Netzebruch (q.v.), while the remainder in 1821 moved to Russia and settled at Alexanderwohl (q.v.).

J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76, 78.

Ostrovo-Chortitza, one of the oldest villages of the Mennonites in Russia, was founded in 1789 in the Chortitza (q.v.) settlement, province of Ekaterinoslav. The inhabitants belonged to the Kronsweide congregation, which had (in 1905) 1,955 members and 1,055 children. It was also known as Insel-Chortitza. (ML III, 326.)

Oswald, a youth of about eighteen, of Augensperg on the Kocher River in Württemberg, Germany, who was seized with a number of Hutterian Brethren near Passau on their way back from Moravia and imprisoned in the Passau (q.v.) castle. On Aug. 30, 1535, he was cross-examined. He confessed that he had been baptized by Adam Schlegel at Dillingen in the Oberland. At the same time Hans Fuchs, a boy of sixteen of Bruchsal, baptized in Augsburg by Philip Plener, was examined. The hearts of both the boys had grown strong by the grace of God, so that no skill in argument, nor the thought of perishing wretchedly in the dark, dank holes in the earth of the castle prison was able to deflect them from their conviction. (ML III, 326.) W.W.

Otelia (Pa.) Mennonite Mission (MC) Church began as a mission Sunday school in May 1938. Elmer Yoder and Harry Yoder investigated the possibilities. The Allensville congregation undertook the responsibility and sent workers to the Otelia community. After 18 months of Sunday-school work, A. Roy Payne was appointed as pastor and served until September 1949, when LeRoy A. Zook was ordained and appointed pastor. After fourteen years of work in an abandoned school a new church was erected in 1952. The congregation is now under the Ohio and Eastern Conference. In 1956 the membership was 58, with A. Roy Payne and LeRoy A. Zook as ministers. In July 1957 the Otelia congregation withdrew from the Ohio and Eastern Conference and joined the Allegheny Conference. Also on July 21, 1957, the resignation of LeRoy A. Zook became effective and Joe Esh, of Blountstown, Fla., was installed as pastor. L.A.Z.

Ottenheim, Matthias von, an Anabaptist martyr: see Matthias Servaes.

Otter, Jakob (c1485-1547), first a Carthusian monk, later a Protestant churchman of the 16th century, a native of Alsace; educated at the universities of Heidelberg and Freiburg, he became a Lutheran pastor in the Austrian village of Kenzingen in 1522. Expelled in 1524, he fled to Strasbourg, and with the patronage of Hans Landschad, Luther's friend, became pastor in Neckarsteinach. Expelled from there in 1529, he served as pastor in Aarau (Switzerland) and Esslingen (q.v.) on the recommendation of Blaurer (q.v.) in 1532. Otter also had a letter of recommendation from Bucer (q.v.). He was inclined to self-importance, probably to compensate for shortness of stature, and lacked the art of leadership. He injured himself and the Esslingen Church by a lack of respect for Blaurer. For years the Anabaptists of Esslingen could point their fingers at the bitter quarrels between Otter and his colleague Fuchs.

The acclaim given Otter in many biographies of Reformation characters is not deserved. The most recent Kirchengeschichte von Stadt und Bezirk Esslingen by Otto Schuster (Stuttgart, 1946) is in this respect pleasantly objective, but contains several errors in the section on Otter. The brief, apt formulation given by Schuster (p. 163) says that in Esslingen it was Blaurer's achievement to lay the groundwork, that of Otter to build the superstructure of the Protestant Church. The regulations formulated by Otter and his colleagues on the order of the services (1533) and church organization (1534), the school regulations (1534) and disciplinary regulations (1536), are now a part of church history and not to be discussed here. But in addition to Schuster's presentation the older one by Th. Keim (Reformationsblätter der Stadt Esslingen, 1860) can still be used. Otter's printed works can be found in part in the city library of Esslingen. Schuster's book (1946) shows no knowledge of the articles "Blaurer" by Christian Hege, and "Esslingen" by Christian Neff (ML I, 226 and 609). The guild of Reformation historiography will not permanently be able to close its mind to the fact that the Anabaptist congregation "furnished the best preliminary work for the introduction of the Reformation" (Neff, 609), and that the Anabaptists, won to the church by Blaurer's preaching and pastoral work in 1531-32 and the church discipline he introduced, were again repelled from the church by the return to laxity of discipline and the baneful quarrels between Otter and Fuchs carried on even in the pulpit; the church was therefore to blame for the loss of these Anabaptists. On the other hand it must be admitted that Otter, the self-important polemicist, kindly received Schwenckfeld and Franck, the two spiritualists from the outside who were spiritually akin to the Anabaptists, although he was certainly influenced against them by Bucer, as Brecht was in Ulm. Schwenckfeld went in and out of Otter's parsonage and was permitted to explain to Otter his objections to Luther's doctrine of communion. Blaurer, of course, supported this intercourse by writing warning letters. Otter died in the horror of the Interim in 1547, which destroyed so many churchmen. Still worth reading is his prayer booklet (1537), found in the Landesbibliothek at Stuttgart. E.T.

Otterberg, a town (pop. 3,000) in the Palatinate, Germany, a former Cistercian monastery, founded by Huguenot Walloons in the 16th century (textiles), since the beginning of the 18th century the residence of several Mennonite families: Lichti (in the "City Mill"), Beutler (in the "Beutler Mill," named for the family), and Reubal (on the near-by Messerschwanderhof). Later came the Engel, Hofli, and Eymann families. In 1957 three Eymann families were living there who belonged to the Sembach (q.v.) congregation. Peter Galle, who came to Otterberg through marriage, was the assistant pastor of the Sembach congregation 1800-27, and died of a cerebral hemorrhage during a service. The Otterberg Mennonites own an old cemetery. (ML III, 326.) G.H.

Otterken, Het, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook: see Liedtboecxken genaamt het Otterken.

Ottius (Otto, Otte, Ott), Johann Heinrich (c1617-82), a Swiss Reformed church historian, was educated at the universities of Lausanne, Geneva, Groningen, Leiden, and Amsterdam, traveled through France and England, and then became preacher in Dietikon near Zürich. He occupied himself with the study of the great Catholic church history by Baronius, and wrote on the question whether and when Peter was in Rome. In 1672 he published the Annales Anabaptistici (q.v.) hoc est, Historia Universalis de Anabaptistarum origine, progressu, factionibus & schismatibus, paradoxis, tumultibus, colloquiis, pacificationibus, locis & sedibus, scriptis hinc illinc emissis, edictis & judiciis, ac quicquid præterea ad rem facere videtur. His præmissa prolegomena 1. Ad lectorem. 2. de variis Anabaptistarum sectis tractatio duplex. 3. collatio cum veteribus hæreticis. 4. de Donatistis. 5. quomodo tractandi ejusmodi homines; unâ cum Indice copioso (Basel, 1672), a chronicle of the Anabaptists year by year from 1521

(Müntzer and Storch!) to 1671. Although Ottius was not very favorable to the Anabaptists and his Annales are not entirely unprejudiced, this account of Anabaptist history contains many interesting facts. He spent the years 1634-41 in the Netherlands, industriously collecting the material that he later worked into his chronicle. He must have had an extraordinary acquaintance with the old Anabaptist writings. Later he became a professor at the University of Zürich. He must be distinguished from a number of contemporaries of the same name with variant spellings. E.C.

Jöchers Gelehrten-Lexikon III (Leipzig, 1751) Col. 1141 and continuation in Vol. V (Delmenhorst, 1816); Cornelius Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916) 146-59; Ernst Correll, Das Schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925) 67 f.; Müller, Berner Täufer, 166 f.; ML III, 327.

Ottmar, Sylvanus, a book printer in Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, who published contemporaneously with Peter Schöffer in Worms the first German translation of the Old Testament Prophets by Hans Denk (q.v.) and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) in several editions. It appeared first on April 13, 1527, at Schöffer's, and on June 22 was followed by a folio issue of 158 pages; he published a second edition on Dec. 24, and by March 1528 the fifth edition by Ottmar was off the press (Meyer, 211). In Nürnberg Andreas Osiander (q.v.) persuaded the council to prohibit its sale (Heberle, 835). Ottmar had already printed several editions of Haetzer's German translation of Malachi with the exegesis by Oecolampadius in Latin on July 17, 1526, the first edition in octavo and quarto, in 1527 in folio (Heberle, 832).

HEGE.

Wilhelm Heberle, "Johann Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre," in Theologische Studien und Kritiken XXVIII (1855); Chr. Meyer, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Zitscht des Historischen Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg, 1874; ML III, 327.

Otto Henry (Ottheinrich) (1502-59), Elector of the Palatinate 1556-59. He had introduced the Lutheran Reformation into his hereditary lands of Neuburg and Sulzbach by 1542. After the defeat of the Schmalkaldian League he had to leave the country; not until the treaty of Passau was signed in 1552 did he again acquire possession of it. By principle he was tolerant. Soon after assuming the government he turned his attention to the Anabaptists, issued a Kirchenordnung on April 4, 1556, ordered a church inspection, and held a disputation with the Anabaptists in Pfeddersheim (q.v.) near Worms in August 1557. But on Jan. 25, 1558, he felt obliged to issue a mandate against them, obligating the superintendents to watch the parishes carefully. "If they should find among the clergy or the parishioners of their district offensive and injurious errors of the Zwinglians, Schwenckfelders, Osiandrists, Anabaptists, or other evil sects opposed to the Augsburg Confession, they shall deal with them in accord with the Brenz (q.v.) Bedenken."

Two years later, on May 9, 1558, Otto Henry released a second mandate, which was to be obeyed in all points on penalty of severe punishment. It is directed against the Anabaptists in Neuburg. He, the prince, had seen "what rubbish the harmful error of Anabaptism bears not alone in the Christian community and church, but also in external police and government. Therefore, in order to counter it in good time, he had a constitution drawn up, which has been decided upon."

And then the alleged errors of the Anabaptists are enumerated: "(1) Since the suffering and death of Jesus there is no original sin, and that all children thereafter are born without original sin. (2) Infant baptism is wrong and useless. (3) They deny the third Person of the Trinity. (4) They hold that the knowledge of God is given to man without the study of the Bible and church attendance. (5) The sacraments are considered by them only as a mark and confession before men and as an outward sign of their brotherhood. (6) Some hold falsely that man is justified before God by holy works and through suffering and fulfilling the law and special illumination. (7) They assert that the reborn cannot fall into the wrath of God. (8) Some teach that temporal rule and temporal judges and the office of prince are sin and condemned and do not rule over Christian people, and judges or princes cannot be at the same time rulers and Christians. (9) They say that all Christians are obliged to give their money and goods to the Christian brotherhood. (10) Item, to accuse others before a temporal court is sin. (11) Item, to render an oath to the ruler or in court is sin. (12) Item, if a married man and woman separate on account of Anabaptism, this is right, together with other unchristian, coarse lies or errors, whereby they and Satan himself who impels them can be recognized."

Since all indoctrination had hitherto remained without result the elector ordered that all his subjects "who are spotted with the damned Anabaptist sect and other abominable errors, desist therefrom and return to the true evangelical Christian Church. Everyone shall also have his children baptized according to Christian order, in six or eight days at the longest after birth. Those who do not do so and regard infant baptism as useless, they shall be punished according to law without delay. Anabaptist elders or leaders should be sheltered by none, nor given any work. Nor is it permitted them to hold meetings or preach. He who trespasses against this mandate shall be brought into arrest by the official of the part of the country where the immigrant arrived, and immediately be announced to the government at Neuburg and be punished in accord with the imperial laws.

"But especially shall the officials of the Neuburg district be on a diligent lookout, whether Anabaptists by day or night assemble in the fields or woods and exercise supposed sacraments, as it has happened at other places that they have met secretly and in corners. They shall by deeds oppose such prohibited meetings and bring these insurrectionists and mobsters to prison, and report them to the government, to await the proper penalty.

"Whoever is then contaminated with the disease of Anabaptism and does not allow himself to be turned to the truth after being taught and warned, is to be held as a foul member of the body and shall not be tolerated in the church of God, but shall at least be expelled from the country. And if anyone shows himself so obstinate and ungodly, he might be punished by loss of life."

The church as well as temporal authorities were to see that this mandate was carried out. It was to be proclaimed about once every church year. In consequence of such severe mandates Anabaptism never reached any importance in the principality of Neuburg, though finally the Anabaptists were tolerated by Otto Heinrich.

W.W., E.C.

K. Schottenloher, Pfalzgraf Ottheinrich und das Buch (Münster, 1927) in Reformationsgeschichtliche Studien und Texte, H. 50-51; discussion in Zts. für Kirchengesch. XLVII (1928) 127 f.; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 84-99; ML III, 327-28.

Oud Gebruyk van de Vryheit van spreken in de Gemeenten der Doopsgezinden was a book published at Amsterdam in 1665; a second undated edition was published at Harlingen after 1665. This book is a Dutch translation of a Swiss Mennonite booklet, Verantwortung etlicher so man Täufer nennt uff die Fragen warum sie nit zur Kilchen gangind, published by Chr. Froschauer at Zürich in 1561. The Dutch editors, whose names are not found in the preface, were apparently Lamist (q.v.) Mennonites and Collegiants (q.v.), who favored the practice of speaking freely in the Mennonite meetings. In the preface they emphasize the view that the conservative leaders Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.) and Jean Boenes (q.v.), who had drawn up the Verbondt van Eenigheyt (q.v.), in which much stress is laid upon well-ordained ministers, who with exclusion of all other brethren are allowed to speak in the Mennonite services, are not in agreement with the old Mennonite practices, as used by the Swiss Mennonites. Besides the translation of the Verantwortung the book contains a preface, some extracts of the Martyrs' Mirror, a letter of D. V. Coornhert (q.v.), and four hymns.

vdZ.

Oud Martelaarsboek (Old Martyrs' Book), common name given by van Braght (q.v.) and others either to the first Dutch martyr book, Het Offer des Heeren (q.v.), or to Historie der Martelaren ofte waerachtighe Getuygen Jesu Christi . . . (Haarlem, 1615). The martyr book Martelaers-Spiegel der werelose Christenen . . . (Haarlem, 1631) was commonly referred to as the Groot Martelaarsboek (Large Martyrs' Book).

vdZ.

Oudaen, Joachim (b. Oct. 7, 1628, at Rijnsburg, d. April 26, 1692, at Rotterdam), a Dutch poet spiritually akin to D. R. Camphuysen (q.v.), was the son of Frans Oudaen, a Rotterdam baker who settled in Rijnsburg in 1622 to avoid persecution for his Remonstrant sympathies, joined the Collegiants (q.v.) there and became the friend of the van der Kodde family of Warmond, to which the originators of the Collegiant movement belonged, and into which he married. His son Joachim was educated at the University of Leiden and moved to Rotterdam, where a "Collegiant college" had been formed both among the Remonstrants (about 1630) and the Mennonites. He was closely connected with this group, which included François van Hoogstraten, poet and book dealer. His first biographer states that although he was a Remonstrant he was also a deacon in the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Rotterdam.

That he was a Waterlander deacon is a fact, but that he was a Remonstrant is questionable, though he often attended the Remonstrant church. Some of his descendants were baptized in the Mennonite church. In honor of Menno Simons he wrote a short poem to be used with the etching of Menno; for the Mennonite painter Michiel van Mierevelt (q.v.) he composed an epitaph. He met the poets Johannes Antonides van der Goes and Heiman Dullaert in the same circle of God-fearing intellectuals in Rotterdam. As a young enthusiast he was a chiliast and later probably inclined toward Socinianism. He was sharply anti-Catholic.

As a religious poet his chief work was rhyming the Psalms, publishing the first part in 1680, the second a year later (Uitbreiding der Psalmen). The Waterlander congregation in Amsterdam adopted many of his rhymed Psalms into the new hymnal in 1684, the Flemish congregation in 1889. In addition he wrote many other religious songs, which were sung by the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation.

In his secular verse Oudaen sought to imitate the great Vondel (q.v., see also Literature), though with humble reverence and a mediocre poetic gift. Camphuysen (q.v.), whom he adored second only to Vondel, was much more nearly an equal and a more comfortable model. His work also includes dramas and historical poems. A personal trait in his lyric poetry is his lively feeling for nature, and in harmony with it, a conspicuous interest in effects of landscape painting (Jan Porcellis, Adam Willaerts, Hendrik Sorgh, Mierevelt). Oudaen's complete works (Poezy) were published in three volumes at Amsterdam in 1712 with a biography by David van Hoogstraten.

H.F.W.J.

G. J. Boekenooogen, "De portretten van Menno Simons," DB 1916; Cramer, "Bijdragen tot de geschiedenis van ons kerklied," DB 1900, 1902; Arnold Houbraken, Groote Schouburg der Nederlandsche Konstschilders (1718-19); C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs (Haarlem, 1900-2); Gerrit Kalf, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (Groningen, 1906-12 D1. IV); W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912); Jakob Prinsen J. Lzn., Handboek tot de Nederl. letterkundige geschiedenis (The Hague, 1916); J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895); ML III, 329.

Oud-Beyerland: see Beyerland.

Ouddorp, a village on the island of Goeree in the Dutch province of South Holland. The former congregation in this village was at first often called Goeree (or Goedereede), later usually Ouddorp. The origin and early history of the congregation are still unknown. At first the members met in an attic. In 1624 there were some difficulties with the government on account of two marriages concluded in the congregation. The Mennonites yielded. In 1747 the authorities wanted to compel the Mennonites to trade in arms; the result is not clear. Repeatedly the congregation suffered loss through floods, especially in 1717 and 1953. The congregation, which at first belonged to the Flemish branch and in the 18th century joined the Zonist (q.v.) Conference (Sociëteit), was always quite small. (The baptized membership in 1645, 44; 1727, 54; 1744, 47; 1807, 25; 1900, 9; 1955, 31.) In the 17th and early 18th centuries this congregation maintained active relationships with the neighboring congregations of Brouwershaven, Renesse, Zierikzee, Middelharnis, Goes, Spijkenisse, and Den Briel, all of which were dissolved in the 18th century with the exception of Goes. Most of the members at that time were quite well-to-do. In 1671 they contributed 473 guilders to the Fund for Foreign Needs; in the course of the 18th century they collected a total of 590 guilders for the brethren expelled from Switzerland and Poland. In the 19th century several families emigrated to North America. It seemed for a moment that the entire congregation would leave; by that time it had become quite poor. The members are almost exclusively farmers. Well-known names found in Ouddorp since the 17th century are Bosland and Mastenbroek. The meeting-house was probably built before 1771. Few of the ministers of the congregation received training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. The last ministers were G. Pol 1853-62, T. Schiere 1863-74, H. Koekebakker 1874-78, W. J. Leendertz 1878-81, K. W. Rössing 1882-d.1921, F. B. Kooymans 1924-25, W. Schopenhauer 1926-28, R. Foppema 1930-36, and Jacob Thiessen 1939-46. Since 1946 the pulpit has been vacant.

After a severe flood on Feb. 1, 1953, had devastated a part of the island of Goeree, a Mennonite Voluntary Service unit composed of American and Dutch young men worked at Ouddorp. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1065; II, 2, No. 300; DB 1876, 72; 1907, 152-69; DJ 1954, 38 f.; ML II, 131; III, 329.

Oude Friezen (Vriezen), formerly a branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Frisian Mennonites.

Oude Liederen (Old Hymns) is a collection of twelve hymns composed by Joachim Oudaen, Jan Bredenburg Jr., and Reinier Rooleeuw, which was introduced with a new rhymed version of the Psalms in 1684 in the Lam and Toren Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam and used there until 1797. There were a number of reprints: the following unchanged editions are known: Amsterdam 1685 (with notes), Haarlem 1713, Haarlem 1713 (with notes), Amsterdam 1721, Amsterdam 1727, Haarlem 1734, Haarlem 1756, Haarlem 1756 (increased by seven hymns; this edition is entitled Opwekkende Gezangen), Rotterdam 1775 (entitled Liederen en Gezangen), Amsterdam 1793 (two different editions). A greatly revised edition was published at Amsterdam in 1791. (Copies of most of these editions are found in AML.) vDZ.

Oude Maeyken, 't (Maeyken Sprincen), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on Oct. 11, 1559, at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium. She was an aged widow, a native of Maastricht in the Dutch province of Limburg. Her clothing and furniture were confiscated and publicly sold. She was a simple, pious woman, remaining loyal even in temptation and trial, and died steadfast. Maeyken is commemorated in two hymns, (a) "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" and (b) "Babels Raets Mandamenten," both found in the Lietboecxken (Nos. 16 and 19). vDZ.

Offer, 566, 581; Mart. Mir. D 249, E 623, 639; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 3, 9, 16; XIV, 26 f., No. 299; Wolkan, Lied., 63, 71 f.; ML III, 711.

Oude Nieldorp: see Nieldorp.

Oude Pekela: see Pekela.

Oude Vlamingen (Old Flemish), a former branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Flemish Mennonites.

Oude Vriezen (Friezen) (Old Frisians), a former branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Frisian Mennonites.

Oude Zijpe: see Zijpe.

Oude Zwitsers, a group of Swiss immigrants in the Netherlands: see Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.

Oudebildtziyl, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, about ten miles northwest of Leeuwarden. In 1505 a large piece of land was reclaimed from the sea by dykes and was known as the Bildtland, which was drained into the ocean by means of a sluice (zyl), near which the village Oudebildtziyl later arose. Many of the peasants who settled in this Bildt-polder are thought to have organized very soon into a Mennonite congregation, the center of which was probably in Sint Anna-Parochie (q.v., at that time usually called Annakerk). The Mennonites living in and near Oudebildtziyl belonged to this congregation. A list set up on the occasion of the organization of the Mennonite Conference of Friesland (Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit) in 1695 does not name Oudebildtziyl, which indicates that the members were still part of the Annakerk congregation; this is also the case in 1735, but at that date this congregation is called St-Annakerk and Bildtziyl. Blaupot ten Cate (Friesland, 192) writes that in 1695 the St-Annakerk and Oudebildtziyl congregations had already merged and had a total of 118 members, but it is more likely that they had not yet been separated. The congregation had two meetinghouses, one in St-Anna-Parochie and one in Oudebildtziyl. The Oudebildtziyl meetinghouse dated from 1636 or even before. Church records have been preserved since 1642. By 1806 the St-Annakerk congregation had completely disintegrated and the church had been dismantled. In the same year Oudebildtziyl built a new church and became an independent congregation, then numbering 9 baptized members (34 in 1838). In 1812 the congregation called Roelof Schuiling (q.v.) to the ministry; he served until 1817, then moving to Hindeloopen. In 1818 Schuiling was called in a second time, the congregation of Oudebildtziyl now having united with the neighboring congregation of Hallum. Schuiling, who lived at Oudebildtziyl, served until 1857. When he left, each congregation decided to call a pastor, and on Sept. 12, 1858, Lamoraël Noteboom, who had been the minister in Ternaard, became the first pastor of Oudebildtziyl itself. The church building was enlarged in 1860 and again in 1908, and a parsonage was bought, which was renovated in 1891. An organ was installed in 1896. The Oudebildtziyl church is the only Mennonite church in the Netherlands which has a bell in its tower, which serves as the village clock. When the bell was rung on the occasion of the birth of Princess Juliana on April 30, 1909, it cracked; for its repair a contribution was made by Queen Wilhelmina. The new bell was taken by the Germans in 1944. The congregation, which still consists largely of farmers, now (1957) numbers 140 baptized members (88 in 1861, 98 in 1900).

Pastor Noteboom served here until 1883. He was followed by G. E. Frerichs 1884-90, J. Kooiman 1891-93, A. Hermansz ten Cate 1893-99, B. H. Rudolphi 1900-6, R. Kuipers 1906-14, M. A. Hylkema 1915-22, J. Yntema 1922-26, L. D. G. Knipscheer 1926-31, Miss J. M. Eelman 1932-42, H. Bremer 1942-46, D. Attema, a retired minister of Zaandam, 1946-49, B. K. Homan 1950-54, and M. J. Heynes 1955-. The congregation has a Sunday school for children, a youth group, and a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; Naamlijst 1829, 44 f.; DB 1861, 139; 1907, 210; 1909, 191; 1910, 131 f.; ML III, 329 f.

Oudeghodt, Pieter, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter den Ouden.

Oudejan Cornelisz, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jan Cornelisz.

Oudekleerkoper, Joris, an Anabaptist martyr: see Joris.

Oudenaarden (Oudenaerde, Audenarde), a town in the Belgian province of East Flanders (pop. 6,520 in 1951), was a center of Anabaptist activity during the 16th century. Though there is no information concerning congregational life in this town, at least one martyr was executed here, viz., Adriaen den Burry, on July 10, 1565. About the same period there was live Calvinist activity at Oudenaarden; in 1554-73 thirteen Calvinists died here as martyrs. vdZ.

Bibliographie des Martyrologes II (The Hague, 1890) 798; DB 1876, 106.

Oudenaerde (Oudenaarden), (van), a Dutch Mennonite family, probably emigrants from the Belgian town of Oudenaarden (q.v.), was from the 17th century found at Rotterdam, Netherlands. Willem van Oudenaerde, d. Oct. 27, 1726, at Rotterdam at a very advanced age, a grocer and a linen merchant, married to Wilhelmina van Eyse, was in 1682 appointed preacher of the Rotterdam Flemish congregation and in 1691 elder; in 1694 he moved to Middelburg, and thereupon to Dordrecht, but in 1696 he was back in Rotterdam as a preacher in the Waterlander congregation. After the Flemish and the Waterlander congregations merged in 1700 Willem van Oudenaerde was preacher of the united congregation 1701-5. Some of his descendants served in Rotterdam as deacons. Marinus Oudenaarden published a pamphlet, Korte Aanmerkingen (Rotterdam, 1718), against Jan Suderman and Aelbert van Meurs, who had protested against the appointment of David van Heyst (q.v.) as preacher. The van Oudenaerde family has died out. vdZ.

Ouderling (Elder; French, Ancien), a function found in the Dutch Reformed Church and occasionally also among the Dutch Mennonites in the 17th-19th centuries. This function was not the same as that of an elder among the Mennonites of America, i.e., a minister who has been ordained to baptize, to administer communion, and to perform marriages; such a minister was formerly called "oudste" or "leeraar tot ten vollen dienst," by the Dutch Mennonites. The "ouderling" is a lay member of the church board, whose function among the Reformed is to supervise the local congregation; among the Mennonites the function usually was restricted to the control of the congregational finances. Ouderlingen were found in only a few Dutch Mennonite congregations, particularly at Leiden, where this name and function existed in the Waterlander congregation in the last decades of the 17th century and in the Waterlander and Flemish congregation (united 1701) until 1763. Besides the control of finances, they with the preachers paid annual visits to the members of the church. In the Workum congregation ouderlingen are mentioned in 1692, but in 1710 the name of ouderling was abolished here. In Bovenknijpe the name and function of ouderling was found until 1877. vdZ.

DB 1878, 131; DJ 1903, 89; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van . . . de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 76, 123-25 et passim.

Oudeschoot, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in 1563-65 baptized 14 persons. Since there was no congregation in Oudeschoot, the converts may have joined the Mildam (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Oudsluis in the Dutch province of North Holland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, in later times usually called Noord Zijpe. (See Zijpe.) vdZ.

Oudste, Dutch name for elder: see Elder.

Oud-Wulven, a Mennonite home for children at Houten in the Dutch province of Utrecht. It was founded on Sept. 16, 1947, on the initiative of the Mennonite Foundation for Special Needs (see Stichting voor Bizardere Noden) to educate uncared-for children (ages 4-12 or even older). The first directors were Mr. and Mrs. R. de Zeeuw (1947-55). In 1957 about 20 children found shelter in Oud-Wulven. In 1958 the home was moved to Schoorl. vdZ.

Our Bi-Monthly Letter was a four-page M.B.C. missionary periodical published 1913-38 by the United Orphanage and Mission Society, now combined with the United Missionary Society. The first editor was T. Ford Barker and the last Dorinda Bowman. The periodical's interest was that of the Armenians living in Syria, Turkey, and Lebanon. J.A.H.

Out, a Dutch Mennonite family name still found in a number of congregations in North Holland. Jan Pietersz Out was a preacher of the Flemish congregation of Barsingerhorn-Nieuwe Zijpe 1732-52. vdZ.

Outerman, Gilles (Gielis, Jelis), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jelis Outerman.

Outerman, Jacques, b. c1547, probably in Flanders, Belgium, died at an advanced age before 1639 at Haarlem, Holland. As an elder he played an important role among the Mennonites of the Netherlands. He was also called Jacob Keest, Jacob (van)

Reinegom (also Reninge, or Reyninghen). In 1586—he was then a deacon at Franeker in Friesland—he opposed Thomas Bijntgens (Bintgens, q.v.), the elder of the Flemish congregation in Franeker. The consequence was a division of the congregation into two factions known as the Thomas Bijntgensvolk or Huiskopers (Housebuyers) and the Jacob Keestvolk or Contra-Huiskopers. This schism was not induced solely by the purchase of a house, but had its roots in the practice of the ban, the Huiskopers being the stricter, the Jacob Keestvolk the more lenient group. The division was not confined to the Franeker congregation. Soon there were found everywhere Old Flemish (followers of Bijntgens) and Young (or Gentle) Flemish, usually called simply Flemish, the party of Outerman being the more numerous.

Later Outerman was elder of the large Haarlem Flemish congregation “in den Block.” About 1616 he was deposed and banned by Jan Luies, the elder of strict Groningen Mennonites; but his congregation remained loyal to him.

Outerman took an active part in compiling the new martyr book, in which the Waterlanders and Frisians also co-operated, which was to replace the smaller Offer des Heeren (q.v.). The Groote Offerboek appeared in 1615 with a foreword by Hans de Ries (see Historie der Martelaren). Outerman for some reason, now unknown, had already finished his contribution to the book.

Outerman must have had a wide influence; the Reformed preachers wrote in warning that the populace looked up to him as to a bishop, shepherd, and master and regarded him as an apostle. Outerman was an unusually prolific writer, writing until a very advanced age. His works are mostly of a polemic character, dealing with the schisms among the Dutch Mennonites. The most important are Nootwendige Verantwoordinghe . . . tot wederlegghen van de Evangelische mijdinge (anonymous, n.p., 1595), Onder verbeteringhe. Verclaringhe met bewijs wt den droevighen handel van Vriesen ende Vlaminghen . . . (n.p., 1609), and Copie eens Briefs, soo Jaques Outerman eertijds geschreven heeft . . . tot onderrichtinghe van de droevighe Sake, so eertijds tusschen die men nu Vriesen ende Vlamingen noemt, ghevallen is (Haarlem, 1634).

In 1608-9 Outerman was attacked by Johannes Zeeuw and Idzardus Nicolai, Reformed preachers, and in 1626 by a Reformed preacher of Haarlem, Johannes Acronius, accusing him of Socinianism, which was heretical on the doctrine of the Trinity, and which the Reformed Church was alertly guarding against at that time. Outerman had to account for his position before the States of Holland. He defended himself and wrote a confession of faith which was signed by nineteen Flemish preachers and presented to the court of Holland on Oct. 8, 1626. This confession deals with the “Eenigen Godt, Vader, Soon en Heyligen Geest” and the incarnation of the Son of God. It was examined and declared Biblical. Outerman had no further difficulties, and the building of the meetinghouse, which the government had halted, could now proceed. But it is a question whether Outerman in his dogmatic rationalism and in his observations on the Trinity did not deviate too far from the simple words of the Bible and thereby to some extent approach Socinianism.

Outerman's confession was apparently highly regarded by some of the Mennonites. It was included in the book that contains the general confessions (De algemeene Belijdenissen . . ., Amsterdam, 1665). And in 1735, at the meeting called for the founding of a seminary, the more conservative Zonists (q.v.) asked (though in vain) whether Outerman's confession should not be taken as the basis for the seminary.

Little is known about the last years of Outerman's life. In 1637 he was still living, for in this year he published Een claer Bewijs uyt Godts Woordt, dat Godt . . . alle menschen door Christum . . . voorzien ende verkonen heeft tot den eeuwigen Leven. Jelis Outerman (q.v.), who died as a martyr in 1561 at Brugge, Belgium, may have been a relative of Jacques Outerman. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 492, 580, 582, 586, 636; II, 2, No. 66; Bibliographie II, 503; Kühler, Geschiedenis II; idem, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 90-105; DB 1870, 59, 63; 1876, 39; 1893, 80; 1899, 103; 1904, 117, 120; 1906, 145, 147; BRN VII, 70 f.; ML III, 330.

Outgert Jacob Barbierszoon, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Jan. 7, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, together with ten others, who were apparently all David-Jorists (q.v.). Outgert is said to have been a lantern maker from the province of Groningen. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 159-60; 1917, 160-67.) vdZ.

Outrijve, van (originally d'Hauteryve, also Houterijve, Houtryve, Outryve, Autryve), a Mennonite family from French Flanders. In the early 17th century they left Belgium and moved to Aardenburg in Dutch Zealand Flanders and other towns of the province of Zeeland, like Vlissingen, Middelburg, and Goes. Joos(t) van Outrijve (d. about 1666 at Vlissingen) was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation in this town. A collection of his sermons, entitled De sterre Jacobs of een ligt der Ziende, bestaande in XVIII Predicaten (Vlissingen, 1688), was published after his death. This book also contains several treatises and some letters by van Outrijve. The letters were separately reprinted at Groningen in 1720. His grandson Joost Pieters van Outryve (d. 1704 at Vlissingen) willed a large part of his property to the Vlissingen Mennonite congregation. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 564.) vdZ.

Ouwejan(s), Jacob, b. Oct. 29, 1706, at Zaandam, d. Oct. 2, 1781, at Rotterdam, was the scion of a Mennonite family living for more than two centuries at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland, where they were mostly engaged in shipbuilding. Some of them were deacons in the United Mennonite congregation in the “Nieuwe Huys” of West Zaandam. Jacob Ouwejan(s), at first engaged in shipbuilding, was made a preacher of this congregation on Nov. 25, 1725, when he was 19 years old. He had received no special training for this position. In 1741 he was called by the Flemish congregation of Danzig, Prussia, to mediate in the dissension that had arisen in this congregation, particularly with Elder Hendrik van Dühren (q.v.). On Sept. 3, 1741, a few days before leaving Holland, he was ordained elder in the Zonist church in Amsterdam by Petrus Smidt; "after a long, difficult, and dangerous journey" he was affectionately received in Danzig. He preached his first sermon in the Flemish congregation in the city on Nov. 5, 1741, and soon succeeded in restoring peace. After only six weeks he received a call from the Rotterdam congregation, and although he was invited to stay in Danzig, he returned to Holland. On June 10, 1742, he preached his first sermon for the United Waterlander and Flemish congregation in Rotterdam, and stayed here nearly thirty years. The new, very handsome church (destroyed in 1940) was dedicated by him on May 28, 1775, with a sermon, Sions Tempelvreugd (Rotterdam, 1775). He was extraordinarily strong in body and mind. At that time there was occasional dissension in the congregation. Ouweijans favored the minority group of conservative Flemish, thereby offending the majority. Later he was involved in some difficulty with his more liberal colleague Menalda. He resigned on Sept. 16, 1781, and died after a few weeks. In 1761 he published a collection of sermons, Hemel en Aarde Verheugd. His son Jan Ouweijans and his grandson Jan Ouwejan van den Berg served the Rotterdam congregation as deacons in 1782-1810 and 1816-33. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 31, 47, 57, 186, 193; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1680; II, Nos. 2673, 2675; II, 2, No. 812; Naamlijst 1787, 56-62; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Rotterdam (1907, reprint) 29, 32, 44; DB 1864, 106-8; 1912, 108; ML III, 331.

Overbeek, a Dutch Mennonite family, which (according to Blaupot ten Cate, Groningen I, 32) originally lived in Münsterland, Germany, from where its members in the 17th century moved to Twente, the southeastern district of the Dutch province of Overijssel, where they are still found. Other descendants have spread throughout the Netherlands. In Twente most of them lived in Hengelo. A few Overbeeks have been ministers. Hendrik Overbeek, a weaver, was a lay preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Hengelo from 1727 until he retired in 1743. He died about 1762. Klaas Tigler Overbeek (d. 1847) of Dokkum was a minister of the Franeker Mennonite congregation 1811-46, while his son Pieter Overbeek served the congregation of Terhorne 1841-67. Cornelis Loosjes Overbeek, b. 1793 at Haarlem, d. 1841 at Zutphen, a son of Lucas Overbeek and Engeltje Loosjes, served at Zutphen 1819-38. He then went into business. He left some property to the A.D.S. vdZ.

Overd'hage, Petrus (Pieter de Zuttere, Suttere), usually called Hyperphragmus, was a Reformed theologian. This remarkable man, who was born before 1530 at Gent, Belgium, joined the local Reformed church and probably was their preacher. He left Gent about 1566 and then lived for some time in Emden, Germany, and later in Rotterdam, Holland. Here he was not admitted to the Reformed pulpit because the strict Calvinists accused him of heterodoxy. In 1581 he was back in Gent, and in 1593 he became a Reformed pastor at Hoogmade, Dutch province of North Brabant, but was dismissed the next year. Of his life not much is known.

Whether he was a relative of the Mennonite de Zuttere (de Sitter) family could not be ascertained. He published a number of theological and devotional books. He was a spiritualist, as is shown from his confession in Latin of 1594 (a confession of 1595, written by Overd'hage in the Dutch language, agrees much more with the Calvinist doctrines); he was thought by some to have been an adherent of D. V. Coornhert (q.v.), and by others a follower of Schwenckfeld (q.v.).

Overd'hage is of special interest as the editor of Henric Rol's (q.v.) book De Slotel van dat secreet des Nachtsmaels onses Heren J.C. (The Key of the Secret of the Lord's Supper). The assumption of some theologians that the author of De Slotel was not the Anabaptist Rol, but Overd'hage himself, is an error, as S. Cramer has proved in BRN V, 6-14. Overd'hage was very sympathetic to the Mennonites and is said to have preached sometimes in their meetings. vdZ.

Bibliotheca Belgica i.v. de Zuttere; DB 1884, 56 f., 58, 60; Chr. Sepp, Drie Evangeliedienaren uit den Tijd der Hervorming (Leiden, 1879) 81-122; a study by H. Q. Janssen on Hyperphragmus has been published in Stu-diën en Bijdragen, verzameld door W. Moll en J. G. de Hoop Scheffer IV (Amsterdam, 1880) 321 ff.; J. H. Wessel, De leerstellige strijd tusschen Nederl. Gereformeerden en Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Assen, 1946) 122; L. Knappert, Het ontstaan en de vestiging van het Protestantisme in de Nederlanden (Utrecht, 1924) 190-92.

Overholt, John D. (1797-1878), a great-grandson of Martin Oberholtzer of Frankfurt a.M., Germany, who emigrated to America and settled near Deep Run, Bucks Co., Pa. He was ordained as minister in 1830 for the church in Westmoreland County, Pa. In 1833 he was ordained bishop. In his work as bishop he made annual trips as far west as Columbiana County, Ohio. In 1857 Henry Yother (1810-1900) was ordained bishop to assist John D. Overholt. W.D.S.

Edward Yoder, "The Mennonites of Westmoreland County, Pa.," MQR XV (1941) 151-86.

Overijssel, a province in the Netherlands, area 1,295 sq. miles, pop. 554,000, including 2,700 Mennonites. These are found in the three towns of Deventer, Zwolle, and Kampen, in the northern tip of the province, where the congregations of Blokzijl, Giet-hoorn, Steenwijk, and Zwartsluis are located, while a smaller congregation in Oldemarkt died out in the middle of the 18th century; also in Twente (q.v.) in the southeast of the province, opposite the German border, where the congregations of Almelo, Borne, Hengelo, and Enschedé, formerly also Goor, are located. In the three cities we come upon Anabaptists soon after 1530, and congregations were formed soon after. The congregation in Deventer, concerning which we are well informed, had a very hard time, whereas those at Kampen and Zwolle apparently developed peacefully.

The congregations in the northern point date from the end of the 16th century. In Twente, which remained under Spanish rule until 1626, the Mennonites could hardly expand before that year. Nevertheless there are indications that the congregations of Almelo and Enschedé date back to about 1580. The Mennonite groups were augmented especially by the immigration of weavers and merchants from Westphalia, Germany. (The supposed immigration of a large number of Mennonite weavers from Flanders, Belgium, is very questionable.) They have been of great importance economically. Twente, now a great industrial center, in the manufacture principally of textiles, became what it is largely because of the Mennonites. In Overijssel there was no federation of congregations, as in Friesland; the congregations were too independent for such a step.

Until the beginning of the 19th century the congregations in Overijssel belonged to several Mennonite branches. It is conspicuous that they for the most part were members of the more conservative groups. The more liberal Waterlanders had congregations only in Blokzijl and Zwolle, which were very small. Many congregations belonged to the Groninger Old Flemish, whereas the congregations in Oldemarkt, one in Blokzijl, Zuidveen (later merged with Steenwijk), and one in Giethoorn belonged to the very strictest wing of the Danzig Old Flemish (q.v.).

On the whole, the records of the Mennonites in Overijssel are so scarce that it is impossible to create an exact picture. The magistrates in this province were often very ungracious to the Mennonites. In 1633 they forbade them to have their marriages performed in their own meetinghouses; they were to be performed by the civil authorities after being proclaimed three times in the Reformed churches (these regulations were repeated in 1636, 1649, 1653, 1659, and 1698). In 1625 Mennonite church meetings were forbidden in Overijssel, but in 1631 their meetings were tolerated on the condition that they would not be held publicly. From about 1690 the magistrates became more lenient.

The congregations of Blokzijl, Giethoorn, Steenwijk, Zwartsluis, Kampen, Zwolle, Deventer, are now united in the Zwolsche Ring. The Almelo, Borne, Hengelo, and Enschedé congregations form the Ring Twente.

The eleven congregations in this province had a total baptized membership of 1,202 in 1834 (previous figures not available for most congregations), 1,519 in 1860, 2,031 in 1900, 2,499 in 1929, 2,487 in 1955. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 113, 282, 374; DB 1878, 4 ff.; 1879, 7, 92 ff.; 1910, 10; N. van der Zijpp, De Doopsgezinde in Overijssel (repr. 1932); ML III, 289.

Overlanders, a 16th-century term used in Holland for Mennonites of Germany (DB 1864, 26; 1875, 28) and particularly those in South Germany (DB 1905, 77, those in Strasbourg; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 865b, those in Strasbourg and South Germany). Hans de Ries (q.v.), the leader of the Waterlander Mennonites in Holland about 1616, wrote a letter (undated) to the "Overlandsche Broeders," seeking to make peace with them (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 556). But soon, especially after a large number of Mennonites from Germany had moved to the Netherlands, the name of "Overlanders" disappeared, both the Mennonites in Germany and those who had moved to Holland generally being called "Hoogduitsche Doopsgezinden" (High German Mennonites). Alenson (BRN VII, 190) says that the Overlanders did not accept the view on the Incarnation (q.v.) taught by Menno Simons and the strict Dutch leaders; and it was said (BRN VII, 460, 465) that the Overlanders were mild in the practice of banning. De Hoop Scheffer's idea (DB 1877, 68) that the "Overlandsch" dialect was spoken in North Germany is not correct. (See also High German Mennonites.) vdZ.

Overmeer, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which had a small membership and at least from 1680 was united with the neighboring congregation at Weesp (q.v.), though in this union Overmeer seems to have had a degree of independence. By 1718 the Overmeer congregation had died out. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 301-3; DB 1872, 67.) vdZ.

Oversticht, an old name of the Dutch province of Overijssel (q.v.). (See Stichtsche Handel.) vdZ.

Overwij(c)k, Harmen R. van: see Reynskes, Harmen.

Owen County, Ind., the seat of the extinct Bower Mennonite Church (MC), the members of which lived in both Owen and Clay (q.v.) counties. The meetinghouse was located in Marion Township, Owen County. One of the early settlers there was Bishop Daniel Funk (1781-1859). Later bishops in the church were Jacob Bower (1803-67), after whom the church was named, Michael Mishler (d. 1871), and Daniel Royer (active in the last quarter of the 19th century). The last two ministers were Jacob Hoffer (1827-1906), ordained in 1872, and Daniel Kinports (1830-1912), ordained about 1885. One of the more active leaders was Deacon George Funk (1812-96), ordained in 1872. The last deacon was Jacob Kilmer (1819-1909). Bishop John M. Breneman (q.v.) of Elida, Ohio, visited the group and tried to help them, as did also John S. Coffman in 1883. But the group was very conservative and seems to have never started a Sunday school. The first meetinghouse of 1861 was destroyed by a tornado in 1883, and the new meetinghouse built in the same year was sold by the Indiana-Michigan Conference in 1928. Today only the cemetery is left, and it is in poor condition. The father of D. A. Yoder, Peter B. Yoder (1855-1948), was born in Owen County. Some of the Mennonites left the area because of the intermittent fever (ague) which plagued the residents. J.C.W.

Oyer, Noah (1891-1931), an able educator in the Mennonite Church (MC), was born April 11, 1891, at Metamora, Ill., the son of John P. and Mary Smith Oyer. He secured his high-school and college training at Hesston (A.B., 1919), his seminary training at Princeton (Th.B., 1922), and almost completed an M.A. at Franklin and Marshall College (1922), was ordained preacher Sept. 30, 1923. He served as head of the Bible department at Hesston 1922-24, dean 1923-24, and pastor of the Hesston College congregation. In 1924 he was called as head of the Bible department and dean of Goshen College, serving as the academic leader and pastor of the College church in a crucial period of reconstruction. He played a vital role in the general leadership of the Mennonite Church (MC), as a member of the Mennonite Board of Education for nine years, and as chairman of the General Sunday School Committee for seven years, this committee being a General Conference standing committee. He was married Aug. 9, 1916, to Siddie King. Two of his children, John Oyer and Mary Oyer, are professors at Goshen College.

H.S.B.

In Memoriam Dean Noah Oyer 1891-1931 (Goshen, 1931).

Ozark County, Mo., the location of a small Mennonite settlement in the 1890's, is on the Arkansas border. On Nov. 12, 1891, A. B. Kolb wrote to C. Z. Yoder, giving him instructions for a western trip, "Write to Noah D. Troyer, Oak Mound, Ozark Co., Mo. . . . There are only a few families here and no minister, and complain that they have been slighted. There is also a C. K. Miller at Bakersville, Ozark Co., Mo., but I do not know where he lives from Bro. Troyer." M.G.

Ozark Mennonite Brethren Mission: see Martin Box Chapel.

Pacific Bible Institute of Fresno came into being in response to a long-felt need on the part of the Mennonite Brethren Church on the Pacific Coast to have a Bible School where the young people might avail themselves of a sound Biblical training in an institution organically related to their own conference. On Sept. 18, 1944, the Pacific Bible Institute of Fresno was formally opened with an enrollment of 27 students in Fresno, Cal., in a large residence at 1095 N. Van Ness. Six faculty members, four full-time and two part-time, had been engaged by the Board of Directors. The enrollment increased to 35 students during the second semester of the school year. Toward the close of the first year another building, a former YMCA building, was purchased at 2149 Tuolumne, a three-story structure. In 1954 the Mennonite Brethren Conference of North America initiated a program of unification in its various educational endeavors and the Institute became a General Conference school. A 20-acre site near Fresno has been purchased for a new campus and to be developed over a period of years.

The aims of the school are as follows: (1) To give young people a thorough knowledge of the Bible; (2) To train them in the highest type of Christian living in whatever walk of life they may find themselves; (3) To prepare them for Christian service, at home or abroad; (4) To fortify them against the various unscriptural philosophies of life; (5) To send forth sanctified Christlike personalities, yielded and obedient to the Master.

In keeping with its purpose the Institute has made the study of the Bible the very center of its curriculum. For some time the Institute offered four- and five-year programs granting the Bible College Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Theology degrees. In keeping, however, with the program of unification and co-ordination a three-year course is now offered, leading to a diploma in Bible and a two-year course granting the Associate in Arts degree in liberal arts or sacred music.

The Bachelor of Theology has been transferred to the Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, which was established on the same campus in 1956, and there expanded to a Bachelor of Divinity course. The following have served as presidents: S. W. Goossen 1944-46, G. W. Peters 1947-52, R. M. Baerg (acting) 1953-55, and B. J. Braun 1955-. G.W.P.

Pacific Coast Conference (MC) was organized Nov. 1, 1906, to include the three Mennonite churches of Oregon and Idaho which had previously belonged to the Kansas-Nebraska Conference, with a total of 135 members, viz., Nampa (Idaho), Albany (Ore.), and Hopewell (Hubbard) (Ore.). Later, besides additional congregations in Idaho and Oregon, newly established congregations in California, Arizona, and New Mexico were added. The Amish Mennonite congregations in Oregon which had belonged to the Western A.M. Conference joined the Pacific Coast Conference in 1921. Before the merger in 1920 the Pacific Coast Conference had six congregations with 362 members; the merger added three congregations with 449 members. In 1948 the congregations in Southern California, Arizona, and New Mexico withdrew to form the South Pacific Conference. In 1957 the Pacific Coast Conference had a total membership of 2,174 in 21 organized and 12 mission congregations distributed as follows: Oregon 17 organized and 8 mission congregations with 1,680 members; Idaho three organized and two mission congregations with 293 members; California one organized and one mission with 21 members. Creston, Mont., which had been a member of the Western A.M. Conference until 1916, then joined the Pacific Coast Conference, transferred to the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference in 1923.

The conference has a district mission board established in 1906 (organ, The Missionary Evangel, established in 1944), a Christian workers' conference, a high school (Western Mennonite School) founded in 1945 at Salem, and a Home for the Aged founded in 1946 at Albany. Within the bounds of the conference are also three private elementary schools and the Lebanon Community Hospital, operated but not owned by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. H.S.B.

Pacific District Conference (GCM) was organized in Pratum, Ore., on May 25, 1896. The first meeting was planned and arranged by J. B. Baer, then Field Secretary of the General Conference. P. Steiner and J. Amstutz of Bluffton, Ohio, S. F. Sprunger of Berne, Ind., J. J. Balzer of Mountain Lake, Minn., and C. Kaufman of South Dakota greatly helped to make that first session a success. Three small churches, Irving and Pratum, Ore., and Colfax, Wash., and a Sunday school of Dallas, Ore., were represented at the first meeting; the Amish church of Eugene, Ore., also participated. S. F. Sprunger was elected as chairman of that historic meeting and J. J. Balzer served as secretary. At that session "a Program-Business Committee, consisting of three members, was elected to which all the work was assigned until the appointing of the first Resolutions Committee in 1904 and the election of a permanent Evangelization Committee in 1908. The President and Secretary were elected at the beginning of each session until the close of the third session. From this time on they were elected in advance for the ensuing year."

The second session was held at Eugene, Ore., in 1897. J. B. Baer was elected as president and David Goertz as secretary. At that session it was decided that congregational representation at Conference be granted on the basis of one vote for every ten members. This arrangement is still in effect.

In 1908 the Conference accepted a constitution (German language) which the Business Committee had been instructed to prepare. In 1937 it was revised and translated into English.

According to Article Three, "The purpose of this organization is to promote fellowship among the churches, to co-operate in the spreading and establishing of the Kingdom of God in our own district, and to give united support to the work done by the various boards of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America."

Article Four states their principle as follows: "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ." The Pacific Conference is not a law-making but an advisory body, and therefore does not consider itself authorized to dictate rules of government to the congregations. It is a union for joint work, and among other things seeks to find ways and means to assist the scattered settlements, by advice and actual help, in the edification and advancement of their congregations, and therefore makes only such regulations as are necessary to carry on this united work. In regard to matters of faith it requires of these congregations who would unite with it that they adhere to the doctrines generally accepted by the Mennonites. By these Mennonite doctrines we understand, baptism on confession of faith, the abstaining from oaths, a Biblical nonresistance, the practice of a Scriptural church discipline, and the inadvisability of membership in secret oath-bound societies, since we consider their principles as contrary to the teachings of Christ and the apostles."

In addition to the regular conference officers, the following standing committees are elected by the delegates: the Evangelization Committee, Education Committee, Peace Committee, and Business Committee.

The Conference has always been interested in missionary work. In 1908 they encouraged the General Conference to open a mission in Los Angeles. In 1928 they started a work in Portland, Ore., in 1949 a new project at Sweet Home, Ore., and in 1954 they helped organize a work at Fresno, Cal., and Filer, Idaho. The congregations have also co-operated in lending assistance to some of the smaller struggling churches of the District.

The Pacific District is the smallest (in membership) of the six districts of the General Conference in the United States, but extends over the largest territory. It includes the area between Canada and Mexico, and the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean. The great distances between church groups have been a serious handicap in holding frequent fraternal gatherings of the various auxiliary organizations. It has therefore been necessary for them to carry on various phases of the conference activity on a sectional basis. The young people's gatherings are of this nature. Each state conducts its own youth retreats. The California young people conduct an annual Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor convention. They elect their own officers and sponsor their own missionary project.

The Pacific District Conference, which was organized by three small congregations, has now grown into an organization of 23 churches with a total membership of nearly 3,500. Six of these are located in Oregon, six in Washington, eight in California, and three in Idaho. H.D.B.

Mennonite Year Book 1932, 32; H. D. Burkholder, "The Story of Our Conference and Churches (N. Newton, 1951).

Pacific District Conference (MB), created in 1913, includes 22 congregations with a total membership in 1957 of 5,070 distributed as follows: Washington one congregation with 187 members; Oregon two, 507; and California nineteen, 4,376. Most of the congregations are located in the San Joaquin Valley of California, with the center in Reedley. A graduate Biblical Seminary was established in Fresno in 1955 alongside a previously (1944) established Junior College and Bible Institute. The first congregations in the conference were established in 1905 at Reedley. In 1942 an Old People's Home was established at Reedley. The Pacific District M.B. Youth Fellowship was set up in 1948. The present conference organization includes among others the Executive Committee, the Home Missions Committee, and the Sunday School Committee. H.S.B.

J. H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1950) 159-76.

Pacifism is a term derived from the Latin meaning peacemakers, the word being used in Matthew 5:9. New Testament or Christian pacifism is therefore identical in its meaning with New Testament nonresistance (q.v.), also taught in the Sermon on the Mount and throughout the New Testament. As generally employed, however, the term pacifism is used to cover many varieties of peacemaking, which may or may not be Christian in their orientation. Some modern pacifists oppose all wars and some do not. Some who do oppose all wars find their authority in the will of God and in the word of Scripture, while others find it largely in human reason.

While recognizing these differences and realizing the impossibility of a generalization which covers accurately all cases, the following would seem to be the chief criticisms of modern pacifism generally, seen from the viewpoint of New Testament nonresistance as found in the Anabaptist tradition:

(1) Pacifism too frequently sees peace as an end in itself, whereas the New Testament sees it as "the fruit of the Christian Gospel; peace is the fruit of regenerated individual lives. . . . While it includes social and political reconstruction, these collectivist improvements also root in the radical change necessary in the human heart." Thus, the primary task of the peacemaker is to bring individuals into direct contact with Jesus Christ the Prince of Peace.

(2) Pacifism is frequently too optimistic concerning the possible achievement of world peace. It does not reckon sufficiently with the reality of sin, and too lightly assumes the transformation of the unregenerate social order into the kingdom of God.

(3) Pacifism frequently fails to understand the basic nature of the state as an organization for the maintenance of order by coercive means in a sinful social order. It too lightly essays to administer this state by Christian principles, whereas the police power of the state is in fact the wrath of God at work among men, causing their evil doings to be kept in check by forcible means which are likewise evil. It is freely recognized that some states approach the Christian standard more nearly than do others, and that some statesmen are men of integrity and Christian character more than others. In the best of states within the unregenerate social order, however, the basic nature remains the same, hence a frequent pacifist assumption that the state may use the Sermon on the Mount as its basic constitution is an illusion.

D. D. King, "The Pacific District Conference," Mennonite Year Book 1925, 40; P. R. Aeschlimann, "The Pacific District Conference," Mennonite Year Book 1930, 23; idem, "History of the Pacific District Conference,"

(4) As a consequence of this misunderstanding pacifism frequently compromises with the coercive methods of the state. In so doing it waters down the high ethic of the New Testament. Its love is not sufficiently far-reaching. Nonresistance, love, and the cross give way to nonviolent coercion or nonviolence (q.v.), which in its essence is a form of warfare. G.F.H.

Don. E. Smucker, "A Mennonite Critique of the Pacifist Movement," MQR XX (January 1946) 81-88; Guy F. Hersberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance (Scottsdale, 1953); idem, The Way of the Cross in Human Relations (Scottsdale, 1958); J. R. Mumaw, Nonresistance and Pacifism.

Page County (Iowa) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was founded by three families from Allen County, Ohio, in 1864. Among them was John S. Good, who was ordained minister of the new church before these families left Ohio for their new home in the West. During the first two decades of the history of the community, Mennonite families by the names of Good, Horning, Hoffman, Ferguson, Snively, Shellenberger, Lapp, Gehman, and Eberly settled in the community, scattering through four townships in the southeast quarter of the county. By 1878 the church membership had declined to 20. When Andrew Good moved to Missouri in 1890, the Page County church was left without a preacher. That date marked the end of the congregation, although the few families remaining were visited by evangelists every few years during the nineties. The lack of aggressive leadership and the unwillingness of the congregation to organize a Sunday school have been given as reasons for the death of the church. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 149-55.

Page County (Iowa) United Missionary churches had their origins in a Brethren in Christ congregation which joined the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church in 1885 or later. The first of the two congregations is the Shambaugh United Missionary Church. When it was incorporated in 1894 it had 25 members. The New Market United Missionary Church was established in 1893 and incorporated the following year with nine members. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 344-49.

Page County, Va., is situated in the valley drained by the South Fork of the Shenandoah River. This river flows north between the Massanutten Mountain and the Blue Ridge (Shenandoah Forest). It was near Luray, the county seat, that the first and largest settlement of Mennonites was made in Virginia in the second quarter of the 18th century. This area had had a checkered political history before it became Page County. It was at first in Spotylvania County which originally included all the land in Virginia west of the Blue Ridge. In 1734-38 it was a part of Orange County, 1738-45 of Augusta County, 1745-72 of Frederick County, and 1772-1831 of Shenandoah County. Then in 1831 that part of Shenandoah County lying between the Massanutten Mountain and the Blue Ridge was taken to form Page County.

The Mennonites came to Page County from Bucks, Berks, and Lancaster counties, Pa., as early as 1727, settling along the South Fork of the Shenandoah River and its tributaries. The settlement prospered during its first 25 years. Perhaps one meetinghouse, the old Hamburg church, a union church (still standing), was built at this time. If so, it was the first church which the Mennonites helped to build in Virginia. A Harmonia Sacra Singing is held in this old church annually.

This early settlement was not without its hardships. In 1758 an Indian raid, associated with the French and Indian War, practically wiped out the settlement for a short time. The people fled to Pennsylvania, where an appeal was made to the Dutch Mennonites for help in a letter which is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. This letter, dated Sept. 7, 1758, and signed by Michael Kauffman, Jacob Boner, Samuel Böhm, and Daniel Stauffer, says, "We were thirty-nine Mennonite families living together in Virginia. One family was murdered and the rest of us and many other families were obliged to flee for our lives, leaving all and going empty-handed." The letter goes on to say that in addition to "our brother and companion in the faith Johannes Schneyder, who is contemplating a journey to the friends and brethren in Holland, . . . our minister and elder, Martin Funck," would go along to Holland to assist in presenting the request for help. Funck was "still a single man, and by occupation a miller. He, too, was compelled to flee and leave all behind." Apparently Martin Funck was the bishop of the Page County congregation, which numbered 39 families or about 100 members in 1758.

In 1764 eight Indians led by a white man killed Preacher John Rhodes (Roads) and members of his family. This is known in Virginia history as the "Rhodes Massacre." The house and barn on the old Rhodes homestead were burned.

Decline began when a number of Mennonites joined the Baptist Church prior to and after the American Revolution. A number of Page County Mennonites moved elsewhere. Local leadership in the church was not maintained. The dwindling membership was served by Rockingham County preachers until 1885, when there were not enough members left in Page County to justify the 30 or more miles of travel to serve them. H.A.B.

"Experience of Mennonite Settlers in Virginia," Mennonite Yearbook & Almanac 1911, p. 18; H. A. Brunk, Early Mennonite Settlements in Virginia (Harrisonburg, 1959).

Pagitt, E(dward), author of Heresiography or A description of the Hereticks and Sectaries of these latter times (London, ? 2d ed. London, 1645). The author, who was a minister in the Church of England, probably at London, enumerates a large number of "heresies" with a refutation of their "errors."

Among these heresies the Anabaptists and also the Brownists (q.v.) occupy a large place. The "Mennonists" (Mennonites) are finished off in one sentence. Though the booklet has some value for the enumeration of the many sects found in England in the early 17th century, the information about the Anabaptists given here is of no great value, the author's sources being biased historians such as Bullinger and Niellius. vdZ.

Pain, an Anabaptist martyr of Swabia, South Germany, was executed with Wolfgang Esslinger (q.v.), Martin Zehentmaier (q.v.), and four other Anabaptists at Schwäbisch-Gmünd after a year's imprisonment in 1529 (the Martyrs' Mirror erroneously gives 1531 as the date). Three songs were written to commemorate their death. NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 32, E 439; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 51-55; Wolkan, Lieder, 21; ML III, 333.

Pakantan, formerly a mission station of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society on the island of Sumatra, Indonesia (formerly Dutch East Indies), south of Sipiroh, was founded on Jan. 10, 1871, by Heinrich Dirks (q.v.). On Aug. 3, 1871, he received the first three converts into the congregation by baptism. When he left to return to Russia in 1881 there were 100 members. The station was taken over by Tilmann Irle (q.v.) of the Rhineland Mission, and by Gerhard Nikkel (q.v.) in 1888. Nikkel returned to Europe in 1900, and was replaced by Johann Thiessen 1901-9. For a short time David Dirks, the son of the founder, worked here. In 1911 Peter Nachtigal (q.v.) took charge of this post and served faithfully until his premature death (1928). Since that time the congregation was without a missionary, cared for by native workers, until it joined the native Christian Batak church. With the support of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society, a hospital and a school were built at Pakantan. NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1879, 30 ff.; several issues of the reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society; DB 1891, 40 f.; De Zondagsbode XVII (1903-4) No. 13; Uit Verleden en heden van de Doopsgezinde Zending, 1914, 20-23, 52, 54; ML III, 332.

Palamau, a political district in the province of Bihar, India, on the west side of Hazaribagh District (q.v.). Its southern section comprises the western part of the Bihar Mennonite (MC) Mission (q.v.) field. In 1956 there were three mission stations in this field, Latehar (q.v.), Chandwa, and Bathet. The Palamau field was acquired from the British Churches of Christ Mission. Evangelistic, medical, and educational work are done. There are a number of small village congregations and schools administered by the missionaries and Indian workers. The following missionaries have served in this field with their families: John E. Beachy, Henry D. Becker, S. J. Hostetler, Paul Kniss, S. Allen Shirk, and M. C. Vogt. The Indian evangelists and teachers in 1956 were Kishore Bakhla, Herem Bhengara, D. M. Lakras, Masihdas Minz, Phulchand Minz, Prem-lata Royan, Daniel Tirki, Joel Tirki, Rabi Tirki, and A. M. Toponos. S.J.Ho.

Palaeologus, Jakob, an anti-Trinitarian (Unitarian), a native of the island of Chios, came to Transylvania and Poland in 1575, where he became an influential Socinian. Socinus, however, repudiated his teaching that military service and holding worldly office are compatible with the profession of Christianity, and of the non-adoration of Jesus. Palaeologus was burned at the stake as a heretic in Rome in 1585. Worthy of note is his book against infant baptism: De baptismo liberorum. NEFF.

F. S. Bock, Historia Antitrinitariorum I (Königsberg, 1784) 583-87; RGG IV, Col. 869; ML III, 332.

Palatinate, a government district of the German state of Rhineland-Palatinate (since 1945), having Neustadt a.d.W. as its government seat. From 1815 to 1918 it belonged to the kingdom of Bavaria, and still earlier (until 1801) known as the Kurpfalz, which extended across the Rhine and had (until 1720) Heidelberg as its capital and later (until 1778) Mannheim. Enclosed by the Palatinate were the bishoprics of Worms and Speyer. In the realm of the Kurpfalz lay the duchies (e.g., Pfalz-Zweibrücken), several principalities (e.g., Simmern, Veldenz, and Lautern) and graviates (e.g., Leiningen, Falkenstein, Wartenberg, and parts of Sponheim). For a long time the Upper Palatinate (since 1918 in Bavaria) was politically connected with the Palatinate on the Rhine.

Since early times the Palatinate has been splintered politically as well as religiously. In accord with the principle of cuius regio, eius religio, most of the population changed its faith five times in the 16th century. Catholic doctrine, supported by Elector Louis V (d. 1544), was followed by the Lutheran under Frederick II (d. 1556) and Otto Henry (d. 1559), the Reformed under Frederick III (d. 1576), again the Lutheran under Louis VI (d. 1583), and finally the Reformed under John Kasimir (d. 1592). These ecclesiastical changes were one of the factors which made it possible for Anabaptism to enter the Palatinate early and to develop—in spite of much resistance—to considerable strength.

Deep inroads were made into the post-Reformation history of the Palatinate by the Thirty Years' War (1618-48) and the French Revolution (1789-1815). Accordingly the 400-year history of the Anabaptists-Mennonites falls into three clearly defined eras: (1) from the origin of Anabaptism c1525 to its almost complete extinction in the Thirty Years' War (100 years); (2) from the immigration of Swiss Mennonites from the middle of the 17th century until the reorganization of the Palatinate c1800 (150 years); (3) from the beginning of the freedom of the 19th century to the present (150 years).

I. The origin of Anabaptism in the Palatinate presumably precedes the formation of the first congregation in Switzerland. Johannes Risser, pastor of the Sembach congregation in 1832-68, says that "already by 1522, and especially after the Peasant Wars (1525)" there were Anabaptists in the Palatinate, although he fails to give any proof for 1522 date. In 1526 Jakob Kautz (q.v.), a native of the Palatinate (Grossbackenheim) and a Lutheran preacher at Worms, became an Anabaptist. In 1527 Hans Denk (q.v.) and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) were living in Worms and here published their German ishment. But the question of infant baptism occupied Bader to his old age, although he leaned toward Schwenckfeld rather than the Anabaptists in this matter.

Suddenly the sharpest persecution set in against the Anabaptists. On March 5, 1528, the unstable Elector Louis V, 1508-44, upon the insistence of Emperor Charles V, issued a mandate against the Anabaptists referring to the imperial mandate of Jan. 4, 1528, which demanded capital punishment for Anabaptists. Soon many of the prisons were full to overflowing. In Alzey (q.v.) many lay "in arrest," as the elector wrote in 1528, "for a long time." A letter written by J. Cochlaeus (q.v.) to Erasmus (q.v.) on Jan. 8, 1528, contains the information that eighteen Anabaptists were imprisoned for a considerable time at Alzey and had been before the court several times. In Germany their number had reputedly risen to 18,000.

The Anabaptist trial at Alzey created wide excitement. There was general uncertainty concerning the correct judgment of the Anabaptists, from the elector, who sought the advice of jurists and theologians, to the local officials, who kept asking for instructions. The Palatine Chancellor Florenz von Venningen in 1527 wrote an extensive document which argued that since the prisoners had accepted rebaptism they were to be punished by death. The document was sent for consideration to the juristic faculties at Cologne, Mainz, Trier, Freiburg, Ingolstadt, Tübingen, Erfurt, Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg. Erfurt and Wittenberg declined to take a position, but the others expressed their agreement.

The Anabaptist prisoners of Alzey were warmly defended by Johann Odenbach (q.v.), the Protestant pastor of Obermoschel. His "Sendbrief und Rat-schlag" to the judges tells them that they have treated many criminals better in prison than these poor people who have committed no crime but have merely in error had themselves baptized. "See with what great patience, love, and devotion these people have died, how honorably they have resisted the world! . . . They are holy martyrs of God."

In spite of intercession the Anabaptists at Alzey were executed, the men by beheading and the women by drowning. The exact number of the victims cannot be definitely ascertained. Julius Lober's martyr list mentions fourteen in Alzey, three in Heidelberg, and five in Bruchsal. The Hutterite chronicles give 350 as the total number of martyrs in the Palatinate, based on reports of refugees who escaped to Moravia and related that the Anabaptists were "taken to their execution like sheep to slaughter." One of the last martyrs was Philipp von Langensheim, executed at Kreuznach in 1529.

After 1529 there were probably no Anabaptist executions in the Palatinate. Michel Leubel, the details of whose trial were recently made public and who was drowned in the Rhein at Speyer in 1533, may have been an exception. The Protestant electors, beginning with Frederick II, who became a Lutheran soon after assuming the government in 1544, tried to win the Anabaptists back to the state church by kind methods. Under Frederick II, who was engaged in conflict with Catholicism, Anabaptism seems to have been firmly implanted in the Palatinate. Hutterite missionaries in the second half of the century induced many Anabaptists to go to Moravia, where the brotherhood was enjoying its Golden Age. In the congregations at Worms and Kreuznach serious differences arose concerning doctrine and discipline. The courts were constantly troubled by the property left by the fugitives; in spite of emigration there were continued reports of the spread of the movement.

The church inspection ordered by Otto Henry under the Superintendent of Strasbourg, Johann Marbach (q.v.), confirmed these reports. It was discovered that Anabaptism was strongest where there was a lack of intelligent preachers of the Gospel. Thereupon the pastors were urged to learn what the erroneous articles of the sects were and to counter them in the pulpit, not with noise and derogatory words but with gentleness and honesty; this would be better than prematurely to threaten these people with severe punishment, for they were otherwise honorable, decent, and obedient. However, they should not be allowed to hold official positions, and their dead should be denied a funeral sermon and ringing of the bells.

Upon the request of the Anabaptists a disputation was held at Pfeddersheim in 1557, in which over forty Anabaptists, including nineteen Vorsteher, took part. The questions debated concerned infant baptism, government office, the oath, the reason for their leaving the state church, communion, and the ban. The church declared the Anabaptists defeated; but the Anabaptists persisted in their convictions. Soon after this some important Lutheran and Catholic theologians held a disputation at Worms and came to an agreement, not concerning the treatment of Zwinglians and Sacramentists, but on the "condemnation of the Anabaptists." Thereupon Otto Henry issued a severe mandate against the Anabaptists, threatening them with expulsion and punishment according to imperial decree; it was, however, not strictly enforced. Instead, the peaceful Anabaptists were tacitly allowed to stay in the country.

Under the Calvinist Frederick III Anabaptism became still more firmly entrenched in the Palatinate. Frederick was attacked by both the Catholics and the Lutherans; he was blamed for the presence of the Anabaptists in his country. But he continued his practice of trying to convert them by conversations with clergymen. Leonard Dax (q.v.), a Hutterite missionary, described a conversation of this kind in his pamphlet, Ein pfälzisches Colloquium mit einem Wiedertäufer im Jahre 1567. Hutterites caught in the Palatinate were generally released. The generosity of the rulers was truly amazing for that time. Duke John Kasimir wrote to Frederick III on Jan. 1, 1566, that since the beginning pious Christians have often been persecuted as sectarians although they were the best Christians and taught and defended the truth.

This was the frame of mind that led Frederick III to institute the Frankenthal disputation in 1571. Foreign, refugee, and native Anabaptists were invited to participate and guaranteed safe conduct for two weeks before and after the debate. To the elector's annoyance, only fifteen Anabaptists announced their coming, including several Swiss Brethren and two Hutterites, but no Dutch Mennonites, whom the elector had particularly meant to attract. The Anabaptist spokesman was Diebold Winter of Wissembourg, Alsace. The representative of the Palatinate Anabaptists was Rauff Bisch of Odernheim. For the established church Peter Dathenus (q.v.), the court chaplain at Heidelberg, was the spokesman, with six other theologians, some of whom came from the Netherlands. The debate lasted nineteen days, from May 28 to June 19, with two sessions daily beginning at 6 AM and 2 PM. The elector appeared in person for the opening, and kept himself informed of the course of the debate. He inspected the final record, which was then published as a book of 710 pages, in two editions and in a Dutch translation. The debate dealt with the following subjects: the Scriptures, God, Christ, original sin, churches, justification, the resurrection of the body, marriage, community of goods, government, the oath, baptism, and communion. Inexperienced in dogmatic speculation and disputation, Rauff Bisch made the comment, characteristic of the Anabaptists, "It almost seems to us that you are asking us about matters that are too high for us; for we know nothing else to say about them than what the text simply says." Agreement was reached on very few points. The superintendents were to continue to try to convert the Anabaptists, though these attempts were rarely successful.

The lot of the Palatine Mennonites became harder under the son of Frederick III, the Lutheran Elector Louis VI, 1576-83, who also took sharp measures against the Calvinists. He began to expel the Anabaptists from the country, confiscate their goods to be kept under curators. If an Anabaptist let himself be persuaded to accept the state church, he received his property back after an examination by the superintendent. The superintendents and the pastors were reminded by an "electoral instruction" of Aug. 1, 1579, "to refute Anabaptist errors clearly from the pulpit frequently and to explain thoroughly the practice and benefits of the sacraments." Obstinate Anabaptists were to be imprisoned in the tower on bread and water, but were to be instructed both within the prison and outside several times, "that they may be moved to real conversion." In cases of continued persistence they were to be expelled from the country; this also happened to the Calvinists, one of whom was called "almost an Anabaptist."

Upon the early death of Louis VI his brother John Casimir succeeded to the government, 1583-91, who continued his Reformed father's church polity. His brother's Anabaptist mandate was once more proclaimed, but not strictly enforced. It was opposed by the government officials rather than the clergy. The burgrave of Alzey reminded the government that the state cannot be governed exclusively on confessional lines, but that political and economic principles must also be considered. The government once more urged the church council to conduct another disputation, but was refused on the ground that the others had been fruitless. Thereupon the church council issued a general order to all the inspectors who had to deal with Anabaptists. The pastors were doubtful of results, for the Anabaptists would, as one of them said, "see nothing in the members of the church but what will hurt them in their hearts and will cause horror and disgust, namely, an unrestrained Epicurean life with cursing, swearing, overeating, drinking, dancing, quarreling, fighting, scolding, fornication, immorality, and the like." In fact the Anabaptists kept replying, "One could read God's Word also outside the churches, since the people who go to church are very wicked." Many a pastor had to work hard with these Anabaptists. One complained that he had "become hoarse and almost sick."

The youthful Elector Frederick IV, 1592-1610, like his uncle wanted peace in church affairs. When complaints were heard about new inroads by Anabaptism, he ordered in 1596 to devote greater care to their conversion. The church councillors, on the other hand, demanded severer proceedings by the government. One week later, June 29, 1596, appeared the order of the councillors, that the Anabaptists were to be strictly watched, "although the pastors of all the villages shall on their part neglect nothing of their constant and zealous instruction and admonition."

By the turn of the century, in spite of oppression and emigration to Moravia, Anabaptism had increased noticeably; for in the Catholic and Lutheran vicinity of Frankfort, e.g., the bishopric of Speyer and the graviate of Leiningen, it was much more seriously persecuted. At the close of 1600 the Reformed councillors reported that the Anabaptists in Dirmstein, Weisenheim a.S., Heppenheim a.d.W., were becoming more established and that at night great numbers of them gathered near Erpolzheim. "When they are ordered to go to church they say they have a large church which has a big roof." In Kriegsheim 66 were reported in 1601. In 1608 it was reported—though later denied—that even the schoolmaster and his son had attended their meeting.

When Frederick V (the "Winter King," d. 1632) became Palatine elector in 1610 and the Thirty Years' War broke out in 1618, there were still some Anabaptists in the Palatinate. Surprisingly, they were living at the same places that after the war became Mennonite centers; e.g., Kriegsheim near Monsheim, Obersülzen near Grünstadt, Dirmstadt near Frankenthal, Rohrbach and Mehlingen near Kaiserslautern, and the Zweibrücken area. There were family names which are still among the Mennonites of the Palatinate; e.g., Herstein, Hühwohl, and Becker. In the last Anabaptist documents before the Thirty Years' War the church councillors raised serious complaint about the increase in the number of Anabaptists in the district of Alzey. It can certainly be assumed that a number of Mennonite families maintained themselves in the Palatinate throughout the war, and then joined the immigrant Mennonites.

II. During the Thirty Years' War the Palatinate was almost completely depopulated and devastated. The number of Reformed clergymen had been reduced to one tenth of its former number by murder, flight, and emigration. Elector Charles Louis, 1648-80, called back the surviving ones. The repopulation of his lands was a serious concern to him. He was generous not only to the Lutherans and Catholics, but also to the Mennonites. He admitted a number of Moravian Hutterite families to Mannheim (q.v.) in 1655, who established a small Bruderhof here, which Duchess Elizabeth Charlotte of Orleans, the elector's daughter, recalled in her letters written in 1718. Soon after the war a Mennonite congregation assembled in Mannheim, to whom the elector assigned space for a meetinghouse. He was especially interested in experienced settlers who could rebuild the country. Thus he also admitted the Mennonites expelled from other countries.

One of the first groups to settle in the Palatinate after the Thirty Years' War came from Transylvania. After severe oppression several of these families emigrated and in 1655 settled in Kriegsheim, Osthofen, Harkheim, Heppenheim a.d.W., and Wolfshiem near Worms. Among them were such family names as Schuhmacher, Kolb, Rohr, and Bonn. Some had become Quakers by 1665; e.g., the Schuhmacher family in Kriegsheim.

The state church was, however, less tolerant than the elector. Already in 1654 voices are heard complaining "about the offensive confusion with the Anabaptists, who despise proper church services and the holy sacraments, let their children run about unbaptized, hold their services boldly in the forests, and even solemnize marriages." From this time on, the church senate continued to warn the government that "it is a necessity to stem the obstinate, fanatical stubbornness of such people and bring them under the discipline of the Reformed Church, marriage, baptism, etc."

In spite of all obstacles the Mennonites made efforts to preserve official toleration and recognition from the elector. In the Palatinate to the right of the Rhine, where also some Anabaptist remnants had been preserved since the 16th century, two Mennonites, Hans Mayer and Hans Körber, decided in 1653 to present a petition to the elector in the name of the congregation, in which they called themselves "Mennists," to obtain permission to meet for worship like their brethren on the left side of the Rhine. But it took a decade, besides the intervention of influential Quakers and even the intermediation of the King of England before Charles Louis was willing to grant them a limited religious freedom. Finally on Aug. 4, 1664, after much effort, they obtained the important general concession which permitted them to meet in groups of more than twenty; but they were forbidden to admit non-Mennonites to the meetings. In return they had to pay an annual fee of six guilders per person as "Mennist Recognition Money," a considerable tax, which was later doubled. Nevertheless this concession was considered a great privilege, meetings having been completely prohibited in 1661. A limit of 200 families was set for the total Mennonite population.

The Mennonites in the Palatinate were increased in number in 1671-72 when persecution in Switzerland reached its climax. The refugees were received as brethren by the Palatine Mennonites and were given generous support from the Dutch Mennonites, who had already intervened in Switzerland for their toleration. On Nov. 2, 1671, Jakob Everling, the preacher of the Obersülzen congregation, reported that 200 persons had come to the Palatinate, some of whom were cripples, old people of 70-90 years, and families of eight to ten children. They arrived destitute with their bundles on their backs and their children in their arms. In January 1672, 215 persons had arrived west of the Rhine and 428 east of the Rhine. The influx of single families and groups continued into the 18th century. Especially in 1709-11 many Mennonite families came from Alsace and Switzerland. Thus the numerous small congregations still existing in the Palatinate were established.

By the end of the 17th century new difficulties overwhelmed the new settlers; economically by the French invasion under Louis XIV, ecclesiastically by the Catholic reaction under the electors of the Zweibrücken-Neuburg line which replaced the Protestant Simmern line. In 1674 and 1689 large areas and numerous towns of the Palatinate were devastated, causing serious losses to many Mennonites. Elector Philip William, 1685-90, who had renewed the Mennonite concession in 1686, died as a fugitive in Vienna. His strictly Catholic son and successor, John William, 1690-1716, was very slow to renew the concession; it was finally granted in 1698 after many petitions, and demanded high protection fees. The early years of his reign saw the expulsion of the Mennonites from Rheydt in 1694, which caused consternation in the entire Protestant world, and also the emigration of a group of Mennonites from Ibersheim to Friedrichstadt in Schleswig-Holstein in 1693.

The first emigration of Palatine Mennonites to North America also occurred at the close of the 17th century. In 1685 a Quaker who had previously been a Mennonite, Peter Schumacher of Kriegsheim near Worms, emigrated to Germantown, Pa. In the spring of 1707 the Kolb brothers—Martin, Johannes, Jakob, and Heinrich—emigrated. Martin Kolb (q.v.), who settled at Skippack, was one of the first Mennonite preachers in America. He was probably the instigator of further Mennonite emigration, which increased rapidly under Elector Charles Philip, 1716-42, for he doubled their protection fees, limited their right to purchase land, seeking thus to prevent the number of Mennonite families in the Palatinate to rise above 200. In the spring of 1717 some 300 Palatine Mennonites were in Rotterdam to embark for Pennsylvania where religious liberty was unrestricted; they received financial support from the Dutch Mennonites. With this group a stream of German immigration set in which continued almost without interruption until the second half of the 19th century. By 1732, 3,000 Palatine Mennonites had arrived in America. By 1773 the immigration lists showed over 30,000 Palatine names, mostly non-Mennonite. The Mennonites in America of Palatine origin numbered c150,000 souls in 1935, of whom 35,000 were living in Lancaster County alone.

A change in favor of the Mennonites took place during the long rule, 1742-99, of the enlightened Charles Theodore of the house of Pfalz-Sulzbach. Although he was Catholic, he granted extensive liberties to the Lutherans, Reformed, Mennonites, and Jews. The concession to the Mennonites was renewed on Nov. 27, 1743, and the protection fee reduced to six guilders. In return the Mennonites advanced the sum of 10,000 guilders toward the election and coronation expenses. Nevertheless the government at first still worked toward the reduction of "this daily increasing condemned sect." Later, however, it realized "that no better, more industrious, and competent subjects are to be found, who, with the exception of their religion, their faith, and their error, should serve the members of other faiths as an example in morals as well as in working day and night."

Since that time, about the middle of the 18th century, the Mennonites of the Palatinate achieved a leading position in agriculture. "The most perfect farmers in Germany are the Palatine Mennonites," wrote the State Economist Christian W. Dohm in the Deutsches Museum in 1778. The official of Hilsbach said about them on Jan. 21, 1794, "They are exemplary, industrious, and intelligent farmers. It would be desirable that every farmer would appropriate their good knowledge of agriculture and stock raising." Jung-Stilling (q.v.), the pious physician and economist, described the family life of David Möllinger (q.v.) of Monsheim as "the highest ideal of agricultural happiness," calling him the "archfarmer of our Palatine country and perhaps of the Holy Roman Empire," and his friend and brother.

About this time the Mennonites of the Palatinate were also given more and more recognition by the Protestant Church, to which Pietism contributed not a little. Gottfried Arnold (q.v.) had already in 1699, in his Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-historie, defended the Mennonites. Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.), like Jung-Stilling, carried on personal correspondence with the Palatine Mennonites, and called Adam Krehbill, the pastor at Weierhof, "a man according to God's heart." Peter Weber (q.v.) of Hardenberg was a zealous devotee of Pietism.

Now nearly all governmental restrictions on the Mennonites of the Palatinate were removed. On April 20, 1769, Jakob Hirschler, elder of the Gerolsheim congregation, wrote to Hans van Steen in Danzig, "Although our ruler is Roman Catholic, nevertheless nearly everywhere Catholics, Lutherans, Reformed, Mennonites, and Jews are living side by side. We are permitted to meet openly for worship wherever we wish, also observe baptism and communion and solemnize marriages. Also we bury our dead openly, and funeral addresses are held, often with many hearers, as in other religions."

At this time the first Mennonite meetinghouses were built in the Palatinate—Weierhof 1773, Sembach 1777, Eppstein and Friedelsheim 1779. The rulers willingly gave their consent, although they stipulated that the church must have the external appearance of a farm building. The names and membership of the congregations are given by Jakob Hirschler for 1769 as follows: "Erpolzheim and Friedelsheim 140, Spitalhof 45, Ruchheim 26, Alsheim and Ibersheimerhof 120. Oberflörsheim and Spiesheim 100, Kriegsheim 52, Wartenberg and Sembach 250, Weierhof 90, Rheingrafenstein 32, Rödern and Schäfbusch 45, Böchingen 68, Zweibrücken 94, Gerolsheim, Obersülzen, and Heppenheim 112, Hö-ningen 54, Eppstein-Friesenheim-Mannheim" (no figures given, but "some 20 households" given for Mannheim). In addition there were numerous scattered Amish families living in the Palatinate around Zweibrücken and Ixheim.

All the congregations were served by lay elders and preachers from their own midst. In 1770 these were: "Abraham Oellenberger in Gönheim; Daniel Stauffer in Guntersblum; Christian Weber in Oberflörsheim; Johannes Krehbiel in Wartenberg; Jakob Gally in Erbesbüdesheim; Daniel Hirschler, Geisberg; Johannes Schnebele for Zweibrücken; Jakob Hirschler, Gerolsheim; Martin Möllinger, Mannheim." Toward the end of the century a lack of qualified voluntary preachers was painfully felt here and there. The men who had been chosen refused the office. "This error, which may be called disobedience, is unfortunately making serious inroads into the Palatinate," wrote Elder Lorenz Friedenreich of Neuwied on Feb. 27, 1775. Therewith a new development began for the Palatine Mennonites.

Shortly before and after the turn of the century two groups of Palatine Mennonites emigrated. In 1784 twenty-eight Mennonite families followed the invitation of Emperor Joseph II to settle in Galicia (q.v.), where they made three settlements near Lemberg-Einsiedel, Falkenstein, and Rosenberg. In 1802 eight families settled in Donaumoos (q.v.) in Bavaria. Other Palatine and Alsatian Mennonites followed, until there were twenty-five families, twelve of whom were living in Maxweiler (q.v.), which they had founded, and thirteen in the surrounding villages. About the middle of the 19th century most of them emigrated to America.

III. From 1792 until 1813 the Palatinate to the left of the Rhine was under French rule. In 1801 the Kurpfalz was dissolved in the Treaty of Lunéville. After Napoleon's defeat, 1814 f., a large part of the Palatinate on the left of the Rhine fell to Bavaria, a smaller part, Rhenish Hesse, to Hesse-Darmstadt. The part right of the Rhine fell for the most part to Baden (q.v.), and a smaller part to Hesse-Darmstadt. With the French occupation in 1803 all the limitations on Mennonite freedom, legal, economic, and ecclesiastical, were removed. Equality of citizenship was gratefully accepted by the Mennonites. But at the same time the leaders feared that this equality of citizenship would lead to complete conformity to their surroundings and the loss of the old doctrines. This concern is clearly seen in the Ibersheim (q.v.) Decisions of 1803 and 1805, in which the Mennonites of the Palatinate and of all South Germany expressly endorsed the old Mennonite principles, such as adult baptism, separation from worldly living, and nonresistance. Because soon afterward nonresistance was nonetheless lost, Wilhelm Mannhardt called these Decisions, with some justification, "the evening glow in the sky of orthodox Mennonitism in the Rhineland."

Actually about the turn of the century Palatine Mennonitism underwent a radical change in development which was to give it its characteristic stamp within German Mennonitism. The first element was the sacrifice of the lay ministry, which was maintained only in a few small congregations in the south: Branchweilerhof near Neustadt and Deutschhof-Geisberg near Bergzabern, which then joined the Verband (q.v.). The small congregation of Altleiningen (q.v.) in the heart of the Palatinate almost lost its existence on this account, even though in 1811, under its preacher Christian Goebels (d. 1821), it built its own church. J. Schiller (1812-86) published in Pfälzer Memorabile an interesting account of a visit to this church; he had come in order to hear a sermon by a Mennonite lay preacher, but unprepared as he was he was compelled to preach, and thereby changed his whole concept of preaching. The last important lay preachers in the Palatinate were Valentin Dahlem (q.v.), the initiator of the Ibersheim Decisions and editor of a formulary, Johannes Goebels of Hertlingshausen near Altleiningen, and Heinrich Koller of Kühbörncheshof.

As the need for preachers in the Palatine congregations increased they began to call theologically trained and professional ministers from their own ranks or from the outside. In 1819 Leonhard Weydmann (q.v.) came from Crefeld to Monsheim to gather and re-establish the congregation. He was followed in Monsheim by Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), also from Crefeld, 1836-68. In Sembach Johannes Risser (q.v.) of Friedelsheim, 1832-68, led the congregation to a new flowering. On the Weierhof Hermann Reeder (q.v.) of Neuwied was called, who had attended a Baptist seminary in England. Friedelsheim found two pastors in its own membership—the teacher Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.) 1827-79, followed by his nephew with the same name. Ibersheim called preachers from West Prussia—Bernhard Thiessen, 1843-56; then Heinrich Neufeld, 1856-69. Under the ministry of these men new catechisms appeared in 1841, 1854, and 1861; a new hymnal in 1854, 1876; a minister's manual in 1852. Michael Loewenberg (q.v.), minister at the Weierhof 1849-74, founded a school there in 1867, which later became the Realanstalt (q.v.) am Donnersberg; it was planned as a ministerial training school, but became a secondary school.

The engagement of professional ministers or pastors, most of whom were educated in Protestant seminaries or universities, denoted a deviation from Mennonite tradition, but proved itself as useful for the preservation of Palatine-Hessian Mennonitism. Externally this led to an era of church building. Meetinghouses, still in use, were built at Monsheim in 1820, Ibersheim 1836, Weierhof 1837, and Friedelsheim 1838. In 1853 the small church in Sembach built in 1777 was torn down and replaced by a larger church. The Kühbörncheshof congregation, which belonged to Sembach until 1832, built a meetinghouse in that year. In 1842, 1843, and 1847 churches were built in Deutschhof, Ernstweiler, and Ixheim, the last named being an Amish congregation which did not unite with the others until 1937 and then met with them at Zweibrücken; both churches were abandoned. In the second half of the century churches were built at Obersülzen in 1866, Neudorferhof 1885, and Kohlhof 1888; in 1903 the church at Ludwigshafen was built, but must now (1958) be razed for the rebuilding of the city.

Since 1824 the Conference of the Palatine and Hessian Mennonite Churches has been meeting more or less regularly in annual sessions, which have greatly strengthened the cohesion of the group. The Conference established a relief fund which was later (1886) called the Mennonitische Hilfskasse. Since 1885 most of the congregations have also belonged to the Vereinigung (q.v.). The congregations fall into six groups, each of which is served by one pastor. The groups, with 1958 membership, are composed as follows: (1) Kaiserslautern 72, Kühbörncheshof 163, Zweibrücken 200; (2) Sembach 250, Enkenbach 270, Neudorferhof 196; (3) Weierhof 445, Uffhofen 48, Eisenberg; (4) Monsheim 255, Obersülzen 94, Biedesheim; (5) Ibersheim 165, Eppstein 110, Ludwigshafen 90; (6) Friedelsheim 151, Kohlhof 64, Atleiningen 30.

Leading ministers since just before the turn of the century were "Christian Neff, at Weierhof, 1887-1946; Thomas Löwenberg, Ibersheim, 1883-1917; Abraham Hirschler, Kaiserslautern, 1880-1930; Johannes Hirschler, Monsheim, 1899-1926; Matthias Pohl, Sembach, 1901-29; Johannes Foth, Friedelsheim, 1904-57." In the Palatinate and Hesse there are some 3,200 Mennonites. This figure includes some 1,000 refugees from West Prussia who came to the Palatinate after 1948 and were kindly received by the brethren. A congregation of this kind has arisen at Enkenbach near Kaiserslautern since 1951 with some 270 members including the residents in the Mennonite Home for the Aged, Friedenshort. In 1957 this congregation received a meetinghouse, which, like the entire settlement, was built with substantial aid from German and American brethren. In Kaiserslautern the MCC built the "Mennonite House" in 1956, in which the resident congregation holds its meetings. In Bad Dürkheim the MCC has for years supported a children's home. In Ludwigshafen the Relief Work of the Vereinigung has its center. The active work of these organizations has contributed greatly to the strengthening and revival of Palatine-Hessian Mennonitism as well as German Mennonitism as a whole since World War II.

G.H.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Manfred Krebs, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer am Oberrhein," in Ztschft für die Geschichte des Oberrheins LXXXIII (1931) 567-76; Müller, Berner Täufer; TA Baden-Pfalz; a large number of documents and letters concerning the Mennonites of the Palatinate are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives and listed in Inv. Arch. Amst., of which only the most important are mentioned here: I, Nos. 1009, 1059, 1130, 1196-99, 1248 f., 1319, 1405-7, 1409, 1414, 1420-26, 1428 f., 1438, 1458, 1470-73, 1476-83, 1495, 1498-1504, 1510 f., 1515, 1517, 1519, 1531 f., 1539, 1750 f., 1866 f., 1881, 2256, 2260, 2267, 2274; Gerhard Hein, "Unsere Gemeinden in der Pfalz vor 200 Jahren und heute," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 138-40, 154 f., 170 f.; idem, "The Development of the Mennonite Hof of the Seventeenth Century Palatinate into the Mennonite Churches of Pfalz Rheinland Today," MQR (1955) 188-96; ML II, 588-600 (Kurpfalz), 356-577 (Pfalz-Zweibrücken), 357-59 (Pfälzische Kirchenordnungen), 492-94 (Rheinland-Pfalz); Ernst Crous, "Mennoniten im Regierungsbezirk Trier 1827-1870," Gem.-Kal., 1940, 62-73; idem, "Wie die Mennoniten in die deutsche Volksgemeinschaft hineinwuchsen," Gesch.-Bl., 1939, 13-24 (repr. Karlsruhe, 1939); Gem.-Kal. annually contains data on the congregations in addition to numerous articles on congregations and Palatinate subjects which are not here registered; Namensverzeichnis; Naamlijst; ML III, 490 f.

Paling (Palingh, Palinck, Paeldinck), a family name found among the Dutch Mennonites. Cornelis Michielsz Paling was about 1610 a member of the "bevredigde broederschap" (q.v.) at Haarlem. Lambricht Paeldinck, a preacher or deacon at Schiedam, in 1632 signed the Dordrecht Confession in the name of the Schiedam Flemish congregation. Andries Palinck was a Waterlander preacher, probably at Haarlem. Another Andries Paling(h), who may also have been a Waterlander preacher at Haarlem, published Verhaal van't gene verhandelt ende besloten is in de by-eenkomst tot Leyden (Haarlem, 1661), a defense against the accusation of the conservative Flemish leaders that the Waterlanders were not orthodox. He also attacked Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) in Aenmerckingen en Aenspraecck op Doct. Galenus Geschrift (Amsterdam, 1665).

It could not be decided whether the Dutch painters Izaak Paling (d. after 1719 at Leiden) and Willem Jan Paling (1777-1848) were Mennonites and members of this family. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 513 f., 525; II, No. 1196; N.N.B.Wb. V, 422.) vDZ.

Pallant, Werner von, bailiff of Wassenberg, in the duchy of Jülich, Germany, about 1530, friendly toward the Anabaptists. He declared expressly that he could not act contrary to his conscience in dealing with them. He denied the right of temporal government in religious matters. His castle was a haven for exiled preachers from far and wide (see Wassenberg "Preachers"). He was also interested in the development of Anabaptism in Münster (q.v.) before this degenerated into extravagant fanaticism, and Johann Kloppeis (q.v.) wrote a letter to him from Münster, which was delivered by Jacob van Ossenbrug (q.v.) in February 1534. Pallant refused to carry out a new instruction for church inspection by Johann III, Duke of Jülich, in the district of Wassenberg. In 1534 he was deposed from office. Even after this he remained the protector of the victims of religious persecution. NEFF.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 146-50; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 57-59 and passim; ML II, 332.

Palm Grove Conservative Mennonite Church, located at Sarasota, Fla., a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, was organized May 3, 1953, with 19 charter members. They worshiped in the Pinecraft Mennonite Church until Nov. 29, 1953, at which time they met in the Pinecraft school. A church building seating 400 was dedicated Feb. 14, 1954. During the winter tourists from as far as California and western Canada worship with the congregation, raising the attendance to 250. Menno M. Coblentz was bishop and Joseph F. Baer pastor until 1956, when Bishop Andrew Jantzi succeeded them. In 1957 there were 33 members. J.F.B.

Palmer, Christian David Friedrich (1811-75), a Protestant theologian, professor of theology at the University of Tübingen. Through his religious work he had a constructive influence on Mennonite circles. Deserving mention is his book, Die Gemeinschaften und Sekten Württembergs (Tübingen, 1877). (RGG IV, Col. 878; ML III, 332.) NEFF.

Palmken Palmen, an Anabaptist martyr of Born, in the Millen area of the duchy of Jülich, Germany, was burned at the stake in an open field between Sittard and Limbricht, in the present Dutch province of Limburg (then Jülich). He suffered martyrdom with song. In 1535 a Palm who was an Anabaptist was found in Maastricht; shortly before 1550 a Palmen in the district of Born, who may be identical with the martyr Palmken Palmen, was baptized by Elder Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.), who also baptized Petergen Palmen and his wife. In the 17th century a Mennonite Palmen family was found in Amsterdam. NEFF, vDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 98, E 496; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 119, 307, 406, 410; ML III, 333.

Palmyra Mennonite (MC) Church (now extinct), located two miles east of Palmyra, Marion Co., Mo., a member of the South Central Conference, had its beginning in 1884, when Jacob Rohrer and family moved here, followed by the Isaac Rohrer, E. L. Buckwalter, and J. M. Hershey families. J. M. Kreider was ordained minister for the work in 1898, and moved here with his family, accompanied by the J. H. Hershey family, all of Lancaster Co., Pa. The meetinghouse was built in 1907. The membership in 1955 was 15, with Harry R. Buckwalter and Harold Kreider as ministers. In that year the congregation dissolved. H.R.Bu.

Palo Alto Mennonite Church (MC), Union Street, Pottsville, Pa., is a mission church in the Lancaster Conference. Established in 1948, it had 14 members in 1957. M.G.

Palo Hincado Mennonite Church (MC), located in Barranquitas, Puerto Rico, had a membership of 57 in 1957, with Don Heiser as pastor. M.G.

Pals, van de(r), and collateral branch van Gilse van der Pals, a Dutch Mennonite family found in Rotterdam, Holland, from the early 17th century. Most of them were well-to-do merchants and brokers, and some were deacons of the church. After Gerrit van der Pals in 1786 left the Mennonite Church to join the Reformed, a number of relatives followed him. The Mennonite branch of the family died out in the 19th century. The name seems to indicate that this family stemmed from the Palatinate, Germany, but this could not be ascertained. (Nederl. Patriciaat V, 1914, 312-16.) vDZ.

Palsters (i.e., Pfälzer, Mennonites from the Palatinate), a name given to Mennonite refugees who moved from the Palatinate (q.v.), Germany, to the Netherlands about 1653 settling in or near Groningen (q.v.). There is no exact information either concerning this immigration itself nor about the number of immigrants, or about the later adventures of these "Palsters." They may have merged with the 1711 group of Swiss Mennonite immigrants who settled in the province of Groningen in 1711-14. (See also Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands; Müller, Berner Täufer, 195; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1193.) vDZ.

Päminger (Bamminger, etc.), Leonhard (1495-1567), a German Lutheran poet and hymn writer. His sons Sophonias (d. 1603) and Sigismund (d. 1571) published some of his papers, including the rhymed Dialogus oder Gespräch eines Christen mit einem Wiedertäufer (formerly in the Göttingen University Library; Th. Pol. 188b). The Dialogus discusses the "three principal errors of the Anabaptist"; viz., their rejection of infant baptism, their attitude toward government (with reference to Matt. 5:39), and their recognition of polygamy (on the basis of the Old Testament); the sons in their foreword made it clear that this "fanaticism" was still flourishing at many places. (ABD XXV, 114; ML III, 333.) E.C.

Pancratz, a Mennonite family formerly found among the Mennonites of West Prussia, Germany, particularly in the Flemish churches of Schönsee (q.v.) and Przechovka (q.v.). Here Peter Pancratz was a preacher 1762-d. c88, and Andreas Pancratz 1785-after 1802. Later some members of this family moved to Russia. Pancratz may have been a Slavic name, and its bearers of Slavic ancestry. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 115; Dutch Naamlijst.) vdZ.

Pandora, a village (pop. 717) located in Putnam County in northwestern Ohio. It was first called Columbia, later Pendleton, until changed to Pandora. Approximately 750 Mennonites live in Pandora and on its rural route. Most belong to the General Conference Mennonite Church, although some belong to the Missionary Church Association and several families to the Reformed Mennonite Church.

The Mennonite community extends from 2 miles north of Pandora to about 4 miles south of the village, and from 1 mile west to 4 miles east of the village. About half of the members live in the village. The first Mennonites here were Swiss Mennonites from Florimont (q.v.), France, who settled three miles south of Pandora in 1833.

The Grace Mennonite Church (GCM) and the Missionary Church (MCA) are located in the village. The St. John Mennonite Church (GCM) is located 1 mile southeast of Pandora, the Reformed Mennonite Church 3 miles southeast of Pandora in Allen County, but on the Pandora rural postal route.

This area is generally conceded to have some of the best soil in northwestern Ohio and is well known for its crops including cattle, tomatoes, potatoes, and sugar beets. D.L.G.

Pankratz, Johann H. (1867-1952), a Mennonite Brethren evangelist and missionary, was born at Ivanenky, South Russia, on Jan. 14, 1867, the oldest son of Johann J. and Helena Unruh Pankratz. In the summer of 1874 he came to America with his parents and three sisters, settling on a farm in the Lehigh and Goessel, Kan., areas. In 1899 the family removed to Buhler, Kan.

As a young man of 23 years he was converted and on March 15, 1891, he was baptized and received into the Goessel Mennonite Brethren Church. Johann completed his elementary training in a small country school south of Lehigh and attended the Teachers' Normal School in Emporia, Kan., during the school year 1891-92. In 1892-97 he attended the Baptist Academy and Theological Seminary in Rochester, N.Y., graduating from both schools.

On Sept. 7, 1899, Pankratz married Maria Harms of Hillsboro; they had five children. Pankratz found his first field of ministry in the First Baptist Church in Allentown, Pa. (1897-98). In October 1899 he was appointed evangelist in the Mennonite Brethren Conference. On Oct. 24, 1901, Pankratz and his wife were commissioned to go to India as missionaries for the Mennonite Brethren Conference. Leaving Hillsboro on June 10, 1902, they arrived in India on Oct. 20, having visited numerous churches in Europe en route to India. In the next 39 years (1902-41) the Pankratzes gave to India some 26 years of service: 1902-10, 1913-19, 1921-26, and 1937-41. Pankratz was an undaunted pioneer, a great Gospel preacher, a church builder. He established three mission stations—Mulkapett, Hughes-town, and Shamshabad, and a missionary rest home at Ootacamund. He organized the first Telugu Mennonite Brethren Church and ordained the first three Telugu ministers.

While at home on furloughs Pankratz served as evangelist and taught two terms (1911-12 and 1929-30) in Tabor College; in 1930-36 he served the American Baptist Church in Beatrice, Neb. His guiding, inspiring, and upholding Scripture passage was: "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness" (Psalm 17:15).

After the death of Mrs. Pankratz on Jan. 25, 1941, Pankratz returned to America, making his home with his daughter Linda, a schoolteacher, first in Los Angeles and later in San Diego, Cal., and died on July 19, 1952. G.W.P.

Panman (Panneman), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living near Sappemeer, later in Pekela, both in the province of Groningen. Many of the Panman family were deacons of the Mennonite congregations at Veendam, Pekela, and Stadskanaal, and Jan Panneman was from about 1740 until shortly before 1780 a preacher of the Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites at Sappemeer and later of Pekela. vdZ.

Pannabecker (Pannebacker, Pennebacker, Panabaker, Pennypacker, and Pfannebacker), a Mennonite family name going back to the Dutch "pannenbakker" or tile baker. Samuel W. Pennypacker, former governor of Pennsylvania and historian, traces the name back to 1568 at Gorcum, Holland, where Jan Pannebakker and his wife were executed as Anabaptist martyrs, the former at the stake and the latter by drowning. Members of the family fled to Germany whence, c1695, Hendrick Pannebacker of Flamborn near Worms in the Palatinate emigrated to Germantown, Pa. There he married Eve Umstadt who had arrived in 1685, and became the progenitor of most of the Pannabeckers in America. A brother Frederick is said to have located in Kentucky about the same time but was not so well known. Hendrick Pannebacker located on the Skippack in Montgomery County, Pa., working as a surveyor for William Penn, where he is said to have surveyed the van Bebber tract. His grandsons Matthias and Henry Pannebecker were Mennonite preachers, the former being bishop at Phoenixville, Pa. Matthias was zealous in the pulpit and in practical life and took his nonresistant belief so seriously he is reported to have taken the bolts and bars off his house doors and never locked drawers or cupboards. Cornelius Pannebecker, blacksmith and preacher, a great-grandson of Hendrick, migrated in 1810 from Montgomery County to Waterloo County, Ont., and became the ancestor of the numerous Pannebecker families in Ontario. In 1957 S. F. Pannebecker was president of Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago and his brother R. P. Pannebecker was an elder of the United Missionary Church in northern Indiana. S.F.P.

S. W. Pennypacker, Annals of Phoenixville and its Vicinity (Philadelphia, 1872); D. N. Panabaker, "Panabaker Family History," in Waterloo Historical Society, Twenty-Fifth Annual Report . . . 1937 (Kitchener, 1939); Edith Foster, "In Pursuit of Freedom," in Christian Living, January-June 1958; S. W. Pennypacker, Hendrick Pannebecker (Philadelphia, 1894).

Pappenheim, Marschalk von, a noble family of the 16th century and later, manorial lords of Kalden in South Germany, prominently connected with Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) and distantly also with Caspar von Schwenckfeld (q.v.). Several members of this very distinguished family were patrons of Marpeck, mainly during his Augsburg period (after 1540), and three ladies were even members of the Marpeck Anabaptist brotherhood.

Joachim, Marschalk von Pappenheim (d. 1536), who played a significant role in the political life of his day in favoring the new Protestant movement, seems to have been the first of this family to come into contact with Marpeck.

His sister Magdalena, a nun of the Benedictine order in the convent at Urspring in Swabia, is perhaps the most important of the Pappenheims as far as the Anabaptists were concerned. She was drawn to Schwenckfeld and apparently had expressed her desire to meet him. Something changed her mind, however, for no meeting took place. Instead Schwenckfeld received a document bearing her name, but in all likelihood drafted by Pilgram Marpeck. In a letter dated Aug. 21, 1542, he expressed his regret that she was no longer interested in discoursing with him. He explained that he was not preaching a "proud Christ," and pointed out some of Pilgram's errors to her. Schwenckfeld suspected that she had never read any of his books, but was relying for her opinion of him on Marpeck. To correct this he was sending her a copy of a tract written by Ickelsamer (q.v.) against Marpeck's alleged view that Christ could have sinned. Also he indicated to Magdalena why he wrote the Judicium against the Vermanung. This letter (CS VII, 217-22) should not be regarded as an accurate description of Marpeck's views since Schwenckfeld's aim was to draw Magdalena from Marpeck's influence.

In the letter to Pilgram Marpeck written Sept. 25, 1542, Schwenckfeld defended his action by saying that Marpeck had been depreciating him to Magdalena and others and had thus arrested Magdalena's spiritual growth. His letter was merely an attempt to show Magdalena how much more correct his view of Christ was than Marpeck's. Apparently Magdalena continued this role as a go-between for Marpeck and Schwenckfeld, for on May 27, 1543, Schwenckfeld wrote to Helene von Freyberg (q.v.) requesting her to give his reply either to Magdalena von Pappenheim or to Pilgram, since he did not know where to look for Pilgram.

On Sept. 25, 1542, Schwenckfeld wrote a second letter to Magdalena. Her reply to Schwenckfeld's first letter, admonishing Schwenckfeld to read the New Testament more diligently and defending Marpeck, prompted Schwenckfeld to reply with a list of twelve errors of which Pilgram was guilty. Apparently this was the last exchange of letters between Magdalena and Schwenckfeld, although Magdalena replied indirectly to Schwenckfeld in a letter to Helena Streicher (preserved in the Zentralbibliothek at Zürich). It thus becomes apparent that Magdalena was strategic in the literary battle between Marpeck and Schwenckfeld, in which some rather crucial issues were debated. In this struggle Magdalena Streicher remained on Schwenckfeld's side, while the Pappenheims and Helene von Freyberg stayed with the Marpeck brotherhood.

In 1545 Marpeck wrote a letter to Magdalena in Augsburg, "Concerning those who die in sin." This letter was recently discovered in a codex of the Marpeck brotherhood called Kunstbuch, copied in 1561. Again on Dec. 9, 1547, he wrote to her on the theme, "Von dreierlei menschen so sich im gericht finden," also concerning the rural nobility (Kunstbuch, No. 38). These two letters together with the earlier correspondence prove Marpeck's high regard for this "sister in Christ."

After her death (1571?) Magdalena's copy of the Verantwortung came into the possession of her niece Walpurga, Marschalkin von Pappenheim, daughter of Joachim, who had likewise joined the Anabaptists. Schwenckfeld's reaction to her becoming an Anabaptist is found in a variant reading of a manuscript containing a letter to Sibilla Eisler, dated after April 15, 1550. Discussing the way in which many Anabaptists had been tricked into giving up their property, then been disillusioned by the Hutterian Brethren, he said that he had heard that Walpurga von Calde (a Marschalkin) had secretly stolen away from her sister's wedding and gone to Switzerland, and would not return unless safety be guaranteed her. Apparently she had left much wealth, and this along with the confidence with which she replied to her friends surprised Schwenckfeld. He called her "Pilgram's sister" (CS XII, 41). The beautiful Zürich codex of the Verantwortung bears the note: "Walpurga Marschälkin, 1571" (Loserth). Walpurga is also known as the writer of an Anabaptist hymn, "Du glaubigs hertz, so benedey" (Wolkan, Lieder, 124). Beyond this not much is known about her activities.

A third member of this family was Sophie, who had married a Baron von Bubenhofen (South Germany). Of her we know only through a letter in the Kunstbuch (No. 36) by Hans Bichel (q.v.) of Waiblingen, Württemberg, written to her on Jan. 7, 1555, dealing with her spiritual improvement. Since this letter was carefully preserved, it may be assumed that Sophie was also an active member of the Marpeck brotherhood somewhere in Bavaria or Swabia.

The story of the Pappenheims is remarkable because not many noble families are known to have shown positive interest in the Anabaptist way of life to the point of sacrifice. (But see Freyberg, Helene von.) HEGE, R.F., W.KL.

Loserseth, Verantwortung (Vienna, 1929); Heinold Fast, "Pilgram Marpeck und das oberdeutsche Täuferum. Ein neuer Handschriftenfund," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., 1956, 212-42 (concerning the Kunstbuch); Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VII, 35; VIII, 216-22, 280 f.; XII, 41; Wolkan, Lieder; ML III, 333; ADB (under "Pappenheim").

Paracelsus Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim (1493-1541). As a roving physician ("a doctor should be a wayfarer"), a man of the people, twined about with legend even during his lifetime, characterized by a strong vital personality and an awareness of himself and of his calling, Paracelsus practiced his profession all over Central Europe, not without violent collisions with medical learning, patients, and authorities.

As a writer on medicine, botany, and natural philosophy Paracelsus was amazingly prolific in spite of his roving. His numerous Biblical-theological works, of which 123 are known, have not yet been adequately examined. The Complete Works of Paracelsus, edited by Karl Sudhoff and Wilhelm Matthiessen, has published (1922-23) the medical, scientific, and philosophical writings as the first division in 14 volumes in Munich. Of the second division, the theological and religious-philosophical works, only the first volume has been published (Munich, 1923). Of the Bible commentaries, the one on Matthew and the one on the Psalms (1530) should be mentioned here, and of the dogmatic writings, the one on communion addressed to Pope Clemens VII (1530). In this book Paracelsus denies the claim of the Catholics, Lutherans, Zwinglians, and Anabaptists that they are the possessors of the Holy Spirit, as Sebastian Franck (q.v.) had done in his song about the four dissentious churches. The two men met at least twice—in 1529 at Nürnberg, in 1531 at Strasbourg. That Paracelsus cured Sebastian Franck of a mental breakdown is mere legend. Franck himself described the doctor as a second Lucianus (i.e., a mocker) and as much more of a mystic than the rationalistic doctor. Nor do the casual meetings with Kaspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.) denote a spiritual relatedness. The peaceable, pious Silesian nobleman and the quarrelsome man of the people had little in common. The Schwenckfeld biography by Mrs. Schultz demonstrates the spiritual independence of Schwenckfeld in his relations with Paracelsus. Only ignorance can equate these two opposite spirits with each other or with the Anabaptists.

The fact that Paracelsus had nothing in common with the Anabaptists—except the criticism of the sacrament of communion—in spite of occasional contacts, is seen in the fanatical, unrealistic hope of the doctor for the ultimate restoration of the church by the pope: "In the pope there will be a blessed spirit and thus a blessed spirit in the sheep." No Anabaptist and no convinced Spiritualist thought in such terms in the 16th century. Paracelsus remained a Catholic in life and death.

His retirement to religious literary work probably was due to the Peasants' War. After 1532 he frequently signed himself with a title of doctor of the Holy Scriptures to which he had no right. Much will remain a mystery until more of his theological works appear. The most reliable biography is Georg Sticker's.

The fourth centennial of the death of Paracelsus in 1941 produced a considerable body of literature, which must, however, be used with a critical mind. In addition there are some older works of a biographical and interpretative content. E.T.

Ludwig Englert, Paracelsus, Mensch und Arzt (Bücher deutscher Kultur, Berlin, 1941); R. J. Hartmann, Theophrast von Hohenheim (Stuttgart, 1904); Fr. Jäger, Theophrastus Paracelsus 1493-1541 (Salzburg, 1941); Wilhelm Matthiessen, "Theophrast von Hohenheim," in Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. XIV and XV (1917-18); W.-E. Peuckert, Theophrastus Paracelsus (Stuttgart, 1941), idem, Paracelsus, Die Geheimnisse, ein Lesebuch aus seinen Schriften (Leipzig, 1941); E. H. Reklam, Die Gestalt des Paracelsus in der Dichtung, Studien zu Kolbenheyers Trilogie (Leipzig, 1938); G. Sticker, Paracelsus, ein Lebensbild (Halle, 1941); ML III, 334.

Paradise, a town (pop. 600) ten miles east-southeast of Lancaster, Pa., the center of an old and large Mennonite (MC) community. This was the home of Tanawa, King of the Pequena Indians, and Madame Ferree, a French Huguenot. So beautiful was the sight of this town (a town that cannot be improved) that in 1804 they called it Paradise, and made it a post office on the Lancaster-Philadelphia coach route. David Witmer's hostelry, the schoolhouse, and the later Mennonite church were important points in the early town. Not only were the Mennonites of the vicinity prosperous farmers, but they certainly aided in putting this clean small town on the map. There is a Mennonite meetinghouse in the town. I.D.L.

Paradise Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, located in Paradise, Lancaster Co., Pa., built its first meetinghouse in 1806 on land contributed by David Witmer, the innkeeper. By popular subscription $828 was collected for the building. Forty years later it was replaced by a larger brick church. In 1885 the third church, 45 x 65 ft., also of brick, was built and in 1909 considerably enlarged. The first Sunday school was held in 1887. This was the center of the missionary movement among Lancaster Conference Mennonites, giving J. A. Ressler, A. Hershey Leaman, Mary Denlinger, John H. Mellinger, and John M. Kreider early to the cause. The sewing circle movement started here in 1895 and Mary Mellinger in 1911 became its first conference-wide chairman. The cutting room of the Associated Sewing Circles is near by. A beautiful cemetery is on the hill overlooking Paradise. The church membership in 1958 was 302, with Clair B. Eby as bishop, and Amos W. Weaver and Willis E. King as ministers. I.D.L.

Paradise Mennonite Church (MC), located near Reid, Md., four miles north of Hagerstown. Services were first conducted in a schoolhouse near by in 1892-97, when a brick church was erected on the southeast corner of the Christian Eshleman farm, who also granted the land. In 1925 the building was enlarged and again in 1947. The ministers of the Miller Mennonite Church (q.v.), of which it is a branch, have pastoral oversight. Irvin S. Shank was the minister in charge in 1956. It has no separate membership. J.D.R.

Paraditz (Czech, Boretice) near Scheikowitz (Czech, Cajkovice) in the Göding (q.v.) (Hodonin) district, became the seat of a Hutterite Bruderhof, after a house was bought in 1545 by the deacon Thomas Seckler and the interpreter Thomas Schmid. The decision of the Brno Landtag of 1545 was not put into effect in Paraditz until 1547, when the Hutterites emigrated to Hungary. When they were again admitted to Moravia they returned to Paraditz, where in 1570 the preacher Hans Schlachindpfann or Klampferer, "a highly gifted man," died. In 1569 a quarrel developed between the Brethren and the barons, when the latter refused to pay for the work in the vineyards. The Hutterites thereupon stopped working and the baron took away their house and expelled them from his lands. They turned to Koblitz (q.v.), a half hour away, where a new Bruderhof was just being set up. But in 1599, ten years later, the new baron Wenzel Hrubcicky von Cechtin of Budkau returned the house to the brotherhood, and the Brethren settled there again. In the middle of July 1605 Paraditz and a number of neighboring villages were burned down by Hungarian troops. It is not definitely known whether the Bruderhof was set up again. It is not named among those that had to be abandoned in 1622. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 334.) P.De.

Paraguay, a landlocked country, lies in the central part of South America between Argentina, Brazil, and Bolivia. With an area of 157,047 square miles, slightly larger than California, it is one of the smaller South American countries. In point of population, estimated somewhere around one and a half million, it is the smallest.

The Tropic of Capricorn runs through Paraguay at the line where almost equal parts lie on either side. Most of Paraguay proper, however, i.e., the part east of the Paraguay River, lies south of the line. Most of the Paraguayan Chaco, that part of the country west of the Paraguay River, lies in the Torrid Zone. The climate is, therefore, tropical and subtropical. Much of the year is mild, but there is a range from cool to very hot. In the summer months of December, January, and February the temperature frequently rises above 100° Fahrenheit. It can also be hot in other months of the year, even in midwinter. Occasionally there are frosts even on the torrid side of Capricorn. In the drier winter months some parts of the country are at times subject to hot north winds and dust storms. The Paraguay River divides the country into unequal and quite different parts, the eastern section being more rolling and having more rainfall than the western. From the Paraguay River, where the elevation is low, to the Brazilian border on the east, the elevation rises to some highlands which average 1,500 feet or more above sea level. Unlike most of South America, Paraguay has no real mountains. Since transportation facilities within the country are very inadequate, the Paraguay and Parana Rivers are doubly important as channels of commerce.

The natural resources of Paraguay make it well fitted for agriculture. There is some industry and there probably will be more in the future, but the basic ingredients of a great industrial development—coal, or oil, and iron—are lacking. The agricultural products are cotton, tobacco, manioc, corn, sugar cane, rice, peanuts, yerba mate, citrus fruits, melons, sweet potatoes, beans and garden vegetables, pineapples, bananas, and other fruits. Lumbering is also important. In addition to the quebracho tree, which furnishes tannin, there are some types of trees and grasses from which oils can be profitably extracted, including oil of petigrain, tung, castor, and coconut oils. Cattle raising is an important industry, providing meat, meat extract, which is largely exported, and hides.

The people are largely a mixture of Spanish and Indian with the Indian (Guarani) predominating. The number of pure Indians and of pure Europeans is not large. There are some Spaniards, a few Italians, Germans, Englishmen, Slavs, and others, besides the Mennonites, who are of Dutch and German ethnic origin.

The Spanish impact on Paraguay goes back to 1537 with the founding of the first settlement, Asuncion. During most of the colonial period Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, served as the center from which the La Plata section of South America was administered. Since obtaining its independence from Spain in the second decade of the 19th century, Paraguay has had a checkered history. Three dictators dominated the political scene down to 1870, and since that time uprisings and revolutions of one kind or another have frequently plagued the country. Disastrous foreign wars have also contributed to the country's backwardness. One of these was the Chaco War in the 1930's, in which the Mennonites, by settling on territory in dispute between Paraguay and Bolivia, played an unintentional part.

Spain contributed her religious and cultural pattern to Paraguay. The great majority of the people are Roman Catholic, although the attachment on the part of many is no more than nominal. Religious and moral standards are quite low. The number of Protestants in Paraguay is not large, the Mennonites constituting the largest Protestant body. The educational level is also quite low, although the authorities are making heroic efforts to raise it.

It was into this environment that the Mennonites began to come in the 1920's. Some of the most conservative groups of the Mennonites from Western Canada, who had come from Russia in the 1870's, were the first to become interested in Paraguay. They prospered fairly well in Canada until World War I, when the Canadian government began to more fully nationalize its various ethnic elements. This effort included the passing of a law eliminating private elementary schools, and, in the public schools, compelling the use of English and forbidding the teaching of religion. These conservative groups of German-speaking Mennonites considered this a serious curtailment of privileges promised them when they came to Canada, and they began to look for new countries to which they might emigrate. The Old Colony Mennonites in 1919-20 investigated several countries in South America, but then decided to move to Mexico. Another conservative group composed of Sommerfelder, Chortitzer, and a few Berghthaler Mennonites then became interested in Paraguay. Oral promises of special privileges already made to the Old Colony group were now renewed and passed as a law in 1921. This famous and generous privilegium provides, among other things, that Mennonites and their descendants shall have the right to practice their religion and to worship with complete and unrestricted liberty, to make simple affirmations in courts of justice, and to be exempt from obligatory military service, combatant and noncombatant, in time of peace and war. They were also given the right to maintain and administer their own schools and to teach their religion and their German language without restriction.

Because of the depression of 1921 and the difficulty of selling their land at satisfactory prices the group which became Menno Colony did not get started on their way to Paraguay until near the end of 1926. With those who came in 1927, a total of 1,778 souls arrived at the river port of Puerto Casado. Since their land, lying slightly more than 100 miles west, bought from the specially formed Corporación Paraguaya, was not ready for settlement, these people were bitterly disappointed in their forced prolonged stay in and near Puerto Casado. In addition, tragedy struck in the form of typhoid and other diseases, taking a toll of over 200 lives. Over 300 disillusioned migrants returned to Canada. But the main body was finally able to settle on its own land in 1928 and the discontent was largely dissipated. Very few persons left this colony after actual settlement on the land. They settled in villages (fourteen in 1928), as had been the practice of their forefathers in Russia. This group, known as Menno Colony, was the first Mennonite settlement in South America and the most stable.

The names of a few non-Mennonites who helped in this venture should be mentioned. General Samuel McRoberts (q.v.), a New York banker, was contacted by the Mennonites and his interest and help enlisted in the cause. He, together with another banker as a partner, Edward B. Robinette, helped the Mennonites dispose of their holdings in Canada and helped them, through Corporación Paraguaya (q.v.), buy and settle on their lands in Paraguay. McRoberts hired a Norwegian, Fred Engen, to help him explore and select an area in which the Mennonites might be interested. It was Engen (q.v.) who suggested the Chaco area.

The next group of Mennonites who came to Paraguay were refugees from Russia. During the 1920's, as a result of the Communist revolution in Russia, some 21,000 Mennonites came to the United States and Canada, largely the latter. Other thousands, thinking the Communist storm would blow over, and lulled by the partial retreat from Communism under the New Economic Policy (NEP) following 1921, were less inclined to leave at that time. In 1929, after new and more persistent efforts to put Communism with its antireligious aspects into effect, the Mennonites realized too late that the emigration doors were pretty tightly closed. Nevertheless, out of the 20,000-30,000 said to have started for Moscow with the hope of escape, slightly less than 6,000 (including some non-Mennonites) were finally, on Nov. 25, 1929, permitted to leave for Germany, which gave them temporary asylum.

Penniless, these refugees needed help and received it from European and North American Mennonites and also from non-Mennonite Germans. Where these people should be settled permanently was a problem. Germany seemed at that time unable to keep them and doors to the United States and Canada, where they preferred to go, were now closed for the great majority. The Mennonite Central Committee came to their aid and after studying the matter as thoroughly as was possible in the short time at its disposal recommended Paraguay. Brazil was also open and a minority decided to migrate to that country. But Paraguay was one of the very few countries which promised them the freedom they desired and which at the same time was willing to receive the aged, ill, and crippled along with the others. Harold S. Bender was sent as the MCC representative to Germany in January 1930, to help arrange and organize the movement to Paraguay. In Paraguay the MCC arranged for the purchase of land from Corporación Paraguaya next to Menno Colony. In 1930-32 a total of slightly more than 2,000 persons from Russia migrated to the Paraguayan Chaco and established Fernheim Colony (q.v.). This number included 50 Mennonites who came from Poland and 367 who came from Russia by way of Harbin, China. In the Fernheim migration three Mennonite branches were represented—Mennonites (now GCM), Mennonite Brethren, and a small number of Allianz Gemeinde (q.v., corresponding to the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren).

Other than the small temporary settlement at Horqueta near Concepción, the third Mennonite settlement to be established in Paraguay was Friesland. This colony was founded by Fernheim settlers who were dissatisfied with the isolated Chaco and many of whom were also opposed to the colony co-operative. After investigating several places in eastern Paraguay the group decided to settle about 40 miles east of the Paraguay River port of Rosario, or slightly over 100 miles northeast of Asunción. The exodus from Fernheim occurred during the winter months of 1937, and by September 748 persons had settled and established Friesland Colony. The pattern of the new settlement was similar to that of Fernheim—settlement in villages; it also had the same religious organizations (GCM and MB) except that very few families of the Allianz Gemeinde had migrated. In time even a business co-operative, which had been so disliked in Fernheim, was formed, but membership was made voluntary. The exodus from Fernheim weakened that colony and caused some bitterness. The MCC discouraged the movement and gave no assistance to the new settlement until some years later. Economically, progress in the Friesland settlement has been disappointing.

In both Fernheim and Friesland considerable dissatisfaction with Paraguay manifested itself during the 1930's and early 1940's and not a little pro-German and pro-Nazi sympathy developed, especially in Friesland, but also in Fernheim; none, however, in Menno. For a while there was more talk of returning to Europe than of further Mennonite migrations to Paraguay, and some actually returned to Germany during the war. After the war, however, this feeling disappeared, and there were actually new Mennonite migrations to Paraguay.

In 1929, when the few thousand Mennonites were able to leave Russia, a larger number was forced to remain behind. During the course of the invasion and occupation of South Russia by the German army in 1941-43, additional thousands of Mennonites fled from Russia to Western Europe. Though many were forced to return to Russia, about 4,500 persons immigrated to Paraguay in 1947-48, besides the 162 persons who came with the group but remained in Buenos Aires. This new immigration to Paraguay was again due to the fact that the doors to other satisfactory countries were closed at this time. The International Refugee Relief Organization (IRO, q.v.) gave the MCC generous assistance in moving these refugees to Paraguay, and the colonies of Fernheim, Menno, and Friesland helped the MCC to get the new immigrants settled on the land. A few of these people settled in Asunción or in the colonies already established, but the majority organized two new colonies. The new Chaco colony of Neuland, located a few miles south of Fernheim, had a population of 2,389 in 1948, and the new colony of Volendam, a few miles north of Rosario on the Paraguay River, had 1,172 inhabitants in that year. The movement to these colonies was somewhat retarded by the Paraguayan revolution of 1947, some groups having been forced to wait several months in Buenos Aires or Asunción.

The most recent Mennonite settlements in Paraguay were founded in 1948 by fellow believers of Menno Colony—Sommerfelder and Chortitzer Mennonites from southern Manitoba, and a smaller contingent from Saskatchewan. Migration conscious ever since the founding of Menno Colony and fearing the impact of continued secularization on their way of life, they finally decided to emigrate. Not satisfied with the Chaco, where their brethren had located, they founded two colonies, Sommerfeld and Bergthal, in southeastern Paraguay between Villarrica and the Brazilian border. About 1700 persons emigrated, but because of disillusionment with the primitive and difficult situation they found some 600 returned to Canada in 1948-50.

The Hutterian Brethren (q.v.), distantly related to the Mennonites, in 1941 also formed a settlement in eastern Paraguay near the Mennonite settlement of Friesland. Of a heterogeneous European background, the group numbered 350 in 1941 and grew to 604 by 1950. This Bruderhof is called Primavera (q.v.).

As to the future of the Mennonites in Paraguay, no one, of course, can speak with certainty. Some groups are better satisfied and more stable than others. Menno Colony, as noted, is the most stable. Fernheim perhaps comes next, although a few are still leaving. In the newer colonies of Neuland and Volendam there is considerable dissatisfaction and quite a few have left—and are still leaving—mostly for Canada, where many have relatives. The economic and cultural backwardness of Paraguay together with its political instability has contributed to this unrest. Climate, insects, transportation difficulties, and lack of adequate markets have also made the struggle hard. On the other hand, many appreciate greatly the freedom they have and are willing to continue in hope that most of the discouraging conditions will improve. In this they are probably correct. For progress has been made, and more is likely to be made in the future. W.H.S.

The Mennonites in the Mennonite colonies of Paraguay are distributed as follows:

	1940	1950	1956
Menno	2020	3169	4265
Fernheim	1512	2339	2524
Neuland	1512	2497	2162
Friesland	822	986	969
Volendam	—	1810	1317
Bergthal	—	574	639*
Sommerfeld	—	626	644*
Asunción	?	?	170†
Total	4354	12001	c13040

* As of 1953.

† Variable figure because of shifting population.

J. Winfield Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953); Willard and Verna Smith, Paraguayan Interlude (Scottsdale, 1950).

Paraguay Mennonite Brethren Mission, "Light to the Indians," in the Paraguayan Chaco was started by missionary-minded members of the Mennonite churches of Fernheim, Paraguay. As early as 1932, soon after the European group of Mennonites settled in the Chaco, the evangelization of the resident aborigines was conceived. The Chaco-Bolivian War delayed a formal beginning until Sept. 17, 1935, when interested friends of missions of the three conferences represented in Fernheim, aided by the K/JK (Committee on Church Relations), formed the Fernheim Mission Association and organized a mission under the name "Licht den Indianern." The newly organized mission employed missionary Gerhard B. Giesbrecht, who with subsidies from various church groups in North America and intermittent help hired from the Mennonite settlements kept the mission work going.

In 1937 Bernard P. Epp came from North America to assist Giesbrecht with the study and construction of the Lengua Indian language and the evangelization of the tribe. Other workers labored for shorter intervals. In order to induce the Indians to settle at one place, the mission set out to operate a farm on which employment and living room was offered them. An experiment of eight years proved that these roaming, unevangelized Indians cannot be induced to reside at one place. It was only after the conversion and baptism of the first Indians in 1946 that these new Christians asked for permission to settle in the mission colony in order to withdraw themselves and their families from the pagan and shifting life of their tribesmen and to build a Christian community.

As early as 1943 definite requests were made by the missionaries as well as by the Fernheim Mission Association that the M.B. Conference of North America assume the responsibility. The formal acceptance of the mission by the M.B. Conference took place in November 1945.

The staff has been increased to include Mr. and Mrs. Jacob H. Franz from M.B. churches in North America, Mr. and Mrs. Gerhard B. Giesbrecht, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Klassen, Mr. and Mrs. Dietrich Lepp, Mr. and Mrs. Gerhard Hein, Mr. and Mrs. David Hein, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rennert, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kroeker, Mary Giesbrecht, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Enns from the M.B. churches in Paraguay, and Mr. and Mrs. Kornelius K. Isaak from the Mennonite church in Paraguay. Isaak was killed by a Morro Indian in 1958.

The mission operates stations in Asunción in eastern Paraguay and the Chulupie stations in Filadelfia and Neuland, as well as the Lengua stations at Laguna Ipuna and Yalve Sanga in the Chaco. It operates two elementary schools, one for Lenguas and one for Chulupies. Short term Bible instruction is given to adults. Dispensary work is carried on by the nurses. Several Gospels and some doctrinal material and songs have been translated into the Lengua and Chulupie languages. The total number of baptized believers in 1958 is somewhat over 200. (See Licht den Indianern, which this article supplements.) A.E.J.

A. E. Janzen, Glimpses of South America (Hillsboro, 1943); Mrs. H. T. Esau, The First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Missions (Hillsboro, 1954).

Parana, a state of Brazil, area about 77,000 sq. miles, population (1950) 2,149,509. Its capital is Curitiba, with a population of 141,349. Parana became the home in 1935 ff. of some of the Mennonites who had originally (1930) settled in Santa Catharina, also a state in Brazil (q.v.), some on the Krauel (q.v.), some on the Stoltz plateau (q.v.). The settlement at Auhagen on the Stoltz plateau did not prosper economically; therefore most of the settlers, 75 families with 368 persons, left in 1935-36 and settled (a few in Blumenau and Sao Paulo) mostly near Curitiba, the capital of Parana. Later when the Krauel settlement dissolved most of the group went to Parana near Curitiba, while others went to Bagé in the state of Rio Grand do Sul, founding a largely Mennonite Brethren settlement there in 1949-50.

The first settlement in Parana was made in 1935 by 38 families at the village of Bouqueirao, some 6 miles from Curitiba. In 1936 a second settlement of 28 families was made in the same area, and in 1937 a third with 74 families called Xaxim. In 1948 a fourth settlement, Guarituba, was founded 12 miles from Curitiba. In the city of Curitiba itself, in the suburb Villa Guaira, a Mennonite area developed, which in 1953 had 75 families. In 1953 the total Mennonite population in and around Curitiba was 292 families, with 1300 persons. The last Mennonite settlement in Parana was made in 1951 about 50 miles northwest of Curitiba, and is called New Witmarsum. In 1953 it had 53 families with 319 persons. Thus the total in Parana was 245 families with 1,619 persons. In the Bouqueirao area the settlers are largely dairy farmers supplying Curitiba with most of its milk. The New Witmarsum settlers are largely dairy and cattle farmers. H.S.B.

Wilhelm Bärge, "Die Mennoniten bei Curitiba in Brasilien," in Der Bote, 1948, No. 1283, p. 2 f.; Walter Quiring, "Auhagen in Brasilien, eine gescheiterte mennonitische Bergsiedlung," in Der Bote, 1948, Nos. 1279-86; idem, Im Schweisse Deines Angesichts (Steinbach, 1953); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, 1953); ML III, 335.

Parkesburg Mennonite Church (MC), located in Parkesburg, a borough of 2,800 in Chester Co., Pa., was opened in the Owens Building in 1938, by the members of the Millwood (q.v.) congregation. Noah L. Hershey was ordained pastor Nov. 13, 1946, and Amos W. Yoder deacon on June 28, 1950. In 1947-48 a substantial brick building 56 x 36 ft. was built on Second Avenue. In 1957 the membership was 57.

I.D.L.

Park View Mennonite Church (MC), located near Harrisonburg, Rockingham Co., Va., a member of the Virginia Conference, was organized in January 1954 with 57 charter members, after many years of group worship on the college campus. Mennonites in this vicinity had held membership in both the Northern and Middle districts of the Virginia Conference. The congregation operates with a church council which has representation from its membership, Eastern Mennonite College administration, as well as the College and congregational pastors. Sunday worship services are held jointly with the students who are living on the campus. The mid-week worship service is designed as a distinctly congregational feature. The membership in 1957 was 82; the ministers were John L. Stauffer, bishop, Ira E. Miller, and Paul H. Martin. I.E.M.

Parma, Margaret of: see Margaret of Parma.

Parnell (Iowa) Mennonite Church (MC) was established in 1948 as a mission under the West Union Mennonite Church. It became an independent congregation in 1958 with approximately 55 members. An abandoned church was purchased and moved into town for the use of the congregation. Paul E. M. Yoder and John Miller Yoder were its ministers. M.G.

Partridge (Kansas) Amish community. Partridge (pop. 221) is located slightly northwest of the center of Reno Co. (q.v.), Kan., on State Highway 61, approximately 10 miles southwest of Hutchinson, the county seat. The town of Partridge was begun in 1884. A year earlier, 1883, a group of Amish families moved from Shelbyville, Ill., to Reno County (q.v.) and settled in the Partridge and Yoder neighborhoods. The Partridge Old Order Amish settlement in 1955 consisted of three districts with 192 members: North Center District, 58 members, and South Center District, 70 members, both under John D. Yoder as bishop (ord. 1944), and East Center District, 64 members, with John N. Mast (ord. 1955) as bishop. The Plainview (q.v.) Conservative Mennonite Church was organized in August 1948 in the Partridge-Hutchinson community, most of whose members came from the Partridge Old Order Amish. The Conservative Church (q.v.) in 1957 had 97 members. D.P.M.

Paschen (Paaschen, Paessen), a Dutch Mennonite family, which originally lived at Burgsteinfurt (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany. Here its members were already Mennonites, most of them merchants; Hendrik Gerritsz Paschen, a merchant, was a preacher of the Burgsteinfurt Mennonite congregation in the early 17th century. About 1623 Berent Paschen (b. 1601) moved to Enschedé in the Dutch district of Twenthe, and other members of the family followed. Some of them also settled at Ootmarsum and Hengelo, but the main center of the family was at Enschedé. The branch remaining in Burgsteinfurt died out about 1700. The Paschen family played an important part in the development both of the Mennonite congregation and the town of Enschedé, its members usually being textile merchants. Isaac Paschen (d. c1710), a son of Hendrik Gerritsz Paschen of Burgsteinfurt, was a preacher of the congregation. Abraham and Gerrit Paschen, both textile manufacturers, moved to Winterswijk about 1762, where many of their descendants served as deacons of the Mennonite congregation until recent times. By marriage the Paschens became related to a number of noted Mennonite families, such as Stenvers, van Lochem, Blijdenstein, Stroink, Roelvink (all in Enschedé), ten Cate (Enschede and Almelo), Coster and Hofkes (Almelo), Willink and Walyen (Winterswijk), and Rierink (Zutphen).

Blaput ten Cate (Groningen I, 31) tells an anecdote concerning Hendrik Gerritsz Paschen, a merchant and Mennonite preacher at Burgsteinfurt; being surprised by robbers (c1650), he preached them a sermon on Luke 3:14, which made them so ashamed that they left. vdZ.

Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 57, 61, 97, 104, 134; A. Benthem Gz, Geschiedenis van Enschedé (2d ed. 1920) 722; F. C. Fleischer, De Doopsgezinde gemeente te Winterswijk (1909) passim; the genealogy of the Blijdenstein family (passim) in Ned. Patriciaat XXXIII (1947) 7-34; P. Beets, Stamboek der Willingen (Deventer, 1767) passim.

Paschen, Den, a small farm near Zenderen in the district of Twente, Dutch province of Overijssel, was the center and meeting place of the Mennonites in this district, later forming the congregations of Hengelo and Borne. The relation of den Paschen with the Mennonite Paschen (q.v.) family is not clear; probably some Paschens lived here. Elder Hendrik Berends (Hulshoff, q.v.; 1664-1745) lived at den Paschen. vdZ.

Pasensner von Jesenwang, Martin, ducal inquisitor in Bavaria, Germany, in 1527. Along the Lech regular hunts had been made (for example by the bailiff of Esting according to a report of Dec. 2, 1527), before Martin Pasensner von Jesenwang received the commission, in the spirit of the simultaneous decision of the Swabian League, to hunt down the Anabaptists throughout the country by means of spies and put them into prison; and all officials were instructed to support him. In Bavaria as elsewhere the Anabaptists brought in received no trial, but "the sentence was read at once and the execution followed," for "the secular law is in this case louder."

HEGE.

J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutions-Periode 1522-1526 (Freiburg, 1851) 721; V. A. Winter, Gesch. der bayrischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809) 29 f., and 177; ML II, 697; III, 335.

Pashnya Mennonite Brethren Church was established in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) of Siberia, and served five villages—Ananyevka, Grigoryevka, Markovka, Ekaterinovka, and Zhelanovka. A meetinghouse was located in Ananyevka. The first leading minister, Gerhard Isaak, was succeeded by Johann Friesen. Other ministers were Heinrich Isaak, Wilhelm Fast, Peter Gäde, Jakob Peters, Jakob Gäde, and Jakob Penner. There were smaller meetinghouses in some of the villages. The present state of the church is unknown. C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 78.

Pashnya Mennonite Church was located in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia and served the inhabitants of Grigoryevka, Markovka, Ananyevka, Ekaterinovka, and Zhelanovka. The first leading minister of the congregation was Jakob Quiring, assisted by Johann Neufeld, David Janzen, Johann Sawatzky, and Johann Boldt. The congregation worshipped in school buildings. (See also Slavgorod Mennonite Church.) C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 72.

Pasma, a Dutch Mennonite family, living in the province of Friesland, and originally residing at Akkrum, where they were farmers; the family name of Pasma is not found before 1810, but the family is much older and found as early as 1600. It is not clear whether the first generations were Mennonite, but Hendrik Franses, b. c1745, was a Mennonite. In 1770 he was married to Wybrich Atzes, widow of Atze Joostes. They were farmers at Snikzwaag near Joure in Friesland, and the curious fact is mentioned that the owner of their farm, Baron Hobbe of Aylva, donated to them the farm on which they lived. Their grandson Hendrik Franses Pasma (1813-91), married to Fokje Jans Fokma, both Mennonites, was a farmer at Irnsum and Haskerdijken. He was an outstanding pioneer in agriculture. Though he had in his youth received little education, he later educated himself by much reading and studying. In 1868 he published an important brochure on the cattle plague and addressed numerous meetings of farmers. In 1879 he was one of the founders of the Fries Rundvee-Stamboek (Frisian Herdbook Association); and on the instigation of the city of Kampen he founded a model agricultural farm near Kampen. He was also active in finding methods for improving the manufacture of butter and made a plan for better drainage of Friesland by building pumping-engines and canals, which project was taken over by the government of Friesland. Hendrik Franses Pasma was an alderman of Haskerland and a member of the States of Friesland, and also a deacon of the Mennonite congregation of Heerenveen. His great-grandson is Frans Hendriks Pasma (b. 1886 at Joure), Mennonite pastor of Mensinge-weer 1913-16, Dantumawoude 1916-21, and Grouw 1921-51, who was the moderator of the ADS (q.v.) 1940-46, active in behalf of a better pension for retired ministers and ministers' widows, author of Onze Vermaning (Bergum, 1917), De Doopsgezinden te Grouw (Grouw, 1930), De Friese Doopsgezinde gemeenten in de laatste halve eeuw (n.p., n.d., 1947), and Doopsgezind Handboek (1954). Since about 1850 a number of descendants have joined the Reformed Church. vdZ.

H. de Haan, Frans Hendriks Pasma, zijn Voorouders en Nageslacht (Leeuwarden, n.d.-1956); G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland II, 1800-1900 (Leeuwarden, 1934) passim, see Index.

Paso Robles First Mennonite Church, Cal., was organized in 1903 by twenty-five charter members. Originally this group was a part of the San Marcos Mennonite Church (q.v.) which dissolved on Nov. 26, 1903, and reorganized as the Willow Creek Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the First Mennonite Church of Paso Robles. The group dismantled an old building 15 miles west of Paso Robles and moved it to Paso Robles where the church was erected. Some of the members lived at Estrella, where worship services were conducted on alternate Sundays for a while. The preaching was originally in German, then in German and English, and at present it is in English only.

Jacob Hege served the congregation until 1906, when he moved to Idaho. John K. Lichti succeeded him and was ordained as elder by Michael Horsch. Hege returned to Paso Robles and served as elder 1915-19, succeeded by his son Christian C. Hege 1919-44. Since that time the church has been served by Arlo Kaufman, Ben Rahn, M. S. Galle, and Alfred J. Schwartz, the current (1958) pastor; the membership is 69. C.K.

H. D. Burkholder, The Story of Our Conferences and Churches (1951).

Paso Robles (Cal.) Second Mennonite Church (GCM), since 1954 called Willow Creek Mennonite Church (q.v.), before 1943 called San Marcos Mennonite Church (q.v.).

Passamentwerker, Geert, an Anabaptist martyr: see Geert Passamentwerker.

Passamentwerker, Arent, an Anabaptist martyr: see Arent Aerssens.

Passau, a city on the Danube in Lower Bavaria, Germany, once a fortress, where, according to some reports, a small Anabaptist congregation formed at the beginning of the Reformation period. In 1527 Hans Hut (q.v.) baptized Hermann Kheil, a citizen of Passau (Vergicht Passau, Feb. 4, 1529; Nicoladoni, 28). Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), Lienhard Stieglitz (q.v.), and other Anabaptist leaders stemmed from Passau. The appendix to Nicoladoni's book contains the records of several Anabaptist trials in Passau. In 1537 about sixty Anabaptists on their way from Moravia to South Germany, were seized in Passau and held in the castle prison for five years. Many died including the song writers Hans Betz (Petz) (q.v.) and Bernhard (Michael) Schneider (q.v.). The prisoners wrote fifty-one hymns, which are contained in the Ausbund (q.v.). (See also Philippites.) NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, p. X and 132; H. W. Erbkam, Geschichte der protestantischen Sekten im Zeitalter der Reformation (Hamburg and Gotha, 1848); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 74; A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bunderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); V. A. Winter, Gesch. der bayerischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809); ML III, 336.

Passau, Jörg von: see Nespitzer, Georg.

Passchier Weyns, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 29, 1568, with Daniel de Pacu and Daniel van Vooren. Particulars are lacking. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives only the year of their execution, not the exact date, nor the method. The names of these martyrs are also found in a song, "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfthondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the 1578 and following editions of the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 370, E 726; Verheyden, Gent, 50, No. 165.) vdZ.

Pastor, Adam: see Adam Pastor.

Pastoral Messenger, the official organ of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference (MC), is a quarterly, published by the Bishop Board, J. Paul Graybill, editor. The first issue appeared on April 1, 1941. It is now regularly an eight-page paper, printed at Scottsdale, Pa.; 6400 copies are printed and sent out gratis to every congregation in the conference. I.D.L.

Pastorius, Francis Daniel (1651-1719), a native of Sommershausen near Frankfurt, Germany, was one of the signatories of the first protest against slavery in America, which was presented on April 18, 1688. He was educated in several German universities and earned a doctorate in law. In Frankfurt he met Philipp Spener and William Penn. From this contact may have come the idea of emigrating to America. On April 2, 1683, he sailed, arriving in Philadelphia on August 20. His Mennonite and Quaker friends who followed on the Concord he greeted with a poem upon their arrival on Oct. 6, 1683. Under his vigorous leadership a plan was at once made for the city of Germantown (q.v.). In 1688 he married. His home became the center of a Christian cultured circle. In 1691 he was chosen mayor of Germantown. When the school was built in 1701 he became the first teacher; a log house erected in 1708 served as a school and a church. Pastorius, a Pietist, joined neither the Quakers nor the Mennonites. He wrote many books and much verse that have not been published, in Greek, French, Dutch, English, and Italian. He died at the close of 1719. NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1884, 60; 1889, 39; M. D. Learned, The Life of Francis Daniel Pastorius of Germantown (Philadelphia, 1908); Whittier's Pennsylvania Pilgrim (Boston, 1872); Comeniushefte, 1893, 30; 1910, 225; Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 82 ff.; C. H. Wedel, Abriß der Geschichte der Mennoniten (Newton, 1900-4) 131 f.; ML III, 336.

Pastwa, a Mennonite village name transplanted from Prussia to the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, and the East Reserve, Manitoba. (See Villages.) C.K.

Pastwa, West Prussia, Germany, a part of the congregation located at Jerczewo, a subsidiary of Heubuden (q.v.). In 1854 Jerczewo built a church in Pastwa and in 1899 united with the Frisian congregation of Tragheimerweide. Pastwa later changed its name to Gutsch and then to Zandersfelde. (ML III, 336.) E.C.

Pastwa, a Mennonite congregation in the Gnadenfeld volost in the Molotschna, Russia (q.v.), founded in 1820. E.C.

Pati, a city (pop. 22,440) in northwest Java, Indonesia, a former mission of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, transferred to the Mennonites by the Reformed Church in 1898. At first Missionary Johann Fast (q.v.) had little result here, but after 1930, when a missionary hospital was built, the number of converts from Mohammedanism increased and a congregation was founded, independent since 1940, with a meetinghouse. In 1949 this congregation numbered 102 baptized members and 95 children; the minister is Sardjoe Djojodihardjo (since 1949). Besides this Javanese congregation there is in the town of Pati also a Chinese Mennonite congregation (membership 176 in 1953). E.C., vdZ.

Uit Verleden en Heden der Doopsgezinde Zending, 1937; ML III, 336.

Pati (Java) Mennonite Biblical Seminary. Before World War II the graduates of the mission-sponsored teacher-training school in Margoredjo received an extra year of Bible training, but only very few of these teacher-lay ministers are still in active church service. A few Mennonite young people had also been sent to and graduated from a Biblical seminary operated by the Reformed Mission Society. One student graduated from the Interchurch Theological Seminary in Jakarta. The Mennonites, however, never had their own preacher training program. Therefore the postwar number of trained ministers in the Mennonite Church was very small. Many congregations and mission stations did not even have an untrained minister. This situation was especially dangerous in the light of the postwar situation. In the newly achieved national independence the Mohammedans became very active. On the other hand, hitherto unknown missionary possibilities were opened. All this clearly called for a large number of trained ministers, and thus, for a program of preacher training.

In February 1950 the Javanese Mennonite church established the Biblical Seminary in Pati. The expenses of this project were shared equally by the MCC, the European Mennonite Mission Board, and the Javanese church. Very simple temporary buildings for classrooms and a dormitory were rented. Twelve young people with the equivalent of junior high school training were admitted as students. Afterwards this number was doubled by the arrival of a group of Batak (Sumatra) students who could not find a place in their own (Lutheran) church seminary. An all-Javanese board supervised the training program, which was headed by two Javanese instructors (S. Djojodihardjo and S. Harso) and two Dutch missionaries (R. S. Kuitse and J. P. Matthijssen). A number of secular courses were taught by several part-time teachers (Javanese and American). The five-year curriculum was in general the same as that of other Indonesian seminaries, none of which (except the Theological Seminary in Jakarta) leads to any academic degree, but which train young Indonesian Christians to become full-fledged, full-time ministers and missionaries. The Pati curriculum consisted of Old Testament Introduction, Theology and Exegesis of Old Testament; the same of the New Testament; Systematic Theology; Ethics; Church History; History of Dogma; Islam; Ecclesiology; Pastoral Theology; Catechetics; Homiletics; Liturgics; Missiology; New Testament Greek; Mennonite History and Principles; Philosophy, Psychology, and several secular courses, and supervised practical work. After completion of the five-year course during which time no new students were admitted except for a few in a special two-year program, final examinations were held in the spring and summer of 1955.

The financial position of the Javanese church makes it impossible to absorb additional large numbers of ministers in the near future. Thus the number of new students had to be limited. This fact, added to the financial impossibility of maintaining an adequate faculty, motivated the decision to merge the Pati seminary with two others facing the same difficulties (West Java Chinese, East Javanese). This merger took effect as of Aug. 1, 1955. This new interdenominational school, which is located in Malang, East Java, is attended by several Mennonite students and has an excellent joint staff. R. S. Kuitse, who is the Mennonite member of this staff, also teaches several specifically Mennonite courses to those interested. The rest of the former Pati staff is now occupied in a new training school for lay church workers, located in Pati. J.M.

Patijn, a well-known Dutch family of French descent. Andries Jansz Patijn, a Mennonite (b. c1559), moved from Rombeke in Flanders, Belgium, to Haarlem, Holland, where he died in 1623. He was a brandy seller and a member of the Haarlem Flemish Mennonite congregation, as was also his son Daniel Patijn (1612-38). Daniel was a skipper, maintaining a regular ship service between Haarlem and Alkmaar; he died at an early age; his wife, a non-Mennonite, had the children educated in the Reformed Church and so the entire Patijn family has become Reformed. It is possible that Lieven Pattin of Maldeghem, Belgium, who is said to have lived there in 1630 as a well-to-do Mennonite, belonged to this family. (Ned. Patriciaat IX, 1918, 280 ff.; DB 1876, 106, 108.) vdZ.

Pätkau, Jacob H. (1895-1947), a prominent Mennonite elder in the Memrik settlement, South Russia, was born in Nikolaipol, Borrissovo settlement, on April 1, 1895, the son of the miller and preacher Heinrich Pätkau. After graduation from the Chortitza Normal School (Lehrerseminar) in 1914 he began teaching in the village school at Schönhorst, Chortitza settlement, but was drafted into alternative service (medical corps) in 1915-17, and resumed teaching in Karpovka, Memrik, in 1917-22, making a brilliant record as an educational leader for the entire settlement. He was ordained preacher in early 1921 by the Kalinovo congregation, and within six months as elder, serving as overseer over the church in 10 villages and beyond. At the request of his church he remained at his post when he could have emigrated to Canada. He was elected a member of the KjK (q.v.) in January 1925. In the autumn of 1929 he went to Moscow to help those fleeing from Russia, but was arrested and returned to his home. He then fled with his family to the Caucasus, where he continued to serve the church. But he was in constant danger and fled from place to place. He was finally caught in 1937-38, arrested, and sent to Siberia. He was still living in 1945 but dead by 1947. His widow was still living in 1949, working in a children's home.

Taken from A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer (Clearbrook, 1949) 154-56. H.S.B.

Patos, an Old Colony Mennonite settlement consisting of 3,000 persons in 1950, is established in the state of Durango, Mexico, about 75 miles north and west of the capital. Patos is the Mexican town that serves as the post office, trading center, and railroad station for the more than sixteen villages that comprise the Mennonite settlement. Mennonites do not live in the town, but in agricultural villages within driving distance of this town. It is of historical interest that originally all of the Old Colony Mennonites now in Mexico had planned to settle in the state of Durango. Land bought there by the large settlement now in the state of Chihuahua was later exchanged for land in Chihuahua before the settlers actually arrived. The Durango colony is about 500 miles south of the larger settlements of Chihuahua.

J.W.F.

Patriots and Mennonites in the Netherlands. When William I of Orange in 1568 started the battle against Spain for the freedom of the Netherlands, the Dutch Mennonites supported him loyally with all means except active military service (see Bogaert). Not only William I, but also other stadholders of the House of Orange, e.g., Maurice and William III, protected the Mennonites and upheld their privileges of freedom from military service and the oath, granted to them by William I. On their part the Mennonites were warmly attached to the House of Orange. But after the middle of the 18th century and particularly from 1787 on, this changed, and the Mennonites lost much of their sympathy for the Oranges, turning to the views of the Patriots, who were the opponents of the Orangistic group in the Netherlands. Against the conservative views and practices of the Orangists they were progressive and liberal, tending to democracy and demanding a voice in matters of politics. There were a number of causes to make the Mennonites side with the Patriots: the period of the stadholdership of William V of Orange (1766-95), a spineless governor, who was largely influenced by his wife and especially by the group of Orangistic magistrates who often abused the privileges of their office and ranks; the incompetency of the government to restore trade and prosperity, which had been severely weakened by the wars; and the fact that only members of the Reformed Church were allowed to hold government offices. Besides this, the reading of English and French philosophers offered many critical persons new ideas concerning statesmanship and political economy. The War of Independence in America (1776-83), and particularly the Declaration of Independence with its definition of the rights of men, made an enormous impression on the Dutch Patriots. Many of them suffered severely at the hands of the Orangistic party; some were imprisoned, while others were banished from the country. Especially after 1787, when after a short period of hegemony of the Patriots, the reaction of the Orangistic-Reformed party forced many Patriots to go into exile, either voluntary or by the measures of the government. After the outbreak of the French Revolution (1789) and particularly from the moment (1795) when the French armies brought to the Netherlands the realization of the motto of the French Revolution, "Freedom, Equality, Brotherhood," the Patriots became the leading party in the Netherlands. But they soon had the disillusioning experience that the French occupation was no less harsh than the tyranny of the Orangists had been, and many Patriot leaders, disappointed with the new situation, soon withdrew from the local and general offices.

In the Patriot movement there were a large number of Mennonites and many, including Mennonite preachers, were among the leaders. The Mennonites were now for the first time in the Netherlands permitted to hold a public office. It was a consequence of this situation that many then gave up the principle of nonresistance and took up arms. Franciscus Adrianus van der Kemp (q.v.), for example, a Mennonite pastor at Leiden, became an officer of a voluntary corps and in nearly every congregation many members joined the free corps. It should, however, be emphatically stated that not all Mennonites then renounced the old principle of nonresistance, as there were also some strict opponents of Patriotism among the Dutch Mennonites, as for example, Pastor Jacob Ouwejans (q.v.) of Rotterdam and the banker Archibald Hope in Amsterdam. Particularly in the district of Twente, in the Zaan region, and in Friesland, the Mennonites enthusiastically co-operated with the Patriots. Pieter Bel and Pieter Houttuyn, both deacons of the Mennonite congregation in Hoorn, fled to Brussels in 1788 to escape the revenge of the Orange party. Pieter Vreede of Leiden took an active part in the revolution (January 1795); in Friesland it was Pier Zeper of Leeuwarden, later treasurer of the Mennonite conference in Friesland, who upon orders from the Comité Revolutionair traveled about in Friesland (February 1795) to dismiss the magistrates who had been in sympathy with the Orangists. Among the first Mennonites to take office were Jan Bernard Blijdenstein in Enschedé and the Mennonite minister of Boven-Knijpe, A. S. Cuperus, while pastor J. H. Floh (q.v.) of Enschedé in 1796 became a delegate in the National Assembly and in 1798 its secretary. Many Mennonites were chosen members of the provisional governments, both local and provincial. Rutger Jansz Schimmelpenninck (q.v.), who in 1796 became the Grand Pensionary and president of the National Assembly of the Netherlands, stemmed from a well-known Mennonite family. Among the Patriot leaders were the following Mennonite pastors: Petrus Loosjes (q.v.) of Haarlem, who with his brother Cornelis Loosjes was editor of Vaderlandsche Let- teroejeningen, a periodical which, founded in 1816, did much to spread the Patriot views; Nicolaas Kloppe (q.v.) of Harlingen, Andries Scheltes Cuperus (q.v.) of Bovenknijspe, Sybren Hofstra of Workum, Jelle Sipkes van Teern (q.v.) of IJlst, Abrahams Staal of Leeuwarden, who was forced to give up his ministry, Gerardus ten Cate of Almelo, and Arend Hendrik van Gelder of Zaandam. vbZ.

N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 189, 252; J. Hartog, De Patriotten en Oranje (Amsterdam, 1882); J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) passim; Inw. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 178; DB 1881, 52 f.; 1909, 70-91; 1912, 107-12; DJ 1931, 112-15; 1951, 63 f.

Paturatte, La, in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland. Here in the fields is found a Mennonite school, founded in 1900 by Elder Samuel Gerber of the Sonnenberg (q.v.) congregation. In 1955 the schoolroom was remodeled. It is a private school, run without state aid; the number of children was 16 in 1956; teacher is Samuel Gerber. vdZ.

Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (Newton, 1952) 5-11; Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 7, 105.

Paul I, Emperor of Russia 1796-1801, the son of Peter III and Catherine II, was crowned on Nov. 17, 1796, at the age of 42, and murdered on March 2, 1801, by a conspiracy of Count Pahlen. He gave the Mennonites the well-known letter of protection of Sept. 6, 1800. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 90; ML III, 337.) NEFF.

Paulding County (Ohio) Mennonite settlement, now extinct, was located in the vicinity of the present village of Junction, eight miles northeast of Paulding. Frederick Geiger of the Putnam Co., Ohio, Swiss Mennonite settlement was attracted to the vicinity in 1862 because of the large amount of uncut timber. He operated a sawmill here and purchased tracts of timber, cleared them and resold the land at a profit. Members of the Hilty, Augsburg, Bandy, and Kemler families from the Putnam County settlement moved there in the next few years. Bishop John Thut of the Riley Creek Mennonite Church (later called Zion Mennonite Church), located about three miles west of Bluffton, Ohio, made several visits to this new settlement, holding services in the homes of various members. Likely other ministers from near-by Mennonite churches also paid occasional visits. Since no Mennonite minister settled here, Frederick Geiger and most of the other settlers returned to the Putnam County settlement in the 1870's. The Kemlers and Bandys remained but were lost to the Mennonite Church. D.L.G.

J. Umble, "Early Mennonite Sunday Schools of Northwestern Ohio: II. Zion (Bluffton) congregation," MQR V, No. 3 (July 1931) 182-84; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 159-60.

Paul(I)ewitz (Pawlovitz; Czech, Pavlovice), situated in a valley surrounded by vineyards, a little off the highway, half way between Auspitz and Kostel. The Hutterian Brethren opened a Bruderhof here on the lands of the Baron of Lipa, a house having been purchased in the spring of 1545 by Jakob Seckler, in which "the tall Matthes" served as the first householder. During the persecution of 1547 it was probably abandoned with the rest; it was not likely reopened, for it is nowhere mentioned again.

P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Gr. Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren, Part II: Brünner Erzdiözese II (Brno, 1858) 114 f.; ML III, 338.

Pauls (Pauels, Pauwels, Paulsen), a family name common among Mennonites of Prusso-Russian background which was found in the Danzig and Prussian Mennonite churches as early as 1621; e.g., Thiensdorf, Orloff, Danzig, Elbing, Königsberg, Montau-Gruppe, Kazun, and Heubuden. The origin of the name is Paul-sen (son). Heinrich Pauls was a minister of the Mennonite Church in Galicia. Jacob M. Pauls is coelder of the Bergthal Mennonite Church of Manitoba and Wilhelm Pauls is the founder of the Didsbury Bible School, Alberta, and a minister. (Reimer, Familiennamen.) C.K.

Paulsheim, a Mennonite congregation in the volost of Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna (q.v.), South Russia, established in 1852. (ML III, 338.) E.C.

Paulus van Drunen (Druynen), a goldsmith and an Anabaptist elder and martyr, was burned at the stake for the sake of his faith with three other Anabaptists, Michiel Stevens of Oosterhout, Jan Block of Gent, and Adriaen of The Hague, at Vught near 's Hertogenbosch in the Dutch province of North Brabant on Sept. 9, 1538. They had been muzzled before the execution. Two days later four other members of the congregation at 's Hertogenbosch or Vught, of which Paulus van Drunen was the bishop, were put to death; viz., Neelken (the wife of Paulus van Drunen), Jan van Capel, Lysken (the wife of Jan Block), and Geertken Erasmusdochter, of Maastricht. The source of van Braght's report in the Martyrs' Mirror was "an old writing" from Friesland. The Martyrs' Mirror speaks of 10-17 persons who died as martyrs at Vught at that time. The history has been clarified by Karel Vos in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, 1917. (Mart. Mir. D 41, E 447; DB 1917, 114, No. 39, and 186 ff., 189; ML III, 337.) vdZ.

Paulus Harrouts, an Anabaptist martyr of Somerdijk, i.e., Sommeldijk (q.v.), burned at the stake at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, on Dec. 7, 1540, because he did not believe the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. (DB 1908, 106; ML II, 257.) NEFF.

Paulus (Pouwel) van Meenen (Paulus van Tiel), a Mennonite elder who was active in Flanders, Belgium, from about 1565. About his private life little is known. He was born at Meenen (Menin) of a prominent family; in 1605 he was still living, then being an elder at Haarlem, Holland. His name is mentioned by some martyrs who had been baptized by him. He was apparently very active in preaching and baptizing. Hans Alenson (BRN VII, 215) reported that after the Frisian-Flemish schism of 1566 Paulus van Meenen sided with the Flemish branch, but took a strict position concerning banning. A letter written in prison by Jacob de Rore (q.v.) to Paulus van Meenen (found in van Braght's Mart. Mir. D 465-68, E 809-12) reveals that Paulus had asked the opinion of his co-elder de Rore as to banning and shunning. De Rore answered by admonishing Paulus van Meenen not to force the issue of the practice of avoidance. vDZ.

K. Vos, "De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de zestiende eeuw," in Bulletin . . . d'Histoire de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 358 f., 377; Verheyden, "Mennonitism in Flanders," ms.

Paulus, Nikolaus (1853-1930), a German Catholic theologian and historian, was chaplain in Molsheim 1878-83, curate in Munich in 1885, wrote among other things the book Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Freiburg, 1911), with strong polemics showing the complete intolerance of the reformers, Lutheran as well as Zwinglian or Calvinist. The objections of Protestant secular and church historians could not invalidate the facts presented by Paulus; especially as Ernst Troeltsch's Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (Tübingen, 1912) created a generally favorable attitude toward the sects and free churches. Also the Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täufer-tum by Wilhelm Wiswedel (2 vv., Kassel, 1930) adopted much from Paulus. (ML III, 337.) E.T.

Paulus van Tielt: see Paulus van Meenen.

Paur (Baur), Thomas, a member of the Anabaptist congregation in Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, about 1527, in whose home in the Antoni house on the Honoltzburg their religious services were held. At his home Jörg Nespitzer (q.v.), Eucharis Binder (q.v.), Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), and Hans Hut (q.v.) went in and out, and at times lived there. With the exception of Hut, they were all related by marriage. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte I (2d ed., Munich, 1901) 232; ML III, 337.

Pausram, a market village about four miles from Auspitz, Moravia, in which Philip Vlay, a tile maker from Vaihingen, united with the Hutterian Brethren in August 1538, who settled in a house and small vineyard belonging to him. During the persecution of 1547 the Bruderhof had to be abandoned, but when the persecution subsided it was rebuilt on a larger scale. Here the deacon Michael Kern died in 1561, and the preacher Christian Zwickh, called Dietl, a native of Tirol, on Sept. 18, 1580; "he knew Latin well." The property had by this time grown considerably, the Brethren owning nine gardens in one division and four in another, then nine Gewand fields with meadows and forests, besides their house, and in addition a polishing and grinding equipment, a fulling machine, a tannery, and a grain mill, for which they paid their baron, Friedrich von Zierotin, an annual rent of fifty-two florins and thirty-two Moravian crowns. Friedrich von Zierotin also owned the land of the colonies in Selowitz (q.v.), Pohrlitz (q.v.), Nusslau (q.v.), Nikolschitz (q.v.), and Pribitz (q.v.), which housed about 3,000 Hutterian Brethren. In Pausram they also had a spa, which was widely known among the Moravian nobility. In this Bruderhof Karl von Zierotin (q.v.) dined on Nov. 4, 1588, with his uncle Friedrich, who was a patient at the spa, and whom the Brethren called "our Fritz" because of his benevolence toward them. In Pausram occurred the death of the deacons Noah Weiss, March 30, 1606; Hans Summer, Sept. 23, 1611; and exactly two years later Philipp Ferber. In December 1620 the Brethren who fled from the destroyed Bruderhofs of Pribitz, Pohrlitz, Maskowitz (q.v.), and Niemtschitz (q.v.) sought refuge here. In May 1621 the imperial armies came to Pausram; the soldiers took "from the craftsmen and here and there in the house by force what they liked." The captain confiscated the wine; the seven barrels were "drunk up in half a day and all kinds of arbitrariness took place thereby." In Pausram a meeting of all the preachers, householders, buyers, and distributors was held on Feb. 21, 1622, in which the previous Vorsteher Rudolf Hirzel (q.v.) was expelled with Burckhart Braitenstainer (q.v.) and also Christoph Hirzel in spite of the threats of Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.)—for betraying the hiding place of the buried money, and Valentin Winter (q.v.) was appointed as elder. A few months later Pausram was abandoned. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Fr. Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Archiv für Kunde österreichischer Geschichtsquellen III (1850) 72 f.; ML III, 337 f.

Pauw (Pauw, Pau, Pou, Pouw), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living at De Rijp, province of North Holland, where Cornelis Jacobs Pauw (d. 1730) was a deacon of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation. He was probably a member of the Reformed Church, and joined the Mennonites in 1705 with his second wife. A number of his descendants, some of whom settled at Purmerend, were deacons at De Rijp and Purmerend. Ysbrand Arisz Pau(w) (d. July 24, 1793), a son of Aris Jacob Pauw and Neeltje Mars, of De Rijp, was a lay preacher of the Barsingerhorn-Wieringerward congregation in 1783-93. vDZ.

N. H. Slinger, Het Doopsgezind geslacht Pauw (Alkmaar, 1938); Naamlijst 1794, 63.

Pauwel, an elder of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of Danzig, West Prussia, is mentioned in two letters by Elder Jan Gerrits (q.v.), written to the Dutch Waterlander Elder Hans de Ries (q.v.) in 1612. By the time of the second of these letters, undated, Pauwel had apparently died. The letter says he is said to have been an excellent leader under whose influence the congregation became prosperous, peaceable, able, and tolerant. The first letter, dated Aug. 25, mentions the death of Elder Simon Martenz and a severe illness of Elder Paulus Bussemaker. If the Pauwel of the second letter is identical with Paulus Bussemaker (q.v.), which seems to be the case, the article Bussemaker (ME I, 485) must include the fact that Bussemaker, having been excommunicated by the Flemish, joined the Frisian congregation at Danzig, and served among them as an elder until his death in 1612. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2925 f.) vDZ.

Pauwels, Pieter, an elder of the Dutch Reformed church at Norwich, England, who wrote a book against the Mennonites. This book, enlarged and corrected, was edited by Herman Moded (q.v.) under the title Grondich bericht, Van de eerste beghinselen der Wederdoopsche Seckten . . . (Middelburg, 1603). (N.N.B.Wb. III, 872.) vDZ.

Pauwels de Roovere, of Leuven (Louvain) in Belgium, a Catholic priest at Heverlee, Flanders, was arrested and imprisoned at Brussels, Belgium, in 1543; in August of this year he was degraded because of heresy and sentenced to life imprisonment in the castle of Vilvoorde. Further information about his fate is lacking. Though the case is not clear and it is not known what the nature of de Roovere's heresy was, it is very probable that it was Anabaptism. (Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 62 f., No. 11.) vDZ.

Pauwels Vermaete, an Anabaptist martyr, was born about 1498 at Sluis, Dutch province of Zeeland. He was a widower and a basketmaker at Gistel, Flanders, Belgium, and a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Brugge (q.v.). He had been baptized in 1537 or 1538 by Jan van Tricht (q.v.) or Jan Matthijsz van Middelburg (q.v.). He was seized with a number of members when a meeting of the congregation held near Brugge was surprised by the officials and he was imprisoned for some time. It is said that when he was arrested he had a New Testament, a book containing the Psalms of David, and a martyrbook(?), which were taken away from him. During the examination by the inquisitors he remained steadfast. Together with Martin van de Walle, Jehan de la Beecke, and Hansken van den Brouck he suffered martyrdom at Brugge on Oct. 15, 1558. His daughter Calleen Vermaete, 18 years old, recanted. (Verheyden, Brugge, 45, No. 27; idem, Mennonitism in Flanders, Ms.) vDZ.

Pavlodar, a town located on the right bank of the Irtysh River of the Pavlodar Region, formerly Semipalatinsk Region, now in Kazakh SSR, Soviet Central Asia, 180 miles northwest of Semipalatinsk, had a population of 20,000 during World War II. The town is located in an agricultural region and on a railroad half way between Akmolinsk and Barnaul.

Near Pavlodar a Mennonite settlement (q.v.) originated in 1906. The city was the primary center of the settlement from the beginning. Later the city of Slavgorod (q.v.) also gained some significance for some of the Mennonite villages closer to this city. Originally primarily Tatars and Russian businessmen lived in Pavlodar. Because of the good transportation facilities on the Irtysh River, the city developed into a business center. Among the Mennonites who established businesses in the city were Driedger and Voth, who dealt in general merchandise and agricultural machinery. Heinz Görzen had a large steam-driven flour mill, while Schartner and Schmidt maintained a "hotel." Franz F. Fröse was the director of the high school (Gymnasium) of the city of Pavlodar in 1923. It can be assumed that more Mennonites have settled in Pavlodar since World War II. C.K.

Pavlodar Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in the Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.), located in the Semipalatinsk Region, now Kazakh SSR, Soviet Central Asia. Very little information about the organization, development, and religious life of the group is available. The Adressbüchlein (1913) by D. H. Epp does not list the congregations. According to Gerhard Fast, the Pavlodar M.B. group was originally without a minister but met in the home of Johann Janzen. Later Jakob Kröker became the elder, assisted by Johann Voth. A simple adobe meetinghouse was built in the village of Rovnopolye, Taldy-Kuduk. Some difficulties are reported about the two ministers, who were both excommunicated. They were succeeded by Johann Dekker and Jakob Kirsch.

In the Musde-Kul district the Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren worshiped together in the home of Abraham Unruh. After a revival a baptismal service was held in the M.B. Church, at which 28 were baptized and Unruh was ordained minister, and later elder. Later Jakob Wiens joined this group as minister. In the 1920's Aron Reimer was ordained elder of the Pavlodar M.B. Church. Later Franz Friesen and Daniel Heide were also ordained elders. Both emigrated to Canada in 1925. After this Heinrich M. Janzen was ordained elder; he emigrated to Canada in 1929.

Unser Blatt (October 1926, p. 24) gives a report about a song festival held in the Pavlodar settlement. Five M.B. choirs participated, two coming from Slavgorod, and one from a neighboring Russian church. It can be assumed that this active religious life, typical of the Mennonite congregations in 1924-27, was soon thwarted by the Soviet attack on all organized religious activities. Whether it has ceased or continued on a reduced basis to be revived since 1953 is not known. C.K.

A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde (Winnipeg, 1954) 204 (not reliable), 368; Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 144 ff.

Pavlodar Mennonite Church originated in the Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.) of the Semipalatinsk Region, now Kazakh SSR, Soviet Central Asia. Very little information is available on the organization, development, membership, and religious life of this church and settlement. In 1925 the total population of the settlement was 2,736. D. H. Epp's Adressbüchlein of 1913 names Jakob G. Wiens as the elder of this church in 1913; Wiens kept the church records of all of the main churches of the area. The following affiliated churches or districts and ministers are listed: (1) Rayevka with Abram A. Unruh, (2) Nadarovka with Abraham D. Pötka, (3) Rovnopol with Jakob F. Kröker, (4) Borisovka with Johann J. Epp.

In addition to this church with its branches, Epp lists two more Pavlodar Mennonite churches: Sabarovka with Johann J. Wiens as minister, and Steinfeld at an earlier date with Johann F. Kröker as minister. Kröker was graduated from the Bethel College Academy at Newton, Kan., in 1899, attended the St. Chrischona Bible School near Basel, Switzerland, and went to India as a missionary (GCM) in 1900. Because of ill health he returned to Russia in 1909, where he served as Reiseprediger (q.v.) including the Pavlodar Mennonite Church. Gerhard Fast (p. 151) lists the following ministers: Peter Wiens, Sabarovka; Harder, Sofiyevka; Johann F. Kröker, Rebrovka.

Unser Blatt reports that a baptismal service was held in the church of Halbstadt in the Tas-Kuduk district by the elder, Johann F. Kröker, in 1926.

Choirs of two churches participated, after which the Lord's Supper was observed. During the second holiday a song festival took place in a shed of Jakob Janzen, the leading minister of the Olgino Mennonite Church, in which seven choirs—three of the Olgino Mennonite Church, two of the Konstantinovka Mennonite Church, one of the Borissovka Mennonite Brethren Church, and one of the Rovnopol Mennonite Brethren Church—participated. A similar report was given by Susi Kröker for 1927 (Unser Blatt, III, 92). The ministers assisting Kröker on these occasions were Jakob Jansen, Scharner, Bergen, J. Wiens, and Decker. Places of worship are listed on these occasions at Halbstadt, Gnadenal, and Olgino.

Judging by general developments, this was no doubt one of the last organized religious activities in the community. The fate of the ministers is not known. Little information is available as to the resumption of worship services and religious activities.

C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957); Unser Blatt, I (1925) 314; II, 24; III, 11, 92; Der praktische Landwirt, 1925-27.

Pavlodar Mennonite Settlement is located in the Pavlodar Region, formerly Semipalatinsk Region, Kazakh SSR in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.), formerly Siberia. This settlement was established in 1906 by Mennonites coming from the various European settlements. The first settler to come to this area was David Cornies, who bought the equivalent of three quarters of a section of land on the Irtysh River near the city of Pavlodar. He and his family left Melitopol, Ukraine, on April 13, 1906, and traveled by train to Omsk, Siberia. Here they embarked on a ship and arrived at the city of Pavlodar on May 9. The distance between Omsk and Pavlodar is approximately 342 miles. The first settlement, Rebrovka, was established on the west side of the Irtysh River on purchased land opposite Pavlodar, which is located on the east side. During the 1920's the village Rebrovka was transplanted to the east side of the Irtysh in the vicinity of the Mennonite villages of Tursun-Bay and Mosde-Kul. The rest of the land was located on the right side of the Irtysh and was obtained through the government free of charge similar to that of the Slavgorod settlement. The land was sandy. When the settlers came they found no trees. They raised wheat, oats, barley, linseed, and watermelons in abundance.

Pavlodar had some advantage over the Slavgorod settlement in that some of the settlers were located only some 15 miles from the city and thus had an easy access to market. During World War I, when the Pavlodar-Kulunda-Slavgorod-Tatarsk railroad was built, contact was established with the Trans-Siberian Railroad, which increased the market and traveling facilities of the settlers considerably. Most of the settlers were poor and the pioneering difficulties were great. The winter was severe and the summer hot and dusty. The Mennonites planted trees around their homes. When P. F. Froese visited the settlement during the summer of 1924 he stated that a Mennonite settlement could be recognized from a great distance. He describes four types of villages in the area. The native Kirghiz population lives during the summer in a special summer aul, and during the winter in a dugout. The Russian village consists of whitewashed adobe houses without any trees or shrubs. The Mennonite houses were also built of adobe or unburned brick patterned after their European architectural styles, but they were surrounded by trees. Most of the surrounding population was Kirghiz.

In addition to Rebrovka there were four groups (uchastki) of villages: (1) Tas-Kuduk was located 15 miles east of the Irtysh near Pavlodar and consisted of Gnadenal, Steinfeld, and Halbstadt. (2) Taldy-Kuduk was located 20 miles east of the Irtysh and consisted of Konstantinovka and Rovnopolye. (3) Tursun-Bay, located 50 miles east of the Irtysh, consisted of Nadarovka, Reinfeld (Tchistopolye), and Olgino. (4) Mosde-Kul, located 60 miles east of Pavlodar, consisted of Sabarovka, Sofieyevka, Dominskoye, and Rayevka.

The Mosde-Kul group of villages or settlement was the closest to the city of Slavgorod (q.v.), which these settlers used for marketing their products after the railroad had been completed by 1918.

The nomadic Kirghiz were accustomed to driving their herds of horses from one place to another. In the early days there were some misunderstandings, but soon they became acquainted and got along well. The Kirghiz would come to the Mennonites begging for bread, which they had never known before, since their diet was primarily confined to meat and milk. Some flour mills were established in the villages. Schools were conducted in every village, and worship services were held in private homes or in schools. The Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren often worshiped together.

In 1925 the population of the Pavlodar settlement was 2,736. A report of the administration of the co-operative, named the Cornies-Verband (Der praktische Landwirt June-July, 1926, p. 8 ff.), gives an insight as to what happened to the settlement during the Revolution and after. It was doubtless very much the same picture as that described in connection with the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.). Even in 1926 only eight of 12 village schools were operating because of lack of teachers, in spite of the fact that the settlement had a Zentralschule in Sabarovka started in 1918, which was supported by private individuals until 1924, at which time the Cornies-Verband took it over (see Pavlodar Zentralschule).

The Cornies-Verband was represented in all villages, and its 450 members constituted 90 per cent of the families. A report states that many had only one horse and some did not even have one cow. The primary objective of the co-operative was to obtain loans through the government to improve the seed and the cattle and do business for the community. Four dairies, one in each of the settlements, were in operation in 1925. The reporter reveals in his concluding remark that the Cornies-Verband was being influenced by the Marxian terminology when he stated, "We would like to urge all readers loyally and without weariness to continue the work of the co-operative so that we can achieve the goal desired by our forerunner, N. J. Lenin." Later all village schools of the Pavlodar settlement were functioning, and the level of the cultural and religious life rose once again.

Some Mennonites from European Russia probably joined the Pavlodar settlement during World War II and after. A letter written by Johann and M. Dück states that the "Memrik Mennonites who were evacuated were sent mostly to Pavlodar and the Altay regions" (Bote, April 4, 1956, p. 7). To what extent these evacuees were placed in the Mennonite villages of Pavlodar is not clear. About present conditions in the Pavlodar Mennonite settlement a letter by Agnetha Boldt reveals that many of those who were exiled during the Stalin regime have died, but those who have survived and are living there now are doing well ("es geht ihnen gut") (Menn. Rundschau, May 2, 1956, p. 5).

C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957); A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (Winnipeg, 1954) 367; Unser Blatt, 1926-28, passim; Der praktische Landwirt, 1925-27; Helmut Anger, Die Deutschen in Sibirien . . . (Berlin, 1930); P. F. Froese, "Durch die Mennoniten-Dörfer in Sibirien" (A. A. Friesen collection, BeCL).

Pavlodar Zentralschule, located in the Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Sabarovka, Musde-Kul, was organized by F. F. Fröse of Slavgorod in 1918, privately sponsored and then taken over in 1924 by the Cornies-Verband. A farm of 324 acres was maintained to support this school. Plans were made to add an agricultural department to this secondary school. No information is available as to what happened to the school.

C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 152; Der praktische Landwirt (June-July 1926, p. 9).

Pax (Latin for "peace"), the term used to designate the foreign service for I-W men (conscientious objectors drafted into service by the United States Office of Selective Service) administered by the MCC. Established in 1951, Pax men have served in Germany since 1951 in building programs at Niederbieber near Neuwied, Espelkamp, Backnang near Stuttgart, Lübeck, Enkenbach near Kaiserslautern, Bechterdissen near Bielefeld, Wedel near Hamburg; in Vienna, Austria (1955-); in Crefeld; and in Algeria (1955-). The Algerian project has been administered by the Mennonite (MC) Relief and Service Committee of Elkhart, Ind. Pax construction has provided housing for 370 Mennonite refugee families in Germany, meetinghouses for the Mennonite congregations at Niederbieber, Backnang, Enkenbach, Wedel, and Bechterdissen; aid in rebuilding the bombed Protestant Karlschule in Vienna, aid in constructing a community and youth center for the Crefeld Mennonite Church; and in Algeria some 30 homes for Arab refugees. Other major Pax projects include agricultural improvement in Panayitsa and Tsakones, two villages in northern Greece (1952-); flood cleanup work near Vlissingen, Holland (1953); service to Hungarian refugees in Austria (1956-57); Korean relief (1954-); road building in Peru (1954-) and the Paraguayan Chaco (1956-); various types of service in Jordan, Nepal, Viet-Nam, Liberia, and scattered individuals. A total of over 200 Pax men have served a period of two years (Europe) or three years (Asia) overseas in all the projects. In 1958 the number in service was 110. A few men from Canada have been used in Pax, even though Canada has no draft. Pax has been financed in two ways: (1) by contributions of $75 per month by the Pax man or his denominational service office, or (2) by wages paid by certain employing agencies, such as the Le-Tourneau Foundation in Peru.

A similar service program for European conscientious objectors, called Eirene (Greek for "peace"), was established in 1957 by conjoint action of the MCC and the Brethren Service Committee. Its first project is one for agricultural improvement in Morocco.

H.S.B.

Paxton Mennonite Brethren Church, located on the western prairies of Nebraska about 15 miles southwest of Paxton, was organized in 1919 by John J. Kliever of Henderson, with H. C. Flaming as leader and a membership of 50. It at first met in a rural schoolhouse. This church has contributed much for missions. A church was built and a parsonage provided. Ministers who have served are H. C. Flaming, John K. Siemens, Geo. H. Jantzen, B. C. Willems, Henry Hooze, and Lavern Loewens. In 1958 the membership was 68, with Edwin A. Schmidt as pastor.

H.E.W.

Pays de Gex, the customs-free zone in France just outside the western border of the Swiss city and canton of Geneva. A Mennonite congregation by this name was started in 1909 when Abraham Geiser, elder in the Chaux d'Abel (q.v.) Swiss Mennonite congregation, settled here near St. Genis, soon followed by several related families. Upon Geiser's death in 1926 his brother, Elder David Geiser in Chaux d'Abel, had the oversight of the congregation, with David Geiser-Glaus, a son of Abraham, as preacher 1929-40, and Abraham Sommer from 1931. The services were held in German for years in an upper room in a farmhouse of the Zbinden family. Later a Protestant chapel was secured in St. Genis, where the French language replaced the German.

Recently a part of the Pays de Gex congregation began to hold evangelistic services on an interdenominational basis in the city of Geneva in a building called Entr'aide. In 1954 this group ordained Abraham Sommer as elder, in 1956 Jean Sommer and Charles Zbinden as preachers, and Werner and Jean Geiser as missionary preachers. Soon Zbinden and Werner Geiser were made elders. The rest of the congregation continued in the traditional Mennonite way at St. Genis, where in 1957 Albert and Louis Zbinden and Willi Müller were ordained as preachers. No formal schism occurred, but in effect there are two congregations. In 1958 the membership was 64.

S.G.

Pea Ridge (Mo.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the South Central Conference, located 12 miles west of Palmyra in Marion County, started as an outpost of the Palmyra congregation in 1903, was organized in 1905, when the meetinghouse was built. It burned down and was rebuilt in 1933. J. R. Shank was called to be the first pastor, assisted by Ira Buckwalter, ordained 1907. When Shank was called to Carver in 1908, J. W. Hess came to serve until 1919. In 1955 when Palmyra was dissolved, seven members joined Pea Ridge. In 1957 a new meetinghouse was erected. David A. Hathaway was the pastor, with 33 members. M.L.K.

Peabody, Kan., originally known as Conesburg, is a town (pop. 1,400) located in the south central part of Marion County. It was incorporated March 15, 1878. Approximately 500 Mennonites live within shopping distance. The various branches are the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, Mennonite Brethren, General Conference Mennonites, Mennonite Church (MC). The C.G.C. group lives largely south of Peabody, the M.B. northwest, the G.C.M. south, and the M.C. north of Peabody. G.G.Y.

Peace Committee (GCM). The Peace Committee of the General Conference Mennonite Church had its origin in the wake of World War I. At the 20th triennial session of the General Conference held in Meno, Okla., Sept. 2-7, 1914, a committee for the drafting of special provisions was appointed and directed to draft a message to the President of the United States to reaffirm its faith in the principles of peace and to give expression to its opposition to war. A resolution was introduced dealing with the question of conference action in case of actual war, but the importance of such a question was not perceived by the delegates, hence nothing further was done.

At the 21st session of the conference in 1917 a Committee of Seven, later known as the "Committee on Exemption," was appointed. The members of this committee were J. W. Kliever, Chr., J. F. Lehman, Treas., S. K. Mosiman, Sec., M. H. Kratz, P. H. Richert, H. P. Krehbiel, and Peter Janzen. The work of this committee was limited because of travel difficulties, but individual members of the committee worked with the problems of conscientious objectors in camps and prisons. A Peace Committee of two, H. P. Krehbiel and A. J. Neuenschwander, was appointed at the 1926 conference session, which was active in conferences of pacifist churches and prepared quarterly Sunday-school lessons on peace. The committee was enlarged to three members at the 25th session in 1929, including A. J. Neuenschwander, H. P. Krehbiel, and A. S. Rosenberger, representing the west, middle, and east sections of the country. Since traveling distances made it difficult to carry on the work as a committee, much of the work was planned during the conference, and carried out by individual members working separately and through correspondence. Sunday-school lessons on peace continued and articles appeared in the church papers presenting the work of the Peace Committee. A step forward was taken at the 1933 session of conference when the committee was enlarged to include one member from each District Conference. This committee prepared a resolution embodying the statement of duties and functions of the Peace Committee. The purpose: "The Peace Committee shall in accord with directions of the Conference concern itself with the promotion of the cause of peace as taught and commanded by Jesus, our Lord, and His apostles, and as prophetically foretold in the Old Testament Scriptures."

The years 1926-35 were directed toward war prevention and study conferences with various Christian groups. 1935-41 was marked by an adjustment to the likelihood of war and the consequent need for strengthening individual peace convictions as conscientious objectors. With these areas the committee concerned itself. During this period a literature series was printed: Christian Peace: According to the New Testament Teaching Outside the Gospels (1928), by Ernest J. Bohn; Christian Peace: Four Hundred Years of Mennonite Principles and Practices of the Past Four Centuries (1938), by C. Henry Smith; War, Peace, Amity, by H. P. Krehbiel; A Brief Catechism on Difficult Questions, by P. H. Richert; and the conference statement, A Statement of the Position of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America on Peace, War, Military Service and Patriotism, adopted at Souderton, Pa., 1941. 1941-50 was a period of inter-Mennonite co-operation through the medium of the Mennonite Central Committee, especially in the Civilian Public Service program of World War II and the Voluntary Service program following the war. This period is also marked by the sense of need for a more aggressive teaching program on peace. A study guide, The Power of Love, and Young People's Union Program helps, besides articles in tract form and in the church papers, were published to promote peace education.

The Peace Committee, together with several other service committees, was merged into a larger board, the Board of Christian Service, at the 1950 General Conference, Freeman, S.D. A.N.

Peace Problems Committee, an important standing committee of the Mennonite General Conference (MC) since 1919, with a membership varying from five at the beginning to six 1925-39, and ten to sixteen since 1939, successor to the Military Problems Committee of 1907-19. It had a United States and a Canadian Section 1925-55. Chairmen have been Aaron Loucks 1919-25, E. L. Frey 1925-35, H. S. Bender 1935- . Orle O. Miller was a long-time secretary 1925-53. Among the long-term Canadian members have been S. F. Coffman 1925-49 and J. B. Martin 1929- . The committee adopted a three point program in 1925: (1) peace and nonresistance education in the church; (2) representation to government in matters affecting military training and service and recognition for conscientious objectors, and (3) the peace witness to other Christians. It has co-operated vigorously with the MCC Peace Section to which it has belonged from the beginning in 1942. It has been an active and influential committee since 1925, and among other things has published or edited a considerable number of pamphlets and books on peace and nonresistance. It has sponsored several important study conferences. H.S.B.

Peace River, Alberta, Old Colony Mennonite settlement, located in a very fertile farming area, was started in 1932 near Carajou by several families from the Saskatoon, Sask., area who moved in 1934 near Fort Vermilion, a small trading post on the banks of the Peace River, some 350 miles north of Edmonton. It expanded rapidly after 1937 and by 1948 had a population of nearly 400, of whom about one third were dissatisfied settlers from the Old Colony settlement in Mexico. The settlers live on scattered farms, not in villages nor in a compact block. The settlers are grouped in three districts—Rosenfeld, Blumenort, and Rhineland, each with a meetinghouse and preacher. The colony has continued to grow in size and in economic prosperity. The Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, maintains a mission station about 60 miles east of Fort Vermilion.

H.S.B.

John A. Hostetler, "Pioneering in the Land of the Midnight Sun," Menn. Life III (April 1948) 5-8.

Peace Section of the Mennonite Central Committee was established in January 1942, as successor to the Mennonite Central Peace Committee organized in 1939. It is composed of delegated representatives of the peace committees of the constituent conferences, or in lieu of such, the regular conference MCC members, plus the MCC Executive Secretary ex officio, and two members at large. It functions through an executive committee of five and a full-time executive secretary with office at the MCC headquarters in Akron, Pa. J. Harold Sherk was a long-time executive secretary 1950-58. H. S. Bender has served as chairman continuously from 1942 (1939). The Peace Section has two representatives on the International Mennonite Peace Committee.

The Peace Section has served as an agency for counseling on problems related to conscription and the draft, a representation to government, a center for study, research, and writing regarding the peace position, and a central agency for peace education.

During the years of World War II the Peace Section endeavored to implement the convictions of Mennonites in regard to wartime measures such as Civilian Defense, Red Cross work, and the purchasing of war bonds. For the latter measure the Civilian Bond plan was arranged as a substitute. A counseling service on problems related to the draft was organized. To strengthen the constituency on the Biblical position regarding peace and nonresistance Must Christians Fight and Compromise with War were published.

The continuation of wartime measures, such as conscription, in the postwar period increased the concerns and activities of the Peace Section. The counseling service for drafted men continued, contacts with government were renewed, the National Service Board for Religious Objectors (NSBRO) continued to function. Besides pamphlet literature two new publications appeared: The Christian and Conscription and Before You Decide. An increasing concern of the Peace Section related to a testimony to Mennonites abroad. To implement this concern commissioners were sent both to Europe and to the Mennonite colonies in Brazil and Paraguay. Beginning with 1947 a full- or part-time representative has been maintained in Europe. Beginning in 1948 for several years the Peace Section sponsored annual summer peace teams and peace institutes in Europe. Must Christians Fight was twice translated into German.

The Peace Section has also maintained a special commissioner in Japan since September 1955: Melvin Gingerich, to 1957, and Paul Peachey 1957-

The Peace Section has been influential in unifying and strengthening the nonresistant position and peace testimony of the Mennonites of North America, and promoting a more vigorous testimony abroad both inside and outside the Mennonite brotherhood.

H.S.B.

Peachey Amish Mennonite Church, Belleville, Pa., had two congregations in 1957 with 100 members in the Upper District and 126 in the Lower District. Jesse D. Spicher was bishop of these two Beachy Amish congregations.

M.G.

Peake Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles northwest of Hinton, Va., a rural mission church of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference, began in 1915, when a Sunday school was organized in a schoolhouse in this highland area. A congregation was established in 1923. Kent Shank and Joseph A. Brunk, active Sunday-school workers, asked permission of the Middle District Council to build the meetinghouse. This was granted if the necessary funds could be raised. H. B. Keener followed by Snively Martin served as pastors of this church for many years; James Shank served here 1947-57. De Witt Heatwole was the pastor in 1958 with a membership of 47.

H.A.B.

Peckh, Hans, an Anabaptist imprisoned in the castle at Passau, Lower Bavaria, Germany. At his cross-examination he confessed that he was baptized by Blasy Khumau (Blasius Kuhn, q.v.) and lived in Greding near Aichstetten; that he had been imprisoned once before, at Eggenburg in Lower Austria; there he was branded by burning through the cheeks and released. He is not to be confused with the Hans Peckh named on page 74 of Wolkan's edition of the Geschicht-Buch. But he was no doubt in the group mentioned on page 105 of this chronicle, which was migrating to Moravia in 1533 under Brother Bastl Glaser. "When they arrived in Austria in a village called Hohenwart they were seized. To them Jacob Hutter wrote a beautiful consolatory epistle, which is still extant. They were then taken from Eggenburg, after they had been branded through the cheeks and released." Certainly Hans Peckh was among them.

Hans Peckh was immovable. The authorities were unable to "convert" him in Passau. The court record reports, "he remained firm." (See also Beck, Hans.)

W.W.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 116; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 105; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 142; ML I, 148; III, 339.

Peckstal(l): see Pöggstall.

Pedro de Soza, an Anabaptist martyr: see Peter of Spain.

Peecke Vulckezoon (name apparently mutilated), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 19, 1550, at Leeuwarden, capital of the Dutch province of Friesland, because "he had been rebaptized and held a bad opinion of the holy sacraments." Further particulars are lacking.

vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Peeter (Peter) Mouwe (Monde), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Tours in Touraine, France, was beheaded on March 12, 1535, at Antwerp, Belgium. Further information is lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 318, 366; XIV, 12 f., No. 137.)
voZ.

Peeter Symonsz: see Peter Simons.

Pehuajó, Argentina. After making investigating trips practically all over the Republic of Argentina, J. W. Shank and T. K. Hershey, Mennonite (MC) missionaries, began missionary activities in Pehuajó, a city about 250 miles southwest of Buenos Aires. On Feb. 23, 1919, the first Sunday school was conducted with 18 present. On March 6 a hall was rented, and on April 27, the first evangelistic meetings began. Seven new members were instructed and on October 10 baptized. In January 1920 a lot was purchased on which there were two tin shops and a dwelling house. These were remodeled and are still used for the home of the workers and the clinic. In 1923 a church with basement was built. In 1930 a five-room dwelling was built to accommodate additional workers. Practically all of the institutional work was opened in Pehuajó. The orphanage began to function in May 1926 with 12 beds. It was later transferred to Trenque Lauquen and still later to Bragado. The Gospel Printery, purchased in February 1927, began to operate in one of the original tin shops; it has been moved to Trenque Lauquen. The Bible school, organized in 1928, had its beginning in Pehuajó with the local pastor in charge. It was officially organized in 1928. Some of the present national workers were among the first graduates. The Bible institute is now located in Bragado. In 1919 the first kindergarten was begun and Bible reading organized in the homes. Five of the first seven baptized became the first kindergarten teachers and Bible readers.

The missionary activities in Pehuajó are preaching services, young people's meetings, literary society, and visitation work. Most of the people who attend these services represent the working class. Some business and professional men are the product of the Pehuajó congregation. The financial contributions of the church membership show a gradual increase from 11.45 pesos in 1919 to 2,992.55 in 1947.

On Jan. 1, 1948, the records show that 199 have been baptized. Of this number 22 died, 76 moved away (many of whom are members elsewhere), 35 withdrew, and 5 were excommunicated. In 1957 the membership was 58.

The missionaries who have had pastoral oversight are D. Parke Lantz, Nelson Litwiller, L. S. Weber, J. W. Shank, Amos Swartzentruber, T. H. Brenne-man, T. K. Hershey, and William Hallman.

T.K.H.

Peisker, Christoph, a furrier of Quedlinburg, a very successful Anabaptist missionary in Thuringia and Hesse, Germany. Nothing else is known about his life. (See Christoph of Meissen; ML III, 339.)

NEFF.

Peisker (Peissger, Peissker, also Döring), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a miller of Kleinreutersdorf near Orlamünde, Thuringia, Germany, baptized by Melchior Rink (q.v.). In his home an Anabaptist meeting was surprised by the police on Nov. 20, 1535. Sixteen persons attending, including Hans Peisker and his daughter Margarethe, were led away prisoners. He bade his wife, who was awaiting the birth of a child, a moving farewell. With four other brethren he was imprisoned in Jena and subjected to a cross-examination under Melancthon (q.v.) and Cruciger (q.v.) on Dec. 1. He remained steadfast and was executed with Heinz Kraut (q.v.) and Jobst Möller (q.v.) on Jan. 26, 1536, at Jena. (Wappler, Thüringen, 137-41, passim; ML III, 339.)

NEFF.

Peitz, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, who died in prison at Passau, Lower Bavaria, Germany, in 1537, is undoubtedly identical with Hans Betz (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 41, E 447.)
NEFF.

Pekela (named for the river Pekel-A). Oude Pekela and Nieuwe Pekela are two adjoining villages in the Dutch province of Groningen, which were founded in the first half of the 17th century, after the peat-moors around the Pekel-A had been dug away and a fertile soil appeared, suited for agriculture. Among the founders of Pekela there were apparently some Mennonites, because as early as about 1660 there was a Danzig Old Flemish (q.v.) Mennonite congregation at Pekela. This congregation, always small in membership, was until about 1750 served by preachers chosen from the congregation. Hendrik Wolters was its preacher until about 1750; in 1747 he and his wife Jantje Coops Boon made arrangements that a room in their farm home would in the future be at the disposal of the congregation as it had been until then. From about 1750 until shortly before 1780, when the pulpit was vacant, it was served by Jan Panneman, preacher or elder of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation at neighboring Sappemeer (q.v.). Panneman may have moved to Pekela, for his descendants, called Panman, are still found there. Soon after 1780 the Pekela congregation declined or even died out. At least by 1815 there was no longer a congregation (Naamlijst 1815, 107), though a number of Mennonites were living both in Oude and Nieuwe Pekela. A new congregation was founded at Pekela in 1851, and a church built, which was dedicated on Sept. 19, 1852. The congregation has always been served by the pastor of Veendam (q.v.). In 1900 the baptized membership numbered 40, and 52 in 1958. There is a ladies' circle and a Sunday school for children.

voZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2185 f.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 212 f.; Zangen bij . . . de eerste godsdienstoefening in de nieuwe Doopsgezinde kerk te Pekela (Wildervank, 1852); ML III, 339.

Pekelharing, a Dutch Mennonite family. Dirk Jelisz Pekelharing (1729-64), living at Zaandam, North Holland, married to Maartje Cornelis Kalf, who made sails for ships and windmills and also compasses, may have been a Mennonite; it is certain that his wife and his descendants belonged to the Mennonite church. His son Cornelis Pekelharing (1760-1800), a sailmaker at Zaandam, belonged to the Oostzijde Mennonite congregation and is said to have been the only adherent of the Orangist party in his congregation, all other members being Patriots (q.v.). Cornelis' son Dirk Pekelharing (1783-1857) and his grandson Cornelis Pekelharing (1811-73) were both physicians, Dirk practicing at 's-Graveland and his son Cornelis practicing at Zaandam. Another son of Dirk, Klass Rutger Pekelharing (1825-85), was a Mennonite minister, serving at Middelburg and Vissingen 1849-84. He wrote an important paper, "Bijdragen voor de Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland," which was published in Archief VI (1866) of the "Zeeuwisch Genootschap," and also the Levens-Bericht of S. de Wind (Middelburg, n.d.). Dirk Pekelharing (1839-1908), a son of Cornelis, was a pastor of the Mennonite Surhuisterveen congregation 1864-1908. Other sons of Cornelis were Baltus Hendrik Pekelharing (1841-?), professor at the technical University at Delft, and Adrianus Cornelis Pekelharing (1848-?), professor in the medical school of the University of Utrecht. Many members of the Pekelharing family served the Zaandam-Oostzijde congregation as deacons, as for example Willem Jan Pekelharing (1851-1933), a merchant who was also for many years a treasurer of the Zaansche Fonds (q.v.) for the pensioning of retired and disabled ministers. vdZ.

Pekema, a Mennonite family found in the Dutch province of Friesland. Jelle Sippersz Pekema (1863-1942) served as Mennonite pastor at Irnsum-Poppin-gawier 1890-91, de Rijk 1891-94, and Hilversum 1894-1904, in which year he retired. Engelbertus Pekema, b. April 22, 1877, at Bolsward, d. Sept. 9, 1950, at Enschedé, was a Mennonite pastor, serving at Mensingeweer 1904-7, Monnikendam 1907-9, IJmuiden 1909-12, and Enschedé 1912-42. He wrote a historical paper on the congregation of Enschedé, which is found in Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.). (DJ 1951, 18 f.) vdZ.

Pellertitz (Bellerditz, Czech, Polehradice), a market village in Moravia five hours southeast of Brno and north of Niemtschitz. Here on the estates belonging to the Záwis of Wickow the Hutterites expelled from Klein Niemtschitz (q.v.) established a small Bruderhof in 1559. But already in 1563 they were driven out by the owner. They returned later, however. In the Polehradice Bruderhof occurred the death of the deacon Abraham Laub on April 8, 1612. The householder Georg Riedel (q.v.) caused the Bruderhof great distress by his absorption in alchemy to the neglect of his duties; he was expelled on July 16, 1612, but after making confession he was admitted to the Kostel (Gostal) Bruderhof. The Polehradice Bruderhof suffered severely in the period of the rebellion, being plundered eleven times beginning on Aug. 19, 1619, and "robbed of many horses and much goods." The sisters of the Bruderhof had been hidden in a camp in the woods, but the rude soldiery found them there and raped six of them. The year 1621 brought new misfortune; on February 8 the Bruderhof was plundered by Saxon horsemen, who took away twenty barrels of "rare wine," and on February 19 it was burned down, and was left desolate. P.D.E.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Gr. Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren, Part II: Brünner Erzdiözese IV (Brno, 1861) 66; ML III, 339 f.

Pelsy, Valentin (1870-1925), a Mennonite leader and elder of Alsace-Lorraine, was born in 1870 at Rhodes, near Saarbarg, Lorraine. In consequence of a leg fracture in his youth which required many operations he was excused from military service. In 1888 his parents moved to Gosselmingen; there Valentin was responsible for the mill as well as the farm. He was led to study at the Bible school at Chrischona near Basel, Switzerland, by his friend Pierre Sommer (q.v.), who had earlier attended that school. Later he and his brother Paul farmed the Mückenhof near Saarbarg, which was burned down at the beginning of World War I. The brothers rebuilt it as well as they could and continued their farming. In 1920 Valentin married Marie Wagler of Schneckenbusch and settled on the farm of his grandparents at Gosselmingen.

Valentin Pelsy exerted a deep influence in his home congregation Saarbarg (q.v.), where he was ordained as preacher and elder in 1898. He also served in the neighboring congregations, such as Morhange (Mörchingen). He had no little part in the spiritual revival in the Mennonite congregations in Alsace and Lorraine. In 1925 he was chosen as president of the newly organized conference of these congregations. With tact and self-sacrifice he served as an organizer and as a pastor. Unfortunately his service was of short duration, for he died on Nov. 23, 1925. S.G.

Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire 1901-1951 (Montbéliard, 1951); Gem.-Kal. 1927, 137; ML I, 560; II, 340.

Peltner, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr: see Plattner, Hans.

Penner, a Mennonite family name occurring in East and West Prussia, Russia, and in North America. The family is found in the Marienburger Werder as early as 1592. In 1776 there were 118 Penner families in West Prussia. In 1936 the members were distributed as follows in Germany: Danzig 56, Elbing-Ellerwald 19, Elbing-Stadt-City 5, Fürstenwerder 21, Heubuden 62, Ladekopp-Orloffelfelde 58, Montau-Gruppe 1, Rosenort 49, Schönsee 8, Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart 88, Tiegenghagen 54, Tragheimerweide 27, Total West Prussia 448; Berlin 13, Gronau 7, Hamburg 1, Total 469. At Hamburg, Germany, Henrich Pender (Heinrich Penner) was in 1669-78 a partner with Carl de Vlieger, also a Mennonite, in the ownership of whaling boats operating near Greenland. Among the outstanding bearers of the Penner name in West Prussia were the following: Elder David Penner (d. 1732), who left Lithuania (q.v.) with 120 Mennonite families in January 1724 because of persecution and settled with them at Thiensdorf-Markushof in the Kleinwerder (West Prussia) (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1571-79; II, 2, Nos. 708, 736, 751). Abraham Penner of Tiegenghagen was an elder of the Old Flemish congregation of the Grosswerder 1749-67, and Jacob Penner (d. 1794) was a preacher of the Orloffelfelde congregation 1766-73. Gerhard Penner of Irrgang, the nephew of Gerhard Penner, Sr. (q.v.), was a preacher at Heubuden in 1861-67. Heinrich Penner (d. 1890), the son of Gerhard Penner, Sr., was the elder of the "emigration congregation," and ministered to those who were compelled to postpone their emigration to Russia. Wilhelm Penner was an elder of the Danzig City congregation and chairman of the church board (picture in Mannhardt, 1904 and 1919, p. 198). Johann Penner of Prangenau (q.v., 1871-1943) was ordained as preacher of the Ladekopp congregation in 1903, and elder 1919, and served as chairman of the Committee of Elders of the Conference of East and West Prussia. Jakob Penner and Johann Penner (q.v.) were elders in the Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart congregation.

In Russia the following should be mentioned: Bernhard Penner, b. 1756 at Elbing, d. 1791 at Chortitza, ordained preacher in 1790 and elder 1791 at Chortitza; Wilhelm Penner and Peter Penner were teachers in the Chortitza Zentralschule (q.v.; pictures in Friesen, facing p. 618). Another Wilhelm Penner, born in Elbing, a brother of Johannes K. Penner (below), was a preacher at Ak-Metchet and later elder at Aulie-Ata.

In America some of the Mennonite bearers of this name were as follows: Andreas Penner, a younger brother of Gerhard Penner, Sr., was from 1854 preacher of the Heubuden congregation and later in Beatrice, Neb., Gerhard Penner, Sr. and Jr., were preachers in the Beatrice congregation. Two sons of the latter were Cornelius Penner, b. May 17, 1868, at Koczelitzke (Warnau), since 1903 a minister in Beatrice, and Henry Gerhard Penner, b. July 24, 1872, at Marienburg, a physician in Beatrice. Peter A. Penner, b. April 2, 1871, at Bilisirkow, Ukraine, d. 1949, was a missionary in Champa, India. Peter William Penner, b. Feb. 12, 1876, at Prangenau in the Molotschna, was a missionary in Janjgir, India. Jakob B. Penner, b. Feb. 10, 1877, in South Russia, was a minister of the Mennonite Brethren congregation in Kronsart, Man., as were also Heinrich Daniel Penner and Johannes K. Penner. H. D. Penner was an important G.C.M. minister and writer. E.C., vDZ.

Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Menn. Gesch.-Bl. V (1940) 26-45; Friesen, Brüderschaft; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Dutch Naamlijst; W. C. Andreas, "Highlights and Sidelights of the Mennonites in Beatrice," Menn. Life I (July 1946); Wanda Oesau, Hamburgs Grönlandsfahrt (Glückstadt-Hamburg, 1955) 132 f.; ML III, 340 f. See also Who's Who Among the Mennonites, 1943, and articles below.

Penner, Abram (d. 1933), was the first elder of the Mennonite church organized in 1894 at Deyevka (q.v.) in the Orenburg settlement on the Ural, Russia. He was characterized by a great love for the brotherhood, a firm will, and an unusual gift for organization. Unfortunately, soon after his election serious conflicts arose on the question whether the planned Zentralschule was to be located at Deyevka or Pretoria. In the heat of this strife Penner had to retire from office upon the wish of the congregation. But since he felt himself called by God to the office of elder, he continued to conduct meetings in private homes with a small group of his followers. But before long even these were discontinued. He died about 1933 without having found his way back into his former congregation. W.Q.

Penner, Bernhard (Behrent) (d. 1791), the first elder of the Mennonite congregations in the Chortitza settlement in South Russia. With a group of the immigrants to Russia from West Prussia he reached Dubrovka in the Russian province of Mohilev, and since there was no minister in the group he was chosen as minister here and confirmed in this office by the home congregations in West Prussia by letter. In 1790 he was chosen as elder, this office being again confirmed by the home congregations.

The conduct of his office was by no means easy. The severe difficulties of pioneering were heightened by strife in the church life. The poverty was so dire that he had to appear in borrowed boots to conduct communion and baptismal services. In addition to all this, his health was poor. He therefore asked to have a co-elder chosen in 1791; the man chosen, however, declined the office. Penner then wrote an epistle (Hirtenbrief) requesting that the congregation choose an elder immediately after his death. He died July 27, 1791, after serving only one year as elder. B.J.S.

Penner Church, Fairview, Okla.: see Fairview Church of God.

Penner, Heinrich D. (1862-1933), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and teacher, was born at Schardau, Molotschna, South Russia, on March 9, 1862. In 1874 he came to America with his mother and stepfather, settling near Hillsboro, Kan. In 1880 he was baptized by Jacob Buller, elder of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church. On April 29, 1884, he married Katherina Dalke. He obtained a good education through private study and taught at the Rosenort (Lighthouse) school 1885-89, at the elementary school at Lehigh 1889-93, and at Bethel College 1893-97.

On July 27, —, Penner was ordained to the ministry by Elder J. S. Hirschler for the Hillsboro Mennonite (GCM) Church. In 1897 he organized the Hillsboro Preparatory School (q.v.) and taught there until 1913. In 1913-18 he taught church history and German at Bethel College, and 1913-30 he served as a teacher and spiritual adviser at the Bethel Deaconess Hospital and Home. He then served as copastor of the Mennonite church at Beatrice 1921-26, and at the Geary (Okla.) Mennonite church 1926-33. Penner served on many committees concerned with schools, congregations, and the conference. He wrote the following booklets: Kurze Andachten fuer die Schwestern und ihre Pflegebefohlenen im Bethel Diakonissenhospital, Newton, Kansas (n.p.), pp. 118; Kurzer Leitfaden für den Religionsunterricht in der Kinderlehre (n.p.), pp. 32; Leibes- und Seelenpflege bei Kranken (Newton, 1916); Our Christian Catechism, Confession and Covenant (n.p.), pp. 7; A Short Course of Study in the Rudiments of the Christian Religion for High School Students, Deaconess Probationers, Students in Nurse Training Schools and Lay Workers (Beatrice, n.d.), pp. 42; The Twofold Nature of the Kingdom (Geary, 1932), pp. 16. He died on Oct. 26, 1933. C.K.

"Aeltester Heinrich Daniel Penner," Bundesbote Kalender (1935) 26; P. J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College; H. D. Penner Collection (BeCL).

Penner, Jakob, an elder of the Mennonite congregation at Orlofferfelde in West Prussia, Germany, b. Jan. 1, 1831, d. Jan. 30, 1909, was ordained elder in 1882. The revision of the Catechism by the Mennonites of West Prussia was chiefly his responsibility; he also shared in the production of a new hymnal. A most significant contribution was the union he brought about between the Frisian and Flemish branches. NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1909, 25; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1883, 109; ML III, 342.

Penner, Johann (1817-89), an elder of the Thiensdorf Mennonite Church in West Prussia, Germany, was born at Thörichthof Sept. 9, 1817, was ordained preacher in 1847 and elder in 1864. He was one of the five elders who traveled to Berlin in February 1869 as deputies of the West Prussian congregations and were given an audience with William I of Prussia to present their position on the military law passed in November 1867. In 1861 Johann Penner had made a previous trip to Berlin on the matter of nonresistance. When the Mennonites were released from military service by an order of cabinet on March 3, 1868, most of the West Prussian Mennonites were satisfied. Some emigrated to America, among them three of the five deputies. Johann Penner remained in Germany and exerted a beneficent influence far beyond the confines of his congregation. He died at Markushof on Feb. 2, 1889. NEFF.

"Heimatbilder aus Westpreussen, nach Oelgemäldern von Marie Birckholtz-Bestvater," Menn. Jahrbuch 1951; Menn. Bl., 1889, 42-44; ML III, 342.

Penner, Johannes K. (1850-1926), usually called "Lehrer Penner," was born at Elbing, West Prussia, Germany, on Nov. 27, 1850. He attended the school at Elbing and the private school at Bröscherfeld (q.v.), where Johannes Claassen (q.v.) was his teacher. In 1867 he was baptized by Johann Töws and became a teacher at Bröscherfeld. In 1860 he attended the normal school at Marienburg and in 1870 emigrated with his mother and brother to the Trakt settlement, Saratov, Russia, where he became a teacher. On Oct. 4, 1874, he married Helen Jantzen. In 1875 he was elected minister. In 1880 Penner joined the group which moved to Central Asia (q.v.) to escape military service and meet the Lord. Disillusioned, he joined the group who went to America, and arrived in Beatrice, Neb., on Sept. 19, 1884, where he taught in a private school and served as minister. His 50th anniversary in teaching was commemorated on June 16, 1917. He died on Oct. 8, 1926. C.K.

"Etwas aus dem Leben Pred. J. K. Penner," Bundesbote-Kalender, 1926, 28; W. C. Andreas, "Highlights and Sidelights of the Mennonites in Beatrice," Men. Life I (July 1946) 22.

Penner, Peter A. (1871-1949), a noted missionary (GCM) to India, was born at Belo Sirko, South Russia, on April 2, 1871, the son of Abraham Penner and Maria Buhler. His father, who had come from the Berghal Mennonite settlement, settled in Belo Sirko, and later in Berdyansk, his wife's home. In 1875 the family arrived in Mountain Lake, Minn., where P. A. Penner attended the elementary and preparatory schools. He spent two years at the Minnesota State Normal School at Mankato and two years, 1895-97, at Bethel Academy, Newton, Kan. After this he taught elementary school and attended the Missionary Training Institute, Brooklyn, N.Y. (1899). He was a member of the Bethel Mennonite Church, Mountain Lake, where he married Elizabeth Dickmann (1876-1906) on June 17, 1900. Two children were born to this marriage, Miriam Hilda and Linda Viola. On Oct. 24, 1909, he married Martha Richert, of Goessel, Kan.

In 1900 the P. A. Penners went to India as the first American G.C.M. missionaries, starting a mission at Champa, Central Provinces (now Madhya Pradesh), and establishing the Bethesda Leper Home (q.v.). In 1941 Penner returned to Newton. In 1926 he was presented the silver Kaiser-i-Hind medal for distinguished service by the Viceroy of India, to which was added at the time of his retirement a silver bar for the forty years of service. Penner's contribution as a missionary was unique in that he was one of the pioneers with a long and very successful term of service. His reports appeared regularly in the Christlicher Bundesbote. Among his writings were He Was—He Is—He Will Be (Newton, 1944), and Kurzer Bericht über die Arbeit unter Aussätzigen (Champa, 1915). He died at Newton on Oct. 3, 1949. M.P.S.

Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); Twenty-Five Years with God in India (Berne, 1929).

Penner, Peter William (1876-1953), a Mennonite (GCM) missionary to India, was born in Prangenau, Molotschna, South Russia, Feb. 12, 1876. When he was two years old, his father, Jakob Penner, migrated to America and settled in the Brudertal community, Hillsboro, Kan. Here he attended the school and was baptized on June 3, 1895, by Wm. J. Ewert, elder of the Brudertal Mennonite Church. In 1902 he married Mathilde Ensz. He attended Bethel College 1896-98, after which he taught school. After taking a teachers' training course at the Mennonite Educational Institute, Gretna, Man., he taught there 1900-4. Then he and his wife attended German (now Baldwin) Wallace College at Berea, Ohio, where he was graduated from the Seminary in 1908. During those years he served the Grace Mennonite (GCM) Church at Pandora and the Sterling Mennonite (GCM) Church at Sterling, Ohio, as minister.

On Sept. 20, 1908, the Penners were ordained missionaries and left for India. On furlough during World War I, he did mission work in Los Angeles and served the Immanuel Mennonite Church 1918-21, after which he returned to India. Besides his heavy evangelistic activities and work in the building program on the mission field, he was the secretary-treasurer of the mission for 25 years. In 1949 he retired after 40 years of service. He died at his home in Hillsboro, Feb. 2, 1953. C.K.

Pennsville and Stonerville Mennonite (MC) churches, now extinct, were located near Scottdale, in western Pennsylvania. The early Mennonite settlers of this area located on both sides of Jacob's Creek in Westmoreland and Fayette counties about 1790, with Abraham Stauffer as the first minister. The first meetinghouse, a log house, was erected before 1800 near Pennsville, 2½ miles south of Scottdale, and a little later another at Stonerville, 2½ miles north of Scottdale. Both places erected new brick buildings, Stonerville in 1841 and Pennsville in 1852. Both belonged to a single congregation and had services on alternate dates. The congregation flourished, with over 200 members at one time, until about 1840, when a general decline began. Some moved away and others affiliated with other church bodies, finally reducing the membership to about 20. In 1893 a new church was built in Scottdale, which created new interest and became the center of worship. Stonerville was abandoned in 1898 and Pennsville in 1903. The burying grounds are the lone reminders of a once flourishing rural Mennonite settlement surrounding Scottdale. A.K.A.

Edward Yoder, The Mennonites of Westmoreland County, Pa. (Scottdale, 1942).

Pennsylvania, one of the original thirteen American colonies along the Atlantic coast, was founded by the English Quaker, William Penn, to whom the land had been granted by King Charles II in 1681. It was named Pennsylvania by the king himself, against the wishes of Penn, who as a Quaker was opposed to any name that might be interpreted as an attempt to glorify himself. The grant was of the proprietary type—that is, Penn as proprietor was granted complete ownership of the land, to dispose of it as he wished, with almost unlimited political power to govern the settlers with such political institutions as he thought best. It was Penn's purpose to establish here on the virgin soil of America a refuge for the English Quakers, who were being severely oppressed in their own country, and also other religious groups in Europe who were still being denied the usual civil and religious rights enjoyed by the established state churches. With this purpose in mind he granted the settlers a liberal frame of government and complete religious liberty.

Immigration. The first settlers were a group of English Quakers who founded the city of Philadelphia in 1681. In the meantime the English Quakers had established several Quaker congregations in Holland and among the Mennonites along the German Rhine (e.g., Crefeld, Kriegsheim in the Palatinate). To these, as well as to all the religious groups that were oppressed by their various governments along the Rhine, Penn issued a cordial invitation, offering them complete toleration—civil and religious—in his new colony. The first to respond to this call was a group of thirteen families from the region of Crefeld, former Mennonites, but by this time victims of Quaker missionary zeal. All of them but one family were now Quakers. The heads of these families were Dirck op den Graeff, Hermann op den Graeff, Abraham op den Graeff, Lenart Arets, Thones Konders, Reinert Tisen, Willem Strepers, Jan Lensen, Peter Keurlis, Jan Siemens, Johannes Bleikers, Abraham Tunis, and Jan Luykens. This group arrived at Philadelphia on Oct. 6, 1683; and, proceeding some six miles north of the newly established Philadelphia, founded a new settlement which they called Germantown on land which they had purchased from Francis Daniel Pastorius, who had preceded them to America by a few months as agent for the Frankfort Land Company.

One of these colonist families remained a Mennonite; others soon followed from the Lower Rhine region, and later from Hamburg-Altona in Germany, so that a Mennonite congregation was formed by 1690 (or 1702). This was not only the first Mennonite church to be established in America, but the first German settlement of any sort in North America. Germantown is to the Germans of America what Jamestown is to the English. In 1702, a lot was set aside for a Mennonite meetinghouse which was built in 1708 on the site of the present little stone building erected in 1770.

In 1702 Matthias van Bebbler started a new Mennonite settlement along Skippack Creek, some 15 miles to the northwest in what is now Montgomery County, which has since grown to numerous congregations in what came to be known as the Franconia (q.v.) district, extending 30 miles north and an equal distance west, covering most of the Montgomery County and Bucks County area and spilling over into the counties of Chester, Berks, Lehigh, and Northampton. In 1707 a few Mennonites came from the Palatinate to Germantown.

Beginning with 1710 there was a continuous migration of Mennonites from Switzerland and the German Palatinate, which continued more or less regularly throughout the 18th century up to the time of the French and Indian War (1756-63). Part of these filled up the Franconia settlement. The rest made their way some 60 miles west of Philadelphia, along the Pequea and Conestoga valleys, in what is now Lancaster County, which is today almost solidly Mennonite in most of its rural area. The very first settlers here in 1710 came directly from Switzerland, the rest mostly from the Palatinate. There was little immigration from Europe to Pennsylvania during the wars from 1756 to 1815; after that, Mennonites as well as others who sought greater freedom in America chose the cheaper lands farther west beyond the Allegheny Mountains, so that Mennonite immigration to Pennsylvania was to all intents ended by 1756. The total Mennonite immigration may have reached 3,000 persons. The Lancaster County settlement spilled over into York, Cumberland, Dauphin, and Lebanon counties.

Beginning with 1736 the Amish also followed the Mennonites to the "Paradise of Pennsylvania," but located their first settlement somewhat northeast of the land occupied by the Mennonites in Lancaster, farther out on the frontier, along the Blue Ridge Mountains in what is now northern Berks County. During the Indian Wars which followed in 1754 they were driven south, and the first settlement was abandoned for safer areas in Lancaster and Chester counties on the eastern Lancaster fringe from Morgantown to Atglen. The Amish immigration did not total more than 400 persons.

Mennonite Churches in Pennsylvania

- # - Old Order Amish Church Districts
- Areas Occupied by Old Order Amish

For churches not numbered see:

- I - Map of Somerset County
- II - Map of Mifflin County
- III - Map of Lancaster County
- IV - Map of Bucks - Montgomery County

MENNONITE CHURCHES (MC)

- Sunnyside
- Meadville
- Britton Run
- Beaverdam
- Masontown
- Scottdale
- Kingview
- North Scottdale
- Rockton
- Pleasant View
- Altoona
- Mill Run
- Martinsburg
- Barryville
- Rockville
- Maple Grove
- Allensville
- Mattawana
- Orelia
- Shady Pine
- Rowe
- Strasburg
- Lauver
- Pleasant View
- Chambersburg
- Marion
- Pond Bank
- Rock Hill
- Williamson
- Salem Ridge
- Cedar Grove
- Buffalo
- Beaver Run
- Crossroads
32. Lauver

OLD ORDER AMISH MENNONITE DISTRICTS

- Crawford County (Atlantic)
- Mercer County North
- Mercer County South
- New Wilmington West
- New Wilmington North
- New Wilmington South
- Enon Valley
- Selinsgrove
- Lebanon West District
- Lebanon East District
- Peachey, Up-
- per District
- Junata County

BEACHY AMISH MENNONITE CHURCHES

- Maple Grove
- Peachey, Up-
- per District

Numerous religious nonresistant German groups and mystics, Dunkards, Schwenckfelders, Moravians, and other smaller German sects soon found their way to the land of freedom from the oppression of the Old World. The smaller nonresistant groups, including Mennonites and Amish, however, formed only a small part of the German migration to Pennsylvania during this period. There was a large influx from South Germany of members of the Protestant state churches—Reformed and Lutheran. These were followed before the middle of the 18th century by the Scotch-Irish, who, finding that the best lands of southeastern Pennsylvania had been taken over by the Germans and the English Quakers, were forced to seek homes farther out on the frontier, along the foothills of the Alleghenies. So by the time of the Revolutionary War (1776), Pennsylvania was settled by the English Quakers, Germans of all religious groups, and the Scotch-Irish (mostly Presbyterians), all enjoying perfect religious liberty, living side by side in peace and contentment. The Mennonites, although they were the first German settlers in the province, formed only a small part of the entire German population by the close of the century. It is estimated that by 1776 there were about 100,000 Germans in Pennsylvania, constituting perhaps about one third of the entire population. Of this number the Mennonites and Amish were not more than 10 per cent.

Most of the Mennonites who immigrated during this time were poor, many of them without sufficient money to pay for their passage. Their Dutch brethren organized the Commission for Foreign Needs, which greatly aided the emigration movement. Some, too, were able to bargain with ship captains for free passage across, in return for which the captain might sell their services (for a number of years) at auction upon their arrival at Philadelphia. These were called "redemptioners." A number of Mennonites came under this head, though the number among them was not as great as among other groups.

The poor economic conditions prevailing throughout the 18th century in the Palatinate, from which came nearly all of the Mennonites and most of the other Germans, together with the arbitrary rule of many of the Palatine counts through the 18th century, were, no doubt, the main cause of the mass migration from this region at this time. But the Mennonites had added reasons for leaving what to them was a land of oppression. Not being one of the three tolerated religious groups guaranteed religious liberty by the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, they were subjected to all sorts of humiliating civil disabilities and religious intolerance throughout the century. They had to pay an extra tax in the form of protection money; their expansion was limited to 200 families; their young men could not become members of the craft guilds and were thus unable to learn a trade; they were not allowed to live in cities except with special permission; they had only limited rights in the ownership of land; they were not allowed to marry except with the consent of the ruling authorities; nor were they permitted to be buried in the public cemeteries.

All the early Pennsylvania settlements were made in the southeastern corner of the province, within 100 miles of Philadelphia. As they expanded by natural increase and by the addition of new immigrants, and as the land became more valuable and scarce, the second and third generation descendants of the first colonists, as well as the newcomers, were compelled to find new homes farther out on the unoccupied frontiers. Mennonites were always among the pioneer settlers in new territory. As early as 1727 a group of Mennonites were found with the first German immigrants to the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia, although no permanent Mennonite settlement was made in Virginia until about 1780. In that state before the end of the century a number of flourishing congregations were located in the general region of Harrisonburg in what is now Rockingham County. Before 1800, too, the Pennsylvania Mennonites had established new homes along the Juniata in the center of the province, in south-central Franklin County, and in the southwestern corner near the headwaters of the Ohio River in Somerset County and Westmoreland County. In 1786 a number of Mennonites from Franklin County and later (1794) from Bucks and Lancaster found their way to Ontario, first near Niagara, then near what became Berlin, but now Kitchener, where they founded a major colony which has since grown into a large number of flourishing congregations, as well as smaller settlements in Lincoln County (Vineland) and in York County north of Toronto (Markham).

The Amish, too, expanded their settlement before the close of the century into the beautiful Kishacoquillas Valley in what is now Mifflin County, and into Somerset County. During the 19th century both the Mennonites and the Amish formed new congregations in a beeline westward in several states—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska.

State Relations. As long as the Quakers, who shared with the Mennonites their peace principles and their objection to the oath, retained control of the political machinery, the Pennsylvania government had a considerate regard for the religious scruples of the Mennonites on these questions. In 1717 a special act was passed by the Pennsylvania Assembly relieving Mennonites from any judicial oath; and in 1742 a similar act was passed in behalf of the Amish. In 1754 the Quakers lost control of the Assembly to the non-Quaker element of the population, and the peaceful policy inaugurated by Penn came to an end. During the French and Indian War (Seven Years' War) which followed there were many Indian depredations and massacres along the whole Pennsylvania frontier. Among those who lost their lives was an Amish family by the name of Hostetler. The influence of the Quakers, however, together with that of the other German nonresistant religious groups, was sufficiently strong to guarantee consideration on the part of the government for their special religious scruples throughout the 18th century. During the Revolutionary War Mennonites and others who shared their scruples against the bearing of arms were exempt from military duty upon the payment of a special small fee. When Pennsylvania, together with the other colonies, declared herself an independent state and free from England, demanding a new oath of allegiance from her citizens, some of the small Mennonite communities on the outer fringe of the larger settlements found some difficulty with the local authorities in maintaining their traditional principles regarding both war and the oath. Mennonites opposed the new oath on the grounds of opposition both to any oath at all and also to this new one in particular because it committed them to the support of revolution against constituted government, which was against their religious principles. In the small isolated congregation at Saucon in Lehigh County the whole male Mennonite population was at one time committed to jail for refusal to take the required oath. This was an exceptional case of persecution, however; in the larger, compact settlements, where the Mennonites were better known and understood by their local governments, no such drastic measures were resorted to, although all through the Revolutionary War the Mennonites, to whom respect for civil authority was a fundamental religious principle, were regarded by the superpatriots of the time as unpatriotic and classed with the Loyalists. In 1790 the new state of Pennsylvania passed a law exempting the Mennonites from active militia duty upon the payment of a small fine.

While the Mennonites were unanimous in their refusal to bear arms, there was some difference in certain quarters on the question of paying the special war taxes required by the government. In 1778, Bishop Christian Funk (q.v.), son of the pioneer Bishop Henry Funk (q.v.), living in Indianfield Township in the Franconia region, insisted on the payment of the special tax, contrary to the general opinion of his fellow Mennonites of this region. As a result of this difference Funk was deposed by the fellowship and with some 52 followers organized an independent congregation which later came to be known as Funkite by those who disagreed with him. These Funkites retained their separate existence until 1850, when they became extinct.

Division. With the exception of the Funk controversy over war taxes, there were no serious controversies among the Mennonites during their first century in Pennsylvania. But during the 19th century there were a number of controversies, usually over minor questions of religious practice, that led to final separation and the organization of separate branches of the church. The first of these was a conservative division led by John Herr, which occurred in Lancaster County in 1812 and resulted in a group called the Reformed Mennonites (q.v.). In 1957 there were only 309 members of this group in Pennsylvania in 10 congregations, 221 of whom lived in Lancaster County.

The second division, also a radically conservative one, occurred in Lancaster County in 1845, led by Jacob Stauffer, hence called Stauffer Mennonites. In 1957 the group had less than 300 members in 6 subdivisions.

The third division (GCM) occurred in the Franconia Conference in 1847, led by John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.), a young minister who, together with his bishop, John Hunsicker, and a total of 16 of the 70 ministers of the district, because they insisted upon certain more liberal church practices than those in usage by the church at large at the time, were expelled from the Franconia Conference. The changes advocated by the Oberholtzer group included greater freedom in the choice of the cut of the clerical coat then required for the ministry; a more definite and prescribed form of procedure in conducting the sessions of the ministerial council meetings; and in general, a more liberal attitude toward all social and religious affiliation with the non-Mennonite world.

After its expulsion this group immediately formed a conference of its own, which later assumed the name "Eastern Pennsylvania Mennonite Conference." Under the leadership of Oberholtzer the new conference adopted a progressive program of church extension, establishing Sunday schools, initiating a church paper, advocating an educational institution, and in the main advocating a more liberal association with other churches, both Mennonite and others, in their religious efforts. Oberholtzer was also greatly interested in the union into some sort of common ecclesiastical organization of all the scattered Mennonite churches throughout the country, and consistently advocated this cause in the church paper which he established in 1852, the Religiöser Botschafter (q.v.). Some years later the congregations in this conference co-operated heartily in the movement that culminated in the formation in 1860 of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America. Today these congregations form the Eastern District of the General Conference. In 1957 its membership in Pennsylvania was 4,041 in 27 congregations.

The fourth division, the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, occurred in 1858, ten years after the Oberholtzer defection, as a division within a division. When William Gehman, a minister in the Upper Milford congregation of the newly organized Eastern Pennsylvania Conference, together with a number of sympathizers, insisted on introducing regular midweek prayer meetings and other evangelistic practices not yet common among even the progressive Oberholtzer following, he was expelled from the conference. This group, too, soon formed a new organization under the name of Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.). For a time they were few in number, but in the course of time, by joining with several other like-minded groups from Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, they formed, in 1883, a new branch of the church under the name of Mennonite Brethren in Christ. In 1947 this branch dropped the name Mennonite, and assumed the name United Missionary Church (q.v.), but the Pennsylvania section, which forms a separate Pennsylvania conference, has retained the old name for the present. In 1957 it had 4,507 members in Pennsylvania in 35 congregations.

The fifth division was that of the Old Order Mennonites in Lancaster County in 1893, a part of a larger movement which included scattered groups of conservative Mennonites who, during the latter part of the 19th century, objected to what they considered some of the progressive religious practices then coming into general use among the Mennonite churches at large—Sunday schools, evangelistic meetings, mission meetings, more modern dress, in some cases the use of the English language in the pulpit, and other new religious observances more in keeping with the spirit of the times. In Lancaster they were first called "Martinites" after their leader Jonas H. Martin; in Indiana and Ohio they were called "Wislers" after their leader Jacob Wisler, who broke off in 1871-72; in Ontario the group broke off in 1889, in Virginia in 1900. In 1957 the Lancaster group, with several subdivisions, totaled 3,272 in 18 congregations.

Having lost these various divisions, the Mennonite Church (MC) constituted the main body in Pennsylvania. For convenience it is usually spoken of as the "Old" Mennonites, but the term "Old" is not official and is not recognized by the group. They have not been influenced much by these various defections. They are still largely conservative, especially in matters of dress and affiliation with other religious bodies, though quite progressive in mission work, Sunday schools, relief work, and other forms of progressive religious effort. As a whole they are more conservative in their religious practices than their brethren of the same branch in the states farther west. Their total membership in the state in 1957 was 26,580 distributed over the various district conferences as follows: Franconia, 5,311; Lancaster, 14,663; Allegheny, 2,721; Ohio and Eastern, 1,878; Franklin County, Pa., and Washington County, Md., 682; Conservative Conference, 438; independent congregations, 373; unaccounted for, 514.

Amish. The Amish in Pennsylvania divided c1880 into two distinct groups, those who remained unchanged in their forms of worship and church life and practices and hence are called Old Order Amish, and those who followed a more progressive pattern and ultimately joined a Mennonite conference. The second group first joined the Eastern A.M. Conference in 1893, which merged with the Ohio Conference into the Ohio and Eastern Conference in 1925. Later several of these congregations transferred to the Allegheny Conference. Some Old Order Amish joined the Conservative Amish Conference (q.v.), formed in 1910, and additional O.O.A. groups (q.v.) withdrew to join the Beachy Amish movement which began in 1926. In 1957 the Beachy Amish had 692 members in Pennsylvania in 5 congregations. The Conservative Conference meanwhile had allied itself with the Mennonite Church (MC). The Old Order Amish in Pennsylvania in 1957 numbered 4,168 members in 52 congregations called "districts."

In 1957 Pennsylvania had the largest total number of Mennonites, 39,382, of any state in the Union, twice as large as Ohio, the next in size. This number was distributed by branches as follows:

Mennonite Church (MC)	26,580
Old Order Amish	4,168
General Conference Mennonite Church	4,061
Old Order Mennonite	3,272
Beachy Amish	692
Reformed Mennonite	309
Stauffer Mennonite	300

The Mennonite Brethren in Christ, who do not reckon themselves with the other Mennonite bodies, had 4,507 members in Pennsylvania in 1957. Thus the total in Pennsylvania carrying the name Mennonite was 43,889.

Institutions established in Pennsylvania by Mennonites include: Mennonite (MC) Publishing House at Scottdale (1908), four high schools (all MC)—Lancaster Mennonite School (1942), Johnstown Mennonite School (1944), Belleville Mennonite School (1945), Christopher Dock School (1954) at Lansdale, and 58 elementary schools operated by either the Amish or the Mennonites (MC) or in a few cases co-operatively by the two groups. Welfare institutions include the following: Mennonite Children's Home (1911) at Millersville, Mennonite Home (1905) at Lancaster, Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home (1898) near New Holland, Bethany Mennonite Home (1954) in Philadelphia, Eastern Mennonite Home (1916) at Souderton, Rockhill Mennonite Home (1955) at Sellersville, Eastern Mennonite Convalescent Home (1942) at Hatfield, and Philhaven Hospital for Mental and Nervous Diseases (1954) near Lebanon. All of these are under the Mennonite Church (MC). The General Conference Mennonites operate the Mennonite Home for the Aged (1896) at Frederick. The Mennonite Central Committee has had its headquarters at Akron, a village ten miles north of Lancaster, since 1937.

The Pennsylvania Mennonites, who were once exclusively rural and have made major contributions to American agriculture through the introduction from their Palatinate homeland of pioneer improvements such as crop rotation, nitrogenous legumes, etc., are now largely urbanized, possibly to 85 per cent. Many have entered into small businesses, a few have become manufacturers on a medium large scale, and an increasing number are entering the professions of teaching and medicine, only a very few into law, and none into politics. Many have become factory workers. The Amish and the Old Order Mennonites have remained exclusively rural.

The literary production of the Pennsylvania Mennonites has been slight, although in the 18th and early 19th centuries the German presses of Christopher Saur (q.v.) in Germantown, the Ephrata Cloister, and John Baer in Lancaster, published a considerable amount of German Mennonite literature including hymnals, catechisms, confessions, prayer-books, and the Martyrs' Mirror. The sole Mennonite press before the establishment of the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale in 1908 was the Mennonitischer Druckverein (q.v.) at Milford Square (1856 ff.).

Characteristic Mennonite Names. The most common Mennonite names in Pennsylvania, all of the Swiss-Palatinate background except a very few who descend from the original Germantown settlers from the Lower Rhine, include the following (in modern spelling): Alderfer, Allebach, Bowman, Bleam, Beam, Brennenman, Brubaker, Baer, Bachman, Burkholder, Burkhart, Boyer, Bookwalter, Beyer, Bomberger, Bergey, Betzner, Breckbill, Bechtel, Beidler, Cassel, Clemmer, Clemens, Cressman, Eby, Erisman, Ebersole, Eschleman, Funk, Frey, Fretz, Frick, Freed, Frantz, Gehman, Gingrich, Groff, Good, Geil, Graybill, Glick, Huffman, Hunsicker, Holdeman, High, Hiestand, Hershey, Herr, Hess, Huber, Hagey, Horst, Hunsberger, Hallman, Hoover, Kolb, Kagey, Kratz, Kendig, Kreider, Keyser, Kaufman, Latschaw, Leatherman, Longenecker, Landes, Moyer, Miller, Musser, Musselman, Meylin, Martin, Melinger, Metzler, Newcomer, Neff, Nissly, Nice, Oberholtzer, Pennypacker, Root, Rupp, Risser, Reist, Rittenhouse, Rosenberger, Swartley, Schantz, Souder, Stemen, Snavelly, Shellenberger, Shenk, Stauffer, Snyder, Shoemaker, Shelly, Tyson, Weaver, Witmer, Wismer, Wenger, Wambold, Yoder, Zigler, and Zimmerman. The most common Pennsylvania Amish names include the following: Blough, Beiler, Borntrager, Coblentz, Detweiler, Kenagy, Fisher, Hooley, Hershberger, Hartzler, Hostetler, Kaufman, King, Lantz, Lapp, Miller, Mast, Plank, Peachey, Schrag, Stoltzfus, Smucker, Troyer, Umble, Yoder, and Zook. C.H.S.

C. Henry Smith, Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909); idem, Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Norristown, 1929); idem, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottsdale, 1931); S. W. Pennypacker, Historical and Biographical Sketches (Philadelphia, 1883) H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America (Canton, 1898); H. S. Bender, "Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII (1933) 227-50.

Pennsylvania Aid Committee, properly called "Mennonite Executive Aid Committee of Pennsylvania for the Mennonite Congregations in West Prussia, Poland, and South Russia," was formally organized on April 14, 1874, as the over-all relief committee of the Mennonites of Eastern Pennsylvania to raise funds to aid in the resettlement of Mennonites from South Russia in the prairie states of Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Dakota. It represented largely the Mennonite Church (MC) in the Lancaster and Franconia conferences, and it was the action of the Lancaster Conference on March 27, 1874, in appointing an aid committee which resulted in the larger committee. Its initial officers were Amos Herr, president, John Shenk, secretary, Gabriel Baer and H. R. Godshall, treasurers. The first four were all of Lancaster County, while Godshall was of Souderton in the Franconia district. The committee co-operated with the Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.) and the other aid committees, such as the one in Ontario, but continued independently to aid the transatlantic movement (using the Red Star Line of Philadelphia) and to furnish loans to needy immigrant families as well as direct donations for the neediest cases. The servicing of the loans continued for several decades. The further history and organization of the Committee are not known. Caspar Hett of Philadelphia was the business agent of the Committee. H.S.B.

C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Kempes Schnell, "John F. Funk, 1835-1930, and the Mennonite Migration of 1873-75," MQR XXIV (1950) 199-229.

Pennsylvania Dutch (Pennsylvania German) is a dialect spoken widely in southeastern Pennsylvania and in other places to which Pennsylvania Germans have migrated. Fredric Klees estimated that probably more than 300,000 Pennsylvania Germans "are more at home in Dutch than in English" and that there are probably more than 400,000 others who habitually speak English but can make "themselves understood in Dutch if necessity arises." Dr. J. William Frey, author of Pennsylvania Dutch Grammar (1950), stated that there were 500,000 in each of these two groups. The principal area in which the dialect or language is spoken is southeastern Pennsylvania, where at least fourteen counties are distinctively Pennsylvania German. Lying directly west of these are eighteen counties having important Pennsylvania German population. Chief areas are the counties of Montgomery, Bucks, Berks, Lancaster, York, Dauphin, Lebanon, Lehigh, Northampton; and the cities of Reading, Allentown, and Bethlehem. During the 18th and much of the 19th centuries nearly all of the Amish and Mennonites east of the Mississippi River and in Ontario, with the exception of those immigrating directly from Holland or Switzerland, spoke Pennsylvania Dutch, and in the 20th century all Old Order Amish Mennonite communities were still using the dialect as their household language, although they used in their religious services a combination of High German and Pennsylvania Dutch. Those wishing to study the dialect have found Amish communities ideal places for their surveys. For instance, Alfred L. Shoemaker did a doctoral dissertation in 1940 at the University of Illinois on "Studies on the Pennsylvania German Dialect of the Amish Community in Arthur, Illinois," while Ruth Bender did a master's thesis at the University of Iowa in 1929 on "A Study of the Pennsylvania-German as Spoken in Johnson County, Iowa." Certain Mennonite communities which have derived much of their membership from the Amish background have also maintained the dialect as a household language. Chief among these areas are the Johnstown and Springs district in Somerset County, Pa., the Holmes County, Ohio, community, and Lagrange County, Ind.

When the pressure of American anti-German feeling during World War I forced the discontinuance of the use of German in public programs, nearly all Mennonite churches in Pennsylvania Dutch-speaking areas which had not done so previously began to use English in their services. The Old Order Amish, however, have continued the public use of German, while the Conservative Amish Mennonites have only recently generally adopted English. The continued use of German by the Amish can be explained by their reluctance to accept any changes in religious practices and partly by the fact that since their music and devotional literature are in German they are fearful of losing their religious heritage by dropping the German. The religious use of German has been an important factor in the retention of Pennsylvania Dutch as the Amish household language. An additional factor in assuring the preservation of the dialect in eastern Pennsylvania has been its widespread use by their Lutheran and Reformed neighbors who originally came to that state from the German Palatinate. English, Scotch-Irish, Welsh, French, and even Negro neighbors learned the dialect from them so that many of these speak it fluently.

The renewed American interest in regional culture and the attempt to popularize Pennsylvania Dutch culture will no doubt prolong the life of this dialect in non-Amish circles and will thus indirectly strengthen its position in Amish life. A growing body of literature on Pennsylvania Dutch culture as well as material written in this dialect has given the Pennsylvanians a pride in their heritage. As long ago as 1941 Otto Springer of the University of Pennsylvania Department of Germanic Languages produced a 16-page mimeographed bibliography listing 223 books and articles for the study of the Pennsylvania German language and its sources. In spite of this interest in the dialect, prophets have predicted that the dialect is doomed to disappear as a living language in America, although it is doubtful that this will happen as long as the Amish preserve their "Old Order."

When thousands of Germans came to Pennsylvania in the 18th and 19th centuries they brought their dialects with them, the chief one of which was the Palatine (pfälzisch) German dialect, since the majority of these immigrants came from the Upper Rhine Valley. The Palatine dialect is the basic element in the Pennsylvania Dutch. Although immigrants from other German areas such as Hesse, Baden, and Württemberg, as well as from Switzerland, added words to the Pennsylvania Dutch vocabulary, it is still primarily Palatine German. Even today Pennsylvania Germans visiting in the Upper Rhine Valley have little difficulty in conversing with the natives of that region. While it is true that the Pennsylvanians have adopted some English words into their dialect, these do not comprise more than 5 per cent of the Pennsylvania Dutch working vocabulary. There are slight variations in the dialect between Berks and Lancaster counties in Pennsylvania, and also between Pennsylvania and the western states; but these groups have no difficulty in understanding each other. Klees characterized the dialect thus: "It is not a language possessing dignity or grandeur; it is not a speech fit for tragedy. But it is one in which humor and homely sentiment can be well expressed." One of the most noted pieces of Pennsylvania Dutch literature is a collection of poems by a Reformed minister, Henry Harbaugh, called Harbaugh's Harfe (Philadelphia, c1870). Chief of several newspaper columns has been 'S Pennsylvaniaanisch Deutsch Eck in the Allentown (Pa.) Morning Call. A number of regular radio programs as well as stage plays in the dialect have entertained large audiences of Pennsylvania Dutch in eastern Pennsylvania.

M.G.

Fredric Klees, The Pennsylvania Dutch (New York, 1951) 277-85; Albert F. Buffington and Preston A. Barba, A Pennsylvania German Grammar (Allentown, 1954); J. William Frey, Pennsylvania Dutch Grammar (Lancaster, 1950); Marcus Lambert, A Dictionary of the Non-English Words in the Pennsylvania-German Dialect (Lancaster, 1924); A Pennsylvania-Dutch Dictionary (Quakertown, n.d.); A. R. Horne, Pennsylvania German Manual (Allentown, 1896); E. F. Robacker, Pennsylvania German Literature (Philadelphia, 1943); Pennsylvania Folklife, a quarterly now published at Bethel, Pa., beginning in 1949 as the Pennsylvania Dutchman published at Lancaster.

Pennsylvania-German Culture. The ethnic group known as the Pennsylvania "Dutch" (from Deutsch) has left an indelible impress upon the American way of life. They are a group of people (of Swiss, Alsatian, and Palatine origin) who earlier shared and still share to a certain extent a common High-German Palatine dialect, and who settled mostly in Pennsylvania in the 18th century and later. Religiously there are three general types of Pennsylvania Dutch: (1) "Church People," so called because the adherents belonged to established state churches (Lutheran and Reformed) when they came to this country; (2) the Moravians; and (3) the "plain people" (also called Sects).

Among the "plain people" (so named because of their plainness in dress) are the various groups of Mennonites, Amish, Dunkards or Church of the Brethren, Zion's Children, Brethren in Christ, and earlier the Schwenckfelder group. The Amish are currently photographed and popularized so much that there is a common mistaken notion that all Pennsylvania Dutchmen are "plain." The plain people probably number not more than 10-15 per cent of the total dialect-speaking population; there are about a half million in North America who can speak or understand the Pennsylvania-Dutch dialect.

The Pennsylvania Germans preserved many of the finer features of the group culture which they brought with them from the Old World. Here will be discussed their contributions to the broader scope of American life, with occasional reference to elements of their ethnocentric culture, which of itself is a fascinating field for the sociologist.

Agriculture: Few persons will disagree that these people always have been among the best farmers in America. Accustomed to the intensive cultivation of their fields, they did not adopt the plantation system of the southern states or devote vast acreage to grazing. The farmstead became a fairly self-sufficient economic unit.

Nature is a stern disciplinarian and those who seek her rewards must learn the disciplines of life. The Mennonites, Amish, and other members of the plain people have integrated these disciplines with their spiritual and economic life. Usually the Lutheran and Reformed people also held close to basic principles and practices in agriculture.

The Pennsylvania Germans are credited with the introduction of the willow tree, many varieties of fruit, especially apples, the prevention of soil erosion, the balanced rotation of crops, the building of "bank" barns, the Conestoga wagon, prairie schooner of pioneer days, several types of fences, and numerous other elements found in modern agriculture.

Kitchen Culture: The excellence of Pennsylvania-German cooking is acknowledged by most people. Housewives in Pennsylvania are little concerned with calories and vitamins but ever alert to the virtues of cleanliness, taste, and the complete banishment of hunger from the domains over which they rule. The Mennonite Community Cookbook, by Mary Emma Showalter, provides a full fare for those who wish to be initiated. They contributed to our national pantry such delicacies as cottage cheese, scrapple, various types of sausages, pretzels, cole slaw and, of course, sauerkraut.

Crafts: Every ethnic group has its own peculiar Volkskunde; that of the Pennsylvania Germans is of especial interest because of its expertness and the vestiges of Renaissance lore which survived the centuries in a new world. Early craftsmen included cabinetmakers, whose workmanship is attested to this day by antique collectors, weavers, potters, stone masons, wheelwrights, wainwrights, carpenters, smiths, millers, coopers, and processors of farm products.

The young lady of the household filled the dower chest (perhaps one made by a relative and decorated by a friend) with linens made of flax which she spun and embroidered. Her mother quilted bed coverings, braided straw for the making of hats, cut and sewed cloth to furnish garments for her family. Some of these handicrafts are still employed on farmsteads in Mennonite-Amish communities.

The Finer Arts, Fraktur: A style of broken or fractured writing, usually illuminated in brilliant colors, was one of the arts practiced in monasteries by the trained copyists of medieval times. The skills involved and the knowledge of vegetable dyes used, were brought to America by the early Germans. They illuminated their birth certificates, baptismal certificates, Haus-Segen (house blessings), and other documents of record. Itinerant artists wrote life data on the flyleaves of Bibles and seamstresses designed and appliqued them to cloth.

This art flourished until 1830 when commercial printing presses began to supply printed forms. Later Currier and Ives attempted to reproduce these forms in color. The invention of four-color printing in the early 1930's has made it possible to reproduce these designs in fairly satisfactory color and theme. Since then the general public has become accustomed to all sorts of advertising materials showing hearts, doves, tulips, stars, and fraktur lettering in glittering hues. The arts of fraktur and illumination are the only forms of folk art transplanted from Europe to American soil.

It should be pointed out here that not all of the church groups participated in the application of designs to the barns, dower chests, chairs, bookmarks, quilts, tombstones, pottery, etc. The practices were not common among Mennonite and Amish sects, who always preferred "plain" living.

After 1830, when the printer, the loom, and the planing mill supplanted the fraktur artist, the seamstress, and the cabinetmaker, respectively, the farmers transferred some of these designs to their barns. To break the monotony of color in an 80-foot expanse of red or white painted boards the owner had attractive designs such as stars, teardrops, sun wheels, etc., painted on barn sides. The credulous, perhaps gullible, persons who know little or nothing of Pennsylvania-German culture have accepted the rather sensational version that these barnscapes are "hex" signs, designed to drive away evil spirits, or witches who might otherwise molest the cattle in the barns.

Music: If the musical capital of the United States had been designated prior to 1830 it would have been located either in Bethlehem or Ephrata, Pa. Remembering that the Puritans of New England were prohibited by the tenets of their faith from participating in any kind of music other than humming and that the plantation of the south knew only the spinet and the fiddle, it becomes quite clear that music could develop only in the middle colonies.

The monks at the Ephrata Cloisters wrote more than 600 hymns. Conrad Beissel, the superintendent of the Cloisters, wrote the first book on harmony written in the New World. As early as 1742 the Moravians in Bethlehem rendered "In Dulce Jubilo." The Brothers and Sisters in Unity (Moravians) composed hundreds of chorales for their religious festivals. To this day the Bach Festival Chorus at Bethlehem continues as one of the finest choral groups in America.

It was the Pennsylvania Germans who built the first church organs, introduced the trombone, the flute, and various types of horns. They formed the first orchestra, rendered the first symphony, and established singing schools in nearly all communities in which they were settled.

Literature: The literature created by people who use a foreign language does not exist for those who do not understand it. The great mass of German literature created before the triumph of English, c1910, is therefore frequently not recognized as a contribution to American life.

Since 1910 all Pennsylvania Germans are completely literate in English and most of them do their thinking in English. The full impact of their contributions is only now beginning to be felt. Among recent writers whose ancestry dates back to early German immigrants are Pearl Buck, Lowell Thomas, Bayard Taylor, William Dean Howells, Joyce Kilmer, Alan Segar, Conrad Richter, Hervey Allen, Neal Swanson, Elsie Singmaster, Joseph Hergesheimer, James Whitcomb Riley, Grace Noll Crowell.

A sizable volume of literature in English has been produced by Pennsylvania German scholars writing for learned societies devoted to the preservation of their history and lore. The result is that the Pennsylvania Germans are probably the most thoroughly recorded group in all America. No group knows its own history better. Not only have professional groups such as the German Society of Pennsylvania (est. 1765), the Pennsylvania German Society (est. 1895), the Pennsylvania German Folklore Society (est. 1935), and the Pennsylvania Dutch Folklore Center (est. 1948) produced much of the literature, but many church bodies, notably the Mennonites, Moravians, and Schwenckfelders, have published great masses of literature relating to their own individual history and statement of faith.

Education: In spite of the assertions made by some writers condemning the Pennsylvania Germans for hostility to secular education the facts prove the opposite to be true. These writers have mistaken the cautious and conservative approach for opposition and benightedness. There are more colleges located in the southeastern segment of Pennsylvania than there are in any similar area in the country; the Language Atlas prepared by Brown University in 1943-44 lists Lancaster, Pa., as the spot where the best English is being used; nearly all the leaders of public education at the state and federal levels are descendants of Pennsylvania-German stock; and the literacy census of 1940 places southeastern Pennsylvania as lowest in the extent of illiteracy in the entire nation. (See Pennsylvania Dutch.) A.D.G.

Emil Meynen, Bibliographie des Deutschums der kolonialzeitlichen Einwanderung in Nordamerika, 1683-1933 (Leipzig, 1937); Frederick Klees, The Pennsylvania Dutch (New York, 1950).

Pennsylvania Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the South Central Conference, located in Harvey Co., Kan., midway between Hesston and Newton, began in 1872, when Mennonite settlers, most of them from Eastern Pennsylvania, located here. The congregation was organized in 1885. The first meetinghouse, about 30 x 40 ft., was built in 1887. Services were conducted alternately by the Mennonites and Amish Mennonites until they merged in 1892. The Amish Mennonites came to Harvey County from Mifflin County, Pa., between 1885 and 1889. A new frame building 40 x 60 ft. with a seating capacity of 200 was dedicated in 1903, and enlarged in 1947.

Among the historic events in the congregation was the reception into the congregation of 61 members by Bishop T. M. Erb on March 4, 1906—45 by baptism, 16 by confession or letter—following evangelistic meetings by J. E. Hartzler. In 1913 there was a schism in the congregation caused by the Holiness movement, when 50 members withdrew, including two of the three ministers, David B. Zook and J. M. R. Weaver. Weaver returned to the Pennsylvania Church in 1922. R. J. Heatwole, who moved into the Pennsylvania community in 1882, was recognized as an influential layman. He promoted Sunday schools and secured evangelists for the early settlers. T. M. Erb served as minister and bishop 31 years, and his son Paul Erb as minister for 22 years. In 1958 Earl Buckwalter was pastor and bishop of the congregation of 102 members.

G.G.Y.

Emma Risser, History of the Pennsylvania Mennonite Church in Kansas (Hesston, 1958).

Pennypacker, Samuel W. (1843-1916), governor of Pennsylvania 1903-7, was a great-great-grandson of the Mennonite immigrant Hendrick Pannebecker (b. 1674), who was in Germantown, Pa., by 1699 and settled in the Skippack Mennonite settlement of Montgomery County, Pa., in 1702. Hendrick's grandson was the Mennonite bishop Matthias Pannebecker (1742-1808), and the latter's grandson was Dr. Isaac P. Pennypacker, a physician and teacher of medicine. The doctor's son, Samuel Whitaker, was born at Phoenixville, Pa., on April 9, 1843. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1866, became Judge in Common Pleas No. 2 in Philadelphia in 1889, Presiding Judge in this court in 1896, and served as Republican governor of Pennsylvania 1903-7. He was also a historian and bibliophile (collected 10,000 items), and wrote voluminously on the history of eastern Pennsylvania and on his Mennonite forebears and their faith. Worthy of note are his essays on David Rittenhouse, Christopher Dock, and the Martyrs' Mirror, in Historical and Biographical Sketches (Philadelphia, 1883), also his book, The Settlement of Germantown (Philadelphia, 1899).

His brother Isaac R. Pennypacker edited his Autobiography of a Pennsylvanian (Philadelphia, 1918). He died Sept. 2, 1916. Whatever merit Daniel K. Cassell's History of the Mennonites (1888) possessed was based largely on the materials he used from Pennypacker's research. Pennypacker's grandfather Matthias, son of the bishop, paid for the reprinting of the Dordrecht Confession of Faith at West Chester, Pa., in 1814. Most of the Mennonite section of the Pennypacker book collection was purchased at auction by the Schwenckfelder Library at Pennsylvania, Pa., in 1924, where it still remains. J.C.W.

Pension Funds of the Dutch Mennonites. When the trained and salaried ministry became more or less usual in Dutch Mennonite congregations, the matter of supplying pensions for aged and disabled ministers and ministers' widows became a real problem; and so a number of pension funds were established. The oldest fund is the Widows' Fund in North Holland, which dates from 1794 (see Fonds ter ondersteuning). Soon after this, funds were founded in Friesland for the pensioning of retired ministers and widows. The Groningen conference founded a widows' fund in 1835; the Zwolsche Fonds (q.v.) was organized in 1810. The Algemeen Emeritaat en Invaliditeitsfonds (q.v.), usually called Zaansche Fonds, was founded in 1848. In 1917 the Groningen conference established a fund for disabled and retired ministers. The Pensioenverhogingsfonds was created in 1929 to supplement inadequate pensions of retired ministers and widows. The functions of all these funds, except those founded by the Groningen conference, are now administered by a new pension fund founded in 1945 by the A.D.S., called the Algemeen Pensioenfonds. (F. H. Pasma, Doopsgezind Handboek, 1954.) vdZ.

Pension and Ministers' Aid Committee (or Committee on Pensions) of the General Conference Mennonite Church. For a long period of time the leadership of the General Conference Mennonite Church was aware of the need for a plan to pension its ministers and missionaries at retirement age. In the fall of 1945 the Executive Committee appointed a committee called the Pension and Ministers' Aid Committee. The original members of this committee were August Epp, chairman, Clinton Kaufman, secretary, Mrs. J. E. Entz, Mary Bergen, H. Albert Claassen, and Robert Stauffer. The duties of this committee were defined as twofold: (1) To provide aid for needy ministers and widows of ministers and (2) to work out a plan of pensioning for ministers and missionaries commencing at age 65. Provision was made for direct appeal to the committee for help. A well-defined plan for pensioning ministers and missionaries was adopted at the General Conference sessions in August 1947 at Berne, Ind. When the constitution of the General Conference was revised this committee received the name of "Committee on Pensions" operating under the Board of Trustees and Finance (since 1956 called the Board of Business Administration).

In general, those who are eligible to enter the retirement plan are full-time ordained ministers, missionaries, both home and foreign, and full-time employees of the district conferences and the General Conference. As a guide to the employing organizations the committee has recommended that an amount equal to 10 per cent of the employees' salary be paid into the Pension Plan. For a number of years the committee advised that one fourth of the payment into the plan ought to be borne by the participant in the plan and three fourths of the cost be paid by the employing organization, such as the church, the Board of Missions, etc. Of recent years the committee changed its recommendation to the employing organizations in that they have been urging the organizations to pay the entire cost of the Pension Plan, thereby making it possible for the minister to enroll in Social Security and pay the cost himself. Benefits for retirement start at the age of 65, and if the participant dies before that time, a lump sum is paid to the surviving family by virtue of the plan having the factor of life insurance. Since Social Security is available to ministers and missionaries in addition to the Pension Plan of the Conference, it now becomes possible for ministers and missionaries to look forward to an income at retirement which can be considered approaching the point of adequacy. The Pension Plan has not been accepted as fully and promptly as it should have been. To date 46 ministers and 78 missionaries are enrolled in the plan (1957).

Au.E.

Retirement Life Income Plan as Adopted by the General Conference (Newton, 1948); Reports and Official Minutes of the General Conference Mennonite Church 1947, 1950, 1953, 1956.

Pension Plan: see Pension and Ministers' Aid Committee.

Penthelin, Sebold, a member of the Anabaptist congregation in Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, in whose house their religious services were held. He was baptized by Jakob Gross. He was seized in September 1527, but declared that he would adhere to his faith and refused to render the oath, and was thereupon expelled from the city with five other Anabaptists, including Anna, the wife of Salminger (q.v.).
HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte I (Munich, 1901) 235; ML III, 347.

Pentler, Sigmund: see Peutler, Si(e)gmund.

Penzenauer, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a goldsmith of Steyr, Austria. Together with the knife-smith Matthäus Pürchinger, the scissors grinder Hans Schützenecker (q.v.), the brushmaker Leonhard Alexberger (q.v.), Sigmund Peutler, the wool-carder Hans Muhr (q.v.), the blacksmith Paul Hertlmayr, the bowmaker Michael Gruber, and the cobbler Hans Heher (q.v.), he was imprisoned in the summer of 1527 by the magistrate of Steyr as an Anabaptist. The cross-examination revealed that they had been confirmed in their belief by the sermons of Hans Hut (q.v.). Ferdinand I, to whom the magistrate had reported the affair, ordered on Sept. 10, 1527, that the prisoners be dealt with in accord with the law and pardoned only if they recanted.

In November Wolfgang Künigl (q.v.), the prosecutor, arrived in Steyr, and the trial was begun. Künigl advised against too severe a penalty for those willing to recant. But Ferdinand wanted the penalty of Horb (q.v.) applied against the penitent; the council in its report of Nov. 15, 1527, objected to this penalty as being too severe, pointing out that six of the prisoners showed signs of penitence. The suggestion of the council was disregarded. On November 20 the king appointed a representative from each of the other six cities in his domain to sit in on the sentencing of the obstinate. The course of the trial has been described in detail in the annals of Steyr written by Preuenhueber. The accused were charged with disregarding the Roman sacrament, heresy, gathering mobs, preaching in corners, and performing baptism.

The examinations, in which the Anabaptists defended their position well with references from the Bible, lasted three days. The prisoners declared themselves willing to stop holding meetings. Künigl replied that this would not be sufficient, and that they must also desist from their Anabaptist views. This they refused to do. In deciding upon the sentence, the minority advocated two months of indoctrination by competent clergymen; the majority, however, out of "human pity," decided upon death by the sword and the burning of the corpses in place of death by fire as the law required.

Ferdinand's decision of March 21, 1528, reproached them for permitting a difference of opinion to arise in judging "so gruesome, damnable, and unheard-of a sect," and ordered death by the sword and the burning of the bodies. On February 28, the condemned men were again tried on the rack, but even torture could not deflect them from their faith. On March 30 the six named at the beginning were executed; in May Heher and five other Anabaptists were beheaded, Schützenecker's wife was drowned, and a number of Anabaptists expelled from Steyr.
P.D.E.

Alexander Nicoladoni, Johannes Bänderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); Valentin Preuenhueber, Annales Styrenses (Nürnberg, 1740); ML III, 347 f.

Peoria, Ill., a city (pop. 111,856; with suburbs 250,512) named after one of the Illini Indian tribes, is located in Peoria County on the western shore of Peoria Lake, an expansion of the Illinois River. It is situated a little north of the center of the state in the heart of an extensive and diversified agricultural area. Part of the city is located on high bluffs along the lake, making beautiful homesites.

The first Mennonites in the area were Amish who settled east of the Illinois River, in Tazewell and Woodford counties, beginning about 1830, coming from Alsace, via Pennsylvania and New Orleans. About 1833 some Mennonites from the East settled in the same areas. The first Mennonite congregation in the city, known as the Mennonite Gospel Mission, was begun on July 19, 1914, by the Central Conference of Mennonites. The second was begun by the Mennonites (MC) on the South Side, on Feb. 16, 1919, and continues as the Ann Street Mennonite Church. Very few Mennonites have settled in the city itself. The present members of these two congregations are largely from non-Mennonite backgrounds. Approximately 200 persons with Mennonite affiliation in all branches now live in the city, with approximately 3,000 persons living within a radius of 25 miles east of the river and city. In 1935 a mission was begun in East Peoria, known as Highway Village, sponsored by the Mennonite Church (MC). The Mennonites in the Peoria area come largely from the M.C., G.C.M., and the Evangelical Mennonites. J.J.H.

Peoria Gospel Mission (GCM), 1001 N. Adams, Peoria, Ill., under the Central District Mennonite Conference, had 111 members in 1958, with Samuel Ummel as pastor. M.G.

Peoria Mennonite Church (MC), now known as the "Ann Street Mennonite Church," is located in the southwestern part of the city at 2101-5 West Ann Street, Peoria, Ill. It was started as a mission in a former saloon at the corner of Garden Street and Western Ave., on Feb. 16, 1919, by the Illinois District Mission Board. John Roth served as the first superintendent. In 1921 the work was placed in charge of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, which still sponsors the congregation. On Oct. 29, 1922, the congregation was organized. In 1926 the mission building was sold and the following year the present parsonage and church were erected, greatly enlarged in 1954-58. The membership in 1958 was 86, with J. J. Hostetler as pastor.

In 1938 the congregation opened a branch Sunday school in Bellevue, just west of the city. This work was organized into an indigenous and later unaffiliated congregation, known as the Bellevue Bible Church. J.J.H.

Perceval van den Berge, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Rijssel (Lille), France, on March 16, 1563, with five other brethren. He was a native of Zwevegem in Belgium, lived in Doornik, and was seized while visiting the preacher Jan de Swart (q.v.) at Halewijn (Halluin) on March 7, 1563. (Mart. Mir. D 299 f.; E 664 f.; ML III, 349.) vdZ.

Perceux, (Les), is listed in the Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender 1931-41 as a Mennonite congregation in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland, with Eugen Burkhalter as preacher, whose address in 1941 was Perceux-Undervelier. No further information was available.

Pergen (Bergen; Czech, Perná), a parish village near Nikolsburg (q.v.), Moravia. Here in 1527 the first colloquy was held between Hubmaier (q.v.) and Hans Hut (q.v.), which was no more successful in leading to an understanding than was the second, which was held soon afterward in the castle of Nikolsburg. When Jakob Wiedemann (q.v.), "one-eyed Jacob," and Philipp Jäger (Philipp Weber, q.v.) grew more and more violently opposed to Hans Spittelmaier (q.v.), who sided with Hubmaier, chiefly on the question of the payment of war taxes and the use of the sword, another debate between the two parties took place in the parsonage of Pergen. The division resulted in the expulsion of the "Stäbler" (as opposed to the sword) from Nikolsburg by Leonhard of Liechtenstein in 1528; two hundred adults and their children left Nikolsburg and Pergen with Wiedemann and Jäger and went to Austerlitz (q.v.). In Pergen the Bruderhof that joined the Hutterian Brethren was able to continue. Here occurred the death of the preacher Matthias Legeder (q.v.) of Tirol in 1552.

When Adam von Dietrichstein (q.v.) came into the possession of Pergen and summoned the Jesuits, the Hutterites in Pergen were subjected to oppression, in the first place because the Brethren refused to remove their hats before these zealous priests. The preacher of Pergen, who had said that the Jesuits did not conduct themselves like the spiritual persons they pretended to be, was placed in stocks and irons for a day and a half and his mouth stopped with a gag "which was painted with a sticky substance. They beat many Brethren because they did not remove their hats before them." The householder was put into the tower of the Nikolsburg castle in midwinter; with fines and imprisonment they tried to compel the Brethren to attend Mass, but the Brethren steadfastly refused to obey. Siegmund von Dietrichstein, who inherited the lands from his father, expelled the Brethren from Pergen and Voitelbrunn, in both of which villages they had lived more than thirty years. He gave them eighteen weeks to take away their goods, some of which they sold on the spot, not without considerable loss; they had to leave behind their buildings and the grain in the fields. On May 7, 1591, they moved out, some going to Wastiz (q.v.), the others to Sobotiste. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, Dr. Balthasar Hubmaier (Brno, 1893) 132 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 350.

Perger, Ulrich, a weaver, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded in Wels in Upper Austria (q.v.) on June 5, 1528, with the baker Hans Neumair (q.v.), the furrier Lienhard Haslinger (q.v.), the mason Hans Steinbeck (q.v.), the furrier Jörg Zacherle (q.v.) of Krems, the baker's assistant Jörg Kneutzing (q.v.), and two cobblers, both named Sebastian; their corpses were burned. The wives of the two furriers, Barbara Haslinger and Barbara Zacherle, were drowned on the following Monday; the execution of Hans Steinbeck's wife was postponed until after the birth of her child. Six Anabaptists who recanted were released. P.DE.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bunderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); ML III, 350.

Periwig Dispute in the Danzig Mennonite Church (q.v.), which arose when Elder Hinrich van Dühren (q.v.) refused to admit to church membership a Dutch Mennonite who wore a wig, and excluded him from communion. Then when a considerable number of Danzig Mennonites followed the example of the Dutch and wore wigs, the quarrel assumed more violent forms and brought confusion into the brotherhood. In vain the government was called upon to settle the matter in 1739. Mutual bitterness increased. Finally Jacob Ouweijans (q.v.), a preacher from Holland, succeeded in reconciling the two parties. On Oct. 2, 1740, the entire congregation again observed communion. NEFF.

Inu. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2634-75; Horst Quiring, "Der Danziger Perückenstreit," Gem.-Kal. XLV (1936) 98-102; ML III, 351.

Perkasie Mennonite Church (GCM): see Bethel (Perkasie) Mennonite Church, Bucks Co., Pa.

Perkasie Mennonite Church (MC), located at Fourth and Chestnut Streets, Perkasie, Bucks Co., Pa., is a member of the Franconia Conference. The first services were held on Aug. 8, 1909. The meeting house, a brick structure 36 x 50 ft., was used nearly 40 years for conducting a community Sunday school and special services, under the general direction of the Blooming Glen Mennonite Church, and the immediate supervision of three trustees, the first of whom were William M. Moyer, A. M. Hunsicker, and Jacob M. Myers. The interior of the building was considerably redecorated in 1945. In 1948 the regularly attending Mennonite families were organized into an independent congregation of the Franconia Conference, with 45 charter members. The first pastor, Richard C. Detweiler, and deacon, Norman B. Benner, were ordained in 1948 and 1949, and are still serving (1958). The membership in 1958 was 80. In 1949 the congregation purchased a plot of ground near Perkasie for a church and community cemetery. It is frequently noted that the first young people's Bible meeting in the Franconia Conference was held at this church in 1914 and served as the forerunner of Mennonite Sunday evening meetings in the district. It is also considered to be the first mission Sunday school sponsored by Franconia Conference Mennonites. In 1956 a vacated factory building adjacent to the church was purchased, renovated, and annexed to the church to serve as an educational and activity facility. R.C.D.

Perkiomenville Mennonite Church (MC), located at Perkiomenville, Pa., was started as a mission station in 1935, by Clayton Godshall, and was organized as a congregation in 1947, with a membership of 47. Abram Metz was ordained minister in 1944, and Isaiah Alderfer as deacon in 1947. The congregation worships in a remodeled dwelling house. In 1950 a mission outpost was started by workers from the Perkiomenville congregation in an unused Mennonite meetinghouse, known as Bertolet's. It is located about four miles west of Perkiomenville. The membership at Perkiomenville in 1956 was 59, with Abram G. Metz as minister. In the spring of 1954 another mission was begun, also in an unused building, called Hersteins, which in 1956 had 23 members. A few of the members of Perkiomenville are workers there. In July 1957 a building program was started to provide more auditorium space and room for more Sunday-school classes. Dedication services were held on Jan. 19, 1958. A.G.M.

Perle-Bäumli is the name of a hymn by the Swiss Brethren, which contains 100 stanzas and begins with the words: "Was wollen wir singen und heben an zu Ehren dem himmlischen Bräutigam." Motto: The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it (Matt. 13). The song was printed in 1767. The full title is as follows: Ein schön neues geistliches Lied das Perle Bäumli genandt: Gerichtet nach dem Titel des hohen Lieds Salomons, und gegründet auf den Felsen, der Evangelischen Wahrheit und wahrer christlicher Confession, durch A.S. Zu singen wie dasz güldene A.B.C. (Wolkan, Lieder, 156 f.; ML III, 350.) NEFF.

Perryton Mennonite Church (MC), located at 319 South Birch Street, in Perryton, Ochiltree Co., Tex., a member of the South Central District Conference, was organized on Nov. 7, 1943. In 1957 there were 50 baptized members. The pastor was Wallace Jantz. R.L.S.

Pershing Street Mennonite Church (MC), located at "C" and Pershing, Hutchinson, Kan., a member of the South Central Conference, is an outgrowth of missionary efforts started in 1931 by the Yoder and West Liberty Mennonite congregations. It was organized as a church on Aug. 7, 1937, with 41 charter members, under the name Hutchinson Mission Mennonite Church. In 1933 a basement was built in which services were held. In 1942 the present frame structure was built. Lay leaders who were prominent in congregational growth are Alf B. Miller, Paul Roupp, and Daniel J. and Susie Headings. The minister who helped in its beginning was Joe F. Brunk. Harry A. Diener and J. G. Hartzler served as bishops. Sanford E. King has been pastor since 1943. The membership in 1958 was 85. Only a few of these are converts of the mission; the majority are of Mennonite background who have made their homes in and around the city. S.E.K.

Persijn, an old Dutch family that can be traced back to 1080. Hippolytus Persijn became known as an enemy of the Mennonites. On Feb. 7, 1544, he wrote a report to the Privy Council against the followers of Menno (preserved in the state archives at Brussels). In a trial presided over by Hippolytus Persijn in 1554 Frans de Cuiper (q.v.) recanted his Mennonite convictions. On Jan. 10, 1553, Hippolytus Persijn issued a proclamation against the Mennonites, which gives expression to his fear that the followers of Menno were more numerous than commonly supposed. In 1565 he again urged the severe persecution of the Mennonites. He died on Dec. 3, 1568, at Utrecht.

Hippolytus Persijn was a zealous Roman Catholic, as were other members of this family during the 16th century. Duke Alba (q.v.), during his stay in Amsterdam, was the guest of the patrician merchant Jan Persijn; but his brother Pieter Persijn, who favored the Mennonites and was probably a member of the church, was seized on Nov. 27, 1567, on the order of the infamous Blood Council with 37 brethren and put to death without trial in Amsterdam in April 1568, and his property confiscated. It is not known when the family joined the Mennonites. The marriage of Jan Poppesz Persijn with Tettje Bouwens, a granddaughter of the indefatigable Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), on Dec. 11, 1728, shows a close connection. Poppe Jansz Persijn, the son of Jan

Poppesz and Teltje Bouwens, owned a roofing-tile factory at Harlingen, Friesland. Their son Jan Persijn (q.v.) was a Mennonite pastor. Others were deacons, as for example his son Jan Hendrik Persijn (1824-1910), an architect, who was a cofounder of the Arnhem congregation and its deacon-treasurer for more than 25 years. Through other marriages the Persijns are related to many well-known Mennonite families. (ML III, 350.) J.H.P.

Persijn, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, b. Aug. 19, 1787, at Harlingen, studied at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam 1807-12. He accepted the pulpit at Hindeloopen in 1813, and was then called to the Mennonite congregation in De Rijp (q.v.) in North Holland in 1816. He preached here nearly forty years, retiring in 1855. He preached the dedicatory sermon in 1864, when the church was remodeled, using as his text Psalm 84:2-5. Persijn was untiring in his efforts for the congregation and did a fruitful work. He died as the result of an accident at Arnhem on May 1, 1861, and was buried in De Rijp. Some of his sermons and other historical works were published; e.g., Een Viertal geschriften betr. de Doopsgez. Gemeente in de Rijp (Hoor, 1857). He was married to M. A. M. Sepp. (ML III, 350 f.) J.H.P.

Persoons, a former Mennonite family of Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland. Lambert Persoon(s) obtained citizenship at Nijmegen on Sept. 9, 1657, but seems to have lived there for a considerable number of years before that. He was a deacon of the Nijmegen Mennonite congregation before 1656, as his brother Gerrit Persoons also seems to have been. Other members of this family are also mentioned as members of the congregation. His co-deacon Jan Godschalks reported that Lambert Persoons died on April 18, 1657, but this cannot be true because he obtained citizenship in September of this year. He may have died in 1658. He and his relatives had moved in from the duchy of Jülich, Germany, probably either from Goch or from Gladbach. The above Gerrit Persoons left the Mennonite church in 1647 and joined the Reformed; in his booklet Vervolg van de Vertooninge des Staets en des handels der Mennoniten (Utrecht, 1663), he tried to convince his former brethren that, although morals were much higher among the Mennonites than among the Reformed, the Mennonite church could not be the true church of Christ because it was divided into various branches. Copies of an earlier book by Gerrit Persoons on the same topic are apparently no longer extant. vDZ.

DB 1874, 13 ff.; 1895, 121; P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdrage tot de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 75.

Perth County, Ont., is significant in Mennonite history because of the westerly part of the Amish settlements in Easthope Township, because of the westerly section of the Old Order Amish of Mornington Township, and because of the Mennonite preaching appointment at a Lehman home in Ellice Township in 1850-65. The Mennonite Church (MC) in Wallace Township was situated also in the upper area of this county. (See also Lehman, East Zorra, Old Order Amish, Wallace.) J.C.F.

Peru Mennonite Church (MC), Milam, W. Va., is a mission church established in 1920. Lloyd O. Hartzler was the pastor of its 24 members in 1958. M.G.

Perwanger, Augustin and Christoph, two barons of Günzlhofen (q.v.) and Vogach in Upper Bavaria, Germany, were beheaded in Munich on Jan. 7, 1528, because they had been baptized as adults. NEFF.

Siegmund Riezler, Geschichte Bayerns III (Gotha, 1889) 811; IV (Gotha, 1899) 193 (in Geschichte der Europäischen Staaten, edited by Heeren et al.); ML III, 351.

Peryne (Petronella) de Corte, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 6, 1573. Peryne, who was arrested when a Mennonite meeting at Antwerp was surprised by the police, confessed that she had often attended such meetings. She had not yet been (re)baptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 118, 121-24, 179; XIV, 90 f. No. 1029.) vDZ.

Pesch, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, since about 1620 living at Utrecht, where many members served as deacons from 1668 until 1875. Originally they were tanners and fur traders, later furriers and bankers. Jacob van Pesch, a deacon, edited Joannes Houbakker's (q.v.) sermons (two volumes, published at Amsterdam in 1730 and 1732). There were also some members of the van Pesch family later at Rotterdam, Haarlem, and Amsterdam. Abraham van Pesch, b. 1806 at Amsterdam, d. at Zutphen on Sept. 10, 1850, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1826-32 and was a minister in the congregations at Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen 1832-34, and Rotterdam 1834-41; he retired for a year because of illness, and then served at Uithuizen 1842-44 and Zutphen 1845-49. He published Het Doopsgezinde Kerkgenootschap gekenmerkt door het streven naar Vrijheid (Rotterdam, 1836). He also copied a large number of the old books and documents of the Rotterdam Mennonite archives; these copies are now in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. vDZ.

H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Utrecht (n.d., 1925); M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 78; DB 1881, 58, 61.

Pestel, Peter, an Anabaptist martyr, a shoemaker, a native of Plauen, Saxony, Germany. In the autumn of 1525 he left his native town and arrived at Linz (q.v.), Austria, at the end of 1529 or in early 1530, where he was won for Anabaptism by Franz Intzinger (q.v.) and baptized with another convert. He married an Anabaptist woman, but she left him when he migrated to Moravia. When persecution became severe in Moravia he returned to his home town. In Hof he was held a prisoner for seven weeks. He was asked to swear that he would not return to the town; he refused, on the ground that swearing is forbidden the Christian. He was nevertheless released. He stayed here only two weeks, in the home of his brother-in-law Balthasar Pintser and continued his way to Schneeberg, where he was employed by Martin Tubler, a shoemaker. Hardly two weeks later, on April 23, 1536, he was arrested and taken to the castle in Zwickau, and on the next day subjected to a cross-examination in the presence of the clergy (Wappler, p. 76). He confessed himself definitely as committed to Anabaptist teaching, and could not be deflected from his faith even by torture; "He would give his life for it." He said he had neither preached nor baptized, but where it was suitable he testified to his faith and reproved "his fellow men of sin"; he vigorously denied that he or his companions had stirred up revolt, conspiracy, or sedition. Then he was given Melancthon's booklet, Verlegung eilicher unchristlicher Artikel Welche die Widderteuffer fürgeben (Wittenberg, about 1536), which had appeared at the same time as the electoral mandate. After reading it he gave the jailer the reply that there was not a true word in the booklet, that he had no fear of the mandate issued against the Anabaptists, for he had committed himself entirely to his heavenly Father. He would stand by this position. This state of affairs was reported to John Frederick (q.v.), Elector of Saxony, who turned the records over to the court in Wittenberg with the request that they pass the sentence. On the next day the sentence was read: Peter Pestel should be executed with the sword because of his heretical views on communion, that in the emblems the body and blood of Christ were not given out, on the person of Christ, that He had not received His flesh from Mary, and on government, that a Christian may not pass sentence as a ruler. The reasons given for the death sentence struck the elector as rather dubious; he could not agree that a man should be put to death merely on account of erroneous religious opinions. But his chancellor Bruck also favored the death penalty, arguing that Peter Pestel should be punished as an obstinate heretic and a violator of the imperial laws. The elector, however, drew up the death sentence himself and sent it to Zwickau, to the effect that Peter Pestel should be executed with the sword, in accord with the edict of Speyer of 1529. In vain the brother of the condemned man, Valentin Pestel of Plauen, and a cousin, Anthonius Pestel, who was the elector's secretary, appealed for modification. The sentence was carried out on June 16, 1536, in Zwickau. NEFF.

Paul Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit (Leipzig, 1908) 70-84; ML III, 351.

Peter: see also Pieter.

Peter, the servant of Peter Planer (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, was executed with his master at Sterzing in the Adige Valley, Austria, in 1532. (Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440.) NEFF.

Peter van den Broecke, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Aug. 18, 1550, at Antwerp, Belgium. Van Braght's account (Mart. Mir. D 128, E 524) that Jan and Pleun died with him is not correct. Jan Lievensz van Gent was executed on August 14, and Pleun, who is called "een Lakenbereider" without the mention of another name, on August 22. Their death is commemorated in the song Een Liedeken van III Vrienden, No. 4 in the Lietboeckken; it begins with the words, "Ick sal met vreuchden singen een Liet." Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 99, E 497) mentions the "three friends" but names only Jan Lievensz. Peter van den Broecke, a baker, was born at Komen (Commines) in Flanders; he later lived in Gent. vDZ.

Offer, 521, the song pp. 521-26; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 390, 393; XIV, 18 f., No. 192.

Peter Bruynen (Peter de Bruyne), a native of Weert, Dutch province of Limburg, an Anabaptist martyr, who was put to death at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 22 (van Braght erroneously Oct. 2), 1551. Four others executed with him were Jan van den Wouwer (van Braght calls him Jan de Oude Kleerkooper), Pleunis van den Hoevele (van Braght, Pleun), Martin du Petitz (not mentioned in van Braght), and Jacob Peeters (van Braght; another brother). Peter Bruynen was unmarried. In prison he wrote two letters of farewell, which are little more than a succession of Scripture verses. Peter was baptized in Weert by Anthonis van Asselroye (Theunis van Hastenrath).

The Groot Offerboek (Haarlem, 1615) relates the trial of Peter, Jan, and Pleun, which is not found in Offer des Heeren or van Braght; all three of the defendants admitted that they had taken part in the breaking of images on the dike at Austruweel, and destroying a cross on the way to Hoboken near Antwerp. This is the only instance of iconoclastic Anabaptism in Holland known to me.

Peter and the four others are the subject of a song which begins with the words, "Tot lof des Vaders, soon, heyligen geest," found in Offer des Heeren and taken over in the Ausbund (No. 10); it is possible that the song, "Ick sal met vreuchden singhen een Liet" (Een liedeken van III Vrienden), found in the Lietboeckken, mentions Peter, Pleun, and Jan. Both hymns are found in Wolkan, Lieder. vDZ.

Offer, 177-86; Historie der Martelaren ofte waerachtige getuygen Jesu Christi (Groot Offerboek) (Haarlem, 1615) 141-47; Mart. Mir. D 128-30, E 498; concerning the matter of image-breaking, Offer, 177 note 1, and 182 note 2; DB 1899, 154 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 405, 415; XIV, 20 f., No. 209; Wolkan, Lieder, 61, 66, 127; ML I, 287.

Peter van Cleve, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter Aelbrechts.

Peter van Coelen (Pieter van Keulen, van Ceulen, or Peter of Cologne) was by 1568 an elder of the Flemish Mennonites. He is known especially for the public disputations he held with the Reformed clergy. Already in 1578 at the disputation at Emden, Germany, when the elders were worsted by the Reformed preachers, he had saved the honor of the Mennonites. In 1587 he held a disputation with Henricus Antonides at Franeker.

Better known is the public disputation held at Leeuwarden in 1596. When Ruardus Acronius (q.v.), the Reformed preacher at Cornjum near Leeuwarden, molested the Mennonites, the States of Friesland ordered a public disputation to be held at the Reformed Galileër Church, in which Acronius and Peter participated and which lasted from August 16 to November 17. In 156 sessions they discussed 11 points set up by the Reformed side (including the Incarnation, the Scriptures, grace, overestimation of human ability, the church). The record (though one-sided) shows that Peter defended his opinions forcefully and with great ability and wide knowledge of the Bible. The only result was an increase in mutual bitterness. The wish of the Reformed synods in the following years to have the Mennonite churches closed is also one of its fruits.

Meanwhile Peter had gone over to the Frisian Mennonites. The Flemish had expelled him because he opposed the strict ban (1589). After the discussion with Acronius he was in Sneek, where he courageously met the violent preacher Bogerman (q.v.) in 1600. A severe edict against the Mennonites resulted. But on the whole the government did not carry it out very rigorously—to the great annoyance of the Calvinists. The date of Peter's death is not known. He died at an advanced age; that he was still active in 1603 is shown by a petition of the Harlingen Reformed Synod to the States of Friesland of that date. vdZ.

BRN VII, 65, 550; DB 1873, 84-88; 1910, 20 f.; 1917, 132; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 431, 445, 447 f.; Menn. Bl., 1851, 28-31; Protocol, dat is de gantsche handelinge des ghesprecks, gehouden tot Leeuwarden (Leeuwarden, 1597); Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 132-37; ML II, 524.

Peter Cornelius van Zurick-Zee: see Plockhoy, Pieter Cornelisz.

Peter Coster: see Pieter Claesz.

Peter (Pieter) Dirks (Dirczn) Snijder, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor, beheaded at The Hague, Holland, on Nov. 6, 1539. He had been (re)baptized by Pieter de Houtzager (q.v.) and in 1533 was living at Amsterdam. In March 1534 he joined the Anabaptists who sailed from there en route to Münster (q.v.), but was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). He was released upon renouncing his faith, but later, "relapsing into his former error," i.e., being again a member of the Anabaptist congregation, he was arrested a second time and put to death. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 219, 745; DB 1917, 103; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 105.) vdZ.

Peter Frerickx, a tailor of Bolsward, Friesland, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded because of Anabaptism on March 17, 1537, with two other Anabaptists at Leeuwarden, the capital of the Dutch province of Friesland. His widow Janneken was drowned at Leeuwarden on Dec. 19, 1537. (DB 1917, 90; Mellink, Wederdopers, 242.) vdZ.

Peter Gael (Pieter Galen), an Anabaptist who after having participated in the revolt and the attack on Amsterdam city hall on May 10-11, 1535, was put to death there in a very cruel way on May 14, 1535. He was typical of revolutionary Anabaptism. His confession contains important information concerning the extent and methods of revolutionary Anabaptism in the Netherlands. He revealed that this group wore a white ribbon on an arm and that they would kill all those not wearing such a ribbon. He also stated that Jacob van Campen, the Anabaptist bishop of Amsterdam, did not agree with their practices and intentions. Peter Gael had been (re)baptized by Claes van Limmen, who is said to have been at Münster during Peter's trial. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 59-64; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.) vdZ.

Peter van Gheyn (Geyn), an Anabaptist elder in Cologne, Germany, who baptized the martyr Hans van Collen (q.v.) (Coelen) there in 1534. Nothing else is known about him. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 132.) vdZ.

Peter von Gmunden: see Riedemann, Peter.

Peter the Great, Czar of Russia 1682-1725, spent some time in the Netherlands in 1697-98 and returned for a visit in 1717. He had learned to know Dutch business people in Russia and through these contacts he came to the Netherlands. During his stay in Holland he spent about a week in Zaandam to learn shipbuilding. After this he went to Amsterdam to study the same trade on the docks of the East India Company. Naturally his interest went far beyond the shipbuilding industry.

During his stay in the Netherlands Peter must also have established contacts with the Mennonites. Boris Rapchinsky reports that Peter invited among others the Mennonites Jan and Nicolaas van der Heyden, the inventors of fire engines, to come to Russia; they declined (Rapchinsky, 126). Nicolaas Bidloo (q.v.), a Mennonite physician of Amsterdam, accepted such an invitation and became Peter's personal physician and the founder and professor of the first medical school in Moscow.

During his second visit at Zaandam in 1717 Peter is supposed to have been the guest of Claas No(o)-men, a Mennonite preacher. When Peter expressed his interest in attending a Mennonite worship service, Nomen took him to church and presented to him "the essence of all admonitions" in the words, "think well, speak well, do well" (Denkt wel, spreekt wel, doet wel). Impressed by this pointed admonition Peter is said to have turned to his Russian priest with the admonition to do likewise. There is, however, a vast number of stories in circulation about Peter the Great's stay and experience in the Netherlands; therefore it may be hard to ascertain whether this incident actually took place. Zaandam has made a monument of the little house in which Peter spent about a week. Of his much longer stay in Amsterdam there seem to be few traces of this nature. C.K.

Boris Rapchinsky, Peter de Groote in Holland in 1697-98 (Amsterdam, 1925); Menn. Bl., February 1908, 11; June 1911, 44-45; ML III, 124, 352.

Peter auf den Heuren, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Rheydt (q.v.), Germany, in 1584. (Der Mennonit IX, 1956, p. 123.)

Peter Janssen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter Jansz.

Peter Kueper, from Sneek, Dutch province of Friesland, joined the Anabaptists and moved to Münster (q.v.), where he seems to have played a rather important part in the "kingdom" of Jan van Leyden (q.v.). In October 1534 he was one of the "apostles" Jan van Leyden sent out to various Westphalian towns to propagate the views of the "kingdom."

Peter Kueper together with Dionysius Vinne (q.v.) and four others went to Osnabrück, where they were apprehended and put to death. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 48, 245.)
vdZ.

Peter von der Lippe, an Anabaptist living in Westphalia, Germany, was an adherent of David Joris (q.v.), and even after 1546 traveled about propagating the ideas of his leader; he also visited David Joris, who was then living at Basel. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 101.)
vdZ.

Peter Metselaer, an Anabaptist martyr: see Peter Witses.

Peter van Norg (Noerich, also Orck; official name, Gerd't Eike(l)man) was a leading revolutionary agitator in the Netherlands and adjoining parts of Germany, being a follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). Originally he lived at Deventer, Holland. By trade he was a glazier. He can hardly be listed among the Anabaptists, for after 1536 he was nothing but an ordinary bandit. He was burned at the stake on April 30, 1544, at Münster, Westphalia. (DB 1917, 141; 1919, 18, 22; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.)
vdZ.

Peter (Pieter) van Olmen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 27, 1552, at Gent, Belgium. The Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, give no information on the manner of Peter van Olmen's execution or the exact date. There is not much information about this martyr; he seems to have lived earlier in Wervik, Flanders, and hence was also called Peter van Wervick. In prison he wrote a letter to his brethren with admonitions to steadfastness, in which he describes his defense of the faith before the examining theologians. This letter is found in all the Dutch martyrbooks. He was commemorated in a song, "Groot zijn des Heeren crachten" (Great is the power of the Lord), found in the Offer des Heeren. The Lietboeckken has the "Liet van vrage ende antwoort" (Song of Question and Answer), which is there ascribed to Peter van Wervick. This hymn, which begins with the words, "Een eeuwige vruecht, die niet en vergaet" (An eternal joy, which does not pass away), is included in the Dutch hymnal Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and following editions (reprinted in Wackernagel, Lieder), while a large number of old Dutch Mennonite hymnals contain only the first part of this hymn, which is of much higher literary quality than the last stanzas, probably composed by another poet. HEGE, vdZ.

Offer, 187-94, 594-600; Mart. Mir. D 147-49, E 536-38; Verheyden, Gent, 18, No. 34; Wolkan, Lieder, 64, 66, 78, 84; Wackernagel, Lieder, 195, No. 99; ML III, 300.

Peter Scheymaker, a Dutch Anabaptist from Baambrugge, province of Utrecht, was in November 1533 one of the twelve "apostles" sent forth by Jan Matthijsz (q.v.) of Haarlem. He is identical with Pieter Boekebinder, who is said to have preached "everywhere in Brabant and Münster." There is no further information on him. (DB 1917, 98, 103.)
vdZ.

Peter Schoenmaker, of Dremmen, a Dutch Anabaptist, who had moved to Münster (q.v.), Westphalia, in 1533. In the next year Peter was among the emissaries sent out by Jan van Leyden (q.v.) to propagate the ideas of revolutionary Anabaptism. In December 1534 he went to Weel, Germany, then to the duchy of Jülich and the bishopric of Liège, where all trace of him is lost. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 28 f., 52, 370.)
vdZ.

Peter Simons (Peeter Symonsz) of Tirns, Dutch province of Friesland, was a follower of Melchior Hofmann and an Anabaptist preacher, against whom the Frisian government issued a decree in 1534. In the spring of 1534 he joined the revolutionary Anabaptists and went to Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, where he was married to Aeffgen Lystynx (q.v.) and occupied a high rank, becoming major-domo of "queen" Divara, the wife of Jan van Leyden. In early 1535 he returned to the Netherlands. Vos thought he returned as a companion of Jan van Geelen (q.v.) to distribute the booklet Van der Wraecke and to rouse the Dutch Anabaptists. In March 1535 (according to Vos) he was in the Anabaptist group who stormed the Oldeklooster (Old Cloister) near Bolsward in Friesland, and was killed in the battle when the stadholder of Friesland reconquered it. Mellink is of the opinion that Peter Simons made a journey from Münster to the Netherlands in 1534 and again left Münster in March 1535, but that it is not certain that Peter was killed in the Oldeklooster battle, since all trace of him was lost when he left Münster.

Vos thought this Peter Simons was a brother of Menno Simons, but Kühler is of the opinion that the information of Gellius Faber that "a brother of Menno Simons was killed in the Oldeklooster battle" without further information is unacceptable. Besides this, it is not sure, as Mellink states, and to my opinion even unlikely, that the fanatical Peter Simons was the brother of Menno Simons, for this Peter Simons is said to have been a native of Tirns, whereas a brother of Menno would have been a native of Wiumarsum.
vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 2 note 1, and passim; DB 1917, 116, Nos. 62; W. J. Kühler in De Zondagsbode of Feb. 26, 1928; idem, Geschiedenis I, 149, 159; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Peter of Spain (Pedro de Soza, Dutch; Peter van Spagnien, official name), an Anabaptist martyr, who was won to the Anabaptist faith by a brother from Amsterdam, Jakob Jansz Ruytenbergh, a merchant whom he had met in Spain. He was baptized in Antwerp, Belgium, and received into the congregation. When he was about to return to Spain to his wife and children he was arrested, and after a valiant confession of his faith was drowned in a tub at Antwerp on Feb. 1, 1560, with two brothers, Gomer de Clercq and Jacob Schot. With many other Anabaptist victims executed at Antwerp, he is commemorated in the song, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader," found in the Lietboeckken. NEFF, vdZ.

Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 640; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 6, 11; XIV, 28 f., No. 310; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML III, 352.

Peter Vrancken (Vrencken), an Anabaptist martyr, a brother-in-law of the martyr Metken (q.v.). In her trial Metken related that Peter had been beheaded at Born, duchy of Jülich, Germany, but did not give the date of his execution. Though the exact date is therefore not known, it must have happened before 1547, when Metken was put to death. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 326, 398.

Peter van Wervick, an Anabaptist martyr: see Peter van Olmen.

Peter Witses (Wytses, Wietjes, Wiettiezoen), also called Peter (de) Metselaer, an Anabaptist martyr, a mason by trade, was put to death on April 13, 1533, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland. During his trial he frankly admitted that he had received baptism on his faith in 1551. In his cross-examination he gave appropriate Biblically grounded answers. To his friends he wrote that they should properly teach simple young souls in the difference in the communion and provide for their own families. "Pray and watch, the times are perilous; and do not forget us in your prayers, and visit us sometimes, it is very edifying." His short letter to his wife is touching: "Abide in God, and mingle not with the wicked; for if the righteous draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him, says the Lord. The time of my departure seems to be nigh, may it take place with God. When the hour of parting comes, fear not, but guard your lips. My dear wife, abide in the grace of God given you." He is commemorated in the hymn, "Kermen is ter werlt en geclach, Druck coemt van alle zijden" (There is much moaning and lamenting in the world; persecution comes from all sides), which is found in the Lietboeckken. (Offer, 437-42; Mart. Mir. D 159, E 548 f.; ML III, 118.) NEFF.

Peters (Pieters), a Mennonite family in West Prussia, Germany, found there from about 1580 and probably of Dutch-Frisian descent. Many members of this family served as deacons and preachers in various West Prussian Mennonite congregations, especially those of Danzig, Montau, Ladekopp. The Dutch Naamlijst names Hendrik Pieters (Peeters) as the elder of the Frisian (Waterlander) congregation in the Elbing Werder 1726-c55, and Isaack Peters as preacher in Tiegengagen 1746-93.

The Peters family furnished a number of prominent leaders in the Molotschna settlement in South Russia. Among these were Abraham Peters (q.v.), an M.B. leader who founded the M.B. settlement in the Kuban in 1863; Abraham Peters (q.v.) of Fürstenau, who led a group to Turkestan in 1880; Hermann Peters (q.v.), the founder of the Peters group called "Brotbrecher"; Bernhard Peters (q.v., 1855-1921), elder at Schönsee; and Isaak Peters (q.v.).

In North America in 1957 there were 26 Mennonite ministers bearing the name Peters, distributed as follows: G.C.M.—12: in Kansas 2, Montana 1, Mississippi 1, Manitoba 4, British Columbia 2, Ontario 1, Saskatchewan 1; M.B.—8: Manitoba 6, British Columbia 1, California 1; Old Colony in Mexico—3; C.G.C.—2: Michigan and Florida. Among these should be mentioned Frank C. Peters (MB), formerly president of Tabor College and now a teacher in the M.B. Bible College in Winnipeg, G. W. Peters, former dean of the M.B. Biblical Seminary in Fresno, Cal., and G. H. Peters, former principal of the Mennonite Collegiate Institute at Gretna, Man. vdZ.

Peters: see also Pietersz.

Peters, Abraham, of Ladekopp (q.v.) in the Molotschna (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in South Russia, a member of the Petershagen (q.v.) congregation, joined the Mennonite Brethren at the founding of that branch, and was chosen deacon. In 1863 he migrated with other Mennonite Brethren to the Kuban (q.v.). Here he took an active part in the life of the congregation, serving as Alt-Diakon in the church council in directing the spiritual affairs of the congregation. In 1877-78 the congregation built a new large church and secondary school (Fortbildungsschule) in one building. The school was founded by a board headed by Abraham Peters, who was vigorously interested in the work, and was maintained for several years, until it was united with the settlement school at Wohldemfürst (Velikoknyazhesk) in 1881. (Friesen, Bruderschaft, 422; ML III, 353.) A.B.

Peters, Abraham, a minister of the Ohrloff-Neukirch Mennonite Church, Molotschna, Russia, and the leader of a settlement in Aulie-Ata (q.v.). Peters was a teacher and was chosen to the ministry in 1873. Under the impact of a revival which swept the Mennonite settlements, the writings of Jung-Stilling, and the introduction of compulsory military service, he—like Claasz Epp (q.v.), who led the settlement in Ak-Mechet (q.v.)—became the leader of several dozen Molotschna Mennonite families who went to Central Asia in 1880 to seek a refuge from the Tribulation, which they thought was at hand. Peters hoped to secure his ordination as elder at Trakt but failed. Upon arrival at Tashkent his group and Epp's negotiated regarding settlement, the Molotschna group choosing Aulie-Ata. The existence of the two settlements in Central Asia was probably due to rivalry between the two leaders. Ultimately the spirit of Peters predominated. Peters became elder of the Romanovka Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1884, and was succeeded by Johann Regier (q.v.). In 1910 Aulie-Ata had a population of c1,000, which included also a small M.B. group. C.K.

Friese, Bruderschaft, 409, 480 ff.; Franz Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittelasien (North Kildonan, 1948) pp. 40 ff.; ML III, 353.

Peters, Bernhard (1816-1912), an elder of the Margenau-Schönsee (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in the Molotschna settlement, South Russia, was born at Vierzehnhuben, West Prussia. He married Agatha Wiens in 1846, and had a family of 8 sons and 4 daughters. Peters became minister of the Margenau-Schönsee congregation in 1850 and elder in 1861. He was a member of the "Molotschnaer Kirchenkonvent" and as such was sent twice during the 1870's to St. Petersburg in matters relating to military service for Mennonites. In contrast to most preachers of his day, Peters prepared his sermons himself instead of reading them from a book. He died at the age of 96 at Liebenau, Molotschna. His son Abram Peters, a minister of the Mennonite Brethren Church, now (1951) 92 years old, is living in Winnipeg, Man.

H.G.

D. H. Epp, "Unser Schmerzensblatt, 1912," Menn. Jahrbuch 1911-12 (Berdiansk) 139.

Peters, Heinrich (1855-1921), an elder of the Schönsee congregation in the Molotschna settlement of South Russia, was born in 1855 at Gnadenheim, Molotschna, the sixth of the twelve children of Bernhard Peters, elder of the Margenau-Schönsee congregation and his wife Agatha Wiens. In 1879 Peters married Maria Sawatzky; their family consisted of ten children. In 1885 Heinrich Peters was elected minister; in 1903, when the Schönsee congregation became independent, he was ordained its first elder. A great earnestness and devotion to his task characterized his personality and his work. He died in February 1921 during the typhoid epidemic. H.G.

Peters, Hermann (1841-1928), founder and elder of the Apostolische Brüdergemeinde (q.v.), was born in Gnadenheim, Molotschna, Russia. He joined the Mennonite Brethren c1860 and was apparently among those who expressed their newly found joy of salvation through shouts and the use of musical instruments and in some legalistic forms of piety. When the Mennonite Brethren disapproved of this wing, Peters went his own way. For some time his followers were known as Herman Peters-Brüder. Originally they insisted that since Christ "took the bread and broke it," Christians should always do the same; for this reason they were nicknamed "Brotbrecher."

After this new group, consisting of some 20 families, was organized in 1865-66 in the Molotschna, Peters moved with them to the Crimea, where other Mennonites joined them. In 1900-1 he took the group to Siberia, settling northeast of Omsk near Kiryanovka and Trussovka. Here the group became prosperous and lost some of its narrow views. Common names among them were Peters, Becker, Penner, Unruh, Martens, Voth, and Wedel. Peters died Feb. 10, 1928, and was succeeded as elder by H. J. Warkentin. A small group of Hermann Peters' followers came to America in 1874 and still exists as the Fairview (Okla.) Church of God (q.v.).

Other tenets emphasized by Hermann Peters were the refusal to accept any form of government service, extreme separation from the world and all other Mennonite groups, rejection of all innovations, refusal to observe holidays, prohibition of photographs, and maintenance of simplicity. In general, their original attitude was very much like that of the first Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) or the Old Order Amish.

C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 236, 293, 378, 381, 393; J. J. Hildebrand, Aus der Vorgeschichte der Einwanderung . . . (Winnipeg, 1949) 78; idem, Sibirien . . . (Winnipeg, 1942) 53, 96.

Peters, Isaak (1826-1911), a Mennonite teacher at Fürstenau, Molotschna, and preacher (ordained 1866) and elder (1867) in the Pordenau (q.v.) congregation, was born Dec. 1, 1826, at Pordenau, the fifth child of Jacob Peters and Sarah Toews. He was married on Dec. 11, 1849, to Anna Steingardt. P. M. Friesen, who was his pupil, describes him as a "stern and ironclad 'old Mennonite' in all questions of teaching and doctrine relating to society and the state, but also a man who realizes the value of a book, especially of historical and theological works, and is an authority on Mennonite history whose equal we have not yet met." As the elder of the Pordenau congregation "he preached penitence and exercised church discipline in the strictest Mennonite sense." He knew "what a new spiritual life through repentance and the new birth is, and recognized all the evangelical means to that end: live preaching, indoctrination of youth, study of the Bible, and congregational prayer meetings." His strict and rigorous requirements led to a division in the congregation; with his followers he had to withdraw and shortly before his emigration he was expelled from the congregation. He had become a teacher in Fürstenau in 1850.

Isaak Peters was a vigorous opponent of baptism by immersion. The Bible, he asserted, speaks of three kinds of baptism: water baptism, spirit baptism, and blood baptism. Water and spirit baptism belong together. He who has received water baptism without spirit baptism has not yet any part in the blood baptism of Jesus, which alone can save, according to I John 1:7. John the Baptist also said: "I baptize you with water," not in water. Likewise Peters rejected the doctrine of the millennium. He held fast to the doctrine of nonresistance and thus became a leader in the emigration of the 1870's. Because of his open advocacy of emigration he was expelled from the country by the government.

In January 1874 he moved to America, settling near Henderson, Neb. There he and a small group of the Pordenau congregation joined the Bethesda Mennonite Church, which chose him as elder. Since he was unable to carry out the way of life he thought necessary, which included stricter requirements for a separated life as evidence of regeneration, he withdrew from Bethesda with a minority of the congregation in 1880. This was the origin of the Ebenezer Mennonite Church in Henderson, organized in 1882, which, together with the Bruder-taler Church of Mountain Lake, Minn., in 1889 formed a new branch of the Mennonites, known at first as the Conference of the United Mennonite Brethren of North America, then as the Defenseless Mennonite Brethren in Christ of North America, and since 1937 as the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. Isaak Peters was a leader in this move and in the E.M.B. church until he was compelled by ill health to withdraw from active work. He was elder at Ebenezer until 1892.

Peters was a competent writer, and wrote for a number of Mennonite periodicals. He was well versed in the writings of Menno Simons and other older Mennonite writers. Among his literary products are the translation of Georg Hansen's Ein Fundamentbuch der christlichen Lehre from the original Dutch into German (335 pp.) (Elkhart, 1893). He wrote Eine Beleuchtung der Schriften Menno's, a pamphlet of 40 pages; Die Christliche Wassertaufe, of 16 pages, and Die Auferstehung, 9 pages, all printed at Elkhart. H.F.E.

Friesen, Brüderschaft II, 73 et passim; A Historical Sketch of the Churches of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (Rosthern, 1939); Jacob Epp, "Aeltester Isaak Peters," Bundesbote-Kalender, 1912, p. 26; ML III, 353 f.

Peters, Peter: see Pietersz, Pieter (de Oude).

Peters, Rhode, listed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror as one of seven Swiss Brethren teachers (preachers) and elders imprisoned in the penitentiary at Bern, Switzerland, in 1659. Samuel Geiser, however, lists eleven, but does not name Rhode Peters. Is he perhaps identical with "Peter Friedle (Frider) von Biglen" found in the Geiser list, and also in Ernst Müller's list of those banished in 1660? The matter awaits clarification (see Himmelberg, Anthoni).

vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 826, E 1124; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 395, 399; Müller, Berner Täufer, 179 f., 191.

Petersberg, a castle and village in Tirol, Austria, in the Inn Valley between Imst and Stams, is frequently mentioned in the beginnings of the Anabaptist movement. On Dec. 23, 1527, the government issued to the judge Hans Erlbacher the commission to search for the refugee Anabaptist "seducers" who had fled from southern Tirol to this locality. On April 2, 1528, he was ordered to look for several Anabaptists "who are said to have secretly gone to the jurisdiction of St. Petersberg." The clerk of Innsbruck, Erasmus Oberhauser, was ordered on April 4 to seize Peter Beck and his one-eyed sister who had fled from Hall, and Lorenz Aufleger, who were secretly preaching to the people in Hertenberg, Stams, and Petersberg. On April 7 instructions were issued to Erlbacher to inquire about the persons baptized by Jörg Fasser (q.v.) and deal with them according to the articles of Kitzbühel (q.v.), burn down the houses in which communion and meetings of this misleading sect were held unless other houses would be endangered by the fire, and in that case to confiscate them, impress upon the ferryman on the Inn to transfer no suspicious persons.

In June the government commanded the baroness of Frundsberg to remove from his post the above clerk because he was a renegade and married Lutheran priest who tolerated the Anabaptists; in July the orders were given to remove him within two months. But he was still there in 1529, and on March 19 even received government orders to cross-examine a woman named Venklehnerin, who was being held in Hertenberg, and especially to find out where and by whom she had been baptized. Meanwhile the clerk had himself arrested several Anabaptists, and was ordered by the Innsbruck authorities on May 19, 1529, to question them closely. In autumn a new clerk is found in Petersberg, Ulrich Runger, who received a directive on September 7 to release the penitent and pregnant Anabaptist Susanna Kobel, to promise her fugitive relatives freedom if they would present themselves penitently at the prison.

Several Anabaptists from the Oetzthal were imprisoned in Petersberg, and cross-examined by the clerk on Oct. 26 and 27, 1529. The government ordered him on November 9 to question several—like Porst and Kneussl—on several points, on the rack if necessary. An order dated November 19 reveals that seven men were on trial, who seemed inclined to recant. A fugitive Anabaptist, who however returned penitently, Hans Gabel, was to be pardoned in accord with the order of November 24 if he would betray where the others who had escaped with him had gone.

On December 7 and 13 instructions were issued by Innsbruck to pardon Jörg Köberl and Andre Kolb on certain conditions after a recent thorough investigation in which they expressed penitence, which should be tested by a priest. In April 1530 there were still some Anabaptists in prison in Petersberg, whom the government ordered the clerk on April 26 to examine on the rack. On May 3 the command came to bring to the criminal court Mayerl-Fröner (see Mayrl, Hans) as a "leader and baptizer of this sect," and others who had abused their pardon.

On June 4 the further order was issued by Innsbruck that in case Fröner repented before his execution he should be given the sacrament and his body buried in consecrated earth. This indicates that the two executions reported in the chronicles for 1529 in Petersberg probably took place in 1530. In May 1531 there were again some Anabaptists on trial, likewise in 1537 and 1544. In 1545 several persons went to Moravia from Petersberg. P.De.

Kopialbuch Causa Domini in the Innsbruck National archives, II, fol. 106, 204, 213, 214, 239, 248, 250, 355, 410, 533, 536, 537, 548, 553; III, fol. 89, 91, 92, 105, 211; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; J. Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML III, 354 f.

Peterschivka: see Petersdorf.

Peterschmidt (Peterschmitt), a Mennonite family name of frequent occurrence in Alsace (q.v.), but also found in the Palatinate and Baden. It is found in the congregations of Colmar (q.v.), Wolfganzen, and Neuf-Brisach, as well as in Pulversheim (q.v.), and recently in Le Hang (q.v.). As early as 1822 a letter sent to the Birkenhof (q.v.) congregation by Colmar (q.v.) was signed by Sebastian Peterschmitt. J. Peterschmitt, of Rheinfelderhof near Fessenheim, was one of the two representatives (the other being Pelsy, q.v., of Alsace) in the Conference of South German Mennonites (q.v.) in 1912. When communications with the South German Conference declined after World War I and those with France expanded, Elder Benjamin Peterschmitt of Colmar became a member of the conjoint conference. Jean Peterschmitt is the elder of the Neuf-Brisach congregation, Eugene Peterschmitt a minister, and Emil Peterschmitt deacon. Willi Peterschmitt, of Munzenheim, serves as traveling evangelist for the French Mennonite Conference. (ML III, 355.) E.C.

Petersdorf, a village in the Nikolaipol (q.v.) district of the province of Ekaterinoslav (q.v.), founded about 1833, was the seat of a Mennonite Brethren congregation, which was a subsidiary of the Einlage (q.v.) congregation. Petersdorf was later called Petershivka or Nadeshdovka. About 35 years later the Mennonite settlement of Yazykovo (q.v.) was established in the same district. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 701, 721; ML III, 353.) E.C.

Petershagen, a part of the Tiegenhagen (q.v.) congregation in West Prussia, Germany. There the Mennonites of the Gross-Werder were in 1768 required to build a Catholic chapel on the Moskenberg and maintain it for all time in return for the permission granted by the Bishop of Culm (who in the name of the king of Poland exercised ecclesiastical sovereignty) for the erection of their own chapels in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, and Heubuden. The newly built Catholic chapel was burned down by lightning in 1788 and was not rebuilt. The obligation was met with a gift of money. (See Fürstenwerder; ML III, 355.) M.K.L.

Petershagen, a Mennonite village name transplanted from Prussia to the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine (see Villages). C.K.

Petershagen. Besides the village of Petershagen in West Prussia (ML III, 355) and Petershagen on the Molotschna (loc. cit.), there was also a Mennonite congregation in Petershagen on the Weser in the principality of Minden, Germany. This congregation is found in the Dutch Naamlijst 1766-1810. The congregation is said to have been founded by emigrant Swiss Mennonites. Petrus Staal (Peter Stähli?) was its preacher; the year of his ordination is not stated. Particulars are not known. vDZ.

Petiscus: see Pitiscus.

Petjanga'an and Ngeling, a Mennonite congregation on the Indonesian island of Java, formerly a mission station of the Dutch Mennonite Mission association. It contains the villages of Petjanga'an, Ngeling, and Pendo. In 1953 it numbered 84 baptized members and 100 children. The preachers are (1955) I. S. Siswojo since 1941 and Surant Themotheus since 1949. vDZ.

Petoskey (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC) is a mission congregation established in 1950 under the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board. In 1957 it had 53 members, with Ivan K. Weaver as bishop. I.K.W.

Petri, Cunerus, from Brouwershaven, Dutch province of Zeeland, was a Catholic priest of Saint Peter's Church at Louvain, Belgium, and in 1570-78 a bishop at Leeuwarden, Friesland. He died in 1580 at Cologne, Germany. He published Den Schilt teghen die Wederdoopers . . . bysonder die Mennonisten (Leuven, 1568). This very prejudiced writing contains no important information, but on the contrary many great errors. For example, Menno Simons is said to have been a schoolteacher. As bishop in Leeuwarden he persistently persecuted the Mennonites; Reytsse Aysesz (q.v.), executed in 1574, was a victim of his fanaticism. vDZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 152-70, 178.

Petronella, an Anabaptist martyr, the wife of a baker of Holdenstedt, a village near Sangershausen in Thuringia, Germany, who was seized with Hans Höhne (q.v.) at Halberstadt in September 1535 and drowned in the Bode at Groningen in October 1535. (Wappler, 133 ff.; ML III, 356.) NEFF.

Petrovka, a Mennonite settlement in Russia, a part of the group of villages called Naumenko in the province of Kharkov, Ukraine, had joined the Mennonite Brethren of Einlage (Kitchkas), the home of their founders, as a subsidiary. In Petrovka and Barvenkovo the settlement had churches. Inadequate connections with the mother church, sharp conflicts with the higher and lower authorities as well as with the Mennonite Church group, combined with economic decline had at times an unfavorable effect on the religious and the intellectual life of this settlement. (See Kharkov; Friesen, Brüderschaft I, 450 f.; ML III, 356.) M.K.L.

Petter Memorial Mennonite Church (GCM), formerly called the Lame Deer Mennonite Mission Church, is located in the Lame Deer Valley, Rosebud Co., Mont., on the Tongue River Indian Reservation, the home of the Northern Cheyenne Indians. The church was built in 1908 by P. A. Kliever, who carried on the work from Busby until 1910. Other workers were Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wiebe 1911-15, Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Neufeld 1915-16, Mr. and Mrs. Rodolphe Petter (q.v.) 1916-47, and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Habegger (d. 1956), who assisted from Busby from 1946, then moved to Lame Deer in 1949. Mrs. Petter continued to help in the work after her retirement. Petter died on Jan. 6, 1947, having served 25 years among the Southern Cheyennes and 30 years among the Northern Cheyennes. Native pastors of this church have been Frank Littlewolf and Milton Whiteman (d. 1958). Over 235 have been baptized since the beginning of the work, with a membership of about 75 in 1947. Both the Cheyenne and English languages are used in the work here. Mr. and Mrs. Donavin Diller have been missionaries at Lame Deer since March 1957. A.H.

Petter, Rodolphe Charles (1865-1947), a missionary (GCM) to the Cheyenne Indians in Oklahoma and Montana, was born Feb. 19, 1865, at Vevey on Lake Geneva, Switzerland, the son of Louis Petter. He attended the local and other schools and the Basel Missionsschule (1883-89). While in military training he became acquainted with a Mennonite, Samuel Gerber, visited the Jura Mountain Mennonites, and heard about the mission interest of the Mennonites in America. J. A. Sprunger (q.v.), of Berne, Ind., who was on a tour of the Swiss Mennonite churches, suggested that he consider work among the American Indians. On May 14, 1890, he married Marie Gerber. On August 7 they landed in New York to become missionaries to the Cheyenne Indians under the mission board of the General Conference Mennonite Church. They spent the year 1890-91 at Oberlin College, Ohio, and in 1891 began their work at Cantonment, Okla. After his first wife's death he married Bertha Elise Kinsinger of Trenton, Ohio, Nov. 28, 1911, who was also a missionary to the Cheyennes. In 1916 the Petters took over the Cheyenne mission field at Lame Deer, Mont., where they were active until his death on Jan. 6, 1947.

Petter was one of the most outstanding missionaries and linguists working among American Indians. He created a dictionary of the Cheyenne Indian language (see bibliography), reduced the Cheyenne language to writing, produced a grammar, and translated Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, portions of the Old Testament, and the entire New Testament. He became a nationally known ethnologist, and his numerous works are found in all leading libraries in this field. His reports about his mission work were published primarily in Christlicher Bundesbote and The Mennonite. The Rodolphe Petter Collection is on display in the Bethel College Historical Library.

C.K.

Books by Petter: English-Cheyenne Dictionary, published by the author and printed on the Gammeter Multigraph (1915) pp. 1126; Cheyenne Grammar (Newton, 1952) pp. 70; Einiges aus meinen Missionserfahrungen in den vergangenen Jahren (n.d.) pp. 72; Reminiscences of the Past Years in Mission Service Among the Cheyenne (n.d.) pp. 79; Hosz Maheo Heeszistoz (Portions of the Old and the New Testaments), translated and arranged by Rodolphe Petter (Cantonment, 1913) pp. 145; Maheo Henitae-Histanovestoz Zeoxtoese-Hesetovaoomohetoz' Vovoe-Histanova na Maheonoxtoenoe-Manhastova (Literal and Paraphrastic Translations from the Old Testament Together with Their New Testament Connections) (Lame Deer, 1926) pp. 282; Zemona Hoemao Maheon-Hoestomohestova . . . (The New Testament in Cheyenne), translated by Rodolphe Petter (American Bible Society, New York, 1934) pp. 666; Nivova-Pavhosto (The Four Gospels), translated by Rodolphe Petter (Lame Deer, 1928) pp. 273; Zesenemeoxtoz (Cheyenne Hymns) (Lame Deer, 1942), at least seven editions, pp. 40; Assetosemeheo Heamoxovistavatoz ("The Pilgrim's Progress" and Some Bible Portions), Printed for the Interest of the Mennonite Mission Among the Cheyenne Indians (Cantonment, 1904) p. 264; Zistxuisto or Cheyenne Reading Book (Quakertown, Pa., 1895) pp. 36.

Books and Articles About Petter: Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) 191; Mrs. Rodolphe Petter, "Kurze Lebensgeschichte Dr. Rodolphe Charles Petter," Christlicher Bundesbote, April 1, 1947, 10; Rodolphe Charles Petter, "How I Became a Missionary," Mennonite Life X (January 1955) 4-13; D. J. Unruh, "Rodolphe Petter, Absent from the Body, Present with the Lord," The Mennonite, January 1947, 5; "Nachruf des Dr. Rodolphe Petter, Apostel der Cheyennen Indianer" in Bundesbote Kalender, 1947, 1-32.

Pettisville Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located north of Pettisville, Fulton Co., Ohio, was organized in 1863. The present building with a seating capacity of 150 was erected in 1909; until then the services had been conducted in the homes. M. Seiler, born in Switzerland, was the first minister, followed by Christian Gearig and Peter Eicher, both of whom were ordained in 1872. The ministry is unsalaried. In 1957 the church had a membership of 24, with C. L. Gearig as minister.

C.L.G.

Petz, Hans, an Anabaptist preacher and poet: see Betz, Hans.

Petz, Margarethe, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake with four other Anabaptists at Bamberg, Germany, on Jan. 30, 1528. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML III, 356.

Peutler, Siegmund, one of six Anabaptist martyrs who were put to death in Steyr, Austria, on March 30, 1528 (see Penzenauer and Austria).

Peyzel, Conrad, founder of the Ephrata (q.v.) cloister: see Beissel, Johann Konrad.

Pfalz-Zweibrücken, a duchy in Germany covering scarcely twenty square miles, which lay for the most part in the south and west (not in one block) of the district that later became the Palatinate left of the Rhine; its principal towns were Bergzabern, Zweibrücken, Meisenheim, and Kusel. It also included lesser districts in the Rhine Province, a part of which were, however, made independent in the 16th century, and known as Veldenz. Duke Louis II, who was quite young in the early days of the Reformation, was influenced by his tutors Johann Bader (q.v.) and Johann Huttich in favor of the new doctrine. But he was never able to take a positive position or pass decisive measures, even though he was inwardly, in spite of many doubts, favorably inclined toward the Reformation and was supported in this respect by his wife, Elisabeth of Hesse. At the time of his premature death (1532) his son Wolfgang was only six years old. Under his reign, administered by Ruprecht, the brother of the deceased duke, together with the widow, the Reformation was put through. The twelve articles drawn up in 1533 by Johann Schwebel by order of Ruprecht, regulating ecclesiastical affairs in accord with the principles of the Reformation, gradually acquired the status of a church constitution in the entire country. In the education of the young Count Palatine Schwebel exerted a similar influence by having his countryman Caspar Glaser, who had left the services of Baden, appointed tutor of the prince. That the teachings of this man, who was with all his love of peace an outspoken defender of Protestantism, did not fall on infertile soil was to be shown by future events. At first Wolfgang, having assumed the regency in 1543, was hesitant; in spite of all the enticements of his father-in-law Philip of Hesse, he avoided a formal union with the Schmalkaldic League and managed the period of the Interim with a diplomatic finesse unusual in so young a ruler. But after the Treaty of Passau a church inspection of the entire country in 1553 laid the groundwork for a thorough Reformation, which was concluded by the great church constitution of 1557 by the chancellor Ulrich Sitzinger and the superintendent Cunemann Flinsbach. This constitution, revised by Melancthon and Brenz, essentially based on the patterns established by the constitutions of Neuenburg, Württemberg, and Mecklenburg, was thoroughly Lutheran. A second inspection in 1558 and the establishment in the following year of the Hornbach school, which was put in the charge of Immanuel Tremellius, a former tutor of princes, completed the work of the Reformation.

The origins of the Anabaptist movement in Zweibrücken are still in the dark. It is, to be sure, known that Hans Denk (q.v.) was briefly in Bergzabern in 1527 and that he aroused some attention by his disputations, but it is doubtful that there was any connection between this visit and the later spread of the Anabaptist movement in the province. Statements made on the occasion of the first church inspection in 1553 indicate that the movement came in from the outside, particularly from the region of Worms and Kreuznach. Diebold Winter, Claus Sümmerer, and Hans Grecker, who later represented the Anabaptist cause in the disputation of Frankenthal, are named as the prime promoters of the movement in the region of Zweibrücken. In the Bergzabern district the villages of Barbelroth and Frankweiler are named, in the Lichtenberg district besides Achtersbach and Baumholder, especially Flurskappel, where it is said Kaspar Schmidt was on the point of drawing half the congregation to the Anabaptist side. This wide distribution of the Anabaptists induced the Count Palatine to issue an extensive mandate, which was proclaimed on April 23, 1556 (Mandat wider die widertaufer und ihre anhenger, auch derselben verführischen opinionen, etc. Im Fürstentumb Zwaybrück öffentlich angeschlagen. Anno 1556). The mandate, which sets as the minimum penalty for the Anabaptists expulsion from the country, but reserves to the prince the right to impose penalties of life and property in accordance with the imperial decrees, was then incorporated into the church constitution adopted in the following year. In addition the constitution also contained a "warning and command against the error of the Anabaptists," which formed a sort of theoretical counterpart to the constitution and was intended to furnish the clergy with the needed tools to prevent the further spread of Anabaptism by instruction of the "common man." The errors of the Anabaptists are classified in two categories, viz., those that pertain to external physical desires, and those concerning spiritual matters. In the first class they enumerate rejection of temporal government, courts, and punishments; refusal to render the oath; the sinfulness of possessions and demand for community of goods; the right of divorce in the case of deviation in religious practice. As spiritual errors they designate denial of original sin; rejection of infant baptism; justification by works; disregard for the church offices and the sacraments; holiness of the regenerated. The application of Bible references in attacking these rather arbitrarily stated tenets of faith was generally left to the clergy; only in the defense of infant baptism are detailed references given. This constitution was to be put into practice at the next church inspection, planned for 1558. The instructions issued to the inspectors pointed out that the spread of Anabaptism was most serious in the Neukastel district, and especially the village of Frankweiler "more than any others of our towns and villages is in ill repute on this account." The Strasbourg divine, Johann Marbach (q.v.), who had charge of the inspection, did not neglect to explain to the clergy the Anabaptist arguments and their refutation. Nevertheless the movement did not decline. In 1561 the pastor of Frankweiler expressed his fears concerning the effect of the adjacent Löwenstein, where a second Moravia was about to be instituted. In 1562 a reprint of the Anabaptist mandate had to be provided, and the clergy were instructed to read the text once a month from the pulpit. After the middle of the 1560's a definite decrease in the Anabaptist movement is discernible. We hear of emigrations to Moravia, which was at that time in its "golden age," and attracted many; there are also many expulsions from the country. (In 1581 the mason Hans Raidel, a native of Zweibrücken, is named.) The effect of the emissaries from Moravia was rather to promote emigration to Moravia than to consolidate the brotherhood in the district. Toward the end of the century there were only isolated persons in a few regions that attracted the attention of the inspectors.

According to an old document the "congregation of the duchy of Zweibrücken" was founded in 1713. In 1732 there were here 27 Mennonite families and in 1769 the membership numbered 94. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1765 lists two congregations in this duchy—Schurburg(?) with preacher Johannes Schöning (Schöny), elder from 1738 (probably 1749), and Zweibrücken with Christian Lohman (Lehmann), elder since 1740. The Naamlijst of 1766 lists only one congregation, Zweibrücken-Schurburg, with Johannes Schöning as elder. The Naamlijst of the following years mentions a congregation of Freudenberg, Hornbach, and Kirchheimerhof (previously called Zweibrücken) with the elders Johannes Schöning, Joseph Schnebely from 1767 (should be 1762) and the preachers Joh. Lehmann from 1745, Rudolf Schmidt from 1755, and Peter Boer (Böhm, ME I, 245, is an error) from 1755; Christian Wels became a preacher in 1774 and an elder in 1781; the Naamlijst of 1793 still names Joseph Schnebele as elder and Georg Finger and Ulrich Lehmann as preachers, both from 1783.

Not until the 18th century did the Anabaptist movement find entry into the duchy through the influx of Alsatian Amish Mennonites. Besides Zweibrücken and Ernstweiler, Mennonites were found as renters on the Deutschhof (q.v.) in the Barbelroth district, the Neudorferhof (q.v.) in the Meisenheim district, and the Kohlhof (Limbach parish close to the former Prussian border). The Ernstweiler (q.v.) and the Amish Ixheim (q.v.) congregations in this area merged in 1937 to form the Zweibrücken (q.v.) congregation. M.K., vDZ.

Gem.-Kal., 1939, 71; Th. Gümbel, Die Geschichte der protestantischen Kirche der Pfalz (Kaiserslautern, 1885); TA Baden-Pfalz; Julius Ney, Pfalzgraf Wolfgang, Herzog von Zweibrücken und Neuburg (Leipzig, 1912); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1433, 1438, 1471 f.; Gesch.-Bl., 1955, 23, 24; ML III, 356 f.

Pfastatt Mennonite Church, which has its meeting-house at Rue de L' Etang 3 in the village of Pfastatt on the northwest side of Mulhouse, was organized in 1912 as a result of a division in the Pulversheim (q.v.) congregation, when a minority started to meet in the home of a Mennonite family in Pfastatt. When the Pulversheim meetinghouse was burned during World War I, most of the Pulversheim members began to attend at the Pfastatt location. The necessity of building a meetinghouse resulted in a second division over the question of location, and although the majority built in Pfastatt (1922-23) a minority rebuilt in Pulversheim. World War II damages to the Pfastatt church were severe but were soon repaired. Pfstatt in 1957 was the largest Mennonite congregation in Alsace, with 265 souls including unbaptized children and second in France only to Montbéliard. The elder is Joseph Widmer, of Modenheim, assisted by the ministers Henri Goldschmidt of Bourtzwiller, Hermann Nussbaumer of Wittenheim, Jaques Nussbaumer of Reiningen, and Max Schowalter of Pfstatt. The members live in Bourtzwiller, Isenheim, Modenheim, Willenheim, Upper Asach, and Guebwiller. Heinrich Schneider of Isenheim signed the Dordrecht Confession in 1660. The Conference of Mennonites of Alsace-Lorraine holds its annual meeting at Pfstatt on Ascension Day. E.C.

Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire 1901-1951 (Montbéliard, 1951); Christ Seul (December 1951); ML III, 359.

Pfeddersheim, a village (pop. 3,500) near Worms, Germany, where an Anabaptist disputation took place with Lutheran theologians on Aug. 25, 1557, on order of Elector Otto Henry of the Palatinate. Some 40 Anabaptists took part, among them 19 bishops (Vorsteher). Five topics were discussed: Infant Baptism, State, Oath, Grounds for Leaving the State Church, and Ban. Very little source material is available regarding the disputation, none giving the statements of the Anabaptists. The Stuttgart Staatsarchiv (Rel. S.B. 16) contains a document reporting the statements made against the Anabaptists by their opponents, entitled Contra Anabaptistarum opinionem, Widerlegung der artikel der Wiedertäufer, signed at the end, "Written at Worms anno 1557." This is printed verbatim in TA Württemberg (pp. 148-61) edited by Gustav Bossert, who states that the document is the report of a disputation, probably the religious disputation at Pfeddersheim in August 1557, and perhaps written by Jacob Andreae, who participated in it. The only other known participant was Dr. Johannes Marbach, who was called from Strasbourg to assist. Diebold Winter, the chief Anabaptist speaker at the Frankenthal (q.v.) debate of 1571, stated at that disputation on the opening day that he had been at the Pfeddersheim disputation; he protested that things were printed about the Anabaptist views supposedly stated at Pfeddersheim "which we never thought, much less spoke. Also we protest that thereupon a very sharp mandate was issued. If we were such people as represented in the Prozess(?) we would not be fit to stand before your eyes. We want to record this for our defense. This is our complaint and protest, that we were dealt with unjustly at Pfeddersheim. . . . We would like to see such persons as were present at that disputation. If someone is here who can testify to this, and the Prozess(?) permits, we would accept correction" (Protocoll, 1573, pp. 9 f.).

It is most probable that a booklet written by Melancthon and others which appeared in 1558(?) titled Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern deals with the views of the Anabaptists as given at Pfeddersheim. (This would explain the strange term "Prozess" in Diebold Winter's statement.) It is identical with a manuscript in the Stuttgart Staatsarchiv, "Bedenken der Wiedertäufer halber," which is dated "written at Worms anno 1557" and written Nov. 5, 1557. This document is strangely the outcome of a meeting of Lutheran theologians held at Worms Sept. 11-Oct. 7, 1557, to attempt a reconciliation between the Protestant and Catholic estates by way of a public conference. The experiment failed, but the theologians came to an agreement to recommend to the government of the Palatinate a sharper treatment of the Anabaptists. The Bedenken contains their recommendations. Why the Worms theologians should have turned from their failure to solve the Catholic problem to dealing with the Anabaptist problem is perhaps best explained by the results of the immediately preceding Pfeddersheim disputation. Jacob Andreae was a participant in both meetings and no doubt others were also. Diebold Winter's reference to a printed unjust report on the Anabaptist statements at Pfeddersheim could of course refer to a printed Protocoll, but none such has ever been discovered. (Recently a trace of a manuscript copy of a set of minutes seems to have been found, but not yet verified, possibly in the princely library at Gotha.) If the Bedenken-Prozess is basically an attack on the Anabaptist position as expressed at Pfeddersheim, then the manuscript "Handbüchlein wider den Prozess der zu Worms am Rhein wider die Brüder so man die Hutterischen nennt ausgangen ist im 1557 Jahr" (modern copy in GCL) may well be at least in part a defense of the Pfeddersheim Anabaptist testimony, and may support the idea that Hutterites took part in the Pfeddersheim disputation as they did later in the Frankenthal disputation of 1571.

It is strange that no minutes or record of the important Pfeddersheim disputation have been preserved, a fact which Krebs states in his edition of the Täuferakten für Baden und Pfalz (1951), p. 153. He prints a report on the disputation (152 f.) contained in a communication from Johann Marbach and Jakob Herman to the Strasbourg City Council dated Aug. 31, 1557, to be found in the Strasbourg Archives. He also prints (footnote, p. 153) a brief report given by Alting in his Historia ecclesiae Palatinae (reprinted in L. Chr. Mieg, Monumenta pietatis I, Frankfurt, 1702, p. 160). In any case the Lutheran participants declared at the end of the disputation that they had overthrown the errors of their opponents, and summoned them to give up their errors and return "to the fellowship of the true Christian church." But their appeal had no success; the purpose of the Elector in calling the disputation, namely, to bring the Anabaptists back to the fold, was not attained.

Whether there was a congregation of Anabaptists at any time in Pfeddersheim is not clear. Krebs, Baden und Pfalz, twice reports Anabaptists at Pfeddersheim. On Aug. 6, 1563, a certain Martinus is named as an Anabaptist. On Oct. 19, 1566, Elector Frederick ordered the Count of Alzey to proceed against the Pfeddersheim Anabaptists, having heard that ten inhabitants of the place had been won to the new faith. On Sept. 14, 1608, a meeting of several hundred Anabaptists is reported as having taken place between Pfeddersheim and Kriegsheim, but these may have been Kriegsheim people since there are numerous reports of Anabaptists at that place. H.S.B.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); TA Baden-Pfalz, 152-54, 157, 163, 242; ML II, 593.

Pfeffel, Gottlieb Konrad (1736-1809), an Alsatian writer of fables. In his fable about the wild boar and the birds he has a Mennonite play the part of a frank and courageous friend of the truth: "Sir," said his renter Hans, an intelligent Mennonite, who was just riding past the forest on his way from the market, 'appearances deceive you; from the stirred up earth many a worm creeps forth; with a cry of joy the gay flock of birds pounces upon it, and this fellow thinks that their melody is coined because of his merit'" (free English rendering of German verse). (ML III, 359.) NEFF.

Pfefferlin, Hans, a victim of the Anabaptist persecutions of the Swabian League (q.v.), was captured on April 24, 1528, with Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) at Leitheim and although he recanted his Anabaptist belief was put to death at Weissenhorn on May 11, 1528. He stemmed from Göggingen near Augsburg, Germany, and had been baptized in his home by Leonhard of Linz (q.v.). HEGE.

Friedrich Roth, "Zur Lebensgeschichte Eitelhans Langenmantel . . ." in Zts. des historischen Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVII (1900) 9, 14, 15, 17, 27-29; ML III, 359.

Pfersfelder, Elisabeth, sister of Georg Pfersfelder (q.v.), married and living in the region of Bamberg, Germany, owning lands there (according to Corp. Schwenckf. VII, 99), "a prominent widow of Wibersbach in the diocese of Bamberg." In the home of her brother, who was friendly to the Anabaptists, she became acquainted with the fanatical Anabaptist Claus Frey (q.v.), who had fled from Rottenburg in 1525 leaving his wife and children behind. She then fell to the wiles of this supposed prophet and became his wife without being aware of the fact that he was already married. Her brother was evidently also ignorant of the character of his protégé; otherwise he would certainly have restrained his sister. She followed Frey to Strasbourg as his wife. Here he was, however, rejected by the Anabaptist congregation, for his dual marriage was known there. He was arrested by the Strasbourg council and tried. His designation of himself as "the head of the church" and "fulfiller of the Scriptures" is evidence of an elaborate system evolved by a disordered imagination. The council sentenced Frey to death for bigamy in 1534 and had him executed by drowning. Seriously disturbed in spirit by this trial, even though she was not proved a partner to the deed, Elisabeth requested that the council take her life also, but she was left unmolested and at liberty, evidently remaining in Strasbourg. She came under the pastoral care of Crautwald (q.v.), a Schwenckfelder, who wrote a letter to her dated Nov. 14, 1540. Its content is known. Elisabeth had asked Crautwald for the correct interpretation of the passages in Galatians 5:5 and Hebrews 3:14. She also corresponded with Schwenckfeld on the Incarnation of Christ. Schwenckfeld's reply, probably in the summer of 1540, is found in Corp. Schwenckf. (VII, 102 ff.). Like her brother, Elisabeth Pfersfelder found the way from the Anabaptists to the Schwenckfelders. E.T.

Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum IV (Leipzig, 1914) 772 ff.; VII (Leipzig, 1926) 99 ff.; also the older literature there; ML III, 359 f.

Pfersfelder, Georg (actually Georg Gross), a baron living and owning property at Weilersburg in the district of Bamberg, Germany, in the service of the city of Nürnberg, was in close contact with Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.) from 1530 on. The latter complained in a letter of May 1533, that he had received no reply to his letters (Corp. Schwenckf., IV, 772 ff.). This letter clearly indicates Pfersfelder's former connections with the Anabaptists, and warns him in regard to them. Schornbaum's Quellen offer conclusive evidence of Pfersfelder's violent and dramatic interference in an Anabaptist trial in Brandenburg-Ansbach in 1531. Anton Schad, the margrave's Protestant pastor in Uttenreuth near Erlangen, in April 1531 had read from his pulpit a mandate of his sovereign against the "fanatics," and had one of his auditors, Anton Schmied, arrested by Hans von Seckendorf, the bailiff of Baiersdorf, for publicly contradicting him. Thereupon Pfersfelder without ceremony arrested the parson and threatened him. After his release Schad accused Pfersfelder to the Ansbach authorities, calling upon them for protection (Schornbaum, 235 f.). As a voluntary counsel for the Anabaptists Pfersfelder wrote a defiant letter to the bailiff, an excerpt from which is found in Schornbaum (231 ff.), and also in Wiswedel (II, 45 ff.). The letter shows Pfersfelder to have been a well-trained opponent of Luther and friend of the Anabaptists, as well as a religiously alert layman who knew how to handle words. A few coarse expressions can be pardoned in that crude century, and especially by Luther's example. Upon the complaint of the chancellor of the margravate the council of Nürnberg imposed city arrest upon him pending the outcome of the dispute. Meanwhile the Uttenreuth "dreamers" were tried in Baiersdorf and questioned on the rack concerning their contacts with Pfersfelder. Recalling the Peasants' War the authorities suspected social revolutionary intentions. Indeed, as recently as 1527 the Nürnberg parson Vogel of Eltersdorf had after a brief trial been beheaded as an Anabaptist and as an alleged revolutionary (see Wolfgang Vogel; also Bilder I, 152 ff.). It was not possible to prove such charges against Pfersfelder. Nor were the authorities of the margrave more successful in fastening a charge of disturbance of the peace upon him for his arrest of the Uttenreuth parson. Pfersfelder was, of course, not successful in saving Hans Schmied, whom he had so warmly defended. After weeks of torture on the rack the latter was beheaded on July 10, 1531, on a charge of "setting up a forbidden, illegal, and fundamentally seditious sect and rabble, on account of seductive visionary dreams and ghosts and on account of the dissolving of his marriage." That in the case of Schmied and the other visionaries it was merely a matter of pathological hallucination, medical science was not yet ready to understand. In the Bavarian national archives of Nürnberg (Religionsakten XXXIX, 428-39) there is a letter written by Pfersfelder in June 1531, to the "dreamers" imprisoned in Baierdorf. Its content has not yet been published (Corp. Schwenckf. VII, 100). But Pfersfelder's letter of self-vindication written to the magistrate on June 23, 1531, is published (in abstract) in Schornbaum (281). In June of that year Andreas Osiander (q.v.), the leading theologian of Nürnberg, was commissioned together with Wenzeslaus Linck and several of the Nürnberg councillors, to talk with Pfersfelder concerning his "Anabaptist errors." Pfersfelder did not appear, but presented a statement of his beliefs, a copy of which was taken from an Anabaptist seized in Uffenheim in 1532. A letter written by Pfersfelder to Osiander on June 8, 1531, now in the national archives at Nürnberg in the volume mentioned above (p. 428), has not yet been published, but is mentioned by Schornbaum (p. 332, lines 25 f. and note 5). A colloquy between Osiander and Pfersfelder in 1532 was also fruitless. After the bloody suppression of the Anabaptists in Franconia Pfersfelder transferred to the Schwenckfelders, as did also his sister Elisabeth (q.v.). E.T.

Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum IV (Leipzig, 1914); VI (Leipzig, 1926); TA Bayern I; Wiswedel, Bilder I and II; J. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode von 1522 bis 1526 (Freiburg i.B., 1885); ML III, 360.

Pfistermeyer (Meyer), Hans, an outstanding Anabaptist leader, of Aarau, capital of the Swiss canton of Aargau (q.v.), who was probably won to the Anabaptist movement by Jacob Gross (q.v.) of Waldshut in 1525. Little is known of him. On Jan. 26, 1526, the council of Aarau discussed his case. He apparently appeared as a preacher soon after his baptism, whereupon he was apparently banished from the canton. In that year he also preached in Basel. A messenger of the council conveyed to him the order to leave the city. He then went in person to the Protestant mayor, Adelberg Meyer, and received from him a friendly repetition and explanation of the law. But soon Pfistermeyer was in the city again. It was made clear to him that he and his like-minded friends might stay in the city if they would promise not to hold any meetings. To this condition they did not consent and were again expelled. Now they went to the neighboring Therwyl and preached there. They were brought before the council, which demanded from them an oath that they would forever avoid the city and an area with a radius of ten miles around it. They refused to render the oath and were ordered to leave the city, and never to return. Nevertheless Pfistermeyer was in Basel again a year later. "He had heard that good Christian people lived here, and so God led him back and then he worked here." Again he was expelled with a very sharp threat, and apparently did not return. In the following year he was one of the eight Anabaptists who wished to participate in the great disputation held at Bern in 1528, but who were arrested and who were cross-examined after the conclusion of the colloquy, and then expelled from the city and canton. Whither they went is not known. In 1530 he appeared as an Anabaptist preacher. Bern heard that he frequently preached to crowds of several hundred, though only seven were baptized. Bern then demanded that he be extradited. In March 1531 Pfistermeyer was seized at Mellingen and taken to Bern. On April 19, 1531, the preachers of Bern, Berthold Haller (q.v.), Caspar Megander (see Grossman), Franz Kolb (q.v.), Sebastian Hofmeister (q.v.), and Jakob Othrus, engaged in a debate with him, in the course of which he was led to recant. The colloquy has been printed under the title, Ein christenlich gespräch gehalten zu Bern zwischen den Predicanten und Hansen Physter Meyer von Arouwen den Widertauff, Eyd, Oberkeyt und andere Wider-toufferische Artikel betreffende (1531) (at GCL). By "the Holy Scripture" it was to be proved that Pfistermeyer was in error with regard to "the faith and the Christian life," and an effort was made "with all friendliness" to lead him from "his ungodly plan" in order that at least "his soul might be won." To attain this goal the preachers dealt with him "with all industry, with gentleness and with patience, out of love." Pfistermeyer was first called upon to account for his statement that the clergy were not preaching God's words but Bern's word. One of the questions dealt with was the Anabaptist view that the New Testament is more important than the Old Testament, a view which Pfistermeyer skillfully defended since Christ "had brought a higher and more perfect teaching." Since everything was to be directed toward faith and life, the swearing of oaths was also discussed by the clergy as being "in accord with faith and love." Pfistermeyer to be sure wanted to stay by a simple yes, but allows himself to be moved far enough on this point that "the swearing of oaths is not different from testifying to the truth" and he would therefore be permitted "to testify to his yes with God."

With regard to taking interest Pfistermeyer asserted that it is not suitable for a Christian to take interest; but the clergy countered with the statement that although the Scriptures do indeed forbid usury taking interest is reconcilable with love. But Pfistermeyer would recognize as real love the kind that according to Matthew 5 shows itself in unselfishness, and he could not "get any farther with the Scriptures."

Concerning the government Pfistermeyer said that no Christian should become involved in such an office. The theologians on the other hand tried to prove by the Old Testament "that a Christian may stay in office." A "Christian government" also had the duty of punishing the wicked. The sword, which Pfistermeyer believed should not be used, saying, "A Christian shall not pronounce a death sentence," was commanded a Christian government as a weapon of love. "Indeed love is precisely the hilt whereby the government shall grasp the sword." They do this "with great sympathy, not arbitrarily or criminally, not out of vengeance or blood-thirstiness, but alone on account of the office of punishing and eradicating the evil for the benefit of the pious." But Pfistermeyer spoke for mercy and pardon, saying that according to the Sermon on the Mount one should not resist evil. It was his opinion that the clergy found so little attention because they "did not follow after Christ," whose teaching was in harmony with His deed, which made a bigger impression on the people than the mere empty word without corresponding deeds.

A lively discussion arose concerning the article of baptism, since Pfistermeyer rejected infant baptism. The circumcision of the Old Testament gave the clergy their foundation for their defense of infant baptism, and baptism denoted being added to the people of God. Pfistermeyer skillfully contended that Christ had commanded to teach and after that to baptize, of which the children were of course incapable. He said that one who was not planted into the kingdom of God by the heavenly Father as a plant, or in other words, added to the people of God, he would be rooted out. Thereupon the clergy said that Christ had promised to the children "the kingdom of heaven." Just as children enjoy civil community without understanding it, so they should also be permitted to participate in the "community of the saints," in baptism. Pfistermeyer, however, found it highly dubious that anybody could be made a Christian through water baptism, without living a godly life.

After a lengthy disputation Pfistermeyer requested time to consider until the next day; this was granted. With the argument that infant baptism is a continuation of the circumcision of the Old Testament and that the latter is based on a definite command of God, Pfistermeyer was finally defeated so that he declared that he knew no further Scripture to oppose it. But since he now "through the grace of God" had been further instructed in the truth, he confessed that he had erred. He would ask God for pardon that He might lead him still further in recognition of the truth.

Now Pfistermeyer considered it to be his task to convert his former companions and brethren to his new view. He failed in this with Heini Seiler, his fellow prisoner, who remained true to his faith until death by martyrdom. This conversation has also been printed (Heiz, 20). After the experiment with Pfistermeyer had succeeded so well, the council of Bern apparently set great hopes on a religious disputation of this kind. Therefore a "friendly teaching from God's Word" was tried again and in 1532 the Anabaptist disputation of Zofingen was instituted, which was to be held like the one with Pfistermeyer according to the rules of "faith and love." That Pfistermeyer was present in Zofingen is not seen in the printed records. In 1533-34 he succeeded in bringing about Friedli Scherger's(?) recantation. In March 1538 he was by letter ordered to appear at the great disputation of Bern (q.v.), since he as a recanting Anabaptist could offer the lords good services. At this point all trace of him is lost.

NEFF, S.G.

J. Heiz, Die Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Müller, Berner Täufer; ML III, 360-62.

Pforzheim, city and district in Baden, Germany. Because of its location on the sometimes indefinite borders of the margraviate of Baden, the Palatinate, the bishopric of Speyer, and the duchy of Württemberg, the region of Pforzheim was a favorable location for the Anabaptists, since they were easily able to escape the hostile measures of one state by moving into another. In the early days of the movement the Anabaptists must have been rather numerous in the city, for the pastor of the city church based his petition for the introduction of a German baptismal ritual in 1532 upon the Anabaptist opposition. ("The Anabaptists may well declare our baptism invalid, since nobody understands it.") For the following period there is no information about the presence of Anabaptists in Pforzheim besides the two executions at Pforzheim mentioned in the Hutterite chronicles and the statement that Georg Rapp, who had emigrated to Moravia in the 1540's, returned to his native town fifteen years later. The apparent decline in numbers may be due to the fact that in 1535 the city became the residence of the lower margraviate and was consequently too closely supervised by the central authorities to permit the growth of separatist groups. So much the more obstinately they maintained themselves in several communities of the Pforzheim district, as in Biffingen, Dürrn, Ersingen, Eutingen, Hohenwart, Kieselbronn, Königsbach, Niesern, Nussbaum, and Oeschelbronn. In Bauschlott, according to the Hutterite chronicles, an Anabaptist by the name of Georg Baumann was executed about 1529. From most of these towns, especially from Oeschelbronn, there are records of the emigration of Anabaptists to Moravia in the 1570's. As late as 1592, the pastor of Oeschelbronn complained about the great number of Anabaptists who assembled in the forests and fields at night for their secret preaching services. As in the rest of the regions of the Upper Rhine, the congregations, reduced by emigration, exile, and death, disappeared in the storms of the Thirty Years' War. Not until the 18th century is there record of the presence of Mennonite immigrants, who settled on the large estates as renters. In 1755 Pforzheim reported to the authorities of the margraviate that there had been no Anabaptists in the area except on the leased estates of Katharinental (Katharinentalerhof, Göbrichen community) and Karlshausen (Karlshäuserhof, community of Dürrn). The Mennonite lessees Jakob Kurz at Katharinental and Claus Brennemann at Karlshausen in 1763 received permission to live there the remainder of their lives when the authorities of the margraviate took over the management of its estates. Today the Mennonites living in Pforzheim belong to the congregation of Wössingen, located in the district of Karlsruhe.

M.K.

Records of the archive of Baden at Karlsruhe; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; TA Baden-Pfalz; ML III, 362.

Pfoutz Valley in Perry County, Pa., extends from the Juniata River at Millerstown to Thompsonstown with a ridge in the center to the Susquehanna at Liverpool, between Turkey and Forge Hills. The northwestern valley near Juniata County, in Little Pfoutz Valley, was the home of the Aukers, Lauvers, Brubakers, and Kauffmans in the 19th century. Caspar Auker was the first Mennonite. His son Henry Auker (Sept. 23, 1790-Sept. 24, 1866) and grandsons Deacon Jonas Auker (Nov. 12, 1824-June 18, 1895) and Bishop William Auker (Aug. 18, 1829-July 16, 1908) lived in the valley. For a number of years the Wardville Schoolhouse was used and later Lock Schoolhouse. The Auker Cemetery east of Thompsonstown is a mile west of the Wardville Schoolhouse. By 1903 all Mennonites in the area were coming to Delaware for communion. It was always a part of the Juniata-Snyder Bishop District. I.D.L.

Pfrimmerhof, an estate near the village of Sippersfeld in the Palatinate, which was leased to Mennonites from the beginning of the 18th century, and which has been farmed by their descendants since the beginning of the 19th century as their property. The earlier village Primmen or Prümen, belonging to the monastery of Rosenthal and to the baron of Stauff, was completely destroyed in the Thirty Years' War, and the ruins were inhabited for decades solely by charcoal burners. In 1702 the entire farm (300 Morgen) of desolate land was given by the Nassau-Weilburg authorities to Casimir Lander, his son Hans Jakob, and his son-in-law Hans Jakob Schwarz in hereditary lease. They built three homes, as well as barns, stables, and other buildings, but stayed only a few years. On Sept. 14, 1709, Jost Krehbiel took over the estate; it thus became the home site of the widely ramified Krehbiel family (q.v.). Some members of the family emigrated to America, including Jakob Krehbiel, the author of the "Chronik des Pfrimmerhofs," who settled in New York in 1831. Through marriage the names of Stauffer and Bletscher were at times represented on the Pfrimmerhof. Today there are on the Pfrimmerhof in addition to a non-Mennonite family, two Krehbiel families and a Fellmann family, who are members of the Sembach (q.v.) congregation.

G.H.

J. Eller, "Die Geschichte des Pfrimmerhofs," in Pfälzische Zeitbilder, supplement of the Pfälzische Presse (Kaiserslautern, Dec. 12, 1927); Gem.-Kal. 1900, 58 ff.; 1905, 143; J. Krehbiel, "Die Chronik des Pfrimmerhofs" (1826, a manuscript in the possession of the Krehbiel family, Pfrimmerhof); ML III, 362.

Pfudler, Felix, a cobbler, was a leader of the Anabaptist congregation of Esslingen, Germany, in 1527-28.

Philadelphia (City of Brotherly Love), population over two million, third largest city in United States, has played a very significant role in American Mennonite history. The city was founded by William Penn (q.v.) and the Quakers in 1681 and chartered in 1701. The Quakers have played a prominent role in the life of the state and the city. The first permanent Mennonite settlement to be established in America was Germantown (q.v.) located 6 miles north of the city at that time, but now incorporated in the city. Ever since the first arrival in 1683 Philadelphia served as a gateway port for most of the Mennonites of Swiss-German background, though very few of them settled in the city. The Germantown Mennonite Church (GCM, q.v.) is still in existence with 32 members.

Mennonites moving into the city later (1865) established the First Mennonite Church (GCM) at Diamond and Reese streets (see Philadelphia First Mennonite Church) and the Second Mennonite Church (GCM, q.v., 1899) at Franklin and Indiana. The Norris Square (q.v.) Mennonite Church, organized in 1922 (Sunday school organized in 1899), belongs to the Lancaster Conference. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ have the Salem Church at Broad and McFerran and some missions in West Philadelphia and Roxboro.

Philadelphia is a cultural center of the nation and contains in its many libraries and museums, such as the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, the Germantown Historical Society, the Free Library of Philadelphia, the Friends Historical Society, the Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation, significant material pertaining to Mennonite culture and history.

The capital town of the Fernheim Mennonite Colony in the Paraguayan Chaco, Filadelfia, was named after the Pennsylvania city, partly because the owners of the land sold to the Mennonites had their chief residence there, and partly because the idea of emphasizing brotherly love appealed to the refugee settlers.

C.K.

Clarence Fretz, "A Sight-Seeing Tour of Philadelphia," Menn. Life II (July 1947) 24-26.

Philadelphia First Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Eastern District Conference, located at Fifth and Diamond Streets, Philadelphia, Pa., was organized in October 1865 as the First Philadelphia congregation, with Bishop Moses Gottshall of Schwenksville as the overseer of the work. On Jan. 12, 1867, the chapel was purchased and regular morning and evening services were conducted by visiting ministers. On April 5, 1868, Samuel G. Clemmer became the full-time minister. In 1872 the congregation became a member of the Eastern District Conference. Originally the services were in German but gradually English was introduced. Since 1914 all services have been in English. The language question caused difficulties in 1874 and about one half of the members withdrew and joined the Moravian Church, some of whom later returned. A new brick church building was dedicated in January 1882, which is the present place of worship (Reese and Diamond streets). In 1881 the congregation was incorporated. One of the outstanding ministers of the congregation was N. B. Grubb (q.v.), who served the congregation in 1882-1920; under his service the congregation increased to a membership of 470 and introduced more effective methods of outreach. The organization of the Second Mennonite Church in 1899 took some of its members.

A Sunday school was organized in 1868 and a Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour (q.v.) in 1886, the first to be organized in a Mennonite church. The congregation had a choir and Ladies' Aid Society from its earliest days. The ministers who have served the church are Samuel G. Clemmer 1868-70, Andrew B. Shelly 1870-72, Levi O. Schimmel 1872-73, Albert E. Funk 1874-82, N. B. Grubb 1882-1920, A. J. Neuenschwander 1921-29, Mary E. Bakewell 1929-30, Carl J. Landes 1930-36, John J. Plenert 1936-47, Wesley C. Ewert 1947-50, H. S. Weiss 1951-52, and Curtis Bedsworth 1952-. The membership in 1957 was 173. J.H.F., C.K.

Fiftieth Anniversary of the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia (Philadelphia, 1915); Charter and By-Laws of the First Mennonite Church (Philadelphia, 1911); Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia (Philadelphia, 1940); "Young People's Association of the First Mennonite Church, Philadelphia, Minutes" 1886-92 (BeCL); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); D. K. Cassel, History of the Mennonites (Philadelphia, 1888); "History of the First Philadelphia Congregation," 1898 Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac (Quakertown, 1898).

Philadelphia (Calvary) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church had 78 members in 1957, with LeRoy S. Heller serving as pastor. M.G.

Philadelphia (Emmanuel) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, 6214 Grays Ave., Philadelphia 42, Pa., had a membership of 60 in 1957. It was organized as a congregation in 1927 and was previously known as the West Philadelphia Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church. John Dunn was the minister in 1957. N.H.W.

Philadelphia, Paraguay: see Filadelfia.

Philhaven Hospital grew out of the experiences of many Mennonite conscientious objectors during World War II who served as attendants in mental hospitals. The Lancaster Conference (MC) appointed a board of 12 trustees in 1948 to establish such a hospital. In 1949 Graybill and Mary Landis donated a farm of 167 acres near Lebanon, Pa., for this purpose; Abram Horst of New Holland was appointed contractor. On May 7, 1952, the building was dedicated. It is on a hilltop overlooking the beautiful Lebanon Valley.

The purpose of this hospital was "to provide institutional facilities for the mentally unfortunate of Lancaster Conference and others . . . regardless of race or nationality." It is a 37-bed active treatment mental hospital. Treatments include psychotherapy, electro-shock, occupational and recreational therapy, and the use of tranquilizing drugs. Since its dedication there have been a total of 1,634 admissions (to Feb. 1, 1958), not including the many outpatients treated. Dr. S. Philip Loucks was the psychiatrist and was succeeded Aug. 1, 1955, by Dr. Henry A. Weitz; on Feb. 25, 1957, a second psychiatrist, Dr. Marjorie Morrison, was added to the staff. Elvin G. Lefever was administrator until November 1953; he was succeeded by J. Horace Martin, the present administrator.

The work grew so rapidly that it became necessary to build (in addition to the original plant): (1) a dormitory 100 x 30 ft. for staff members—the staff having increased from 8 to 33; (2) an annex to the hospital, 31 x 38 ft., to care for acutely disturbed patients. The hospital has served as an outlet for Christian service on a voluntary basis, and as alternative service for CO's. H.C.S.

Philip I (1504-67), called the Magnanimous, Landgrave of Hesse, Germany, 1509-67, was until 1518 under the regency of his mother Anna of Mecklenburg, introduced the Reformation into Hesse in 1526, founded the University of Marburg in 1527, was one of the most zealous promoters of the Reformation in Germany. Before his death he divided his lands among his four sons, William, George, Louis, and Philip.

In his attitude toward the Anabaptists he showed extraordinary generosity and kindness. He saw in the Anabaptist movement a disorder in religious life, which had its roots in error and weakness in the faith rather than in moral error like sedition and revolt, and which must therefore be treated with lenience and consideration. Characteristic of his attitude are his words: "I see more improvement of conduct among those whom we call fanatics than among those who are Lutheran" (a letter to his sister, Duchess Elizabeth of Saxony, Feb. 18, 1530). "On every hand there is no perfect faith in us, so that we must say: Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief" (Heidenhain, 78). "Alas, how cold love is among us who call ourselves Christian and those who create such offense must give an account before God and bear a grievous judgment" (Corpus Reformatorum IX, 762). Above all, he said, one must try to lead them back to the church by persuasion and indoctrination. Expulsion from the country was the severest penalty he would permit; it too must be preceded by teaching. Bishop Franz of Münster asked his advice concerning the punishment of the Anabaptists (letter of Jan. 20, 1534; Cornelius, p. 218), as did also Karl, Margrave of Baden (letter of Oct. 12, 1566). Philip replied, informing him of the decrees that had been issued against the Anabaptists: "not to follow them too strictly, but always deal according to the circumstances and persons, so that the poor people might be converted and brought to the truth" (Hochhut, 554; Franz, No. 150).

At first Philip felt compelled to take steps against Melchior Rinck (q.v.). In 1528 Philip had a personal talk with him in the hunting castle Friedewald near Hersfeld (Wappler, II, 53). Then Philip made repeated attempts, but vain, to have him converted by the pastor Balthasar Raidt and the theologians at the University of Marburg. Now Rinck was sentenced to church penance, but remained in the country. Therefore John, Elector of Saxony, sent Philip the printed and manuscript writings of Rinck in order to induce him to take a more rigorous attitude. Soon afterward Rinck was seized on Hessian soil; but the efforts of the elector and his councillors to have a severe punishment inflicted were unavailing. Philip repudiated all interference in this affair. Finally he made up his mind to banish Rinck from Hesse and Saxony, and to extract from him a vow never to return to either of the two principalities. This was done in May 1531 (Franz, No. 5, 13a, 14a).

On the part of Saxony and especially of the Lutheran divines no effort was spared to make Philip, whom they suspected of an open inclination toward Anabaptism, change his opinion and to make clear to him the danger in his present position. Justus Menius (q.v.) dedicated to him his libelous booklet, Der Wiedertäufer Lehre und Geheimnis aus heiliger Schrift widerlegt. Mit einer schönen Vorrede von Dr. Martin Luther (Wittenberg, 1530). But Philip was not influenced by the polemic. In the matter of the punishment of the Anabaptists living in Eisenach and in the Hausbreitenbach district, which were under the joint jurisdiction of the two rulers, a serious difference of opinion arose. John of Saxony demanded the death penalty; Philip refused to give his consent. At the Schmalkaldic Bundestag at Nordhausen early in December 1531 the matter came up for discussion. The delegates of Saxony demanded the death sentence on the basis of the imperial decree (1529); the Hessian delegates countered that their prince had scruples against putting them to death. If they could not be deflected from their belief by indoctrination, they should be punished by having their hearth fire extinguished. They would then emigrate of their own accord. At most their homes should be barricaded (see the regulation of Philip on the subject of the Anabaptists at the end of 1531 in Wappler, I, 154, Franz, No. 15). The Nordhausen Bundestag (Franz, No. 18) also discussed the case of Melchior Rinck, who had been rearrested on Nov. 11, 1531. Again in vain. Again several of Rinck's writings were sent to Philip, as well as a personal letter from John dated Dec. 21, 1531, which expressed the hope that the old revolutionary be punished with the sword, a course justifiable before God and with a good conscience. John called attention to the fact that the Hessian authorities had agreed to the death penalty in sanctioning the edict of Speyer on April 23, 1529. But Philip was unable to inflict the death sentence on the obstinate Anabaptist. On Jan. 3, 1532, he informed John that he had sentenced the Anabaptist leader to life imprisonment and had taken him to Bürbach in the district of Katzenellenbogen, Wiesbaden area. He added that that he would not be able to reconcile his conscience to executing anyone with the sword in a matter of faith, where there was no other ground for taking his life. Otherwise no Catholics or Jews could be tolerated, for they blaspheme Christ to the highest degree, and would have to be put to death in a like manner (Franz, No. 17, 18b).

Philip likewise refused to consent to the severe penalty for the Anabaptists arrested in Hausbreitenbach. Finally they were divided between Saxony and Hesse; some of the former were executed, the latter were released. In no indefinite terms he also rejected the idea of executing Fritz Erbe (q.v.), who was imprisoned in Eisenach. To Elector John Frederick, who had demanded the death sentence for Erbe on the basis of the opinion of the Leipzig court, he declared in a letter of May 22, 1533, that he had never yet had a man put to death solely on a matter of belief; he had merely banished such or commanded them to sell their goods and move out. Only the obstinate who refused to go had he arrested. Therefore in the case of Fritz Erbe he also favored exile. If Erbe should refuse to leave the country he should be kept in prison until he changed his mind. He could not persuade himself "to punish anyone with the sword because of an error of faith, which is a gift of God, and was adopted at the time, not from malice, but from ignorance." He maintained this position in spite of repeated efforts by the elector, who based his opinion on the imperial law of 1529 and the official opinion of the theologians. Fritz Erbe remained in prison until his death in 1548 (Franz, No. 25).

In July 1533, when 18 Anabaptists were again seized in Hausbreitenbach and the Elector of Saxony again demanded their execution, Philip refused with the words, "Our Lord will give grace that they may be converted." This hope of Philip's was fulfilled in several instances in September of that year when some Anabaptists imprisoned in Mühlhausen recanted. After the revolt of 1525 the protectorate over the city of Mühlhausen was held in turn for a period of one year each by the Elector of Saxony, Duke George of Saxony, and Philip of Hesse. On June 15, 1533, the rule fell to Philip. He had a difficult position to maintain against the other two rulers. But he did not yield, and sent the pastor Raidt to Mühlhausen to convert the Anabaptists imprisoned there; Raidt was surprisingly successful in persuading all to recant, whereupon they were released (Wappler, II, 101). The Anabaptists at Sorga near Hersfeld were expelled in September 1533. They emigrated to Moravia (Wappler, II, 102; Franz, No. 28).

Philip's position was made more difficult by the events at Münster (q.v.). From the beginning he gave his attention to developments there. He corresponded with Bishop Franz von Waldeck and the regent and the city council (Cornelius, II); in a letter of March 6, 1535, he requested that the Anabaptists be watched (Becker, 83; Franz, No. 37). He sent his divines Theodor Fabricius and Johann Lening to Münster to convert the Anabaptists and to settle the dispute. After the fall of the city and the capture and condemnation of the leaders of this unfortunate movement, upon his express wish an attempt was made to convert the leaders by the Protestant clergymen Antonius Corvinus (q.v.) and Johann Kymeus (q.v.). With some malicious satisfaction the Elector of Saxony made use of the opportunity to influence Philip to take stronger measures against the Anabaptists. Already on April 25, 1534, he had called attention to the revolt in Münster as an example of the dangers of lenience. Philip did not reply. He was obviously embarrassed. Expulsions from the country did no good. The Anabaptists kept returning. There were instances where they promised three times not to return, but still kept appearing. "In order not to undertake something so very burdensome as concerning the life and body against the Anabaptists," he requested the opinion (May 24, 1536) of the magistrates of the cities of Strasbourg, Ulm, the dukes Ulrich of Württemberg and Ernst of Brunswick-Lüneburg, as well as of the theological faculties of the universities of Marburg and Wittenberg (Franz, No. 47).

Four days later he issued to all the districts of his realm a new mandate against the Anabaptists (Hochhut, 554-57; Franz, No. 47d). It is again unusually lenient for the times. It stipulates that the Anabaptists be summoned and diligently instructed by the clergy. If they persisted in their error they should be commanded to sell all their possessions within two weeks and leave the country with wife and children. If they promised this in a credible manner, they should be given all aid and support in the sale of their goods, "for we desire neither their lives nor their goods." But the houses of the disobedient should be barricaded, and no smoke or fire be allowed in them. Their property should be given them; they should only not live in the realm. All who granted them any aid were threatened with the same punishment as the Anabaptists. But those who were converted and returned to the church should be kindly received and only admonished to avoid "harm and disadvantage" in the future.

Concerning the opinions that were sent to Philip see Hesse. To discuss them Philip summoned the most prominent of his councillors, the knights, and his theologians, in addition to several representatives from the cities of his land to Kassel on Aug. 7, 1536 (Becker, 84; Franz, No. 47 P.Q.). This point of time was extremely unfavorable for the Anabaptists. Shortly before, a band of robbers and arsonists posing as Anabaptists was seized and some of its members executed. So it came about that the Hessian chancellor Feige also expressed himself in favor of greater severity toward the Anabaptists. He wanted to have the death penalty inflicted at least on the foreign Anabaptists who returned the third time after as many expulsions; for it was necessary to be on one's guard against them. The sharpest opinions were expressed by the Lutheran preachers Tilmann Schnabel and Justus Winter, who demanded a strict enforcement of the imperial edicts, whereas their colleague Johann Lening, who had been Philip's emissary to Münster, gave this judgment: "One should pray God to correct the errors in his own life and to admonish the Anabaptists kindly and in a friendly spirit. Even if all that they carry on their shield were bad, it is necessary to use caution and not make use of the sword until all other means have been tried."

A new regulation against the Anabaptists was worked out, which was with Philip's consent adopted verbatim in the Hessian church inspection regulations of 1537 (see Hesse; Franz, No. 47 R.S.). It sharply insists on the abolition of vices, because the Anabaptists were offended by them. In general it contains a sharpening of the previous regulation: "Foreign preachers of Anabaptists shall be beaten with rods, have a sign burned into their cheeks, and be threatened with death if they ever returned." Natives were ordered to sell all their goods. But if they did not do this within the time set, their houses should be closed up, the hearth fire extinguished, and their goods sold. The proceeds should be kept until they demanded it, and they were to be ordered on penalty of death to leave the country forever. If foreigners should nevertheless return, criminal proceedings should be inaugurated against them and the law take its course according to the imperial mandates. Natives should, on the other hand, in this case be beaten with rods and a sign burned on their faces; if they returned again after this, they should be racked and executed. The same methods should be used against those who were ordered to leave the country but refused to do so. "But no Anabaptist shall be put to death, even after the sentence has been passed, without previously notifying us."

But if someone had not previously baptized, preached, or held meetings, and had perhaps been misled through lack of misunderstanding, but refused to receive instruction, he should, in case he was a foreigner, be expelled from the country for all time, for the first offense. If he should, however, return, he should be beaten with rods and have a sign burned on his cheek; on the third offense he should be put to death. But if he in the face of death recanted, he should be taken back for further consultation and not killed. These severe measures were never put into effect; Philip never confirmed a death sentence. In 1540 he was able to write that in his realm the death sentence had never been inflicted on an Anabaptist. The Anabaptists were given gentle treatment. This was also true of those imprisoned in Wolkersdorf, Georg Schnabel (q.v.) and others. On them was found a letter from Peter Tasch with the address: "To the elect and called in the Lord, Jörgen S., my dear brother together with his companions among the wild beasts in tribulation and misery." This letter Philip sent to the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Jülich, Tasch's sovereign, and recommended to them that they keep a watchful eye on the Anabaptists. Since this letter also mentioned the Anabaptist movement in England, Philip drew up a letter with the Elector of Saxony to Henry VIII, and sent it through the council of Hamburg, notifying him of the presence of the Anabaptists in England (Franz, No. 62).

Philip took pains to induce the Anabaptists imprisoned in Wolkersdorf to recant. He sent them a letter in his own hand (Hochhut, 612; Franz, No. 76), expressing his disapproval of the lenience of their imprisonment; he would therefore have reason to deal otherwise with them, but did not wish to do so, but once more wanted to deal with them graciously and kindly, and was therefore sending them a God-fearing man who wanted to discuss with them in a friendly way their error; they should listen to him, give him good information; they would have to be obstinate indeed and remain stubbornly by their adopted opinion (if they refused to listen to him); "he shall show you the right way, so that you may come to the true knowledge of divine truth, which we would most heartily like to see and would rather hear than to proceed against you with rigor, as is our right, since you refuse to desist from your unchristian sect." To this end he called Martin Bucer (q.v.), the reformer of Strasbourg, to Hesse (Philip's letter to the magistrate of Strasbourg, Aug. 9, 1538). This led to complete success. Peter Tasch and his followers declared themselves willing to submit to the church. They presented their modified principles in a document called Bekentnis oder Antwort einiger Fragestücke oder Artickeln der gefangenen Täufer und anderer im Land zu Hessen vom 11. Dezember 1538 (Hochhut, 612-22; Franz, No. 85); the statement was accepted by the Lutheran clergy, who then declared that they were "willing to pardon those Anabaptists and accept them in the church." Eagerly Philip accepted the proposal of Bucer to have these converts win their brethren. He did not hesitate to deal with them in person, and to his great joy most of the Anabaptists of his realm returned to the established church.

In 1544 there were once more negotiations between Saxony and Hesse concerning Anabaptists in the Hausbreitenbach district. Again John Frederick wrote to Philip (July 28, 1544; Franz, No. 121), demanding that the imperial edict be enforced against the obstinate Anabaptists, who had had ten years to consider. If Philip hesitated to do this, he should at least not hold it against John Frederick if he (John Frederick) punished them in accord with the imperial edict, which had been confirmed at the last Reichstag at Speyer. Again Philip withheld his reply; his conscience prevented his consenting to the request. To the extreme annoyance of Justus Menius, the superintendent, the Anabaptists in Hausbreitenbach remained unpunished. Philip also protected the Anabaptists in Mühlhausen, whereas George of Saxony had them cruelly put to death and the Elector of Saxony demanded the death penalty for them. In a writing to John Frederick on Aug. 19, 1545, Philip cited his general reasons and also the passages of Scripture, Matt. 13: 24-30; Luke 9:52-56; and Romans 14:1-5 and 12 ff., and said, "These quotations block our path to such an extent that we cannot find it in our conscience to proceed with such rigor against a person who errs somewhat in the faith; for the person might accept instruction over night and desist from his error. Now if such a one should straightway be put to death by one of us, we are truly concerned that we may not be as innocent of his blood. For if one were to execute all those who are not of our faith, how would the Papists, likewise the Jews, fare, who in this matter err as deeply or even deeper than the Anabaptists? Therefore it pleased us once more, wherever these people are, that they be arrested and indoctrinated by skilled persons with the Word of God; and those who would not return to the church and desist from their error after being instructed should be expelled from the country; if they returned or if they were so completely obstinate that they might infect others they should be kept in prison; the expenses would not be so great" (Franz, No. 128).

This letter is indeed evidence of a generous mind and noble religious tolerance, in which Philip far surpassed his contemporaries and also the reformers Luther (q.v.) and Melancthon (q.v.); he represented a new era, they were still in the clutches of the Middle Ages. He maintained this position even during his imprisonment by Charles V after the unfortunate outcome of the Schmalkaldian War. In his opinion to John Frederick the Middle of Saxony, on March 7, 1559, he says, "It is so, many Anabaptists have an unchristian evil sect, as was shown at Münster and elsewhere; but they are not alike. Some are simple, pious folk; they should be dealt with in moderation. Anabaptists who deal with the sword may rightly also be punished with the sword. But those who err in faith should be dealt with leniently, and shall be instructed in accord with the principle of love to one's neighbor, and no effort shall be spared, also they shall be heard, and if they will not accept the truth and scatter error like a harmful seed among Christians, they shall be expelled and their preaching abolished. But to punish them with death, as happens in some countries, when they have done nothing more than err in faith and have not acted seditiously, cannot be reconciled with the Gospel. Other Christian teachers like Augustine and Chrysostom also violently opposed it."

This attitude Philip also impressed upon his sons in his will: "To kill people for the reason that they believed an error we have never done, and wish to admonish our sons not to do so, for we consider that it is contrary to God, as is clearly shown in the Gospel" (Franz, No. 148).

Philip's sons and descendants held to this attitude. His spirit of gentleness and reconciliation lived on among them. "And it was due to this lenience toward the Anabaptists to a great extent, that new life and wholesome recollection of nearly forgotten truths of salvation were brought to the church" (Wappler, I, 117).

NEFF.

E. Becker, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberhessen," in Archiv für hessische Geschichte und Altertumskunde, n.s. X (Darmstadt, 1914); G. Egelhaaf, Landgraf Philipp der Grossmütige (Halle, 1904); Festschrift zum Gedächtnis Philipps des Grossmütigen (Kassel, 1904); A. Heidenhain, Die Unionspolitik Landgraf Philipps von Hessen 1557-62 (Halle, 1890); K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Landgraf Philipp und die Wiedertäufer," in Ztschrift für die historische Theologie XXVIII (1858) 538-644; XXIX (1859) 167-234; Philipp der Grossmütige (Festschrift des Hist. Vereins für das Grossherzogtum Hessen, 1904); Urkundliche Quellen zur hessischen Ref. Gesch. I, 1182 f. (article by Walther Köhler); Paul Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipps von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Thüringen; C. A. Cornelius, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster (Münster, 1853) 218; TA Hessen (Franz); ML III, 363 ff.

Philip, Margrave of Baden: see Baden.

Philip Mutsemeker belonged to a group of Anabaptists at Maastricht (q.v.), Dutch province of Limburg about 1534. In early September 1534 he was baptized by Henric Rol (q.v.). Arrested with many others in January 1535, he was tried and recanted his faith. Thereupon he was beheaded at Maastricht on Feb. 6, 1535. Mutsemeker's trial is very interesting. He was a young man; Steven Mutsemeker, his father, formerly belonging to the Sacramentists (q.v.), also joined the Anabaptists. Philip, who formerly had been a drunkard and a fighter, had turned to a better life after his conversion. He was apparently a poor man, who repeatedly received relief from the Anabaptists; Jan van Genck (q.v.), the deacon, had even had the roof of his house thatched. It was his opinion that infant baptism was not in accord with the Scriptures and that it was not necessary to hold to the institutions of the Catholic Church, such as fasting. Like many of this Maastricht Anabaptist group Philip had a strong tendency to revolutionary practices.

vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht I (The Hague, 1937) 91, 98, 119.

Philipp Weber: see Plener, Philipp.

Philippites, an Anabaptist group named after Philipp Plener (q.v.), existing as an independent group from c1527 to the middle of the 1540's. Its origins go back to Plener's activities around Bruchsal (q.v.) in southwest Germany. In 1527 Plener came to Moravia and in 1529 established his own Bruderhof at Auspitz (apparently on a communal pattern), made up in the main of brethren from Plener's home area, Württemberg and Baden. In 1531 Blasy Kuhn (q.v.) arrived with the remnants of the old Bruchsal congregation, Kuhn becoming Plener's assistant. There were now three groups in Moravia living communally: the Gabrielites (q.v.), mostly Silesians, in Rossitz (q.v.), the Philippites, and the Tiroleans (under Schützinger, q.v.), both living in Auspitz (q.v.). A smaller Bruderhof of the Philippites existed also at Pulgram (q.v.), Moravia, which united with the Hutterites in 1538. The Auspitz Philippite group attracted many newcomers and c1535 numbered some 400 members. The names of some of these members are recorded in the Hutterite Chronicle and some in the Passau documents, to be discussed below. There were Adam Schlegel (q.v.) and Hans Both (q.v.), both of whom had shifted from the Hutterites to the Philippites; Hans Haffner (q.v.), the author of a remarkable tract; Hans Gentner (q.v.), who turned Hutterite in 1538 and thereafter became quite prominent in this group, and two well-known hymn writers, Hans Betz (q.v.) of Eger and Michael Schneider (q.v.) of Bruchsal.

When persecutions set in in Moravia in 1535 and the brethren were unable to find any place of abode, Plener decided that the entire brotherhood (with the possible exception of the Pulgram people) should return to Germany. Actually the records show that there now existed three different groups 1535-c45. (a) One group arrived safely in the former home area: the triangle Heilbronn-Worms-Strasbourg, with Bruchsal (in the Kraichgau) roughly in the center. Of this group some facts are revealed in epistles by Peter Riedemann (q.v.). Hans Gentner visited them several times 1540-43. Apparently due to a lack of vigorous leadership the group faded out, most likely fusing with the "Swiss Brethren" of that area. This is all the more probable since endeavors toward the unification of all the different Anabaptist groups in the Strasbourg-Worms area were afoot time and again (compare Marpeck's activities in the 1550's).

(b) Another group in Upper Austria (see Austria) is indicated in certain Riedemann epistles and other Hutterite sources. In Steyr (q.v.), Linz (q.v.), and Gmunden small brotherhoods existed 1534-41 called "Philippites"; they were presumably the result of Philippite mission work there before 1535. Later Riedemann felt a concern for their spiritual welfare and wrote them many epistles. One name becomes conspicuous in this group; viz., Wolf Brandhuber (Chronik, 176), doubtless the son of the leader of the old Linz congregation, Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), martyred in 1529. Some of these Upper Austrian Philippites later joined the Hutterites in Moravia, but the majority "turned worldly" and thus disappeared as a distinct group. The Hutterites had not been able to provide them with any leadership outside Moravia. Practically all of these Upper Austrians were urban.

(c) The best-known group is the Passau group, 1535-40. Back in Moravia in 1535, Plener in a last act as bishop had ordained Michael Schneider of Bruchsal as the leader (Vorsteher) of a group of about 60 persons (mostly from Bruchsal) who planned to reach their former homes via the Danube route. Catholic authorities, having been alerted, caught the entire group in August and September 1535 around Passau and imprisoned them in the dungeons of the Passau castle (belonging to the bishop of that city). Some were tortured, but no death penalty was imposed. Some of these brethren died in the following years; some recanted and were set free; of the rest nothing is known. Wolkan in his Lieder gives the best account of this group, using the "Passauer Religions Akten" of Munich. This source gives the names of some 50 Anabaptists, their origin, and in part their story. The 52 hymns of the oldest part of the Ausbund (numbers 81-129) were composed by these Philippite Brethren in Passau. Since some of them later joined the "Swiss Brethren," it is easily understandable that they brought these hymns along from prison and allowed them to be printed (first ed. in 1564) as "hymns of the Swiss Brethren." Of Michael Schneider (the leader) 11 hymns are thus preserved, of Hans Betz 17 (only 11 bearing his signature). One hymn by Betz is also found in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 75-77.

The most remarkable spiritual document coming from the Philippites is the tract Concerning a True Soldier of Christ (q.v.), written c1533-35 by Hans Haffner, of Riblingen near Schwäbisch-Hall. It is a study of what constitutes the proper mental equipment of a disciple: besides love, faith, and hope Haffner emphasizes in particular "Gelassenheit" (q.v.) or inner surrender to God. Comparing this tract with the Ausbund hymns, one easily discovers a great unity of the genius of both, discipleship, resignation, and love being the main ideas stressed, likewise the inevitability of the cross. Once the principle of community of goods was abandoned (in 1535), it was not too difficult for these brethren to merge organically with the Swiss Brethren of southwest Germany.

R.F.

Robert Friedmann, "The Philippite Brethren: Chapter in Anabaptist History," MQR XXXII (1958) 270-97; idem, "Concerning a True Soldier of Christ," MQR V (1931) 87-99; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914); Wolkan, Lieder; ML III, 367 f.

Philippus de Keurs, an Anabaptist martyr, a cabinet-maker, died in 1537 at Cassel in Flanders after a valiant confession of his faith. Particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 41, E 447; ML II, 486.)

NEFF.

Philips, Dirk: see Dirk Philips.

Philips van Hulle, an Anabaptist martyr, unmarried, a brewer, was burned at the stake with two others on April 13, 1557, at the Vrijdagmarkt of Gent, Belgium. Further particulars are lacking. (Verheyden, Gent, 24, No. 52.)

vdZ.

Philips, J. C., a Dutch artist who made the engravings for the thirty pictures of Dutch Mennonite ministers, including Menno Simons, published at Amsterdam in 1743 by Kornelis de Wit under the title

Verzaameling van Afbeeldingen van Doopsgezinde Leeraaren. vdZ.

Philips, Lucas, a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Filips, Lucas.

Philips, Obbe: see Obbe Philips.

Philips Wyntgen van Westbrouck, who was one of the first Anabaptists at Amsterdam, Netherlands, was sentenced to death at The Hague on March 10, 1533, and executed there or at Amsterdam that very day or the next day. His property was confiscated; after the execution, probably by beheading, his head was put on a stake as a deterrent exhibit. Particulars about Westbrouck were not available. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 50, 302.) vdZ.

Phister, Werner, an Anabaptist martyr, an aged preacher of the brotherhood, who was seized at Wädenswil near Zürich, Switzerland, in 1640 and with his wife and his son's wife put into the Othenbach prison at Zürich. Whereas his wife was released, he and his daughter-in-law were kept in arrest until they died of want and misery. The family name of Phister was later found among the Emmental (q.v.) Mennonites. Here Peter Pfister was chosen as preacher in 1809 and (by lot) elder in 1825. NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 819, E 1118; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, n.d.) 386 f., 467; ML III, 371.

Phlein, Christian, a Mennonite elder in the Palatinate, Germany, wrote a letter to David Rutgers at Amsterdam in 1698, which gives information on the material and spiritual conditions of the Palatine congregations. He stated that some of them were planning to emigrate to America, and that the members of the congregations "all stand in peace one with another." There is apparently no further information about this elder. The letter does not indicate which congregation he was serving. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1428.) vdZ.

Phoenixville. About 1750 the Mennonites who had settled in the vicinity of Phoenixville in Chester County, Pa., joined in building a union church on the Charlestown road, two miles from Phoenixville. In 1772 the Mennonites built a school and meetinghouse on Main Street in the town, which was later known successively as Buckwalter's and Morgan's Schoolhouse. In 1794 they erected a stone church on the southwest corner of Main and Church streets. Among the ministers who served there were Bishop Matthias Pennypacker and preachers John Buckwalter, Daniel Showalter, George Hellerman, Jacob Haldeman, John Showalter, and Israel Beidler. Beidler went with John Oberholtzer (q.v.) in the schism of 1847, and the congregation died out in the next decade. About 1873 Henry A. Hunsicker, the minister of an independent Mennonite congregation and the first principal of the Freeland Seminary (q.v.), built a new meetinghouse on the site of the 1794 building in an attempt to establish a new congregation here. He allowed the Lutherans of the city to worship in this building on alternate Sundays. In a few years the Lutherans purchased the meetinghouse, and in 1905 added a Sunday-school annex. They also filled in the cemetery with sufficient soil to bury all but one or two tombstones of the Mennonite cemetery which surrounded the meetinghouse and which contained about one hundred Mennonite graves. According to some authorities there was a meetinghouse on Schuylkill Street before 1750. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1937) 213-15, photograph of the 1794 church following p. 336.

Physicians, Hutterite: see Medicine, Hutterite.

Piccards, a mutilation of the name Beghards (q.v.), an epithet of opprobrium applied to both the Moravian Brethren (q.v.) and the Bohemian Hussites. In government decrees this designation was also used; it thus became so general that the Brethren used it themselves in the title of their writings, often in the following form: "The Brethren who are called Piccards from envy and hate."

The Moravian Piccards of the 15th and 16th centuries were much more radical than those of Bohemia. In Western Europe, particularly in France, the Waldenses (q.v.) of the 15th century are often called Piccards.

The theory that the name Piccards is derived from Picardie, a province in Northern France, where the Waldenses were rather numerous, is wrong.

Whether Nicolaus Storch (q.v.) and Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) were influenced by the Moravian Piccards, as has been suggested, is an open question. (ML III, 374.) NEFF, vdZ.

Pichner, Hans (Mart. Mir. D 162, E 550), Hutterite martyr: see Pürchner, Hans.

Pickelin, Maeyken, an Anabaptist martyr, a simple, God-fearing woman, who was imprisoned in 1590 (place not given) and died as a result of her sufferings. (Mart. Mir. D 777, E 1080; ML III, 371.) NEFF.

Pickert, Veit, from Etzleben, Thuringia, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Sachsenburg, Saxony, in 1527. (Wappler, Thüringen, 45, note 6, ML III, 371.)

Pierijntgen, an Anabaptist martyr; she is the subject of two accounts in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, both inaccurate and incomplete. In one instance she is called Pierijntgen van Male, and in the other Pierijntgen Maelbouts. The research by Verheyden has revealed additional facts. Pierijntgen (Pyrinken) van Male was born at Thielt, Flanders, and lived at Malebosch. She was the widow of Jacob de Backere. She and Marijtgen (Martyncken) suffered martyrdom by beheading at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 12, 1564. The two women are commemorated in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the 1578 and the following editions of the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 301, 306; E 666, 670; Verheyden, Gent, 30, No. 102; ML III, 3.) vdZ.

Pierken van Cleve, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter Aelbrechts.

Pierre Messchars, an Anabaptist martyr, a member of the congregation of Brugge, Belgium, who was arrested with a number of other members in March 1568. He was burned at the stake on March 6 or shortly after. Further particulars are lacking. He may have been a member of the Mennonite Messchaert (q.v.) family, which is found later in the Netherlands. (Verheyden, Brugge, 52, No. 47.)

vbZ.

Pierre Wandesoye, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 26, 1573, with three others. Pierre was sentenced to death because he had attended Anabaptist meetings. He had apparently not yet been baptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 116 f., 178; XIV, 90 f., No. 1027.)

vbZ.

Piers, Wibbe, a Mennonite preacher at Oldelamer in the Dutch province of Friesland, published Seven Verscheyden Brieven aen den Eersaemen Leser, printed at Franeker, 1630. The first six letters are by Wibbe Piers, the seventh by Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.) in 1629.

vbZ.

Pierson (erroneously Piseron), Pierken, a Mennonite from Antwerp, Belgium, who had fled to the Netherlands to escape persecution and settled at Harlingen, Friesland, where he played a part in the Flemish-Frisian strife in 1566. He sided with the Flemish, but in 1574 he is said to have been chosen preacher by the Frisians (stated in a letter by Hans Busschaert, q.v.); he then had some trouble because he refused to "avoid" his former Flemish friends. By trade he was a maker of buttons. (Génard, Antw. Arch.-Bl. XII, 25; DB 1893, 11 f., 21.)

vbZ.

Pieryntgen (Pierijntje, Périnne, Printgen) (van) Loosvelt (Losveldt) (or Peeryntgen Neckers), an Anabaptist martyr, who at the age of 43 was taken prisoner at Meenen (Menin) in Flanders, Belgium, in 1572, while she was visiting a sick woman, and was burned at the stake on Jan. 6, 1573. At no price could she be moved to betray her brethren. She was interrogated on ten points of doctrine, which she answered aptly with Biblical references. When she was led to death she said to the people, "Go and buy testaments and read in them why I am condemned to death and must die." (Mart. Mir. D 641, E 962; BRN VII, 74 f.; ML II, 690.) NEFF.

Pieryntgen Ketels, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed with her mother Leentgen and also Maryntgen and Pieryntgen of Male in 1564, in the abbey of St. Peter in Gent, Belgium. The exact date and method of execution are not known. The names of these martyrs are found in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede," which is found in the Lietboecxken of 1578 and following editions. (Offer, 651; Mart. Mir. D 301, E 666; Verheyden, Gent, 30, No. 100; ML II, 484.) NEFF, vbZ.

Pieter: see also Peter.

Pieter Aelbrechts (Pierken van Cleve) of Cleve, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on March 30, 1568, on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium, together with Jan van Parijs, Hendrik Maelschap (van Braght writes Maelschalk), and Laurens Pieters. When they arrived at the site of execution the Spanish provost compelled the executioner who was to strangle them as the sentence decreed, to burn them. The waiting victims had meanwhile begun a song, "Ik roep U o hemelsche Vader aen" (I call upon Thee, O heavenly Father). So the Spaniards beat them violently and mutilated them terribly, and then burned them alive. They were aenkomende vrienden (q.v.), i.e., not yet admitted into the brotherhood by baptism. Pieter and his comartys are commemorated in the hymn "Een liedeken van XLI Vrienden," found in the edition of 1578 of the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 367, E 723; Verheyden, Gent, 43, No. 137; ML I, 364.)

vbZ.

Pieter Andriesz: see Hesselings, P. A.

Pieter de Backer(e), an Anabaptist martyr, who is listed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror as having been arrested at Gent, Belgium, with four other Anabaptists, and executed at the market place of Antwerp in 1557. The official records, collected and published by P. Génard in Antwerpsch Archieven-Blad, give the information that Pieter Pluvier, commonly called Pieter de Backere (baker) of Wer- vik in Flanders was burned at the stake at Antwerp on Jan. 30, 1557. His name is also found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken.

vbZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 184, E 568; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 433, 437; XIV, 22 f., No. 239; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML I, 102.

Pieter Boekebinder: see Peter Scheymaker.

Pieter Claesz (Peter Coster), an Anabaptist martyr, who had been a sexton of the Catholic church at Zaandam, moved to Amsterdam, joined the Anabaptists there, being baptized by Pieter de Houtzager (q.v.), and was ordained as a preacher by Bartholomeus, i.e., Bartel Boeckbinder (q.v.). During his trial he declared that he had baptized only one person. In March 1534 he was among the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam to Bergklooster (q.v.) in order to go on to Münster (q.v.). He was released, and returned to Amsterdam; but shortly after he was betrayed by a woman and seized; because he had been baptized and was preaching he was condemned to death and beheaded on May 25, 1535.

vbZ.

Mart. Mir. D 36, E 50; Grosheide, Verhooren, 121 f.; DB 1917, 111, No. 24; Mellink, Wederdopers, 163 f.; ML II, 603.

Pieter Claesz Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland. Neither the date nor the place of execution is known. According to the Bibliographie, he was put to death at Enkhuizen, North Holland. (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 464; Bibliographie II, 671, No. 136; ML III, 352.)

vbZ.

Pieter de Cleercq, an Anabaptist martyr, a miller by trade, burned at the stake on March 4, 1557, on the Vrijdagmarkt of Gent, Belgium. He had been arrested by treachery. Particulars are lacking. (Verheyden, Gent, 23, No. 29.) vDZ.

Pieter Coerten (Coerte, Courte), a cloth shearer, born at Meenen, Flanders, living at Antwerp and later at Gent, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake with three others on July 5, 1559, on the Vrijdagmarkt at Gent, Belgium; on August 7 of that year seven more suffered martyrdom. All were members of the Gent congregation and had been seized on Friday after Pentecost, as Hans de Vette (q.v.) relates in his letter, who also gives the names of these eleven martyrs. They all remained steadfast. Their names are commemorated in the hymn "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), found in the Lietboekken. (Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 58.) vDZ.

Pieter Coster, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter Claesz.

Pieter van Eynoven (Eynhoven), a native of Antwerp, Belgium, a silk weaver 28 years old, had been baptized "according to Christ's teaching" by a certain Leenaert (viz., Lenaert Boeckbinder) at Antwerp. He later lived in Rotterdam, Holland, where he was seized and twice horribly tortured, but he remained true to his faith, and was condemned to die by fire with two companions on March 28, 1558, at Rotterdam. While the execution was being carried out a popular uprising broke out, to which he owed his forcible release. (Mart. Mir. D 191, E 675; DB 1905, 172; ML I, 623.) NEFF, vDZ.

Pieter Florisz of Oosthoven, Flanders (Belgium), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Nipkerke (Nieppe) in Flanders, renounced his faith, repented of his recantation and earnestly witnessed to his faith, and suffered death at the stake in 1564 at Armentières, France. (Mart. Mir. D 301, E 666; ML I, 654.) NEFF.

Pieter Foppes, of Leeuwarden, Friesland, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to death by the Court of Holland on Feb. 15, 1541. The execution took place by beheading, probably at The Hague, Holland. Particulars are lacking. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 46, 237, 745.) vDZ.

Pieter Gerritsz (Wageman), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, a native of Enkhuizen, province of North Holland, was baptized before Christmas of 1534 by Lenaert Boeckbinder (q.v.) of Antwerp. He was seized at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, together with Adriaen Jorisse of Brouwershaven, who was also baptized by Leenaert, Jan Jansz (baptized in 1535 by Damas Jacobs at Middelburg), and Janneke Melchior Simons of Den Briel (baptized in 1534 by Cornelis Pietersz wt den Briel). They did not believe in the miracle of the Mass. After severe torture they were beheaded early in the morning of Sept. 4, 1536, the corpses burned, and the heads set on poles. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 38, E 445) names them Pieter Gerritsz, Pieter Jorisz, Pieter Leydekker, and Janneken Mels. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; ML II, 84.) K.V.

Pieter de Guliker (Peter of Jülich; official name Pieter Aertsz), a Dutch Anabaptist, was arrested with a number of members of the congregation at Nieuwvaart (now the village de Klundert), not far from Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant, on Aug. 5, 1571, while they were attending a worship service in the house in which Pieter de Guliker, a tailor, lived in the front, and Jan Pieters, a weaver, lived in the rear. The meeting was betrayed to the mayor Anthonis van der Broek, while he was in Gerrit Vorster's tavern. After a confinement of two days at this place the prisoners were taken to Breda, where they were brutally tortured. Pieter de Guliker recanted and was beheaded, whereas the others remained steadfast and died at the stake.

W. Meindersma published a study of these martyrs (DB 1912), which reveals the following facts about them: Preaching services were held at two places; viz., at Pieter's home and at the home of the widow Elskens Deckers. The records of the trial indicate that there were about 50 persons at the meeting, rather than 100, as stated by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror. The police raid occurred while Theunis was preaching. Several of the imprisoned women managed to escape. Two were seized on August 24—Hilleken Jacobs, Jacob Cornelis' maid, 25 years old, and Anneken, the wife of Pieter Pieters of Klundert, 58 years old. The execution probably took place in October. The judges were two members of the City Council of Brussels, Desiderius van Sestich and Nikolaus de Zoete. The Meindersma account also includes a letter not found in the Martyrs' Mirror, which Pieter wrote to his wife. (Mart. Mir. D 603-5, E 929-31; DB 1912, 30-48; ML II, 198.) K.V.

Pieter van den Hende, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Stekene, Flanders, who was living at Gent, Belgium, was burned at the stake with Willem van Ackere (de Camp) on July 11, 1551, at Merelbeke near Gent. Both had been seized at Merelbeke. Pieter was a cabinetmaker. His property was confiscated. Both Pieter and Willem had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). (Verheyden, Gent, 15, No. 28.) vDZ.

Pieter Hillebrantsz, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on Jan. 10, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, "because he had been rebaptized." Pieter, a "snydere van calckeren," which probably means that he was a tailor of Calcar (on the Rhine, Germany), was apparently a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) vDZ.

Pieter de Houtzager (Peter Houdtsager), an adherent of the fanatical Jan Matthijs (q.v.) van Haarlem, came to Friesland in December 1533. In the Frisian village of Arum he baptized a woman named Hillegond, who suffered a martyr's death by drowning at Kampen in February 1534. In December 1533 he stayed at Leeuwarden, capital of Friesland, where he baptized Dirk Philips (q.v.) and tried to win the Sacramentists (q.v.) in this town for his Anabaptist ideas and conviction. In a poster the government named Pieter de Houtzager with Melchior Hofmann, Jakob van Campen, Obbe

Philips, and other "misleaders of the populace." He escaped persecution by flight to Amsterdam. He was one of the fanatical leaders who in March 1534 was taking many people by boat to Münster (q.v.); but they were halted at Bergklooster (q.v.) near Genemuiden. On March 26, 1534, he was beheaded with Bartel (Bartholomeus) Boeckbinder (q.v.) (or van Halle) and five others at Haarlem. J.Y.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 24, 27, 745; BRN VII, 31, 45, 106, 130; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 76, 105 f., 159; DB 1875, 61; 1884, 7-9; 1917, 98, 106 f., 151; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Pieter ten Hove, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hove, Pieter ten.

Pieter Jansz, of Westzaan, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to death on May 16, 1534, by the Court of Holland and beheaded the same day or the next, probably at Amsterdam. Pieter was one of the Anabaptists who were arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.), having sailed from Amsterdam en route to Münster (q.v.) in March 1534. He was then apparently released, but soon after apprehended again. vDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744 f.; DB 1917, 122, No. 151; Mellink, Wederdopers, 159.

Pieter Jans(z), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Blankenham, Dutch province of Overijssel, confessed that he had been baptized about 1536 at Oldersum in East Friesland, Germany, by Menno Simons, and was beheaded at Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, on June 14, 1540. Further particulars are lacking. vDZ.

DB 1875, 65 f.; 1906, 4; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 243; ML II, 392.

Pieter Jansz (Peter Janssen), an Anabaptist martyr who had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.), was burned at the stake on March 20, 1549, at Amsterdam with seven other martyrs. He was a native of "Lininckhuysen" (Lüdinghausen in the bishopric of Münster, Westphalia?), a shoemaker by trade. His wife Trijnen van Dorsten (q.v.) was executed on Jan. 15, 1550. Pieter and his comartys are commemorated in the hymn "Tis nu schier al/vervult ons broeders getal" (The number of our brethren is now nearly complete), found in the Dutch hymnal Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and following editions. vDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 82, E 483; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 159; F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 193, No. 473; ML II, 390.

Pieter Jansz-Twisckvolk, a branch of the Dutch Mennonites: see Twiscken.

Pieter Jeltjes, a Dutch elder and merchant living at Kollum, province of Friesland, and a member of the Old Frisian (q.v.) branch of the Mennonites. In 1599 he became involved in a disagreement with Elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.), who was very strict, considering it sin to sell to non-Mennonites, and who at a conference of Old Frisian delegates meeting at Dokkum on Dec. 16, 1599, banned the more liberal Pieter Jeltjes and his adherents. Concerning Pieter's life and work nothing further is known. vDZ.

Lambert Pietersz, Nootwendighe Verclaringhe van't Verscheel . . . tusschen Jan Jacobsz van Harlinghen . . . ende tusschen Pieter Jeltjes van Collum (1624, n.p.); DB 1889, 6; 1892, 71; 1912, 66, 68-71.

Pieter-Jeltjesvolk were the adherents of Pieter Jeltjes (q.v.), who, after this leader had been excommunicated in 1599, organized congregations at Kollum (q.v.) and a few other places in the Dutch province of Friesland. These congregations gradually died out or merged with congregations of other Mennonite branches. The Balk (q.v.) congregation, which belonged to this group, later usually called Old Frisians or even Old Flemish, existed until 1853-54, when most of the members emigrated to the United States. vDZ.

Pieter de Jonckheere, an Anabaptist martyr, brother of the martyrs Vijnken, Goudeken, and Janneken de Jonckheere, was burned at the stake on March 12, 1562, at Gent, Belgium. He was born at Merendree, Flanders. Further particulars are lacking, except that he was in prison before Dec. 5, 1561, and that he remained steadfast. (Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 80; idem, "Mennonites in Flanders," Ms.) vDZ.

Pieter Jorisz, an Anabaptist martyr: see Adriaen Jorisse.

Pieter van Keulen: see Peter van Coelen.

Pieter van Leiden, a Dutch Anabaptist preacher, was arrested and imprisoned at The Hague, Holland, in December 1535. Further particulars are lacking. (DB 1917, 114, No. 44.) vDZ.

Pieter Leydecker, an Anabaptist martyr, was inhumanly tortured and beheaded with two brethren and a sister at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, on Sept. 4, 1536. This is mentioned by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 38, E 445), but the name given here is not quite correct. This martyr's name was probably Jan Jansz(e) (q.v.), also called Hansken Schalydecker; he was a native of Tongeren in Belgium. NEFF, vDZ.

Pieter (Pierre) van Maldeghem, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Nevele, Flanders, was burned at the stake with three others on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, on July 16, 1562. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror only gives the year of execution, not the exact date. These martyrs are commemorated in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the 1578 and following editions of the Lietboekken. vDZ.

Offer, 650; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 87; ML III, 3.

Pieter (Pierre) van Male, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on July 16, 1562 (van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives only the year, not the exact date), with three others on the Vrijdagsmarkt of Gent, Belgium. Pieter van Male, who may have been related to the Mennonite van Male family of Flanders, later found at Haarlem, Holland, was 39 years of age and a native of Gent. He had been arrested before Jan. 7, 1562, but, as the Inquisitor Titelman (q.v.) complained, the trial had been postponed because the head bailiff of Gent and the bailiff of Den Oudburg disagreed concerning their competence in this case. Pieter's wife Lynken de Meyere (q.v.) had already suffered martyrdom on March 24, 1562. Pieter and his co-martyrs are commemorated in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyft vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the 1578 and following editions of the Lietboecxken.

vdZ.

Offer, 650; Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 85; ML III, 3.

Pieter Matthijsz, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake on Aug. 21, 1552, at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland. Particulars are lacking. He was probably a brother of the martyrs Willem Matthijsz and Jannetgen Matthijsdochter, executed at Leiden on the same day. (Offer, 578, note 1.)
vdZ.

Pieter met den creupelen voet (Peter with the lame foot), an Anabaptist martyr, a cloth dresser, was burned at the stake on Aug. 27, 1555, at Antwerp, Belgium. Neither the Offer des Heeren nor van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives the exact date or the method of execution. His official name was Pieter van Beringen. He was put to death with Hans Borduerwercker, Jan Droochscheerder, and Frans Sweertveger. Their names are found in hymn No. 16 of the Lietboecxken: "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father).
vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 161, E 550; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 426, 429; XIV, 20 f., No. 230; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML III, 352.

Pieter van der Meulen (Peter van der Muelen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 15, 1564, at Gent, Belgium. The exact date was unknown (not found in Offer des Heeren or in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror) until Verheyden published it from the records. Pieter, 27 years old and (re)baptized in 1563, was not a native of Gent; hence his property could not be confiscated. Verheyden mentions a few other van der Meulens, probably relatives of Pieter, who were punished for "heresy." Pieter's name is found in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyft vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the 1578 and following editions of the Lietboecxken.
vdZ.

Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 301, E 666; Verheyden, Gent, 31, No. 104; ML III, 173, 352.

Pieter de Meulenaer (Peter the Miller), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake (van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror says erroneously beheaded) at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 22, 1557. His official name was Pieter van Beke; he was a miller and a weaver, a native of Petegem, near Deinze, Flanders. His name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken.
vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 438; XIV, 22 f., No. 245; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 71; ML III, 180.

Pieter Meynghers: see Pieter (de) Schoenmaker.

Pieter Neert, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Jan. 19, 1554, on the Vrijdagmarkt at Gent, Belgium. By trade he was a weaver or cloth shearer. Further particulars are lacking. (Verheyden, Gent, 19, No. 39.)
vdZ.

Pieter den Ouden (Old Peter), also called Pieter (den) Oudeg(h)od(t), an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders on April 30, 1569, after being cruelly tortured three times (van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives only the year). He was executed with five other Anabaptists, and died with the words, "O Lord, stand by Thy servant and strengthen him in this last extremity, and do not hold this evil deed to their account, but convert them; for they know not what they do." He was a native of Kortrijk, living as a cabinetmaker at Meenen (Menin), where he was arrested. His property was confiscated. He had been (re)baptized in 1568.

NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 408, E 759; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 38, No. 23; ML III, 351.

Pieter Pieters (called Beckjen or Beck), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, a skipper of Asperen, living at Amsterdam, was sentenced to death after cruel torture, because he had attended the "damned and forbidden meetings of the Mennonites," had furthermore permitted secret meetings of the Mennonites on his ship; although he had not yet been (re)baptized, he was probably a "principal leader"; his two oldest children had been baptized as Catholics, but the youngest was still unbaptized. He confessed that he had not attended the Catholic church for four or five years, and that he had confessed to a priest only once, about twenty years previously; he had never gone to Mass. Notwithstanding torture and much admonition by Catholic priests and by the sheriffs of Amsterdam, he refused to return to the "old faith"; remaining steadfast he was burned at the stake on Feb. 26, 1569, at Amsterdam. His property was confiscated. On the way to the site of execution Willem Jans, also an Anabaptist, called out to him, "Fight bravely, dear brother," whereupon he himself was burned at the stake two weeks later.
NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 385, E 738 f.; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 179 f.; ML I, 150; III, 372.

Pieter Pieters (Peter Petersz) of Leiden (called Borrekiek, Borrekieck, or Barekiek), an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Amsterdam, Holland, on July 10, 1535 (not May 15 as van Braght states). He was a weaver, who had been (re)baptized in 1534 by Cornelis wt den Briel (q.v.). In the spring of 1535 he fled from Leiden to Amsterdam. In his confession he clearly showed that he did not agree with the revolutionary ideas of most of the Leiden Anabaptists. He had not been in the Catholic church for two or three years and emphatically rejected the Catholic doctrine of the Mass. (Mart. Mir. D 619, E 765; Grosheide, Verhooren, 150-52; ML III, 372.)
vdZ.

Pieter Pietersz, of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland, burned at the stake on May 11, 1534, probably at The Hague (not, as Mellink states, at Amsterdam). Pieter had preached and baptized. He had been in the group who sailed from Amsterdam in March 1534 en route to Münster (q.v.), but was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 115, No. 56; Mellink, Wederdopers, 159, 353.)

vdZ.

Pieter Pietersz (Coman Piet), of Leiden, Holland, apparently a "koopman," i.e., merchant, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on May 29, 1536, at The Hague. He had been (re)baptized at Leiden in November 1534. He is charged with the crimes of being rebaptized, having preached in Anabaptist meetings, and having regularly received messages from Jan van Leyden (q.v.), then in Münster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 143, 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 193 f.)
vdZ.

Pieter Pluvier (Plovier), an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieter de Backere.

Pieter Potvliet, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Thielt in Flanders, a weaver, was beheaded with his brother Jelis Potvliet and Jelis Strings at Wer-vik, Flanders, Belgium, in 1562 (exact date unknown). They had been sentenced to be burned at the stake, but because the heavy rains had made the wood too wet to burn they were beheaded. (Mart. Mir. D 289, E 656; ML III, 386.)
vdZ.

Pieter Schoenmaker, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Rijssel (Lille) in France on March 16, 1563. Pieter, a native of Eecen, Flanders, whose official name was Pieter Meynghers, son of Josse van Gheldere, was a shoemaker by trade. On March 7, 1563, a number of Mennonites of Halewijn (Halluin) were arrested including the preacher Jan de Swarte (q.v.) and his family, and also Pieter Schoenmaker and his wife Jacomijntgen. They were all conducted to Rijssel, and tried, sentenced, and executed there. Pieter and all the others remained steadfast except Jacomijntgen, who recanted. (Mart. Mir. D 299, E 665; ML III, 352.)
vdZ.

Pieter Stayaerts (Styaert, Stayert) and his cousin Jan Stayaerts (q.v.), two seekers after God, Anabaptist martyrs, who lived with their parents in Mereedor (Meerendree), a village of Flanders, Belgium. Through searching the Scriptures they arrived at the belief that baptism is necessary for the regenerated, and traveled to Germany to look for others of their faith. Being baptized there, but not finding satisfaction, probably because they were averse to the revolutionary views of many Anabaptists, they returned to their home, were seized there, were held prisoner in a vile pit, and then beheaded in 1538 at Vinderhout, a village near Gent, Belgium. This account by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 44, E 449) is correct, as has been shown by the official documents (Verheyden, Gent, 4, Nos. 9-10). Van Braght, however, lists another martyr by the same name, Pieter Stayert, who with some others was executed at Gent in 1569 (Mart. Mir. D 407, E 759). This Pieter Stayert is commemorated in the hymn "Alsmen schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Liet-boecxken. (Offer, 653.) Verheyden (Gent, 56) did not find this latter martyr in the records of Gent.

NEFF, vdZ.

Pieter Thymans (Peter Thijmanszoon), an Anabaptist martyr of Zutphen, burned at the stake in Amsterdam, Holland, on Aug. 6, 1552. By trade he was a cooper and later a bookbinder; he was baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). Pieter was in a group of twenty Anabaptists who were arrested at Amsterdam in May 1552. Only two of them were citizens of Amsterdam; all the others had come to Amsterdam from elsewhere. Pieter had come only eight days before he was arrested. Five were burned at the same time as Pieter, five more on Jan. 6, 1553, and the other nine, who had not been rebaptized and who recanted, were only fined and banished. (Mart. Mir. D 142, E 535; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 159-61.)
NEFF, vdZ.

Pieter Trijnes of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death with Dirk Pieters Krood (q.v.), Claes Roders, and Pieter Claes Jans. The date of the execution is unknown. It probably took place at Enkhuizen, Dutch province of North Holland. (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 464; Bibliographie II, 781, No. 791.)
NEFF.

Pieter Verlonge(n), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake with Gerrit Vermandele and Willem de Clercq at Antwerp, Belgium, on March 30, 1569. A number of particulars, including the exact date of the execution, not given in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, have been published by Génard in the Antwerpsch Archieven-Blad: Pieter was a native of Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders; he lived at Borgerhout near Antwerp; by trade he was a weaver. About one and a half years before his arrest he was married; his wife also belonged to the church; the marriage had been performed in the presence of the congregation by a certain Herman (probably Elder Herman Timmerman, q.v.) in a house at Borgerhout. Pieter rejected infant baptism because this practice is not found in the Scriptures. He was twice tortured very cruelly, but remained steadfast.
vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 415, E 766; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 346, 369, 399, 440; XIV, 64 f., No. 715.

Pieter Vettewarier, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the market place at Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 16, 1558. His name is commemorated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken. Some particulars about this martyr have been published by Génard in the Antwerpsch Archieven-Blad: his official name was Pieter Henrick; he had a grocery store with the name "In de Vettewary," hence his name. Génard also lists Pieter van Hese, "vettewarier int Lelyken," who had been arrested on June 11, 1535, and sentenced on Dec. 24, 1535, to a pilgrimage to Nicosie, because he had associated with the Anabaptists and other "Lutherans," i.e., heretics. This man may have been identical with Pieter Vettewarier.
vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 454, 465; XIV, 14 f., No. 142; 24 f., No. 270; ML III, 352.

Pieter Willemsz was a follower and friend of the Dutch elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.). He lived at Hoorn; Jan Jacobsz, after his banishment from Friesland on April 13, 1600, found shelter in his home. He accompanied Jan Jacobsz on his tours of baptism and after the death of Jacobsz he published his songs under the title Eenighe Gheestelijke Liedekens, gemackt aen versheyden persoonen door Jan Jacobs zoon van Harlinghen (Amsterdam, 1612). He also published a songbook entitled Eenighe Nieuwe Gheestelijke Liedekens gemaeckt door versheyden persoonen . . . (Amsterdam, 1612), containing 36 songs, most of which were composed by Pieter Willemsz himself. (Obviously the year 1612 on the title page is an error, because at the end of the book the note is found: "Gedruct bij Nicolaes Biestkens in de Lelye onder de Doornen, Anno 1613" and the last song is dated Dec. 21, 1612.) Pieter Willemsz, who later probably became an elder of the Jan-Jacobsz group, also visited "our friends in Prussia." It is, however, not known which Prussian congregations belonged to the Jan-Jacobsz group. Years of birth (c1560) and death and other particulars about Pieter Willemsz were not available. vdZ.

J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden," in Nederl. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XI (The Hague, 1914) issue III, 196 f., 201, 204-6, 239.

Pieters: see also Pietersz.

Pieters, a Mennonite family found since the early 17th century at Aardenburg (q.v.) in Dutch Zealand Flanders. The members of this family were usually in business, and in the course of three centuries many of them have served the congregation of Aardenburg as deacons. vdZ.

Pieters, Cornelis: see Cornelis wt den Briel.

Pieters, Derk (d. 1566 or 1567), a Dutch Mennonite who lived at the Melkema farm near Huizinge, province of Groningen, was the ancestor of the well-known and large Mennonite Huizinga (q.v.) family. He was married to Katrine Tomas. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Derk Pieters en Katrine Tomas (Groningen, 1883); Groningsche volks-almanak 1921, 98, 102, 105.

Pieters, Dirk. About 1600 there were in Holland two Mennonite preachers bearing this name. One Dirk Pieters lived at Hoorn, originally a member of the Frisian branch and an elder of the congregation, later apparently joining the Waterlanders. In 1610 he opposed the union of some English Brownists (see Smyth) with the Waterlanders at Amsterdam. He died in 1612.

The other Dirk Pieters, also called Derk Pieters van Nierop, was in 1580 a preacher of the Frisian Mennonite congregation at Nieuwe Niedorp. He is said to have been of a peaceful disposition, trying to eliminate the schisms which had arisen among the Dutch Mennonites. He too joined the Waterlanders and became a preacher at Amsterdam, where he died about 1604. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 480, 531; II, Nos. 834, 1361; DB 1876, 37.) vdZ.

Pieters, Ebbe, a Dutch elder: see Ebbe Pieters.

Pieters, Menno, author of Reys-boecxken, ofte gemeen onderwys in de Christelycke ofte Apostolische Leere (Gouda, 1616). No information was available concerning him. vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 80.

Pieters, Ocke (d. in 1685 at Hamburg, Germany), was ordained as a preacher of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite congregation in 1671; in 1676 he was ordained as an elder by the elders Jan Sibes Pottebacker of Harlingen and Remmert Jacobs. Pieters preached the first sermon in the new meetinghouse at Altona on March 14, 1675. In 1678 Ocke Pieters, Gerrit Roosen, and Hans Hermans met with Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), then visiting Hamburg, to investigate his orthodoxy. vdZ.

C. B. Roosen, Geschiede der Mennoniten-Gemeinde Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 48, 51, 57, 61.

Pieters, Tamme (c1650-90), a son of Pieter Michiels of Westeremden, Dutch province of Groningen, was in 1683-90 a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite congregation of Huizinge (q.v.). He was a member of the well-known Huizinga (q.v.) family. About his marriage to Geertuid Derks in 1678 there is the following information: "Married at Huizinge in the house of Gerit Bennen and performed by Oom Willem Janssen." His son Derk Tammes (1679-1728) was a preacher of the same congregation. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Derk Pieters en Katrine Tomas (Groningen, 1883) 2; DB 1879, 4.

Pietersbierum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Jacob Teunis, elder of the Jan-Jacobsgezinden branch of the Mennonites, baptized a number of persons in 1603-18. Of a congregation at Pietersbierum, however, there is no information. (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 164.)

Pietersz: see also Peters.

Pietersz, Jacob: see Meulen, Jacob Pietersz van der.

Pietersz, Jacob (also called Jacob Pietersz van de Kooch, Cooch, Coogh) (1599-1671), of Koog aan de Zaan, Dutch province of North Holland, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Koog and Zaandam-West. He served here from before 1645 until his death. Jacob Pietersz was a peaceable man, as is shown from a letter dated Jan. 30, 1661, in which he urged moderation and peace. On June 9, 1664, he tried to intervene in the quarrels which had arisen in the Flemish congregation at Amsterdam (see Lammerenkrijgh), but in vain. He then published Vrede-basuyt tot verminderingh van de verschillen, voorgevallen onder de Doopsgezinde tot Amsterdam (Amsterdam, 1664), in which he criticized the quarrels and showed his sympathy with Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and the Lamists (q.v.). This book was opposed by P(ieter) A(postool) in his Antwoort op de soo genaemde Vredbasuyn (Amsterdam, 1665). Jacob Pietersz had previously published Veilighe Wech (Amsterdam, 1631), in which he warned against the practice of strict banning. He also published Korte Onderwysinge voor de jonge Aenkomelingen . . ., a catechism (first edition lost; 2nd edition Wormerveer, 1650; 3rd edition, called 2nd on title page, Amsterdam, 1674); Inleydinge om te koomen tot een recht gebruyck van de tijdelicke Goederen (Wormerveer, 1649) and Handelingh of Onderrichtinge om te koomen tot de ware Ruste des Gemoeds . . . (Amsterdam, 1652), a devotional booklet followed by an appendix which discusses the way in which Mennonite ministers are to be appointed and their authority. He is probably identical with the Jacob Pietersz who was a member of the Frisian Mennonite congregation at Zaandam, but who joined the Flemish congregation with some followers about 1632. vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 2032; Biogr. Wb., V, 169; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 97; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 94.

Pietersz, Jelder, a deacon or a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, who ardently promoted the reunification of the Dutch brotherhood, divided by schisms. In 1610 his congregation united with the Frisian congregation at Harlingen, which step was greatly censured by most Flemish Mennonites, especially those in the province of Groningen. In 1608 Jelder Pietersz, in the name of the Harlingen Flemish congregation, had written Deemoedige Remonstrantie to plead for the union of Flemish and Frisian Mennonites. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 523, 539, 557.) vbZ.

Pietersz, Lambert, author of Nootwendighe Verclaringhe van 't Verscheel ende Questie, geresen tusschen Jan Jacobsz van Harlinghen met zijne Medehulpers en tusschen P. Jelties van Collum met syne Medestanders (n.p., 1621). This booklet gives some information about the schism among the Old Frisian Mennonites (see also Jan Jacobsz, and Pieter Jeltjes). The author was an opponent of Jan Jacobsz and a follower of Pieter Jeltjes. He was a "bishop" of the Old Frisian Mennonite congregation at Bolsward, Dutch province of Friesland, a malt maker by trade, and no doubt the author of some other books, one of which was an attack on the Catholic doctrine of the Apostolic Succession, entitled Proeve op die Pauselijke Afkomste ende succesie (2 vol., Hoorn, 1633). vbZ.

Pietersz, Pieter (German, Peter Peters), called "de Oude" (Senior), was born at Alkmaar on Jan. 28, 1574, d. Oct. 14, 1651, at Oost-Zaandam, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher, serving in the Waterlander congregation of De Rijp about 1600-25, and then until his death in the Waterlander or "Komenjannen" congregation at Zaandam. He was a friend of the Waterlander leader and elder Hans de Ries (q.v.), and sided with him in the dispute with Nittert Obbes (q.v.) and Jan Theunis (q.v.). Pietersz is said to have been a gentle, peace-loving, pious man, averse to doctrinal strife; for more than fifty years he worked with unusual effectiveness in the office of preaching. He was a carpenter or rather a maker of windmills and had no special theological training. On May 25, 1627, after he had preached his sermon at Marken-binnen (q.v.), he was compelled to dispute with the Reformed minister Abdias Widmarius (q.v.), who accused him of Socinianism (q.v.). During his ministry at De Rijp, Pieters had some disagreement with his co-preacher Jan Willems (q.v.), caused by views on dogma as well as by personal differences.

Pietersz wrote a number of devotional books, tracts, and sermons. His best-known book is Wegh na Vreden-stadt: waer in ghewesen wordt hoemen die Vrede mach bekomen (Way to the City of Peace, in Which is Shown How to Obtain Peace), followed by a prayer and some hymns. This book, written about 1625, went through eight Dutch editions, most of which were undated (nearly all editions now lost). It is a remarkable book, depicting in dialogue form the itinerary to the "heavenly Jerusalem," where is found "the unity of spirit under the palms of peace." "No doubt Wegh na Vreden-stadt is a book of fine Christian spirit and moralism. Yet its spirit is far different from all that is known in earlier Mennonite literature, and the book certainly deserves the honor of being one of the very first pietistic writings in Dutch Mennonitism" (Friedmann). Both in method and spirit John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678) may have been inspired by Wegh na Vreden-stadt.

Besides this book Pietersz published Twee Eenvoudighe stichtelijke Predicaten . . . (Amsterdam and De Rijp, 1624); Toetst-steen om te proeven elck mensche de wegh sijns levens (De Rijp, 1629); Spiegel der Gierigheydt (Hoorn, 1638; 9th ed., 1698); Hemelsche Bruyloft (De Rijp, 1641; Amsterdam, 1642 and 1662); Spiegel der Bermherticheyt (De Rijp, 1645), followed by Proeve des Waren Christelycken Geloofs and Een Christelijke Sendtbrief aen alle Doopsgezinden; Predicaties over de Liefde (De Rijp, 1642), a sermon on the Foolish Virgins and some other sermons. A sermon on the Song of Solomon 2:1-6, "Stichtelycke Predicatie van de Bloem te Saron," is found in Kort-Verhael van het leven en de Daden van Hans de Ries (De Rijp, 1644). Finally Pieter Pietersz' Opera (Complete Works) were published in Harlingen, 1651 (reprinted Amsterdam, 1666, n.d., but between 1675 and 1686, 1698, 1715, and 1740).

Pietersz' works not only were eagerly read both by Mennonites and non-Mennonites in the Netherlands, but they also have been very popular among the Mennonites of the Palatinate, Prussia, South Russia, and also in America, where they were imported by the Russian Mennonites, especially the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in 1874. For this purpose they were translated into German in the early 18th century and maybe even before, but all these old editions are apparently lost. The following editions in German are known: Weg nach Friedenstadt (1790); Spiegel der Gierigkeit (1827); Spiegel der Barmherzigkeit (1865); Ein Christlicher Sendbrief (1865); Ausgewählte Schriften von Peter Peters . . . für die Liebhaber der Wahrheit aufs Neue aufgelegt (Stuttgart, 1865; reprinted Elkhart, 1901);

the American edition also contains a translation from the Dutch of the Toetzs-steen under the title Prüfstein der Menschheit, um für jedermann zu prüfen den Weg seines Lebens, ob er recht gehe nach der Stadt des Friedens, oder hingehe nach Unfrieden und Jammer. Pietersz' tract, Himmlische Hochzeit, translated by the translator of Prüfstein, appeared in America in 1906. NEFF, vDZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II (Amsterdam, 1744) 588-96, with a picture of Pieter Pietersz; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 80 f.; DB 1863, 122; 1864, 15; 1896, 18-26; 1900, 90; 1907, 49 f.; 1917, 30-32; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 171-74, 176, 202; Amstelodamum Yearbook XXV (1928) 96, 97, 98, 119, No. 51; Gem.-Kal. 1930; MQR XIV (1941) 188; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 106-11; ML III, 354.

Pietersz, Pieter, d. Aug. 27, 1680, at Koog aan de Zaan, Dutch province of North Holland, was a preacher of the Koog-Zaandijk Waterlander congregation. He was an ardent Collegiant (q.v.) and an advocate of free speaking in Mennonite worship services. J. D. Middelhoven delivered his funeral sermon, Lykrede, ofte Aenmerking des Doods . . . (Amsterdam, 1680). vDZ.

J. C. van Slee, De Rijsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 201.

Pieters(z), Syvaert (Sywert), a preacher of the Old Frisian Mennonites at Hoorn, Holland, in temperament and thought like P. J. Twisck (q.v.), wrote in collaboration with Twisck the foreword to the Hoorn book of martyrs (1617), which caused great offense by its violent attack upon the Waterlanders (q.v.). This foreword contains a confession of faith compiled from the works of Menno Simons. The confession, entitled Bekentenisse des Gheloofs nae Godes Woort: also de selvighe van vele jaren herwaert ende noch tegenwoordich, by diemen Mennisten noemt: Ghelooft, Gheleert ende Beleeft wordt, . . . was reprinted twice as a separate edition at Hoorn in 1620 and without date but before 1626.

Pieters is also the author of Corte aenwysinghe, voorgestelt in eenighe Vraghen vande voornaemste mishandelinghen der Vlamingen ende Vriesen, in den twist van den Jare 1566, ende volgens teghen malcanderen bedreven, . . . (Hoorn, 1634). This book deals with the Frisian-Flemish quarrel and schism. The book, taking the view of the Frisians in a very prejudiced manner, gives some valuable information concerning the schism. Neff's assertion (ML III, 372) that Pieters wrote the introduction to the documents of unification between four congregations in Friesland, is a mistake. This unification came into being about 1560, before Pieters was born. vDZ.

BRN VII, 156, 162 note; IX, 539, 543; DB 1864, 56; 1870, 69, 72; 1889, 76 f.; 1893, 1, 4; 1912, 63 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 110; ML III, 372.

Pietersz, Wybe: see Zeeman, Wybe Pietersz.

Pieterzijl, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen close to the border of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation until 1892. Of the history of this congregation, always small in membership, not much is known. It may have been founded about the middle of the 16th century. A meetinghouse was built in 1664; this made the district governor take action. On the basis of the law of 1651 forbidding the building of Mennonite meeting-houses where they had not existed before, he ordered this meetinghouse to be closed or even pulled down. The Mennonites appealed to the provincial government; the district governor was supported by the Calvinist clergy. It is not clear how the matter ended. In the 17th century the congregation belonged to the Flemish branch; until about 1750 it was generally called the congregation of De Waarden and Pieterzijl. Among the members the de Waard (q.v.) family were numerous; many of them were deacons and Jacob Symons and his son Jan Jacobs de Waard, both farmers, were preachers in 1726-c60 and 1753-c90 respectively. In 1815 a meetinghouse was built in Pieterzijl; it is not known where the congregation met before 1815. In 1827 its baptized membership numbered 21, in 1849 65, in 1860 82. Until 1790 it was served by untrained and unsalaried preachers. Gerben Cornelis van Grouw (d. 1825), serving here in 1792-1814, was its first salaried preacher, and Jan Frederik Boersema, serving 1814-26, its first minister trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. In 1891 a new parsonage and in 1892 a new meetinghouse were built, both at Grijpskerk. After that time the congregation was called Grijpskerk and Pieterzijl, now only Grijpskerk. For its history since 1892 see Grijpskerk. vDZ.

S. K. de Waard, Aanteekeningen uit de Doopsgezinde Geschiedenis van 't Westerkwartier (Groningen, 1901); G. A. Wumkes, De Gereformeerde kerk in de Ommelanden . . . (Groningen, 1904) 39; DJ 1850, 60; DB 1893, 35.

Pietism is a form of piety originating after the Reformation and during the period of Orthodoxy within the Reformed and Lutheran churches of continental Europe, chiefly in Germany, parallels to which are to be found in Methodism, revivalism, and Fundamentalism in England and America. No other single religious movement has had such an impact on the Mennonites in all countries with the exception of the Netherlands as Pietism. This observation has led some to believe that there is a close historical kinship between Anabaptism and Pietism (Max Goebel, Albrecht Ritschl).

Background and Basic Principles. Pietism as a movement came into being at the end of the 17th century in the midst of Reformed and Lutheran Orthodoxy in which adherence to the doctrinal and confessional heritage was strongly emphasized. In opposition or as a supplement Pietism emphasized a "heartfelt" religion accompanied by a self-analysis based on a personal emotionally experienced conversion resulting in the application of this experience in daily life in doing good works and in certain forms of nonconformity, abstaining from such entertainments as the dance, card playing, the theater, worldly literature, and at times alcoholic beverages. Pietism also emphasized the second coming of Christ. Its adherents met frequently for private devotional exercises.

Major representatives of Pietism in the Reformed Church were Gisbert Voetius (Utrecht) and Gerhard Tersteegen (Mühlheim). The father of Pietism within the Lutheran Church was Philipp Jakob Spener (1635-1705), who was active as a minister in Frankfurt, Dresden, and Berlin and started the movement through his Pia desideria (Pious Wishes) in 1675, in which he emphasized more diligent use of the Bible, the spiritual priesthood of laymen, a reform of preaching and the study of theology. Through group Bible studies, prayer meetings, and special meetings for children he introduced institutions which later were accepted by Protestant churches generally. August Hermann Francke (1663-1727) emphasized home mission work and the spread of the Bible. Nikolaus Ludwig, Count von Zinzendorf (1700-60), gave Pietism a more emotional emphasis. He became the great leader of the Moravian Church and promoted foreign missions by sending missionaries out to the West Indies, Greenland, and America. He had received the remnant of the Moravian Brethren on his estate in Silesia, where they founded the village of Herrnhut. His successor was August Gottlieb Spangenberg (1704-92). Particular brands of Pietism originated in Württemberg, promoted by men like Johann Albrecht Bengel, who introduced special private Bible studies known as "Stunden" (see Stundism).

Various waves of Pietism have influenced European Christendom. In France, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, "Reveil" (q.v.) became another form which influenced the Mennonites particularly in Holland. Later the Baptist (q.v.) movement spread from England to Germany and other countries influencing the Mennonites of Russia, Prussia, and Poland. The Gemeinschaftsbewegung (q.v.) of the 19th century was another form of much the same movement, which influenced the Mennonites of the Palatinate. Pietism also affected Anglican Christianity through the Moravians. John Wesley was influenced by Moravian missionaries in his work in England. The Moravians established outposts in Holland, England, and Pennsylvania. The various awakenings and revivals of North America were closely related to continental Pietism. The assertion that the Great Awakening during the first half of the 18th century, primarily promoted by Jonathan Edwards and George Whitefield, had its beginnings among the Mennonites has not been clearly established. The revival movements of the 19th century centering around Charles G. Finney, Dwight L. Moody, J. Wilbur Chapman, Billy Sunday, and Billy Graham have very much the same emphasis as Pietism, although each has peculiarities and methods of its own, and although the mass type of evangelism was seldom practiced in Europe.

Netherlands and North Germany. Along the Lower Rhine in Northwest Germany, the Mennonites had early contacts with leading pietists. The devotional writings of Pieter Pietersz (q.v.), Jan Philipsz Schabälje (q.v.), and others also reveal pietistic tendencies prior to the actual introduction of Pietism. Johannes Deknatel (q.v.) of Amsterdam was strongly influenced by the Moravians. John Wesley was a guest in his home. Deknatel influenced the South German Mennonites toward Pietism (see Weber, Peter). Before Deknatel the Collegiant movement (q.v.) had definite pietistic traits and influenced the Dutch Mennonites very strongly. Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, the leader of the Lamists (q.v.), was its main representative. The Reveil (q.v.) movement of the Netherlands, led by Willem Bilderdijk (1756-1831), influenced the Mennonites. Among the Mennonite leaders in it were Willem de Clercq (q.v.), Jan ter Borg (q.v.), and Jan de Liefde (q.v.), who promoted a "return to the Bible." The Gemeentedagbeweging (q.v.) after World War I had also some pietistic leanings.

The Mennonites of Crefeld (q.v.) were under the influence of Pietism. Gerhard Tersteegen (q.v.) had friends among the Mennonites and preached in their church. The Crefeld Mennonites were also influenced by the Quakers and the Dunkards. Ernst Christoph Hochmann (q.v.) von Hohenau associated with them. The Mennonites of Hamburg-Altona were strongly influenced by Pietism. The van der Smissen family, originally very successful in business, directed its interest to a large extent to the cause of Pietism. The strongest representative was Jacob Gysbert van der Smissen (q.v.), who was in touch with the pietistic leaders of his day and supported their cause. Jacob Denner (q.v.) followed pietistic leanings to the degree that he broke away from the Mennonite church and established a Dompelaar church.

Germany. The Mennonites of Prussia were early in contact with representatives of Moravian Pietism. It was particularly the case with the Mennonites along the Vistula River and the congregation of Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) near Driesen. Joh. N. Lederer-Lentz and J. H. G. Jahr were ministers of the Moravian Church who visited the Mennonites of Brenkenhoffswalde and the Vistula River between Graudenz and Marienburg in the early 19th century prior to their migration to Russia and helped them when the revival broke out. Mrs. von Krüdener also visited these churches emphasizing sanctification of life. Moravian literature was read by the Mennonites of West Prussia and Poland. The writings of Johann Arndt, Krummacher, and Hofacker were much used by most of the Mennonites.

Among the Mennonites in South Germany the Pietism of Württemberg was influential. The movement of J. M. Hahn (q.v.) influenced three small groups to break away and form the Hahnische (q.v.) Mennoniten. A similar pietistic influence was found among the Mennonites of Switzerland and Alsace-Lorraine. As soon as the Mennonites of these areas began to attend schools in preparation for the ministry or simply to strengthen their religious convictions they attended pietistic institutions. The Missionary Institute of Basel founded by Christian G. Blumhardt (1840), the Bible school at Beuggen in southern Baden, the Bible school at Muristalden near Bern, the Evangelical Ministerial Training School of Basel founded in 1876, and the St. Chrischona school near Basel founded in 1835 were attended by Mennonites of Germany, Russia, Switzerland, and France. In Switzerland the Mennonites have been closely associated with the Free Evangelical churches, which were of pietistic background.

Russia. The Mennonites of Russia, particularly those who had been in touch with the Moravians in Prussia, underwent pietistic influences during the first half of the 19th century. Additional influences came through Württemberg Pietism and its chief promoter Eduard Wüst (q.v.), who was the minister of a neighboring Evangelical separatist church near the Molotschna settlement. Some of the Mennonite leaders, such as August Lenzmann (q.v.) and Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), became his close friends and introduced him to the Mennonite churches and settlements. Nicholai Schmidt (q.v.), who traveled in South Germany, became acquainted with the teachings of Christoph Hoffman (q.v.), a separatist of Württemberg. The forces at work among the Mennonites of Russia through these influences aimed to raise the educational, cultural, and spiritual levels and to free the Mennonite brotherhood from a "dead orthodoxy" in favor of a pietistic experience of salvation, which led to the founding of a number of new groups within the Mennonite brotherhood and the revitalization of the total brotherhood. In addition to the influence of Pietism of Moravian and Württemberg background, the German Baptist influences must be mentioned. The Mennonite Brethren (q.v.), with their emphasis on abstinence and the emotional side of Christian experience, were most influenced by Pietism. However, the Mennonites of Russia in general were strongly influenced by this movement. The young men who obtained a training for the ministry and teaching profession attended not only the schools of Switzerland already named, but also the Johanneum of Barmen, established in 1886, the Missionsanstalt of Neukirchen near Mörs, Lower Rhine, established in 1882, and the Bible School of Berlin, established in 1905 and later transferred to Wiedenest. These schools, although differing widely in educational standards, were all originally inspired by Pietism and had also a definite influence on the Mennonites of Russia and consequently on those in America. The mission society Licht im Osten, organized in Wernigerode am Harz in 1918 under the leadership of Jakob Kroeker (q.v.), was intended to serve evangelical Christendom in Russia. The Blankenburg Alliance Conference of Germany, at which Jakob Kroeker was a frequent speaker, was quite regularly attended by Mennonites from Russia and Germany. The Plymouth Brethren, founded in 1824 in England by J. N. Darby, influenced the Mennonites through traveling evangelists and Bible teachers, such as Baedeker, and in current times Erich Sauer.

America. From the earliest Mennonite settlements at Germantown to the present time, characteristics and influences of Pietism can easily be traced among the immigrants coming from Europe. Pietism of European background prevailed for a long period, not only in groups like the Mennonite Brethren and Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, but also in the older churches. The American revival movements also influenced the Mennonites. John Oberholtzer (q.v.), in organizing a conference of like-minded congregations and ministers and introducing Sunday schools, publications, and mission activities, revealed pietistic influence at work among the Mennonites of his day. Carl Justus van der Smis-sen (q.v.), called from Germany to teach at Wadsworth, successfully promoted pietistic views in this country. Most of the Mennonites who came from West Prussia, Poland, and Russia and settled in the prairie states and provinces had been touched by European pietistic trends, except those who settled in Manitoba as the Bergthal and Old Colony groups. A freer and more spontaneous informal church service with greater emphasis on a personally experienced salvation, the use of musical instruments, Gospel songs, the introduction of Sunday schools, prayer meetings, Bible studies, the emphasis on conversion and serious holy living are all characteristics of Pietism which leavened the old Mennonite heritage. Some of these influences have revitalized church practices and traditions which at times were fossilized, and given new meaning and significance to Mennonite traditions. Even such a conservative group as the Amish is being somewhat influenced by this form of piety, although usually those coming under this influence break away from the Old Order Amish.

As soon as the Mennonites of America adopted the English language and the American way of life they were also challenged by American revivalism (q.v.) and more recently Fundamentalism (q.v.). Some of the forms of Christian outreach and the expression of Christian life found in some Mennonite groups today are the result of American revivalism and Fundamentalism rather than European Pietism. One of the major differences between the old form of Pietism and contemporary Fundamentalism is that the former was born in opposition or as a supplement to orthodoxy, while the latter is combating Modernism and Liberalism in American theology. In some of their promotional and sensational methods revivalism and Fundamentalism are typical American accents, the extremes of which are not readily accepted by Mennonite churches.

Evaluation. Has Pietism had a positive influence on the Mennonites since it penetrated the congregations? How do the basic beliefs of Anabaptism differ from those of Pietism? What would have happened to the Mennonites if they had completely rejected Pietism? In general, it is apparent that pietistic influences have been beneficial in Mennonite history, in many areas revitalizing the rather dead and traditional Mennonite orthodoxy. The emphasis on a personally experienced salvation, on the Christian outreach at home and abroad, and the use of newer forms of spreading the Gospel is particularly due to the revitalization which came through Pietism. That some of the standards and basic Anabaptist ideals and emphases, which had already been obscured by the dead weight of tradition, were altered is true. The Anabaptist emphasis on the church of believers within which each member is challenged to discipleship differs from what is commonly found in an emotionally experienced conversion of the pietistic fundamentalist practice. Particularly dispensationalism brought into the Mennonite fold by millennialism in the 20th century is foreign to Anabaptism. Also it weakens the witness pertaining to peace and nonresistance. Pietism and Fundamentalism have some decided weaknesses and can serve only as a supplement. The core of any Christian church is found in the Gospel and the confessions of faith. The latter are usually minimized since Pietism considers the personally experienced conversion as the cornerstone of Christendom. The classic Christian tradition considers this aspect an overemphasis of the subjective element of Christianity and a minimizing of the objective act of God in Christ Jesus expressed in the creeds of Christendom. It is likely that a continuous exposure to a theological liberalism could have completely disintegrated the Mennonite churches and removed their witness from the scene.

The exact relation of Anabaptism and Pietism has not yet been fully studied, both as to possible influence of Anabaptism on the origins of Pietism, and their theological relationship. Ritschl's (q.v.) theory that Anabaptism was a direct forerunner of Pietism has not found support among careful scholars. Robert Friedmann, who has delivered the only thorough theological comparison of the two movements (Mennonite Piety), concludes that they are substantially different, and that when Pietism came into the Mennonite fold it at the very least blunted the essential thrust of Anabaptism as discipleship in conflict with the world, and at the most, substantially changed and redirected Anabaptist-Mennonite theology and piety from a sturdy movement to conquer the world by bringing men under the lordship of Christ into a subjective emotionalized search for inner peace and godliness which lost its readiness to defy the world for the sake of its understanding of the Gospel and the Christian ethic. Pietistic Mennonitism, he claims, was much more ready to accommodate itself to the prevailing culture and abandon such characteristic Anabaptist teachings as nonresistance and nonconformity.

C.K.

General: "Pietismus," RGG IV; H. Bornkamm, Mystik, Spiritualismus, und die Anfänge des Pietismus (Giessen, 1926); A. Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus, 3 vv. (Bonn, 1880-86); W. Hadorn, Geschichte des Pietismus in den Schweizerischen Reformierten Kirchen (Constance, 1901); Werner Mahrholz, Der deutsche Pietismus (Berlin, 1921); George Eisenach, Pietism and the Russian Germans in the United States (Berne, 1948); W. Goeters, Die Vorbereitung des Pietismus in der Reformierten Kirche der Niederlande (Leipzig, 1909); Max Goebel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westfälischen evangelischen Kirche, 3 vv. (Koblenz, 1849-60); Paul Fleisich, Die moderne Gemeinschaftsbewegung (Leipzig, 1912?); W. W. Sweet, Revivalism in America. Its Origin, Growth and Decline (New York, 1945).

Mennonite: Dirk Cattepoel, "Das religiöse Leben in der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts," Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (1939) 5-28; Ernst Crous, "Mennonitentum und Pietismus," Theologische Zeitschrift (Basel, July/August 1952) 279-96; idem, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreussischen Mennoniten im Rahmen ihrer Gesamtgeschichte 1772-1945," Gesch.-Bl. XI (1954) 7-29; Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); Emil Händiges, "Der Pietismus," Der Bote XXVI (1949) No. 50; 51; XXVII (1950) No. 1-7, 9-12; 14; 15; 19; 21; 22; 24; 26-28; Friedrich Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); Chr. Neff, "Peter Weber, ein mennonitischer Pietist aus dem 18. Jahrhundert," Gem.-Kal. 1930, 61-102; J. J. Wolleb, Gespräch zwischen einem Pietisten und einem Wiedertäufer, in welchem einige Vorurteile und Lehrpunkten der Wiedertäufer untersucht und worinnen wahre Pietisten von ihnen zu unterscheiden sind (Basel, 1722, copies in GCL and AML); W. Leendertz, "Johannes Deknatel, een pietist onder de Doopsgezinden." Geloof en Vrijheid (1887); Nachrichten aus der Brüdergemeinde (1830) 243, 308; 1839, pp. 78, 118; Alexander Glitsch, Geschichte der Brüdergemeinde Sarepta (1865) 276; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 83, 118; Ernst Crous, "Anabaptism, Pietism and Rationalism," in Recovery of the Anabaptist Vision (Scottsdale, 1957); ML III, 372-74.

Pigeon (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC) was organized in 1894 by Bishop Daniel Wismer of Berlin, Ont. Samuel S. Bowman was sent by the Ontario Conference in 1897 as the first minister of the congregation. The first meetinghouse was built in 1897 in Berne, one mile north of Pigeon. Berne was then the largest settlement. In 1897 Peter Ropp was ordained minister. Other ministers who were ordained and served here were Alfred Weidman 1917-24, S. J. Miller 1926-43, and Sherman Maust 1934-44. In 1916 the Berne congregation was transferred from the Ontario Conference to the Indiana-Michigan Conference and Menno Esch, of Fairview, Mich., was appointed bishop. The present meetinghouse was built in 1934 on a new site in Pigeon. In 1957 the membership was 101, with Donald King as minister and bishop. D.E.K.

Pigeon River Conservative Mennonite Church, located near Pigeon, Huron Co., Mich., several miles south of Saginaw Bay, a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, had its beginning in 1900 when several C.A.M. families from Croghan, N.Y., moved into this community. M. S. Zehr, one of this group, was ordained to the ministry. With several families who came from Ontario in 1902 they organized a Sunday school in that year under the leadership of Jacob M. Bender, bishop of the Ontario group. Solomon J. Swartzendruber, bishop, had charge of the work in 1904, when a meetinghouse was built. This church was enlarged in 1909 and replaced by a new one in 1957. The membership in 1957 was 275, including three mission outposts conducted by the congregation. Former ministers were S. J. Swartzendruber, M. S. Zehr, Jacob Yoder, Dan Shetler, Edwin Albrecht, Raymond Byler, and Emanuel Swartzendruber, bishop. The ministers in 1957 were Willard R. Mayer, bishop, and Earl J. Maust, minister. E.J.M.

Pigeon River Mennonite Mutual Auto Aid, a mutual insurance company covering automobile accidents (not liability and property damage), was organized Jan. 1, 1950, at Pigeon, Mich., to serve Conservative Mennonites of the local area. It had 75 members in 1953. H.S.B.

Pigot(t), Thomas, an English refugee living at Amsterdam, Holland, who was a Brownist (q.v.) of John Smyth's (q.v.) party, which had separated from the main Brownist body. Smyth and his party, including Pigott, had been influenced by the Mennonites and accepted the doctrine of believers' baptism. After Smyth's death in 1612, Pigott became the preacher of this group, which in 1615 joined the Mennonite Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam. Because of the difference of language, the English group continued to meet separately in their former meetinghouse called Jan Munter's bakehouse. Pigott, who had been ordained as an elder by the Waterlander elder Pieter Andriesz Hesseling in 1620, served until his death in 1639. Then the English group discontinued its separate meetings. After Smyth's death Pigott published Smyth's Retraction of Errors and Confirmation of the Truth, adding a preface in commemoration of Smyth and a confession drawn up by Smyth. The Amsterdam Mennonite library contains a written copy of John Smyth's Confession and Life (of 1612) by Pigott. Four other members of the Pigott family also joined the Mennonites in 1615. vbZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 95 f.; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer and W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, n.d.-1922) 148, 163-68; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1351.

Pijper, Frederik, a Dutch Reformed theologian, b. 1859 at Hoogwoud, d. 1926 at Leiden. He was professor of church history at the University of Leiden, and coeditor with Samuel Cramer (q.v.) of the Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, in which he edited a number of rare 16th-century Reformed books. After Cramer's death he edited volume X, containing the writings of Dirk (q.v.) Philips, with notes and an introduction. In the Nederl. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis (II, 1903, 299) he published an article, "Een nieuw ontdekt Doopsgezind Martelaarsboek," in which he expressed himself quite critically about it. Besides a number of other books and papers on church history, he published Martelaarsboeken (The Hague, 1924), in which he dealt with the martyr books by Jean Crespin (q.v.), Adriaan van Haemstede (q.v.), the Offer des Heeren, and later Mennonite martyr books, and the book by Ludwig Rabus (q.v.). (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 259; ML III, 374.) NEFF.

Pike County (Mo.) Old Order Amish settlement, near Bowling Green, Mo., began in December 1947, when Jacob M. Beachey and his sons moved here from Jay County, Ind. A church was organized on Feb. 29, 1948, with Jacob J. Miller as minister of the group, and Christ M. Bontrager of Buchanan County, Iowa, as bishop. The congregation is now (1958) divided into two districts, the South District having 55 members, with Jacob J. Miller as bishop and Joseph E. Miller and P. M. Borntrager as preachers, and the North District, 68 members, with Peter Girod as bishop and Jacob J. Schwartz, John M. Schwartz, and Jacob W. Eicher as preachers. J.J.Mi.

Pike Mennonite (MC) Church, located two miles west of Elida, Ohio, originated as a daughter of the Salem (q.v.) congregation in 1874, when the first meetinghouse was built, although services had been held soon after Sunday school was started in the Pike area in 1860. The second meetinghouse, built in 1888, which burned in 1930, was replaced in 1934. J. B. Smith (1870-1951) was senior minister at Pike from 1922 to his death. In 1957 Paul Smith and Harold Good were the ministers, with 238 members. The Pike congregation was supporting two mission congregations in Kentucky—Wildcat (1949) and Newfound Mission (1951). The Central Mennonite Church (q.v.) was established in Elida in 1925 by a group of members expelled from the Salem and Pike congregations. H.S.B.

Pike Mennonite Church. In a disagreement over the treatment of an orphan girl in 1845 the two ministers at Groffdale, Lancaster Co., Pa., Jacob Stauffer and Jacob Weber, led a small schism, with Jacob Brubaker of Juniata County as their bishop. They were granted a small meetinghouse near Hinkletown and built one in Snyder County on Port Trevorton Route 2. They are today called the Weaver Mennonites. There were in 1955 60 members, with Weaver Zimmerman as bishop and Martin S. Weaver and Peter L. Weaver as ministers. The Stauffer Mennonites, 218 in all, are in two congregations, with Jacob S. Stauffer as bishop and Joseph O. Brubaker as minister at the Pike church, worshipping in the same house as the Weaver group, and at Loveville, Md., Harry Stauffer and John M. Brubaker, ministers. There are a few other small schismatic groups in Snyder County. I.D.L.

Pike Mennonite Church (MC), Harrisonburg, Va., located 5 miles south of the city on Route 11, was established in 1825, with Frederick Rhodes and Abram Nisewonger as ministers. It was then known as "Moyers Church." In 1957 it had 162 members, with Aldine Brenneman and John E. Kurtz as ministers. H.A.B.

Pilgrim Fathers, the name of a group of English Congregationalists (q.v.) who came to America on the Mayflower, arriving in Massachusetts on Dec. 11, 1620, the first settlers in this area. These English Separatists had lived for some time at Leiden in the Netherlands. In their strict church life they were somewhat akin to the Anabaptists. They were influenced in the origin of their group (about 1595) by Dutch Mennonites, but soon adopted more Calvinistic views on baptism and predestination. NEFF.

H. G. Wood, Venturers for the Kingdom (London, n.d.-1919); D. Plooy, De "Pilgrim Fathers" (Utrecht, 1919); HRE X, 684 f.; ML III, 375.

Pilgrim Mennonite Church, Amelia, Va., established in 1956, had 53 members in 1957. Harvey J. Mast and Levi D. Kramer were the ministers. M.G.

Pilgrims Amish Mennonite Church, Allendale, S.C., is an independent Sleeping Preacher (q.v.) church, attempting to establish a more conservative church than the Oregon group from whom they separated. The bishop of their 13 members in 1957 was LeRoy S. Stoltzfus. M.G.

Pilgrims, Veit (Fitus tho Pilgrams), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of South Germany, who was apprehended in 1532 and imprisoned at Gladbach, then belonging to Jülich, Germany. By the aid of friends he was able to escape from prison. But he continued his activity and was again arrested. After being cruelly tortured he was burned at the stake at Gladbach (q.v.) in 1537, because he loyally confessed his faith. (Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 15, 437; ML III, 375.) NEFF.

Pil(l)owitz (Bil(l)owitz; today, Velké Bilovice), a village located 20 miles west of Göding (q.v.) in Moravia, in which the Hutterian Brethren acquired a house with all its equipment in 1545. Here occurred the death of deacon Gregor Pehem. Johann von Zierotin (q.v.), the proprietor of Pillowitz, gave the Brethren a meadow in 1571 for a vineyard. One day in 1595 "in broad daylight" a fire was set in the roof of the Hutterite school, destroying not only the Bruderhof, but also a large part of the village. In April and June of 1600 the cavalry of Count Thurn caused a vast amount of damage. The Brethren fared even worse at the hands of the troops of the revolting Hungarians who had crossed into Moravian territory and on May 7, 1605, burned Pillowitz to the ground, after murdering four Brethren. For years the site remained desolate. In 1614, at the wish of the new Baron Ladislav Velen von Zierotin, the Brethren erected a new Bruderhof, which was burned down by Dampierre's soldiers in 1619. The Hutterites rebuilt once more, but in 1622 had to leave Pillowitz for good. (Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 375.) P.D.E.

Pilraust, Erhard: see Polrus, Erhard.

Pincher Creek Hutterite Bruderhof, of the Dariusleut (q.v.), located at Pincher Station, Alberta, was founded in 1927 by members of the Raley brotherhood. Their preacher Jakob Hofer was chosen in 1924 by the Raley Bruderhof, and with several families from this Bruderhof founded Pincher Creek. Paul Gross was chosen preacher here. In 1950 this Bruderhof had 85 souls, including 30 baptized members. D.D.

Pincher Creek Mennonite Brethren Church was affiliated with the Coaldale, Alberta, M.B. Church until 1948, when it was organized as a separate congregation and built its church building. In 1957 the presiding minister was D. Duerksen, with 23 members. A.A.T.

Pinder, Wolfgang, an Anabaptist martyr found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 539, E 874): see Binder, Wolf.

Pine Crest Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, Louisville, Ga., is located 5 miles northwest of the town. It had 97 members in 1958, with Reno L. Hibner as pastor. M.G.

Pine Grove Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Bowmansville, Montgomery Co., Pa., had its beginning in 1848, when certain members were excommunicated from the M.C. congregations for bringing suit in protest against the state's taking over the schools. In 1852 they organized a congregation, and in 1854 dedicated a new meetinghouse. A tablet originally facing the highway, bearing the legend, "Pine Grove Fersamling House 1854," is now in the church. Ministers who have served are William Shelly 1856-58, Solomon Ott 1859-1913, Raymond Stubbs 1929-48, Leroy Albright 1950-53, and John Wesley Muffley 1953-55. In 1957 the membership was 42, with Howard T. Landes as pastor. J.W.M.

Pine Hill Hutterite Bruderhof (colony) near Penhold, Alberta, belonging to the Dariusleut (q.v.) branch. In 1950 the population was 86 with Peter Hofer as head preacher. vvdZ.

Pinecraft Mennonite Church (union), Sarasota, Fla., is controlled by trustees representing A.M., C.M., and M.C. groups. The church is open for services to each of these groups, and consequently the Pinecraft Mennonite Church (q.v.) of the Lancaster Conference worships here. The union services began with a Sunday school in 1941. The present building was occupied in 1946 and accommodates an average winter attendance of over 700. M.G.

John Umble, "The Mennonites in Florida," Menn. Life XII (1957) 108-15.

Pinecraft Mennonite Church (MC), Sarasota, Fla., a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, was organized from among those attending the Union Mennonite Church in the Pinecraft area. It had a membership of 30 in 1957, with Joseph M. Nissley and Otho B. Shenk serving as preachers. J.M.N.

Pinegrove Mennonite Church (MC), located south of Stryker, Ohio, on Route 6, was established in 1951. In 1957 it had 106 members, with D. Wyse Graber as pastor. M.G.

Pingjum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, about three miles west of Witmarsum (q.v.) where Menno Simons was born. Menno is supposed to have spent his youth at Pingjum and after his studies he officiated here as a Catholic priest in 1524-31. The Catholic church in which he served has been replaced by a new one (now Reformed), but its old tower is still standing. It is not known when Mennonitism arose here. Wabbe Lysbethsdochter of Pingjum had as early as March 1535 been among the Anabaptists who assaulted the Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 14 persons here in 1563-65, and 12 in 1568-82. At least since that time there has been a Mennonite congregation at Pingjum. Concerning this congregation there is only scarce information. In 1695 it numbered 32 baptized members. During the 18th century the (lay) preachers of Pingjum also served in the neighboring congregation of Arum (q.v.). In 1827 the Pingjum congregation united with that of Witmarsum, from then being served by the ministers of Witmarsum. The old and characteristic meetinghouse of Pingjum was restored in 1950. vvdZ.

Menn. Life V (January 1950) 44-46; DB 1864, 125 f.; DJ 1951, 21-26; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 30, 229; ML III, 375.

Pinesburg Mennonite Mission (MC), located midway between Williamsport, Md., and Clear Spring, Md., is the outgrowth of a Sunday school begun in a schoolhouse. In 1925 it was organized as a congregation under the Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Mission Board, by persons living in the community. In 1957, the membership was 35, with Oliver H. Martin as minister. The present frame building was built in 1939. J.D.R.

Pinto Mennonite Church (MC), located in Pinto, Allegany Co., Md., a member of the Allegheny Conference (formerly Southwestern Pennsylvania), was organized in 1927 with a membership of 46. D. H. Bender was the first Mennonite minister to preach in that community, about 1915. Milton B. Miller, of Springs, Pa., served as minister. Chester M. Helmick was ordained as minister in 1929, and the following year Robert P. Dayton was ordained to the ministry. The church building, a cement block structure which seats 250, was built in 1927. In the present (1957) membership of 100 there are representatives of ten denominations who have been received into fellowship. The ministers in 1956 were A. Lehman Longenecker and Chester M. Helmick. C.M.H.

Pioneer Evangelical Mennonite Church, located in Pioneer, Williams Co., Ohio, was organized in 1912, built its first church in 1916, and was served by E. M. Slagle its first pastor. It had 55 members in 1958, with Gaylord E. Gerig as minister. G.E.G.

Pioneer Mission (Mennonite Pioneer Mission), which in 1957 was made the official mission board of the Canadian District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church, was a mission agency of the Berghthaler Mennonite Church (largely of Manitoba) 1945-57. It was started to take over the missionary effort which Ronald Groening had begun in 1942 among the Tarahumau Indians of Mexico, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Gerbrandt in 1945-48, but which had to be discontinued in 1948. In 1948 work was begun among the Indians on Matheson Island in Lake Winnipeg, to which two additional Indian stations have recently been added (Paungassi and Cross Lake). The Pioneer Mission also raises funds for the support of missionaries from the Canadian Conference constituency serving under the Congo Inland Mission (q.v.; two in 1957) and those serving under the G.C.M. Mission Board in India (one), Japan (two), and Formosa (one). In 1957 there were three missionary couples working among the Indians in Northern Manitoba. The official organ, Mennonite Pioneer Mission, has appeared twice per year as a 12-page 6 x 9-inch journal at Altona, Man., since 1945. The headquarters of the organization have been at Altona. H.S.B.

Pioneers Memorial Hospital, Rocky Ford, Col., though owned by the community, has been administered since 1954 by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). It has a capacity of 31 beds and 9 bassinets. J.H.F.

Pirenne, Henri (1862-1935), was professor of history in the University of Gent, Belgium, in 1896-1930. Among his numerous books and papers on the history of Belgium is the outstanding Histoire de Belgique (7 vols., 1899-1932, also translated into German and Dutch). The third volume deals with the rise of Anabaptism in Belgium. He describes Anabaptism largely as a socio-economic movement, the Anabaptists in his view having been the poor, the proletariat. Pirenne's views deeply influenced the Dutch Mennonite historian Karel Vos (q.v.).

vbZ.

Pirkheimer, Willibald (1470-1530), a Humanist, one of the outstanding leaders in the active intellectual and religious life of Nürnberg, Germany. At the beginning of the Reformation he sided with Luther, but in 1524 returned to the Catholic Church. When Hans Denk (q.v.) was made rector of the school of St. Sebaldus upon recommendation of Oecolampadius (q.v.), he must certainly have come in contact with Pirkheimer. There is no information on the matter. In Denk's dispute with Andreas Osiander (q.v.) Pirkheimer took the latter's side. He wrote an unfavorable opinion concerning Denk to Basel. Oecolampadius wrote two letters to Pirkheimer, Feb. 26, and April 25, 1525, to defend his recommendation of Denk to the rectorate of the school of St. Sebaldus. NEFF.

Ernst Staehelin, Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads (Leipzig, 1927) 359, 364 f.; ML III, 375.

Pistor, Georg, an Anabaptist of the Palatinate and Zweibrücken, Germany, who stemmed from Alsace (Hagenau). Under Capito (q.v.) and Bucer (q.v.) he was a Protestant preacher in Strasbourg, and was sent by Bucer to Zweibrücken at the request of Johann Schwebel, the reformer of Zweibrücken; Pistor was given the pastoral charge of the neighboring village of Ernstweiler. His Anabaptist views soon brought him into conflict with Schwebel. "Stripping baptism and the breaking of bread of all sacramental significance and denying their necessity as means of salvation, the demand for the moral integrity of the one administering them as a necessary condition for the validity of the rite; the assertion of the incompatibility of true Christianity with holding a government position or with the possession of worldly goods; in addition the disregard and defamation of a salaried ministry"—these were the Anabaptist views that Pistor held and that Schwebel attacked. The Strasbourg reformers were called in a futile attempt to arbitrate the matter. Ruprecht, the Count Palatine, also entered the breach. In 1538 Georg Pistor was expelled from the country. All trace of him is lost. NEFF.

Fritz Jung, Johannes Schwebel, der Reformator von Zweibrücken (Kaiserslautern, 1910) 107 ff.; ML III, 375 f.

Pistorius, Johannes (Jan de Bakker or Jan Jansz van Woerden), b. 1499, was the first victim of the Inquisition in the Netherlands. He was a Roman Catholic priest who rejected the doctrine of the Mass and other Catholic doctrines. From July 11 to Sept. 7, 1525, Pistorius was interrogated by the inquisitor Ruardus Tapper (q.v.). He was arrested in May 1525 and imprisoned at The Hague. One of his prison mates was Guilhelmus (Willem) Gnapheus (q.v.), to whom he dictated the questions of the inquisitors and his own answers and who then wrote a circumstantial account of the cross-examinations of Pistorius. In the sentence he is called a Lutheran, but this means merely that he was a Sacramentist (q.v.). He was burned at the stake at The Hague on Sept. 15, 1525. vbZ.

J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Nederland . . . tot 1531 (Amsterdam, 1873) 360-89 and passim.

Pius IV (b. 1499), a pope 1560-65, successor of Paul IV, is said to have been a lenient ruler, but less merciful to "heretics." In 1564 he complained to Marco Soranza, the emissary of the republic of Venice, concerning the lax attitude toward heretics; in consequence the two imprisoned "Anabaptists" Sega (q.v.) and Rizzetto (q.v.) were sentenced to die by drowning on Feb. 8, 1565. The sentence stated that this mode of execution rather than the usual one of burning was passed "for definite reasons on the strength of a special authorization granted this tribunal by the Holy See." The drowning was performed at night to keep it quiet. NEFF.

K. Benrath, "Geschichte der Reformation in Venedig," in Schriften des Vereins für Ref.-Geschichte V (Halle, 1886) No. 18; pp. 99, 101; idem, "Wiedertäufer im Venezianischen," in Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1885, 9-67; ML III, 376.

Plaats, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family, from the 17th century found at Harlingen, Friesland, where in the early 18th century Folkert van der Plaats Jzn was a deacon of the Mennonite congregation and owner of a publishing house, which printed a number of books by Johannes Stinstra (q.v.). His son Folkert van der Plaats Jr. continued this publishing house until his death in 1806. The business was then run by Melle van der Plaats, a son of Folkert Jr. Some members of this family were noted physicians and lawyers in Friesland.

A descendant of this family was Jan Daniel van der Plaats, b. 1837 at Leeuwarden, d. 1890, who after finishing his studies at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary served as pastor at Hindeloopen-Molkwerum 1851-56 and Woudsend 1856-83. He published the sermons delivered in 1858-59 to commemorate the last service in the old meetinghouse and the first service in the new one at Woudsend: Twee tempel-psalmen (Sneek, 1859). vdZ.

G. A. Wumkes, Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland, 2 vv. (Leeuwarden, 1930 and 1934) passim; Blaupot t. C., Friesland; De Zondagsbode.

Placcaten, official edicts issued by the Dutch government against the Anabaptists and Mennonites: see Mandates.

Placement Committee. With the transition from the lay ministry in the General Conference Mennonite Church to the trained and professional ministry, a need arose for the mediation between churches and prospective candidates for pulpits which had become vacant. In the 1929 session of Conference a temporary committee of five members was created, known as the Placement Committee. For some time this committee was continued by special resolution from session to session.

To begin with, this committee was charged with the sole responsibility of finding available qualified ministers and recommending them to congregations looking for a minister. The committee sought to meet the needs of the particular congregation with the qualifications of the man recommended. By 1945 the functions and responsibilities of the committee had been enlarged and widened so that it recognized the following areas: (a) The placement of ministers; (b) Recruiting young ministers; (c) The training of ministers; (d) Keeping in touch with ministerial students; (e) Ministerial internships; (f) Responsibility to Mennonite students in non-Mennonite schools; (g) Guidance of young ministers; and (h) Obtaining facts and information regarding candidates and congregations.

With the adoption of the new constitution in 1950 the Placement Committee was replaced by the Committee on the Ministry, with greatly enlarged functions. Some of the additional responsibilities with which this new committee is charged are the ordination of ministers and the preparation of an all-conference ordination questionnaire, an ethical code for ministers and congregations, ministers' salaries, ministerial certification, scholarships for ministers, the orientation of new ministers, standards for the ministry, and keeping in touch with ministerial students. The Committee on the Ministry is also responsible for setting up and promoting retreats for ministers and other Christian workers. It is responsible to the Board of Missions, and the members of the Committee are appointed by this board. P.K.R.

Plac, Jean le (Jan de Pla), was a preacher of the French-speaking Mennonite Waterlander congregation of Leiden, Holland. He was chosen to the office before 1630, and was still serving in 1647, when as a delegate from his congregation he attended a Waterlander conference held at Amsterdam. He also intermediated in the schism of 1627 in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation between Nittert Obbes (q.v.) and his co-preachers. vdZ.

L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van . . . de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 41, 62 f., 83, 215; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 341-43.

"Plain" Coat. In Colonial America the man's coat was a frock coat without lapel, and buttoned to the throat. It had a long, split tail for convenience in horseback riding. In the early 19th century the collar rose higher and higher on the back and finally turned over to form the modern roll collar and lapel. At the same time the tail shortened to form the modern sack coat. The ministers in general, and some of the laity, in the more conservative Mennonite groups objected to these changes, and clung to the old-fashioned frock coat with its long tail and no lapel. In the strictest groups such as the Old Order Amish the old collarless coat, known as the "plain" coat, is still worn by ministry and laity alike, and is fastened with hooks and eyes rather than buttons. In the eastern sector of the Mennonite Church (MC) (Franconia, Lancaster, Washington-Franklin, and Virginia conferences) the ministers generally still wear the split tail frock coat (somewhat shortened) with the "plain" collar, while some of the laity wear a collarless sack coat, and others wear the conventional sack coat with roll collar and lapel. In the remainder of the church (MC) the standard practice of the ministers is to wear the sack coat with the "plain" collar, but most laymen wear the conventional coat with lapel. (See also Dress.) Mennonite deviations in dress from the conventions of the surrounding culture are regarded by many as symbols of nonconformity to the world.

The Amish congregations descending from the Alsatian Amish immigrants of 1815-60 did not bring the "plain" coat with them from Europe and did not adopt it generally until well into the first quarter of the 20th century and then only for the ministers, not for laymen. In the course of the first quarter of the century most of the Mennonite and Amish conferences (MC) adopted regulations requiring the "plain" coat for the ministers and recommending it for the laity, hence the "plain" coat is often called the "regulation" coat. The high tide of the movement was about 1920-30. In the Lancaster Conference in recent times all male church workers, including Sunday-school teachers, are required to wear the "plain" coat as a condition for service. Further west the trend seems to be toward less wearing and less requirement of the "plain" coat, even for ministers. In some sections the "plain" vest is also worn with the plain coat. Because in most sections of the church west of the Allegheny Mountains very few laymen wear it, the plain coat has in effect become a preacher's coat or clerical coat, and has indeed a very similar appearance to the clerical coat worn by some Roman Catholic and Episcopalian clergymen. Its origin, however, has no connection with the clerical coat.

The Church of the Brethren, which formerly had the custom of wearing the "plain" coat similar to the Mennonite custom herein described, has now largely dropped it. Among the Quakers it has completely disappeared. The Brethren in Christ still retain it. J.C.W.

Plains (for a time Plain) Mennonite Church (MC), located in Hatfield Township, west of Lansdale, Pa., is a congregation in the Franconia Mennonite Conference. The name is derived from the plain on which Lansdale is built. The first log school and meetinghouse was built between 1760 and 1769 on land contributed by Henry Frey. It remained in use until 1813, when a stone meetinghouse was built. A third stone building was erected in 1867, and the present stone (white stucco) building in 1922. Before the Revolutionary War the circuit system was in use. Bishop Isaac Kolb (1711-76) is thought to have considered this his home church after 1764. He was ordained bishop in 1761. The first minister definitely known to have been ordained for this church was Jacob Krupp (1799-1842), ordained in 1816. Others who served this church were Joseph Cassel (1799-1868); Jacob Kulp (1798-1875), ordained minister 1838 and bishop in 1843; Jacob C. Loux (1822-95), ordained minister 1867; Henry Godshall (1834-1908), ordained 1874, relieved in 1905; Jonas Mininger (1852-1937), ordained minister 1895, bishop in 1905; Jacob C. Clemens (1874-), ordained 1906; John E. Lapp (1905-), ordained minister 1933, bishop 1937; Wayne Kratz (1913-), ordained 1949. Burials were made in the cemetery as early as about 1764. A Sunday school was organized in 1888. The last three of the above ministers were still serving in 1956, with a membership of 254. J.E.L.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 163-66.

Plainview Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located 6 miles west of Chickasha, Grady Co., Okla. The first members, among whom was J. B. P. Schmidt, came here from Pauls Valley in 1902. The church building, erected in 1920 and enlarged in 1952, has a seating capacity of 250. The first pastor was Sam A. Nichols. Ministers ordained here include Andrew Nightingale, P. W. Decker, Edward Unruh, and Eben Nightingale. In 1958 Abe D. Koehn was pastor and the membership was 147. E.U.

Plainview (Kan.) Conservative Mennonite Church. In 1948 five Amish families, feeling the need for more spiritual activities in the church, such as young people's Bible meetings, prayer meetings, more mission work, etc., decided to ask the Conservative Mennonite Conference for help to organize a Conservative church here. On Aug. 1, 1948, the church was organized with 24 members. Nevin Bender of Greenwood, Del., and Emanuel Swartzendruber of Pigeon, Mich., were in charge of the work. Noah Miller was pastor for two years. A new church building was dedicated on Dec. 18, 1949, located 4 miles south and 4 miles west of Hutchinson. In 1958 the baptized membership was 105, with Valentine Headings as bishop and Jonas P. Yoder as minister. C.Y.M.

Plainview Mennonite Church (MC), near Aurora, Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was founded by Amish Mennonites from Nebraska. Several Stutzman families arrived in 1906 but their first minister was Eli B. Stoltzfus of West Liberty, Ohio, who had been ordained for Long Green, Md., in 1908, but moved to Portage County in 1909, and was ordained bishop in 1916. The congregation enjoyed economic and religious growth. Membership increased from 35 in 1908 to 100 in 1912. In that year the congregation built the present meetinghouse. Members of the congregation helped to found the Britton Run Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Crawford Co., Pa., and still assist actively in the Burton Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Gauga County and in the Gladstone Mennonite Mission in Cleveland. The membership of Plainview in 1957 was 136. Development of the congregation is being hindered by inflationary land values and the encroachment of wealthy buyers of land for rural estates. The resident bishop in 1957 was Elmer Stoltzfus and the minister Eugene Yoder. J.S.U.

Vern L. Miller, "The History of the Plainview Mennonite Church . . ." (1950, unpublished paper in GCL).

Plainview Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, at Dalhart, Tex., was listed in the Minutes and Reports of the Western District Conference for 1932 with a membership of 46. The congregation had no minister at that time. J. W. Bergen served the church 1933-35; then the church was dissolved. It was a home mission church of the Western District Conference. C.K.

Plaitner, Virgil: see Plattner, Vigil.

Planer, Andre, an Anabaptist, a scythe smith in Welsberg, South Tirol, Austria. In his house the first followers of Jakob Hutter (q.v.) met. One meeting was raided on May 26, 1529, but Hutter managed to escape. (ML III, 377.) P.DE.

Planer (Plaver), Peter, an Anabaptist martyr, was imprisoned with Lamprecht Gruber (q.v.), Hans Beck (q.v.), Lorenz Schuster (q.v.), Hans Taler (q.v.), and Planer's servant Peter in Sterzing in South Tirol, Austria (now Italy), in 1532. In spite of the use of the rack they were true to their faith and were therefore put to death by beheading. The letters they wrote in prison have been preserved. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 74; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 102; ML I, 145; III, 377.

Planerkolonie, located north of the Sea of Azov between Mariupol and Berdyansk, Ukraine, was a German settlement established in 1822. The name was derived from a "plan" which was worked out by the government for the settlement. The settlers of the original 17 villages came from the Marienburg, Danzig, and Elbing area of Prussia where the Mennonites also came from. Although these settlers spoke Plattdeutsch and established homes and villages similar to those of the Mennonites and some had "Mennonite" names they were not Mennonites. The village names were primarily given in memory of those from which they had come. The settlers had spent some years in the Molotschna settlement and were later joined by others coming from South Germany. The original Planer settlement was located just north of the five Mennonite villages of Bergthal. When the Bergthal Mennonites left for America in 1874 their villages became a part of the Planer settlement.

The original Planer settlement consisted of 27 villages and the five Bergthal Mennonite villages, of which Grünau, Ludwigstal, and Bergthal were the district seats. The Planer mother settlement spread into the surrounding territory of Mariupol, establishing 19 additional villages. The settlement also spread into the East, establishing a daughter settlement in the Don Basin. The 20 villages had names like Liebental, Grüntal, and Gnadenfeld. Another daughter settlement was established north of Berdyansk with the following villages: Neuhoffnung, Rosenfeld, Neuhoffnungstal, and Neu-Stuttgart.

In this area the evangelist and minister Eduard Wüst began his evangelistic work, which caused a great revival among the German population in South Russia, spreading into the neighboring Molotschna settlement. Cornelius Jansen of Berdyansk was a friend of Wüst. From here the revival movement also spread eastward into the mother settlement of Mariupol and the daughter settlement in the Don area. For a time there was a Mariupol Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). Wüst's activities caused breaks in the Protestant churches and the founding of Pietistic and separatist movements. Some joined the Baptist Church. C.K.

J. A. Malinowsky, Die Planerkolonien am Asowschen Meere (Stuttgart, 1928); G. J. Eisenach, Pietism and the Russian Germans in the United States (Berne, 1948).

Plank, a Mennonite family name found principally in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, but also represented in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, as well as other western states. In 1958 there were five Planks in the ministry of the Amish and Mennonite churches. Among the prominent representatives of the family was David Plank (1833-1912) (q.v.), an Amish Mennonite bishop of Logan County, Ohio, and a descendant of Melchior Plank. Samuel Plank (1809-79), David's father, who moved to Logan County from Mifflin County, Pa., in 1845, served as an Amish Mennonite deacon for thirty years. Solomon K. Plank (1837-1912) served as deacon for forty-two years, mostly in Wayne County, Ohio. D. J. Plank was ordained bishop by the Douglas County, Ill., O.O.A. in 1892. Peter Plank, who served as bishop in the Conestoga, Pa., A.M. Church 1808-31, was a great-grandson of a French Huguenot doctor who settled in Berks County, Pa. Perhaps through the influence of his wife, he became a Mennonite. He was the successor of the first bishop of the Conestoga A.M. Church. Following him as bishop was John Blank (1831-35) (C. Z. Mast), who may possibly be an ancestor of the A.M. Blanks in eastern Pennsylvania, although other Blank families were among the early immigrants to Pennsylvania. C. Henry Smith listed Hans Blank and Christian Blank for 1751, and Jacob Blank, Nickolas Blank, and Frederick Plank for 1752.

There is confusion concerning the relationship of the Blanks and Planks. John Horsch listed Blank as a Mennonite Palatinate name of Swiss origin. Christian Blank was an active participant on the Amish side of the Ammann-Reist controversy in Switzerland in 1693. The name Blank was found among South German Mennonites as late as 1940. In America evidently some members of the family changed the name to Plank.

Most of the Mennonite Planks of the central states, however, are descendants of Melchior Plank, or more specifically Johann Melchior Blankenberg, who arrived in America from Holland and was sold as an indentured servant for a five-year term to Jason Cloud on Nov. 27, 1767. In Berks County, Pa., on Jan. 16, 1769, Jason Cloud assigned his servant to Howard Hughes for the remainder of his term and on June 22, 1772, Hughes dismissed Blankenberg upon his payment of five pounds, as shown by the photostatic copy of the indenture in the Goshen Archives of the Mennonite Church. According to family tradition Blankenberg was a Swiss Mennonite in Holland, who with his wife visited friends sailing for America on a ship docked in a Dutch port. While they were on board ship it left the harbor.

To the Melchior Planks were born six children, the oldest of whom was Jacob (1768-1851). To Jacob and his wife Mary Yoder Plank were born 12 children, 3 in eastern Pennsylvania and 9 in Mifflin County, Pa. In 1821 Jacob moved to Wayne County, Ohio. The Planks of Wayne County, Ohio, and Lagrange County, Ind., are descendants of Jacob. M.G.

Plank, David (1833-1912), bishop of the South Union (q.v.) and Walnut Grove (q.v.) Amish Mennonite congregations in Logan County (q.v.), Ohio, from 1895 to 1912, was born in Mifflin County

(q.v.), Pa., the son of Samuel (later, deacon) and Juliana Hertzler Plank. With his parents he moved to Union Township, Logan Co., Ohio, in 1845. In 1856 he was married to Mary Hertzler. After his ordination in 1859 he sided with the more progressive neighboring Champaign County bishop, John Warye, in his controversy with the Logan County leaders. Always alert for new ideas and plans for Christian work, he attended a Brethren Sunday school near his home and in 1863 with the consent of his bishop and the unanimous vote of the congregation he organized in Logan County the first Amish Sunday school in America, held in an Amish meetinghouse. The next year he organized a similar school in the Hooley Amish meetinghouse in Champaign County (later known as the Oak Grove Church, q.v.). He served as both superintendent and teacher for a number of years. Following the complete break between the two districts in the late 1860's he and his father had charge of the seceding Logan County group, which alternated services with the Champaign congregation and in 1875 erected the Walnut Grove Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Union Township near Plank's home. Plank was successful in his small farming operations and had special talent in drawing, carpentry, and cabinet-making. After the bishop at South Union moved to Kansas, the congregation at that place was left without a bishop. Following the organization of the Ohio Amish Mennonite Conference (q.v.) in 1893 earnest efforts to reconcile differences between South Union and Walnut Grove resulted in a decision to place the Walnut Grove and South Union ministers in the lot for bishop and to ordain for both congregations whoever was chosen. David Plank was chosen and ordained in 1895 and served until his death in 1912, when A. I. Yoder (q.v.), as son of the South Union minister, was installed as Plank's successor. Plank did much to heal the breach between the two factions.

J.S.U.

John Umble, "Early Sunday Schools at West Liberty, Ohio," MQR IV (1930) 6-50, passim.

Plantenga, Broer Pieter, b. Dec. 15, 1865, at Zutphen, d. May 28, 1929, at Haarlem, a Dutch Mennonite pastor serving at Meppel 1893-98, Wormerveer 1898-99, Arnhem 1899-1901, and Haarlem 1901-27. In 1927 he resigned because of his health. Among his many offices in the Dutch brotherhood should be mentioned his membership (secretary) on the committee for the Mennonites in the Diaspora (see Verstrooiing) and on the board of curators of the Mennonite seminary. He also served for a number of years as a trustee of the Dutch (liberal) Protestant Union. (DJ 1930, 21-26.) vpZ.

Plantinus. There have been three Dutch Mennonite ministers by this name: Petrus Plantinus, serving as preacher at Schiedam 1732-d.41, Jan Plantinus (b. c1783 at Dokkum, d. ?), minister of Drachten and Ureterp 1809-50, and his son Doede Plantinus (b. 1815 at Drachten, d. 1890 at Holwerd), minister of Rottevalle-Witveen 1839-45, Uithuizen 1845-47, Warga 1847-49, and Holwerd-Blija 1849-85. Jan and Doede Plantinus received their theological training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Doede Plantinus was the author of a catechetical book, De Leer des Heils (1st ed. n.d.; 2d ed. 1882), and Blijf in hetgene gij geleerd hebt (Drachten, 1864), a sermon to commemorate his 25 years in the ministry. (De Zondagsbode III, 1889-90, No. 29.) vpZ.

Plarre, Ernst Martin (1684-1717), an official in the military secretariat in Berlin, Germany. In 1701 he wrote his first book, E. M. P. Epideigma sive specimen historiae anabaptisticae. It is based on the Histoire des Anabaptistes (Paris, 1695), and upon its predecessor, Historia Tumultuum Anabaptisticorum (Basel, 1548) by Lambertus Hortensius. Hence Münster (q.v.) and the Netherlands (q.v.) occupy the foreground of his observations, followed by David Joris (q.v.). Other areas in which the Anabaptists appeared are given less consideration; of these England (q.v.) is most extensively treated.

E.C.

Christian Gottlieb Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon III, and the continuation by Henrich Wilhelm Rotermund, op. cit., IV; ML III, 377.

Plato Mennonite Church (MC), Lagrange, Ind., established in 1949, had a membership of 90 in 1957. Willis C. Troyer was the minister. M.G.

Plattdeutsch (Plautdietsch), a Low German language spoken by Mennonites who originally came largely from the Netherlands and settled in Danzig and along the Vistula River whence they spread into Russia and North and South America. All Mennonites are primarily of two ethnic and linguistic backgrounds, the Swiss-German (see Pennsylvania German) and the Dutch-German or Low German.

Dutch Background. When the Mennonites from the Netherlands settled along the Vistula, they adhered to their Dutch language until the second half of the 18th century. Individuals of different backgrounds joining the Mennonites simply learned this foreign language. The native language of the country was a form of Low German or Plattdeutsch with peculiar local characteristics, spoken in some form in all of North Germany. It is linguistically related to Dutch and English. That the similarities between Low German, Dutch, and English are in some respects greater than those between Low German and High German, the official language of German-speaking countries, can be seen in the word for water: Dutch water, Low German woata, and High German Wasser. Until the 17th century it was a literary language. Whereas Dutch has remained a literary language, most of the Low German dialects are now colloquial languages, although there is a large body of Low German literature, and the dialect has been used by some of the great writers. A current classification divides the Low German language and dialects by the following geographical areas: Westphalia, Hanover, Oldenburg, Bremen, Hamburg, Lübeck, Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, Braunschweig, Brandenburg, West Prussia, and East Prussia. Most of these areas or countries have many local dialect forms.

From Dutch to Low and High German. Although the Mennonites of this area lived at times under Polish sovereignty, they were little influenced by the Polish language. In their daily life they accepted the Low German spoken in their territory. The question has been raised why the Mennonites in America coming from Russia and Poland speak different forms of Low German. Some scholars have pointed out that this is related to their religious background such as the Flemish or Frisian church affiliations (Quiring). Others consider it due to the different localities in Danzig and West Prussia from which they moved to Russia (Mitzka). The Mennonites accepted the Low German of their environment gradually, at times retaining some Dutch peculiarities. Mitzka has pointed out that some of the notebooks of Mennonite farmers of the 17th and 18th centuries contain a mixture of Dutch and German. This was the time when they were becoming more and more exposed to the German culture and language. C. Wiens, in his study of the Dutch linguistic influence on the vocabulary of this area, has shown that the shift from Dutch to Low German in daily life was completed before Dutch was replaced by High German in worship services, correspondence, etc. In rural areas this change in worship services was completed earlier than in cities like Danzig. Some ministers, e.g., Buhler in the Grosswerder, began to preach in German in 1757, although the congregation did not like it. In 1762 the first German sermon was preached in the Mennonite church of Danzig, for which the minister received special permission, but no appreciation was expressed. The last elder to insist on Dutch preaching in Danzig was Hans von Steen (q.v.), who died in 1781. The Danzig church record was henceforth kept in German (in BeCL). The first German Mennonite hymnal replacing the Dutch was printed in 1761. In 1788, when the first Mennonites migrated to Russia, some were still using Dutch. Dutch Bibles and other books were taken along to Russia, some of which even reached the prairie states and provinces of the United States and Canada during the migration of 1874. However, the first migrants to Russia, coming from the poorer classes of the Danzig and Elbing area and settling at Chortitza (q.v.), primarily spoke Low German. Dutch was no longer in use and High German was still a foreign tongue. It is particularly this form of Low German which has been perpetuated among the more conservative Mennonites of Manitoba and Mexico, and which has been investigated by such scholars as Quiring and Lehn.

Those Mennonites who stayed in Danzig and West Prussia longer followed the prevalent trend, accepting High German more fully for worship services and literary intercourse. Better education, particularly among the more well-to-do, hastened this development. In 1803, when the Molotschna settlement was established in the Ukraine, the new settlers, being a little more prosperous, had made a greater shift from Dutch to Low German as well as to High German. Also the Low German spoken by them had been considerably altered by High German influences. The difference between the Chortitza and Molotschna Low German is still discernible in the settlements of North and South America. There was, however, a general tendency in Russia toward accepting this "more cultured" form of Low German in the areas where Mennonites from both settlements were mixed, such as in secondary schools, forestry service camps, daughter settlements, and especially in the North and South American settlements, where a mixing of various backgrounds has taken place on an unprecedented scale. Among those Mennonites who left Danzig and Prussia in 1850-80, going to Samara (Russia), Nebraska, and Kansas, the shift from Low to High German had almost been completed before the emigration. In the family the parents spoke mostly High German, but knew Low German well enough to converse with servants and those who preferred it. Their High German, to be sure, revealed peculiarities as a remnant of their Low German background. This phenomenon was true of many of the Mennonites of Prussia up to the time of their dispersion in 1945. At that time Low German was still spoken by the non-Mennonite population, especially by the laboring and poorer classes, in the Prussian communities from which Mennonites had gone to Russia and America, and in which Mennonites still resided. Mitzka, who made a study of the Low German spoken by the Mennonites of Russia and the areas from which they originally came in West Prussia, states that a geographic shift of the Low German had taken place in their home country.

Low German in America. In the great Mennonite migration from Russia to North America in 1874 the Chortitza or Old Colony Mennonites went to Manitoba and later some to Mexico and South America. They have preserved the original Low German in its purest form, although it also shows Russian and English influences. They have only a very limited mastery of High German and English, and in Mexico and South America of Spanish. The Molotschna Mennonites went primarily to the United States, settling in Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and Minnesota, although some settled in Manitoba. Mennonites from Poland settled in Kansas and Dakota. The Low German of the Polish group differs more from that of the Molotschna and Chortitza than these do between themselves. The Molotschna Mennonites did not all speak the same form of Low German, nor had they lived together long enough to achieve complete uniformity. The later Molotschna settlements, such as Waldheim and Alexanderwohl, had very definite linguistic characteristics which have been retained and are even today noticeable in Kansas.

Russian and English Influences. Gerhard Wiens's study of the influences of the Russian language on Low German makes some startling observations: "This study of mine may indeed shock some of my people," because their Low German "was not nearly so pure as we were proud to claim." He presents examples of how new words were introduced from the new environment and assimilated, how Russian neologisms entered and Low German words were given a Russian form. Quiring also made a study of Polish and Russian influences on Low German, while C. Wiens has done similar work on Dutch influences on Low German. J. John Friesen and J. W. Goerzen have pointed out the relationships between Plattdeutsch and English. No one has fully investigated the influence of the English language on Low German in Canada and the United States, or the Spanish and Portuguese upon the Low German in Mexico and South America, although such influences are noticeable.

Among the Mennonite groups of Russian background in the United States, Low German is still spoken or understood in solid Mennonite communities such as Goessel, Buhler, Inman, and Hillsboro in Kansas, Henderson in Nebraska, and Mountain Lake in Minnesota. However, by far not all the young people are able to converse in Low German. It can be expected that Low German will gradually disappear within a few generations among the Mennonites in the United States, but will likely remain in use for some time to come in Canada and particularly in Mexico and South America where the bearers of this language are living in much greater isolation. A Plattdeutsch religious radio program has been broadcast over CFAM in Altona, Man., by the Mennonite Radio Mission since 1957, and another at Swift Current, Sask. During World War II, when the use of the High German was not permitted, the Mennonites of Brazil used Low German in worship services. The Old Colony Mennonite ministers frequently change from High to Low German since many of the young people understand very little High German. Many of the Indians living in the vicinity of the Chaco Mennonites in Paraguay speak some Low German. Thus far the studies dealing with the Low German as spoken by the Mennonites have been devoted primarily to synchronic, diachronic, and phonetic investigations (Quiring, Goerzen, Lehn). Only few attempts (Mitzka) have been made to trace the origin, spread, and differences among the various Low German dialect forms spoken by Mennonites, their relation to each other, as well as the structural development of each.

There is a noticeable culturally restrictive effect of the continued use of the dialect, particularly in groups where the isolation from the main stream of German or English culture is marked. Most of those who speak Low German as their major language read practically no literature, since there is very little modern Low German literature available especially of a religious character. (See Language Problem.)

The Low German and Pennsylvania German languages have been used by the conservative Mennonites and Amish as barriers against "worldly" influences. Like other forms of nonconformity, such as dress restrictions, they have been at times a positive and at times a negative factor in the development of a wholesome Mennonite church and community life. (See also Pennsylvania German and Language Problem.)

Low German Mennonite Literature. Among the Mennonites of Russia, J. H. Janzen was the first to write Low German plays. They were primarily designed to be given in schools and deal particularly with questions pertaining to education. He continued his writing in Canada and was succeeded by Arnold Dyck, who wrote Dee Fria, a comedy, "Wellkaom op'e Forstei!" and a number of other Low German plays and numerous narratives and short stories, such as Koop enn Bua op Reise; Koop enn Bua faore nao Toronto; Die Millionäa von Kosefeld; and Onse Lied. These plays are still being given in Mennonite communities of North and South America where Low German is spoken. This is generally the case in Canada, Mexico, Brazil, and Paraguay. C.K.

Jacob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitz in Süd-Russland (München, 1928); H. Grimme, Plattdeutsche Mundarten (Leipzig, 1910); C. Wiens, "Niederländischer Einfluss im Wortschatz der Weichselwerder," Ztscht des Westpreussischen Geschichtsvereins, 1916; Walter Isaak Lehn, "Rosental Low German, Synchronic and Diachronic Phonology" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Cornell University, 1957); J. W. Goerzen, "Low German in Canada, a story of 'Ploutdietsch' as Spoken by Mennonite Immigrants from Russia" (unpublished University of Toronto Ph.D. dissertation 1952); Walter Mitka, "Dialektgeographie der Danziger Nehrung," Ztscht für deutsche Mundarten XVII (1922) 117-35; idem, Deutsche Mundarten (Heidelberg, 1943); idem, "Die deutsche Sprache in Westpreussen," Staat und Volkstum (Berlin, 1926) 487-95; idem, Grundzüge Nordostdeutscher Sprachgeschichte (Halle-Salle, 1937); idem, Handbuch zum deutschen Sprachatlas (Marburg, 1952); idem, "Die Mennoniten in Russland und ihre Beziehungen zu Westpreussen," Staat und Volkstum (Berlin, 1926) 471-87; idem, "Niederpreussisch," Ztscht für deutsche Mundarten XVI (1921) 151-54; idem, Sprachausgleich in den deutschen Mundarten bei Danzig (Königsberger deutsche Forschungen II, Königsberg, 1928); idem, "Die Sprache der deutschen Mennoniten," Heimatblätter des deutschen Heimatbundes VIII (Danzig, 1930; also as a reprint 1931); V. Schirmunski, Die deutschen Kolonien in der Ukraine (Moscow, 1928); Unruh, Hintergründe; E. Wagner, "Ueber die Mundart der Thorner Stadtniederung" (unpublished University of Königsberg doctoral dissertation, 1912); W. Ziesemer, Die ostpreussischen Mundarten (Breslau, 1924); Gerhard Wiens, "Russian in Low German," Menn. Life XIII (April 1958) 75; J. John Friesen, "Romance of Low German," Menn. Life II (April 1947) 22; J. W. Goerzen, "Plautdietsch and English," Menn. Life II (April 1947) 22.

Plattner (Basseyrer, Passeier, Peltner), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor, was beheaded in 1574 at Rotenholz in Tirol in the Inn Valley. "He was . . . conducted forth to the place of execution, where he admonished the people to desist from sin and repent. Then he kneeled down, turning his face to the East, . . . lifted his hands to heaven and poured out an earnest prayer to God his heavenly Father, thanking and praising Him for all the grace and benefits shown him, and that He had made him worthy to suffer for His name. He also prayed for all people who were worthy, that God would put repentance and amendment into their hearts. Finally he commended his spirit into the hands of God, for whose name he was willing to offer up again his life and body (which he had received from Him), and to testify to His truth even to his last drop of blood, as he had promised Him on baptism, and would thus expect to be received of Him into His gracious arms. . . . When he had finished praying, he rose and went boldly toward the executioner, so that neither his face nor his color changed, but he knelt down again so intrepitly, that the executioner was consternated by his valiant praying and undaunted mind, and became afraid to execute him."

Plattner is the author of two hymns: "Ach hilf mich leid und sehnlich klag all Tag" (three stanzas) and "Hilf, Herr, in dieser Not, sieh an die schwere Pein" (13 stanzas). He is also the subject of the hymn: "Hört zu, was wir euch singen thon, ir Gottes hausgenossen" (43 stanzas), an acrostic on the name "Hans Blatner aus Passeir, ein Schneider."

NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 676, E 993; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 703-7; Wolkan, Lieder, 234; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 474; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 366; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 266; ML III, 377.

Plattner (Plaitner), Vigil (Vigil), an Anabaptist martyr, previously a people's priest in Rattenberg in Tirol, Austria, joined the Anabaptist movement. The severe persecution breaking out in North Tirol made him withdraw to another place. He was probably on his way to Moravia, when he was seized at Schärding. He defied all attempts to convert him, "would not deviate to the right or to the left." Condemned to death, he was beheaded in 1529 at Schärding (at that time in Bavaria). He is the author of a hymn, in which he gives "testimony to God in the truth": "Wach auf, mein Seel, wann es ist an der Zeit" (with 17 stanzas). P.D.E.

Zieglschmid, Chronik, 64; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 33; Mart. Mir. D 23, E 432; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 46; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 45; Wolkan, Lieder, 15; ML III, 377.

Platzter, Jacob, of Prad in the Vintschgau, Tirol, Austria, an Anabaptist martyr, a locksmith, was seized together with three other Anabaptists, Sier, Mareez, and Rauchenpüchler, on May 6, 1585, by Jost Tausch, called Aichele (q.v.), who was hunting down the Anabaptists (see Lienz). At his cross-examination he refused to name those who had lodged him. The four men had been sent by the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia to Tirol to visit the Anabaptists there and to win new converts for Moravia. On July 5 Platzter recanted, as the others also did before and after him. He explained that it was not the doctrine, but only the life and conduct of the Anabaptists that attracted him. He enjoyed his freedom for a long time; on June 19, 1591, he was again arrested in the village of Sillian in eastern Tirol, having apparently again adopted Anabaptism. During the eight weeks of his imprisonment he could not be persuaded to recant. He accepted his death sentence "with good cheer"; "he was not at all sorry to have to die for his faith." His steadfast martyrdom is the theme of the hymn, "Ir liebhaber der Warheit guet, lasts euch erzellen mit freiem muet" (with 30 stanzas). P.D.E.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 308-10; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 434; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 562; J. N. von Kripp, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Tirol (Das achte Programm des II. Staatsgymnasiums zu Innsbruck, 1857) 3-60; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 790; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol I und II (Vienna, 1892-93); Wolkan, Lieder, 236; Mart. Mir. D 779, E 1082; ML III, 377 f.

Platzter, Melchior, a Hutterian Brethren martyr, an apothecary, was arrested in Zürich, Switzerland, with Ludwig Dörcker and David Falch in 1574, subjected to a cross-examination, and then released (Bergmann, 46; Geschicht-Buch, 367 f.). In 1583 he was seized in the village of Rankweil in Tirol, Austria, and taken to Feldkirchen, where he was put into the tower of the castle. He was again cross-examined. A priest was summoned from Bregenz to convert him, and hoped to gain honor and fame by this colloquy. But when he was soon defeated he said, "Did the devil bring me here and deceive me with this Anabaptist?" It was hoped that Lutheran clergymen would have better success. But they too failed. Thereupon Platzter was accused of being a misleader of the people. In 1581-82 he had been very active in the Bregenz Forest (q.v.) area, converting many persons and persuading them to emigrate to Moravia (q.v.). The government required that he render an oath in order to be released; he could then go where he had come from. But he refused. He was then returned to Rankweil and there beheaded and burned on Nov. 6, 1583. At the site of execution he admonished the people, who showed great sympathy for him; he urged them to repentance and warned them of the false prophets who were misleading them. He is the author of the hymn, "Hörent jhr Kinder Gottes rein, was wir euch wellen singen."

NEFF.

Cornelius Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich (Leipzig, 1916); Mart. Mir. D 751, E 1058; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 367 f., 413-15, 435; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 477, 533 ff.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 283; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 756; Wolkan, Lieder, 235; ML III, 378.

Plauschwarren, a village in East Prussia, formerly German, now Russian, where Mennonites from West Prussia settled in the 18th century. They founded the Lithuanian congregation about 1758 (usually called Memel-Niederung, q.v., after 1918) near Tilsit (q.v.), membership 233 in 1774, and 239 in 1788, and built a church at Plauschwarren in 1767. In 1831 this meetinghouse was abandoned and a new meetinghouse was built at Adlig-Pokracken, then the center of the congregation. The old meetinghouse of Plauschwarren was remodeled in 1884 and used again until 1897, when it was sold.

vdZ.

Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk der westpreussischen Mennoniten (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952) 44 f.

Pleasant Grove Mennonite Church (MC), Brewton, Ala., a mission congregation established in 1949 under the Lancaster Conference, had a membership of 10 in 1957.

M.G.

Pleasant Grove Mennonite Church (MC), Salix, Pa., had 27 members in 1958. Norman Teague was its licensed minister. It was started in 1900 in an abandoned Lutheran church near Elton by L. A. Blough, organized as a congregation the same year, erected a new meetinghouse in 1910 remodeled in 1940.

M.G.

Pleasant Grove Conservative Mennonite Church, located 5 miles southeast of Goshen, Ind., was built in 1948 as a branch of the Townline and Griner churches. The first services were held here Aug. 15, 1948. Services were held in all three of the churches every Sunday, the ministers alternating between the three churches. In 1956 the congregations organized separately. The membership of the Pleasant Grove congregation at that time was 260, with Clarence A. Yoder (ordained in 1948, as bishop 1950), Menno S. Schrock (transferred from O.O.A.), and Edwin J. Knepp (ordained in 1954).

In 1954 the Bethel Church was built 4 miles northeast of Nappanee, and a congregation was organized as a branch of the Pleasant Grove congregation with Homer Miller as bishop; in 1957 it had 85 members, while Pleasant Grove had 240. S.T.E.

Pleasant Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located in Pendleton County, W. Va., is a member of the Northern District of the Virginia Conference. Services were first held at this place in an old tannery and in near-by schoolhouses beginning about 1885, under the leadership of bishops John Geil and Abraham Shank. In 1903 a frame church was built, which still serves the congregation. Until this time the ministry was supplied from Rockingham County, Va. The membership in 1956 was 54, and the pastor Lloyd O. Hartzler, who was ordained in 1945. T.S.

Pleasant Grove Mennonite Church (MC), now abandoned, was erected in 1900 about 3 miles southwest of Martinsburg, Blair Co., Pa., as a branch of the Martinsburg (q.v.) congregation, having their worship together on alternate Sundays. Pleasant Grove was abandoned in 1945, and since that date all services are held in the Martinsburg church, only a beautifully kept cemetery near by remaining. A.K.A.

Pleasant Hill Amish Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, located near O'Neill, Neb., was listed in the Mennonite Family Almanac in 1892 for the first time under the name "Slocum," which was used interchangeably with "Holt" until 1922 when it was listed as the Pleasant Hill congregation, with 23 members. It was last listed in 1944, with one member. In 1905 it had had 40 members with Christian Ernst as minister. It reached its highest membership, 51, around 1916. M.G.

Pleasant Hill Mennonite Church (MC), earlier known as the Pleasant Hill Rural Mission, a member of the Illinois Conference, and located about 4 miles northwest of Morton, and 5 miles southeast of Peoria, Ill., was organized as a congregation on March 8, 1924. In 1958 it had a membership of 91, with Wayne King as pastor. R.D.R.

Harry F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931) 314 f.

Pleasant Hill Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, located in Fairfield County, Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was founded in the early 1800's by settlers from Rockingham County, Va. The first settler (1799), Martin Landis, Sr., built a log meetinghouse at an early date. Henry Stemen (q.v.), who came in 1803, was ordained minister and later bishop and served the congregation until 1841, when he moved to Allen County, Ohio. In the early years the congregation built a meetinghouse on the farm of Henry Brenneman, father of John M. and George (bishops), Daniel (preacher), and Henry (deacon) Brenneman. Nearly the entire membership moved away from the "Fairfield County hills" to land better suited for farming. The church building was moved across the road just north of the Pleasant Hill cemetery. Later it was sold and the proceeds used to fence the now badly neglected cemetery. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Extinct Ohio Mennonite Churches," MQR VI (1932) 5-29.

Pleasant Hill Mennonite Church (MC), located in Milton Twp., Wayne Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. The original meetinghouse was built in 1880 as one of the two meeting places of the Oak Grove congregation, remodeled in 1910 and again in 1950. (For the history of this congregation before 1947 and the names of its ministers, see Oak Grove Mennonite Church.) The present congregation was organized in 1947 as a schism from the Oak Grove congregation when the latter withdrew from the conference. The ministers since 1947 were Wm. G. Detweiler 1947-52, Gerald C. Studer 1947- . The membership in 1957 was 180. In 1959 it built a new meetinghouse at the edge of the town of Smithville. G.C.S.

Pleasant Retreat, a mission station of the Lancaster (MC) Conference, was opened in West Cocalico Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., 3 miles east of Cocalico in 1928. For 15 months Sunday school was held in the afternoon every two weeks, followed by preaching, but in 1931 the work was combined with Cocalico. I.D.L.

Pleasant Ridge Mennonite Church (MC), erected in 1882 in Vermilion Twp., Ashland Co., Ohio, replaced an earlier Mennonite church built (probably c1840) on land donated as a public burying ground by John Beutler, a Palatine immigrant. Soon after 1830, the ordained men here were Peter Beutler and John Risser (q.v.), immigrants from the Bavarian Palatinate, John Nusbaum, Isaac Kilmer, and either John or Christian Kauffman, probably a deacon. Bishop Jacob Nold of Columbiana County, Ohio, ordained Isaac Kilmer as bishop. Internal dissension, incompetent leadership, financial reverses, and defection to the River Brethren (Brethren in Christ) contributed to the early dissolution of the congregation. Before 1860 the Beutlers moved to Mahaska County, Iowa; the Kilmers, first to Crawford County, Ohio, and then to Elkhart County, Ind.; John Nusbaum and many others also to Elkhart County. The few remaining members joined with the small number of survivors of the Salemskirche (q.v., GCM) and their Lutheran and Reformed neighbors to found the prosperous Stone Lutheran Church five miles south of Ashland. J.S.U.

John Umble, "Extinct Ohio Mennonite Churches," MQR XIX (1945) 227-37; Melvin Gingerich, Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 138-45.

Pleasant Valley Amish Mennonite Church, Yoncalla, Ore., a Sleeping Preacher (q.v.) church, which broke away from the Harrisburg (Ore.) congregation. Roy J. Headings was bishop of its 23 members in 1957. Before 1953 it was called Roseburg (q.v.). M.G.

Pleasant Valley Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, Ordway, Col., is located 1¼ miles northeast of Crowley. In 1958 it had 34 members with deacon D. J. H. Schmidt in charge. M.G.

Pleasant Valley Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct: see DeKalb County, Ind.

Pleasant Valley Mennonite Church (MC), sometimes known as Sandtown, located 8 miles south of Iowa City, Iowa, and 2½ miles southeast of Hills, was organized as a congregation July 23, 1956. In 1948 the East Union and Lower Deer Creek congregations began a rural mission in the area, using an abandoned Methodist church, which is still used as a meetinghouse. The membership in 1958 was 20. Herman J. Smucker was pastor of the church.

H.J.S.M.

Pleasant Valley Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Kismet, Kan., was organized by Mennonite families coming from eastern Kansas at the beginning of the century. The first report of the congregation, under the name Schöntal Mennonite Church, appeared in the Western District Conference minutes of 1915. In 1930 P. B. Kopper was listed as leader, and the membership was 48. In 1957 the minister was Harold H. Jantzen, and the membership 38.

C.K.

Pleasant Valley Mennonite Church (MC), located in Harper Co., Kan., a member of the South Central Conference, was organized in 1888 with 15 charter members. The first meetinghouse, a frame structure, was built in 1897. The present meetinghouse was built in 1915. The first minister was Jacob Holderman. R. M. Weaver became pastor in 1907 and served the congregation for 39 years. Other ministers who have served the congregation are Andrew Good, Ephraim Shellenberger, Simon Hetrick, George Hinkle, Ben Horst, Noah Ebersole, J. P. Berkey, H. J. King, John Thut, Stephen A. Yoder, Wilbert Nafziger, and Waldo Miller (present pastor). B. F. Hamilton, S. C. Miller, T. M. Erb, David D. Miller, Milo Kauffman, and Gideon G. Yoder served the congregation as bishops. The membership, most of which is rural, was 188 in 1957.

G.G.Y.

Pleasant View Amish Mennonite Church, now extinct, Holden, Mo.: see Johnson County, Mo.

Pleasant View Amish Mennonite Church, located near Berlin, Holmes Co., Ohio, a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, was organized in May 1912 with about 20 members under the leadership of Bishop John B. Zook. Ministers who have served the church are P. V. Yoder and Dan Miller. Ministers who have been ordained by this church are John Swartzendruber, Joe Schlabach, Abe J. Schlabach, M. J. Swartzendruber, and Harry Stutzman. In 1933 there was a split in the church and the congregation began again with 21 members. In 1945 the congregation organized another worship service in Wayne Co., Ohio, north of Tragy Station on U.S. 30. In 1955 the combined membership of the two groups was 250, with Bishop Harry Stutzman and ministers Moses M. Miller, David L. Stutzman, and Andrew Stutzman in charge. H.A.S.

Pleasant View Beachy Amish Mennonite Church, Hartville, Ohio, was organized in June 1947. It had 132 members in 1957, with Samuel J. Otto as bishop (ord. 1948).

M.G.

Pleasant View Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located on the northeast edge of Goltry, Alfalfa Co., Okla. The first members settled here in 1900. The congregation was organized in 1905, using a district school for a place of worship until 1935, when the present church was built. In the early years the church was served by ministers from Kansas. A Sunday school was organized in 1923, and a sewing circle in 1940. The majority of the members are farmers and industrial workers. In 1958 Reuben J. Koehn and Leroy Wedel were the ministers, with a membership of 45.

R.J.K.

Pleasant View Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles north and $\frac{3}{4}$ mile west of Goshen, Ind., was established in 1936 as a mission Sunday school by the Prairie Street Mennonite Church. In 1958 it had a membership of 153, with John S. Steiner serving as bishop.

J.S.S.

Pleasant View Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Aurora, Neb., was organized in 1886 under Christian Rediger and again in 1892 as the "German Mennonite Church," one of the twelve charter member congregations of the Central Conference of Mennonites. Ministers who have served the congregation were Andrew Oesch, Jacob Donner, George Donner, Eugene Augspurger, Edwin Gossen, and Herbert Roszhart. The membership in 1957 was 161, with Leo D. Thomas as pastor. The original church built in 1886-87 was remodeled in 1949.

H.Ro.

Pleasant View Mennonite (MC) Church, North Lawrence, Ohio, dates back to 1837, when a group of 36 from Farmersville, Lancaster Co., Pa., settled in the vicinity, arriving there after fifteen days of travel by Conestoga wagons and buggies. Family names included Horst, Eschliman, Dague, Doll, Shisler, Oberlin, Hartel, Keffer, and Buchwalter. The land was homesteaded in 1811 and some of the old deeds, still preserved, bear the signature of President James Madison. The first church building was erected in 1856. Ministers who have served the church in order of succession are Henry Martin, Jr., and Benjamin Horst (ordained 1857), Michael Horst (1877), I. J. Buchwalter (1893), Alva Wengard (1935), Elmer E. Yoder (1952), and David E. Hostetler (1953). In 1956 the membership was 91, with Elmer E. Yoder as minister.

D.E.H.

Pleasant View Mennonite Church (MC), located 9 miles southwest of Hydro, Okla., a member of the South Central Conference, began in 1896-97, when the B. B. Miller family came from Kansas and the W. C. Lantz family from Indiana. The congregation was organized by Bishop Joseph Schlegel of Milford, Neb., in 1898. In 1900 another Joseph Schlegel, who lived in Lyon County, Kan., became its bishop. In 1906 he settled on the quarter of land where the church is located, and served until 1914. In 1902 a meetinghouse was built, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles southeast of Thomas, across the road from the cemetery, which is now used by the Old Order Amish. In 1915 the old church was replaced by a larger one and the present structure was built in 1924-25. In 1906, in order to locate it more centrally, the meetinghouse was moved $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east and 2 miles south. About one fourth of the members, past and present, came from non-Mennonite homes.

The ministers in charge of the congregation of 130 members in 1956 were John Slagell, pastor, and Alva Swartzendruber, bishop. J.S.

Pleasant View Mennonite Church (MC), located 2½ miles west of Chambersburg, Franklin Co., Pa., is a member of the Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Conference. The church was built in the summer of 1909 by members of the Marion and Chambersburg congregation and was dedicated on Aug. 15, 1909. Ministers serving this congregation have been George W. Ernst 1909-52, Walter H. Lehman 1929- , and John B. Sollenberger 1949- . The membership was about 35 in 1909, and 104 in 1958. W.H.L.

Pleasant View Mennonite Church (MC), Schellsburg, Pa., a member of the Allegheny Conference, had a membership of 29 in 1957. Aldus Wingard was bishop and Charles R. Shetler minister. It was started by settlers from the Johnstown region in 1872, but no meetinghouse was erected until 1910. The congregation was organized fully in 1914. H.S.B.

Pleasant View Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite Church, located in Mahoning County, Ohio, is a congregation of about 80 members. In 1872 preacher Samuel Good (1810-83) and deacons David Weaver (1819-90) and Christian Lehman (1832-1912) with about 16 families withdrew from the Columbiana-Mahoning congregation with Bishop Jacob Wisler. Local issues which precipitated the division were the use of the English language in preaching, elevation of the pulpit and ceiling in the new Oberholtzer meetinghouse, and funeral customs. This group used the three meetinghouses of the Columbiana-Mahoning congregation in 1872-98. The Columbiana-Mahoning (MC) congregation held three services a month, alternating between the Oberholtzer church at Columbiana, the Nold church at Leetonia, and the Metzler church at North Lima. The Wisler group used one of the two churches which were vacant. In 1897 a meetinghouse, still used, was erected west of the present Midway church. The congregation was organized with 40 charter members in 1898. Ministers who have served are Samuel Good (1810-83), Jacob Tyson (1850-1914), who moved from Wood County, Ohio, Jacob L. Weaver (1846-1921), Harvey Horst, and Abraham Brubaker. In 1957 the ministers were Daniel C. Witmer, Israel Snyder, and David Weaver, with a membership of 85. W.D.S.

Pleasantview Home for the Aged, at Kalona, Iowa, a 46-room home built and operated by the Mennonite Benevolent Association consisting of 33 members representing the Mennonite, Conservative Mennonite, and Beachy Amish congregations of the community. It was built in 1957-58 at an approximate cost of $250,000, and was opened for service on April 14, 1958. E.G.S.

Pleasantview Mennonite (MC) Church, near Brethren, Manistee Co., Mich., had its origin in 1903, when William Lantz, the first Mennonite to locate in the area, settled here. Other settlers followed, mostly from the Howard-Miami, Amish Mennonite (now MC) congregation near Kokomo, Ind. E. A. Mast, bishop of the Howard-Miami congregation, organized the Manistee County Mennonites into the Pleasantview congregation on Sept. 9, 1904. Included among the first members was Joseph S. Horner (1864-1945), a preacher. The new congregation in Manistee County worshiped in a log cabin until 1906, when a church building was erected in Brown Township. Four years later, in December 1910, Horner moved back to his home congregation, Howard-Miami. At about that point the membership was 48. But soon a decline set in as families moved away. Finally only one family remained. In 1917 the church building was sold to the Church of the Brethren, only to revert later to Mennonite ownership. Two years later, in May 1919, C. C. Culp was placed in the Pleasantview congregation by the district mission board to serve as pastor and mission worker. He served there until his death in 1953. Lester Wyse also served as a minister in the congregation for a number of years until his removal to Ohio. In 1957 the minister was Warren Shaum, with a baptized membership of 30. The congregation is not independently organized but is under the sponsorship of the mission board. J.C.W.

Plempsche Doopsgezinden, or Plempsche gemeente (congregation), nickname of the Old Frisian Mennonite congregation at Hoorn (q.v.), Holland, "de Plomp" being the name of a house in which this congregation held its meetings. Because of the fanaticism of the elder Pieter Jans Twisck, Jr., this group, then numbering 30 members, had separated from the Frisian congregation in 1690. Its members merged with the main body in 1723. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 111-13; DB 1867, 78-90.) vdZ.

Plener, Philipp (also called Blauärmel, blue sleeves being the sign of the dyers' craft, or Weber, i.e., weaver for his profession), the leader of an early Anabaptist group in 1527-35. His birthplace is not known; in some records he is called Philipp of Strasbourg, in others "of Bruchsal," indicating, however, the places of early activity rather than his birthplace. Gustav Bossert Jr. assumes that he comes from Zaisersweiher near Bruchsal, Baden, Germany, and that his real name was Loyer, Layer, or Löwe (TA, 52). W. Wiswedel follows this conjecture; but it is hard to see how Plener and Loyer could coincide. In any case, he was won for Anabaptism by 1526 or early 1527, most likely in Strasbourg. He then concentrated his work in and around Bruchsal in the Kraichgau, where he won and baptized Blasius [or Blasy] Kuhn (q.v.), who later became his most loyal and effective co-worker, Hans Gentner (q.v.), who later was an important link with the Hutterites, and a great number of others. In 1530/1 the Bruchsal congregation was said to have numbered about 500, Julius Lober (q.v.) being their minister for a time. Plener moved on. For two months in 1527 he lived in Augsburg in the home of the widow of Hans Leupold (q.v.), the martyred Anabaptist leader; he worked in and around Augsburg with Jörg Schachner of Munich. Persecution drove him on to Moravia, where he at first worked hand in hand with Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.) at Rossitz (1527). As the group grew by newly arriving Anabaptists from the Palatinate, Hesse, Swabia, and Baden, all seeking a safe refuge in Moravia, Plener moved on to Auspitz on grounds belonging to the Abbess of Maria Saal (Brno). In 1529 the principle of community of goods was established, most likely at first for economic reasons rather than Christian principles. From now on the brethren lived in Bruderhof communities. In 1531 Blasy Kuhn brought the remnants of the Bruchsal congregation also to Moravia, swelling the Auspitz group to (allegedly) a total of 2,000 souls.

There were now three Anabaptist groups in Moravia practicing community of goods: the Gabrielites (mostly Silesians) in Rossitz, led by Gabriel Ascherham and his assistant Peter Hueter, who in 1537 joined the Hutterite group; the Philippites (mostly Southwest Germans from Swabia, Baden, and the Palatinate) in Auspitz with Philipp Plener as leader and Blasy Kuhn as his assistant; and third the Tyroleans, also in Auspitz, under the leadership of Sigmund Schützinger (q.v.), and later Jakob Hutter. In 1531 these three groups loosely fused, with Ascherham as their bishop. To be sure there were other Anabaptist groups in Moravia, living on private property; they were collectively called the "Swiss Brethren." When, in 1533, Jakob Hutter came to Moravia, rivalries soon developed. It appears that no principles of Christian living were involved; it was rather a question of leadership, perhaps one could better say of "charismatic leadership." No doubt Hutter was spiritually superior to all the others involved, a true leader in the prophetic sense of the word. Since, however, neither Schützinger, Ascherham, nor Plener was willing to step back, sad and unpleasant conflicts arose. Schützinger was eliminated from the Tyrolean group, which thus became "Hutterite" in the later sense of the term. Ascherham became the exclusive leader of the Gabrielites at Rossitz; after his death in Silesia most of them united with the Hutterites. Plener now became the leader of the Philippite Brethren in Auspitz—supposedly a total of 400—at least for the short yet significant years 1533-35.

Then in 1535 intermittent persecutions began also in Moravia. Ascherham and his group emigrated to Silesia. The Hutterites tried to stay on, in spite of great privations and misery (Jakob Hutter returned to Tirol and was martyred there in 1536; Hans Amon became the new bishop). Concerning the Philippites the only information extant is what the Hutterite chronicles report, understandably in not too sympathetic terms. The Abbess had driven them away from Auspitz, and they camped somewhere in the open, deeply discouraged. Plener and his assistant Blasy Kuhn went on horseback hither and thither to find other places to settle. As they were unable to find anything, they told the crowd (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 109) that everyone should look out for himself as best as he could.

With these few remarks both Plener and Kuhn disappear from the records; that is, the Hutterites had no further information about them. Certain Philippite brethren stayed on and later joined the Hutterites (1538/9); the majority, however, returned to Germany; for their history, see Philippites. Since the later trial records of this group contain no complaints concerning Plener's behavior, it is apparent that he did not really abandon his flock, even though no document reveals his later fate. Since there were Philippite Brethren in many parts of Western Germany until the mid 1540's, it may be rightly conjectured that Plener returned to Württemberg (or Baden) with a group, but that he died or was martyred soon afterward. In 1539 Peter Riedemann (q.v.) had talks with these brethren in Heilbronn, but nothing was recorded about Plener.

Concerning his teachings and spiritual leadership the chief source is Hege's report on the early days of Bruchsal. To be sure, some main ideas of the brotherhood are known, but it cannot be said with certainty whether they were ideas of Plener himself or of some of his co-workers at Auspitz. In any case, the principle of community of goods was observed by the Philippites both in Moravia and in Upper Austria, but was abandoned by the West German groups. Thus it was not too hard for the two first-named groups to join the Hutterites several years later, while the others, the Southwest German groups, being leaderless, joined the Swiss Brethren in their respective areas in the 1540's.

R.F.

TA Württemberg, 52; Beck, Geschichtsbücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Chr. Hege, Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 60 ff.; Wiswedel, Bilder III, 146-49; ML III, 378.

Pleshanovo (Neu-Samara), a Mennonite settlement in the Luxemburg district of the province of Samara, South Russia, was founded by the Molotschna settlement in 1890. The settlement covered an area of 96,376 acres and included 14 villages and 9 separate farms, with a Mennonite population of 3,670. In 1917 the settlements organized a volost, whereas up to that time they had belonged to Bashkir and Russian volosts. The settlement suffered less during the Revolution than some of the other Mennonite settlements. During the civil war the front passed over the settlement several times, but aside from the much requisitioning and occasional plundering did relatively little damage. In 1919-20 the Pleshanovo and Orenburg (q.v.) settlements were incorporated into the newly established Bashkir republic. The Bashkirs, an Asiatic Mohammedan race on a culturally inferior plane, had difficulty in adapting themselves to the role of ruler of the relatively wealthy Mennonites.

The Tok-Churan province, to which the two Mennonite settlements belonged, moved its seat from the Bashkir villages into the Pleshanovo settlement, beginning for the Mennonites a period of requisitioning and oppression; for since the Bashkirs owned practically nothing, they had to depend on the Mennonite farms for everything. Even the obligation of the settlers to transport the innumerable petty officials of the clumsy government organization meant a heavy burden, so much the more serious because the crop failures of 1920-21 made it difficult to feed the horses adequately. The employees of the province and the army had to be supported by the settlements. At the end of 1921 a Mennonite delegation in Moscow managed to have the Mennonite settlements separated from the Bashkirs and attached to the Russian regional government.

Pleshanovo had three steam-driven mills, two of which were ruined during the Revolution (1917); there were no funds available for repairing them. A large Mennonite water mill on the Tok filled the needs of the settlement for a time.

In 1905 a post office was built in Pleshanovo, and in 1907 a Mennonite hospital was founded by G. G. Voth; it passed into the hands of the district, and was enlarged in 1912. The school (a three-class Zentralschule) was built at Lugovsk in 1908.

Mennonite villages in the Pleshanovo settlement were: Krassikov with 221 souls on 45 farms with 4,860 acres of land; Podolysk with 263 persons on 47 farms with 5,000 acres and a steam mill; Lugovsk with 64 families, 305 persons, on 31 farms with 3,248 acres; Pleshanovo with 49 families, 258 persons, on 22 farms with 4,700 acres, with a post office, a Mennonite church, a Mennonite co-operative, and a hospital; Donskaya with 58 families, 298 persons, on 45 farms with 4,860 acres; Bogomazov with 65 families, 284 persons, on 34 farms with 3,672 acres; Annenskoye with 93 persons on 15 farms with 2,025 acres; Ishalka with 38 families, 212 persons, on 22 farms, 2,700 acres; Klinok with 246 persons on 44 farms, 4,700 acres; Yugovka with 175 persons on 35 farms with 3,780 acres; Kaltan with 251 persons on 45 farms with 4,860 acres; Kuterlya with 195 persons on 40 farms with 4,320 acres.

According to Ehrt the settlement had a population of 3,071 in 1926. After the Revolution many were exiled but the settlement was not completely disrupted during World War II as was the case with most of the European Mennonite settlements, and as erroneously stated in the article Neu-Samara. Numerous communications published in the Mennonite papers indicate that the settlement has continued some activity, although on a different level. Regular reporters have been Jacob and Anna Wiens. They state that many of the homes have been changed considerably. The traditional barns and sheds have been removed and the dwelling places have been altered to accommodate more families. Between the villages of Bogomazov and Dolinsk an electric power station has been erected for the industrial centers and the surrounding villages. A large carpenter shop, sawmill, blacksmith shop, flour mill, secondary school, hospital, clubhouse, garage, and barns and sheds for cattle, horses, and poultry as well as grain bins have been established. All the five sons of the Wienses served in the Russian army during the war and three of them did not return. Another report states that the churches of Lugovsk and Donskoye are being used as schools. The Donskoye collective farm planted an orchard of 32,123 acres.

Regarding the religious life recent letters have also given encouraging information. Wilhelm Sawatsky, a minister of Lugovsk, celebrated his golden wedding anniversary, for which occasion many people came. In both the afternoon and the evening three ministers preached. Another minister named in the letter is Peter Engebrecht. Even in 1949 religious funeral services were conducted. All the old ministers are gone, but young ones have taken their place, and revival meetings and baptismal services are common occurrences. Greater religious freedom prevails in the settlement since the death of Stalin. (See Neu-Samara, which this article corrects and supplements.) J.Q., C.K.

Der Bote, June 27, 1956, 7; July 25, 1956, 7; March 19, 1958, 4; Menn. Rundschau, Aug. 10, 1955, 2; June 6, 1956, 11; June 13, 1956, 2; Adolf Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland (Berlin, 1932) 152; ML III, 378 f.

Pleshanovo (Neu-Samara) Mennonite Church, Samara, Russia, was established in 1891, the early days of the Pleshanovo settlement (q.v.). In 1905 the baptized membership numbered 1,034, and the total number of souls was 2,689. The elder at that time was Daniel Boschmann, assisted by Johann Isaak, Peter Stobbe, Heinrich Peters, David Warkentin, Heinrich Unruh, and Johann Braun. The church was located in the village of Pleshanovo.

The settlers, in distinction from the "Old Samara" settlement, came from the Molotschna settlement and not directly from Prussia. Contact with other settlements was lively. The Revolution disrupted the economic and religious life, but gradually an adjustment took place and religious activities were resumed. Unser Blatt reported regularly in 1925-28 on song festivals and other activities of the church. In 1926 there was a song festival and a course for choir directors in Lugovsk in which nine choirs and 200 singers participated. In 1927 ministers from the settlements conducted a Bible study conference in the villages of Pleshanovo. The Mennonite settlement did not disintegrate during World War II as stated in the article Neu-Samara, but is still in existence although great changes have taken place. Few of the old ministers have remained but young ones have taken their place. Revival meetings and baptismal services have been common occurrences since the death of Stalin. Ministers named in letters include Wilhelm Sawatsky of Lugovsk and Peter Engebrecht. C.K.

H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 32, 64; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 171; Unser Blatt I, 176; II, 112, 275; III, 168.

Pletscher (Plätscher), a Mennonite family of Swiss descent, living since the last decades of the 17th century in the Palatinate, Germany. Jakob Plätscher was a preacher at Immelhausen (q.v.) in Baden from 1761, and Heinrich Plätscher a preacher at Eppstein (q.v.) near Frankenthal from 1764, both serving until after 1802. This Heinrich Plätscher was married to Katharina Brenneman; they lived at Friedelshelm. Their son Johannes with his family emigrated from Friedelshelm to the United States in 1833. Other relatives moved from Friedelshelm to America in 1841-55. The martyr's Jacob and Melchior Platzer (q.v.) may have belonged to this family. A Pletscher family migrated from Schleithelm (q.v.) to the Palatinate c1650. vdZ.

Dutch Naamlijst; MQR XXX (1956) 142, No. 28; 146 f., No. 38; 147, Nos. 39-41; 151, No. 50.

Plett, Gerhard (1860-1933), elder of several congregations in the Molotschna, Taurida, Russia, was born at Hierschau, Molotschna, in 1860. In 1882 he was married to Elizabeth Klassen, and in 1892 to Katharina Willms. The family consisted of three sons and six daughters. He supplemented his elementary education by evening instruction from the local teacher and later by extensive reading and private study, and then served for several years as a teacher, first in a village of the Crimea, then at Sparrau in the Molotschna. Then he took over a farm at Hierschau. In 1899 Plett became the minister of the Margenau congregation, in 1908 its elder, in 1909 elder of the newly formed Landskrone congregation, and in 1910 elder of the Alexanderwohl congregation. Before becoming minister Plett served for several years as district (Volost) judge at the Gnadenfeld office and later for many years as a member of the Molotschna Church Council (Kirchenkonvent) and the Molotschna School Board (Schulrat). Gerhard Plett was arrested in 1919 and spent some time in prison; in 1931 he was driven from his home and, broken in health, led the life of a fugitive until his death in April 1933. Devotion to duty and sound judgment were outstanding features of his character.

H.G.

Pleun(is): see Plonius.

Pleun (Pleunis), official name, Ampleunis van den Hoevele (Huevele), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 22, 1551 (not Oct. 2, as is stated in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror). Peter Bruynen, Jan de Oude Kleerkoper, Martin du Petitz, and Jacob Peeters suffered martyrdom with him. Pleun was a linen weaver, born at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders. These martyrs have been commemorated in the hymn "Tot lof des vaders, soon, heyligen geest" (To the praise of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost), found in Offer des Heeren and also in the Ausbund (No. 10); and the hymn "Ic sal met vruechden singen een Liet" (With joy I will sing a song), found in Lietboeckken (No. 5), was written in memory of Pleun, Peter, and Jan.

vdZ.

Offer, 177, note 1, 184 ff., 521 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 128, E 524; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 405, 415; XIV, 20 f., No. 210; Bibliographie II, 756, No. 631; DB 1899, 83, 154; Wolkan, Lieder, 61, 66, 127; ML III, 379.

Pleuntgen van der Goes (Apollonia Lonts Jansdochter), an Anabaptist martyr from Goes, Dutch province of Zeeland, was drowned in a tub on March 19, 1559, in the Antwerp prison called the "Steen," together with Naentgen, a leather merchant, and the midwife Fransken, because they persisted in their faith. They are celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Lietboeckken. Further particulars about Pleuntgen are lacking. K.V., vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 460, 472; XIV, 26 f., No. 238; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML II, 133.

Plockhoy (Ploquoy, Pluckoy, Plokhoy, Pluquooij), a Mennonite family found in the Netherlands, probably emigrants from Flanders, Belgium. Pieter Cornelis Plockoy (q.v.) belonged to a branch of this family formerly living at Zierikee (q.v.). During the 17th and early 18th centuries a number of Plockhoys were living in Amsterdam as members of the Lamist (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. vdZ.

Plockhoy, Pieter Cornelisz (1620?-1700?). The Netherlands. Living in the "Golden Age" of Dutch political independence and cultural achievement, Plockhoy came to Amsterdam from the city of Zierikzee in Zeeland, as did also Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, the noted physician and minister of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church. These two men were both influenced by the Collegiant movement and were associated in bringing into the Amsterdam Church Collegiant ideas, which caused much dissension and eventually divided the church into the Lamists and Zonists. Plockhoy was also associated with a radical Collegiant group of poets in Amsterdam known as the Reformateurs. In the light of his Collegiant connections he has little significance in the history of thoroughgoing Mennonitism except as a by-product of the transitory period of the Amsterdam congregation in 1650-64.

England. In Puritan England Plockhoy has more significance as a religious and social reformer during the late months of the Cromwell government. He published various editions of the following two tracts dated 1659:

1. The Way to the Peace and Settlement of these Nations fully discovered . . . published the letters that he had submitted to the Cromwell government in his attempt to reform in the area of the state church by supplanting it with all-embracing interdenominational assemblies based on principles of freedom, discussion, and toleration, all of which were typical Collegiant ideas. His attempt at reform on such a big scale had little chance for success.

2. A Way Propounded to Make the Poor in these and other Nations Happy . . . comprised an alternative scheme with more practicality as a solution to the immediate socio-economic needs of the day. It was a plan for co-operative settlements with communitarian production and consumption. Although colonies were actually begun in London, Southampton, and Ireland, and others were projected for locations in the Isles and even on the Continent, the Restoration of Charles II in 1660 put an end to these and other reform movements of the English revolutionary period. There is some evidence that in England Plockhoy had connections with other radical reformers of this period: Levellers Giles Calvert and William Walwyn; utopian, Samuel Hartlib; and possibly the poet-statesman, John Milton.

Colonial America. Plockhoy's determination to establish communitarian settlements culminated in the planting of a colony of Dutch emigrants along the Delaware in New Netherland in 1663, following a long series of negotiations with the Amsterdam burgomasters begun in 1661. In addition to the two English tracts mentioned above, there are also extant a third and fourth published in the Netherlands in 1662 and coming out of the negotiations in Amsterdam:

3. Kort Verhael van Nieuw Nederlant . . . (Brief Account of New Netherlands) published the seven anonymous letters which Plockhoy and his company submitted to the burgomasters in petition for a colonization contract.

4. Kort en Klaer Ontwerp (Brief and Concise Plan) bears Plockhoy's signature and was the actual colonization prospectus which he published to enlist emigrants for his settlement. According to a separate document, a group of twenty-five "Men-nists" had already been enlisted and promised financial support by the Amsterdam government. The identity of these Mennonites has never been established, and the colony was not itself a Mennonite colony in the usual sense.

A settlement of 41 persons was made in America in 1663 at Horekill on the Delaware, but was destroyed after a brief year of existence in the Anglo-Dutch war of 1664. Plockhoy's active career apparently came to an abrupt end, due in part no doubt to the fact that he became blind. Although he and his wife continued to reside in the neighborhood of Lewes, Del., under English rule for thirty years, they finally sought and found refuge in the new Mennonite settlement at Germantown, Pa., where they lived as public charges for their last six or more years (1694-1700). L.Ha.

H. P. Quack, De Socialisten (1899) I, 186-207; Leland Harder and Marvin Harder, Plockhoy from Zurich-see (Newton, 1952); Leland Harder, "Pioneer of Christian Civilization in America," Menn. Life IV (January 1949); idem, "Plockhoy and His Settlement at Zwaanendael, 1663," MQR XXIII (1949) 186-99; Irvin B. Horst, "Pieter Cornelisz Plockhoy, An Apostle of the Collegiants," MQR XXIII (1949) 161-85; DB 1884, 76; Friedrich Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 104; ML III, 379.

Ploeg, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family. The first generations of this family, as far as known, were in the early 17th century living at Bolsward and Franeker in the province of Friesland; many members of the Franeker branch were potters. They gradually spread over the Netherlands. This family has produced a number of Mennonite ministers: Feike Hiddes van der Ploeg (b. 1736 at Franeker, d. 1790 at Dokkum) studied at Franeker University and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and was a preacher at Hindeloopen 1767-72 and at Dokkum 1772-87. In 1787 he retired and left Dokkum; the probable reason for his retiring was his Patriotic (q.v.) sympathies. In 1788 he was back in Dokkum to give all his time and energy to a publishing house which he had founded in 1778. He was the author of a book of poems for children, which was once very popular. He also published a Naamlijst (List of Names) of the Mennonite congregations in Friesland with their ministers (N.N.B.W.b. VI, 1158; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1693). Both of his sons were Mennonite preachers: Hidde Wibius van der Ploeg (b. in 1769 at Hindeloopen, d. at Goch, Germany, in 1853), serving at Cleve 1789-93 and Crefeld 1793-1818; then he resigned, but in the next year he accepted a call from Goch, where he served 1819-50, also serving at Emmerich 1821-49 and at Cleve 1822-49. He published a sermon on Eph. 5:15-16 which he had preached at Crefeld, and a collection of sermons, Christelijke Leerredenen (Haarlem, 1813). The other son of Feike Hiddes was Johannes Aeschinus van der Ploeg (b. 1778 at Dokkum, d. 1859 at Grouw), who was a minister at Grouw in 1802-52. Two sons of the latter were also Mennonite ministers: Feico van der Ploeg (b. 1805 at Grouw, d. 1883 at Burgsteinfurt, Germany), who served at Ouddorp 1829-42 and Enschedé 1842-71, and Hidde Wibius van der Ploeg (b. 1815 at Grouw, d. there 1903), who was a pastor of Middellie 1839-92. Feico's son Jan van der Ploeg (b. 1834 at Ouddorp, d. 1917 at Wildervank) also went into the ministry (serving at Baard 1858-63, Monnikendam 1863-83, and Veendam 1883-98), as did also his cousin Sybrand Feico van der Ploeg (b. 1854 at Middellie, d. 1942 at Apeldoorn), a son of Hidde Wibius; he served at Burg on the island of Texel 1880-84, Drachten-Ureterp 1884-87, Noordhorn 1887-89, Pieterzijl (Grijpskerk) 1889-91, and Leer in East Friesland 1891-1920. He was married to Emma van der Goot, a daughter of the well-known Amsterdam Mennonite pastor Pieter van der Goot. Two other Mennonite pastors were members of this family: Folkert van der Ploeg (b. 1865 at Grouw, d. 1947 at Apeldoorn) married to Albertje Wuite, of Tjalleberd, minister of Tjalleberd 1893-96, Wolvega 1894-96, Veendam 1896-1906, and Groningen 1906-31, and his cousin Tjalke van der Ploeg (b. 1876 at Grouw, d. 1938 at Amsterdam), who served as pastor at Mensingeweer 1901-3, Heerenveen 1903-8, Zaandam-Oostzijde 1908-25, and Apeldoorn 1925-31. With the exception of Feike Hiddes van der Ploeg, who had no special training for the ministry, and Hidde Wibius, who was appointed as a ministerial candidate (proponent) by the Conference of Friesland (F.D.S.) in 1839, all of these ministers received their training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. In addition, many members of this family served as deacons in various Dutch Mennonite congregations. (Ned. Patriciaat XVII, 1927, 282-93.) vdZ.

Plonius (Pluen, Pleunis), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned in the Rhine on Nov. 29, 1561, at Cologne, Germany, with Johann von Orval (q.v.). The account in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is brief and incorrect. He only mentions the year of execution and not the date; he reports that two other martyrs, Orvel and Jan, were executed with him. This must be a mistake; Orvel and Jan were the same person, viz., Johann von Orvall (q.v.). Plonius was a tailor, a native of Emmerich, Germany. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D. 286, E. 654; Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 1, p. 11.

Plovier (Plouvier, Plover, Pleviers), a Mennonite family found in the 16th-17th centuries at Haarlem, Holland. They were weavers or tailors, natives of Meenen (Menin) in Flanders, who fled to Haarlem because of persecution. By marriage they were related to other Mennonite families such as van Heuvel, van Robaix, Verschoten, and Alderwerelt. Very likely the martyr Lenaert (q.v.) Plovier, executed in 1560 at Antwerp, Belgium, was a member of this family. (Church records of Haarlem: Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1855.) vdZ.

Pluen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pluen (van Hoevele).

Pluevo: see Nepluyevka.

Plum Coulee, a village (pop. 500) located 9 miles west of Rosenfeld, Man., on a creek named Plum Coulee, because delicious wild plums grew on both sides of the creek. It began in 1888 when the Canadian Pacific Railroad completed the Pembina branch. It was incorporated as a village municipality in 1901 and officially opened as such Jan. 1, 1902, with A. A. Harder as its first mayor. In 1897 Plum Coulee had seven grain elevators; a large surrounding area shipped all its grain to this spot. The town had four churches in 1958: Sommerfelder, built in 1917, the Bergthaler, the largest in membership, built in 1926, the Rudnerweide church and the Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, built only recently. John J. Hooge served the Bergthaler congregation for many years. The village is noted for its tree-lined streets where formerly there was only open, bald prairie. H.H.H.

Plum Coulee Mennonite Church, a congregation of the Rudnerweide (q.v.) Mennonite Church, located in Plum Coulee, Man., was organized about 1945 as a schism from the Sommerfelder (q.v.) Mennonite Church. The ministers take the pulpit in rotation according to a schedule. They are unsalaried. The membership in 1957 was about 120. H.H.H.

Plum Creek Mennonite Church (MC), 2 miles east and 2½ north of Béemer, Cuming Co., Neb., a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, was organized in 1895 with 14 charter members, with Jacob D. Birky the first resident minister, ordained here in 1895. The first meetinghouse was built in 1907 on the present site, and has been twice enlarged. The membership in 1956 was 142, with Samuel Oswald as bishop and P. O. Oswald minister. S.O.

Plumstead Mennonite Church: see Groveland.

Pluvier, Leendert, an Anabaptist martyr: see Lenaert Plovier.

Pluys, Jan (name probably garbled), was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Monjou (Monschau, q.v.) in the Eiffel, Germany, who because of persecution in 1711 moved to the Dutch province of South Holland, where he was engaged in farming. Further particulars are lacking. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1305.) vZ.

Plymouth Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located near Plymouth, Neb., was organized in 1885 with David Hiebert and Peter Yost as ministers. Its membership grew to about 30. Upon the death of David Hiebert, Peter Yost and John Yost served as lay ministers. After the death of Peter Yost in 1906 the congregation began to dissolve by members moving to other congregations, mostly to Kansas, until by 1919 it was extinct. A.L.Y.

Pochtitz (Bochtitz; Czech, Bohutice), a village and estate in the parish of Wolframitz near Kromau (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.). Because of a strong influx of Anabaptists, the Hutterian Brethren, after establishing a Bruderhof at Gopschitz (see Gopschitz), bought a house "on the heath" in Pochtitz in 1545-46 of Gallus Kusy von Mukodel and settled in the domain of the Kusy von Mukodel family; soon afterward they acquired a mill in Klein-Selowitz. During the time of persecution they had to abandon this Bruderhof but re-established it in 1560.

Whereas they had been favored by Stefan Kusy, their position deteriorated under his son Hans to such an extent that an open break occurred. On April 13, 1597, Kusy's men entered the house and severely damaged it, compelling the Brethren to leave on the following day, with their "aged, widows, and orphans and little children," losing all their possessions. The chronicles estimate the loss, including unpaid wages due for more than a year, at 5200 florins. The baron soon discovered his loss in their departure, and "upon his repeated desire and persistence" they returned in 1598.

In 1602 Gopschitz was abandoned "with the good will of the baron," but the Pochtitz Bruderhof remained. In 1605 it suffered at the hands of the Altheim regiment, in 1610-11 through the mismanagement of Georg Riedel, who purchased the grain too late (see Pellertitz). On Aug. 1, 1619, it was "hard plundered" by Dampierre's troops; on Dec. 19, 1620, Spaniards, Neapolitans, French, and Polish soldiers behaved so barbarously that the Brethren decided to flee.

After some time the refugees returned to Pochtitz, where on Aug. 26, 1621, the preacher Konrad Blösi died. On Jan. 5, 1622, the imperial troops, composed of all kinds of rabble, burned down the dwelling house; the remaining buildings were plundered and burned ten days later by cavalry from Lower Austria. The Brethren, driven out by these acts of violence, did not return; the settlement was abandoned. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; G. Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II: Brünnener Erzdiözese (Brno, 1858) 311 ff.; ML III, 380.

Podolsk Mennonite Settlement in Samara: see Pletchanovo.

Poeldijk, a village in the Westland district south of The Hague, Dutch province of South Holland, was in February 1536 the center of a revolutionary movement. Perhaps as many as 40 Anabaptists, both men and women, gathered in the home of the wealthy Jutte Ewouts (q.v.). The leader of this group was Adriaen Adriaensz (q.v.), a fanatic who claimed to be called by God to punish the world. On March 8-9, 1536, the Jutte Ewouts' house was surrounded by the police and finally taken. A number of the Anabaptists were killed, including Adriaen Adriaensz. (He did not escape, as is assumed in the article in ME I, 14.) A few succeeded in escaping; the others, including Jutte, were arrested, and in the next few days thirteen of them were put to death at The Hague, and some of the others were banished from Holland. vZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 166-72, 176, 178 f.; E. van Bergen, "De Wederdopers in het Westland," in Bijdra- gen voor de Geschiedenis van het Bisdom Haarlem XXVIII (Leiden, 1903) 269-88; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 188 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 217 f.

Podusilna, a former Mennonite congregation in Galicia (q.v.), located 15 miles southeast of Przemyśl. It was one of the later settlements which developed out of the original settlement in 1789. In 1872 several families settled here, followed by others in the following spring. Among the most common names were Bachmann, Brubacher, Ewy, Hubin, Müller, and Rupp. Jakob Müller was the first elder, ordained on July 8, 1877, d. Jan. 25, 1878. He was followed in office by Peter Bachmann, chosen to the ministry in 1878 and as elder in 1897, d. in 1901. In 1881 many of the families emigrated to America. In 1909, as a result of a general reorganization of the Galician Mennonites, the "Christliche mennonitische Gemeinde Kiernica-Lemberg" (q.v.) was organized, which incorporated all the earlier organized groups. During World War II the Mennonites left Galicia, most of them to settle temporarily in the Warthegau (q.v.). In 1945 they fled to West Germany. Finally most of them emigrated to Uruguay, although a few got to Canada.

NEFF, E.C.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934) 280 ff.; Menn. Bl., 1878, 16, 23; ML III, 380 f.

Pöggstall (Peckstall), a village northwest of Melk (q.v.) in Lower Austria, became the center of an Anabaptist congregation, which was gathered by Georg Fasser (q.v.), who had just been released from prison in Mödling (q.v.). He was captured and suffered a martyr's death in 1537 or 1538. The records do not agree on the date or the method of execution. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 381.)

P.D.E.

Pohl, Matthias (1869-1934), a Mennonite preacher, born in Emmendingen, Baden, Germany, on March 26, 1869, was a typesetter and proofreader in Langnau in the Emmental, Switzerland, where he also served the Mennonite congregation as preacher. In 1896 he was called as a co-worker on the Zionspilger (q.v.) and wrote several articles for this periodical. He also had some poetic gift and published some of his verse in a small volume, Blumen am Wege. In 1898 he became editor of the Zionspilger and kept this position until he returned to Germany in 1900. In that year he was elected preacher in Sembach (q.v.) in the Palatinate. His work here was blessed until he retired in 1929. He spent his last years at the Thomashof. As an author he was unusually active, contributing devotional, narrative, and historical articles to the Gemeindeblatt and the Christlicher Gemeindekalender, thereby creating for himself a lasting monument of grateful appreciation. Matthias Pohl died at the Thomashof (q.v.) on May 13, 1934. (Gem.-Kal. 1935, 54-63; ML III, 381.)

NEFF, S.G.

Pohrlitz (Boherlitz; Czech, Pohorlice), a market village on the Iglava in Moravia (q.v.), belonging to the Zierotin domains of Selowitz (q.v.) in 1581, when the Hutterian Brethren began to settle there. The next year they bought a small house with the land belonging to it of Josef Kowar, the resident of Pohrlitz, and expanded it to a proper Bruderhof. The buildings were located on the Waitzen highway, and were later known as the "old post office." In 1593 the Bruderhof comprised a considerable amount of land, for which they paid a fee to the barons. Although Johann von Zierotin (q.v.) favored the Anabaptists, he was nevertheless displeased by the intention of the widow of a Lutheran preacher to join the Brethren. The Bruderhof was greatly damaged by the Teuffenbach cavalry in 1608. On Dec. 16, 1619, the deacon Dietrich Pfingshorn died here. In summer of 1620 Bouquoy's troops plundered the Pohrlitz Bruderhof, murdered two of the Brethren, wounded three others fatally, and took away all the horses. Under the impact of this violence the Brethren fled, but soon returned. But on Dec. 29 the Bruderhof was again attacked, plundered, and partly burned. It was scarcely restored, when it had to be finally abandoned in 1622.

P.D.E.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Gregor Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II; Brünner Erzdiözese II (Brno, 1858) 229; ML III, 381.

Pokraken, Adlig, was the center of the Mennonite Memel-Niederung (q.v.) congregation in East Prussia after 1831, when a meetinghouse was erected here. Until 1831 the meetinghouse had been at Plauschwarren (q.v.).
vdZ.

Pol, a Dutch Mennonite family, which is said to have come from Münsterland, Westphalia, Germany. (1) Jan Jansz Pol, b. about 1665, a weaver, spent his winters in Zaandam, Holland, and is supposed to have joined the Mennonites there. About 1700 he settled at Borne in the district of Twenthe, Dutch province of Overijssel, from where this family later spread over the Netherlands. By marriage they have become related to many prominent Mennonite families of Twenthe, such as Hulshoff, ten Cate, Doorencate, Nijenhuis, Paschen, Stroink, Stenvers. In Borne the Pol family, which in the first generations was engaged in weaving and textile business, were Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites. (2) Jan Jansz Pol (1740-1806), a textile merchant and grandson of (1) Jan Jansz Pol, was in 1766-1806 a lay preacher of the Borne congregation. From 1779 he was a "commissaris" (trustee, and at the same time elder) of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite conference. (3) Adam Pol (b. 1782 at Borne, d. 1872 at Workum), son of (2) Jan Jansz Pol, after receiving his training from Pastor Pieter Beets (q.v.) of Zaandam, served as Mennonite preacher at Hippolytushoef (Wieringen) 1810-19 and at Hindeloopen 1819-50. The following ministers from this family received their training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary: (4) Jacob Pol (b. 1787 at Hengelo, d. 1848 at Weesperkarspel), a son of Jan Hendriksz Pol of Hengelo, served at Hoorn 1814-43. His brother (5) Jan Pol (b. 1804 at Hengelo, d. there 1849) was the pastor at Leeuwarden in 1827-49; a half brother of (4) Jacob and (5) Jan was (6) Gerhard Pol (b. 1815 at Hengelo, d. 1895 at Apeldoorn), who was a minister at Baard 1840-53, Ouddorp 1853-62, and Kromwal (Ytens)

1862-83. Finally (7) Johannes Pol (b. 1815 at Hipolytushoef, d. 1888 at Norden), a son of (3) Adam Pol, served at Warga 1839-47 and at Norden, East Friesland, Germany, 1847-84. His picture was published by Jan ten Doornkaat Koolman in his history of the Norden Church (1904).

Some of them published sermons and other writings: (4) Jacob Pol published a Leerrede (sermon) at Hoorn in 1839, commemorating his 25 years of serving and also his farewell sermon at Hoorn (Hoorn, 1848). (6) Gerhard Pol published his farewell sermon preached at Baard, Afscheidsrede (Harlingen, 1854), and (7) Johannes Pol Iets uit mijn Katechisatiewerk (Norden, 1886). Many members of the Pol family have served as deacons at Borne as did some members of the Hulshoff Pol lateral branch.

vpZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XXVIII, 1942, 227-44; Naamlijst 1829, 33, 43 f., 58; DJ 1840, 40; DB 1891, 54; 1897, 5 f., 8; ML III, 381.

Poland, located between Germany and Russia, has undergone many changes in its history as a "buffer state" and played a significant role in the history of the Mennonites who moved eastward from the Netherlands and South Germany. West and East Prussia were added to Poland in 1466 under the Jagellon dynasty (1386-1572) in a conflict with the Teutonic Knights. After 1530, therefore, when the Mennonites started to come from the Low Countries to settle along the Vistula River, they settled in Polish territory. Both privileges (q.v.) permitting them to settle under certain conditions and edicts prohibiting their settlement as "heretics" were issued in early times, primarily by Polish rulers. They were mostly valid only during the lifetime of a ruler. The Mennonites were tolerated only because some estate owners or officials derived benefits from them as expert farmers and drainers of the swampy areas along the Vistula River. In many instances they were unfairly exploited by government officials. After Willibald von Haxberg, the representative of the king of Poland, had unjustly exploited them, King John Casimir (1648-68) issued two "privileges," July 16 and Nov. 28, 1650, which were renewals of a privilege of 1642 and applied to the Mennonites of the Marienburg and Graudenz lowlands. The Mennonites and other Dutch immigrants became known as experts in various trades, particularly in draining swamps. Numerous favorable privileges and restricting edicts were issued in the following years. A special manner of settling, i.e., the pattern by which the "Hollanders" settled and rented their land, became known throughout Poland.

Starting in Danzig around 1535 Mennonite settlers moved into the unoccupied areas along the Vistula River establishing "Holländer" villages in the triangle between Danzig and Elbing and Marienburg. Some of the areas were the Danzig Werder (q.v., i.e., marsh), Scharpau (q.v.), Tiegenhof (q.v.), Marienburg Werder (q.v.), Heubuden (q.v.), Herrenhagen (q.v.), and Einlage (q.v.).

As the land in this triangle became occupied the descendants and newcomers proceeded south along the Vistula River, establishing themselves in Schwetz

(q.v.), Graudenz (q.v.), and Culm (q.v.). From here they proceeded into the interior of Poland. During the late 18th century they established the Mennonite settlements of Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) and Deutsch-Wymysle (q.v.) near Warsaw and farther southeast Michalin (q.v.) near Makhnovka, Karolswalde (q.v.) near Ostrog in Volhynia (q.v.) which meanwhile had become Russian Poland.

During the 18th century Swiss Mennonites and Amish from South Germany and Alsace-Lorraine settled near Lemberg (q.v.) in Galicia (q.v.), which was ceded by Poland to Austria in 1772. In Volhynia such villages as Kutuzovka (q.v.) and Neumanovka (q.v.) were established. Most of these Swiss-Volhynian and Swiss-Galician Mennonites emigrated to the United States around 1874 (see also Volhynia).

Since the fate of Poland is so varied most of the Mennonite settlements shared in the same vicissitudes. The history is related in greater detail in the articles dealing with the individual provinces, settlements, and villages.

During the Reformation period Poland experienced its greatest expansion when its territories extended from the Baltic Sea to the Black Sea, including West and East Prussia, Galicia, Volhynia, and other parts of the Ukraine and Lithuania. Lithuania was lost in 1635 and parts of the Ukraine in 1667. During the first partition of Poland (1772) West Prussia, not including Danzig and Thorn, became a part of Germany, and East Galicia of Austria. During the partitions of 1793 and 1795 other parts of Poland—Danzig, Thorn, Plock, and Warsaw—were added to Germany, and Volhynia to Russia. The Volhynian and some other Mennonite settlements were in Russian Poland when the great migration of Mennonites to America took place in 1874.

After World War I Poland again became independent, and Danzig (q.v.) became a free city. Many of the Mennonite settlements were located in Polish territory or the Polish Corridor. At the beginning of World War II Germany and Russia divided Poland once more, and the Mennonite population in Russian-occupied Poland was transferred to the German part. Since 1945 all of the areas in which Mennonites lived in Danzig, Prussia (except the Königsberg-Memel area, now Russian), and Poland belong to Poland and are under Polish rule. The Mennonite population either fled from this territory during World War II or the German collapse in 1943-45 or they were evacuated or have fled since that time. No organized Mennonite community or church exists today (1957) along the Vistula River or any other part of Poland. Two women are known to be still living in Danzig and Elbing who survived because of intermarriage with Poles.

American Mennonites did relief work in Poland in 1940-41 and 1947-49. M. C. Lehman was in charge of the Mennonite Central Committee work in 1940-41, when needy Poles and the Deutsch-Kazun Mennonites were helped. In 1947 relief work was resumed by the Mennonite Relief Committee (q.v.) and the MCC. In the Danzig area and in Nasielsk north of Warsaw some 245 tons of food and 31 tons of clothing were distributed in 1947-48. In 1947 the MCC established a demonstration farm near Pelplin south of Danzig. At its peak this unit had 23 men. The MCC was also instrumental in helping some remaining Prussian, Polish, and Russian Mennonites to leave for Western Germany.

The relation of the Mennonites to the Poles and Poland, the attitude of the Polish rulers toward the Mennonites, and their contribution to the country have not been thoroughly investigated. Much of the source material is not accessible at this time or has been destroyed. Some of the church records have been rescued and are located in the Bethel College Historical Library, the Mennonite Research Center at Göttingen (Germany), and in private hands. In some instances the Mennonite communities were fertile soil for the Baptist movement, which entered Poland in the mid-19th century. Some Mennonites joined the Baptists and helped the spread of this movement, which ultimately reached not only the German Protestant churches, but also the Polish Catholic churches. Today the Polish Baptists are primarily Polish nationals, since the German population has fled or been evacuated from Poland.

There is some evidence that intermarriages have taken place between the Mennonites and Poles since the early days of their settlement. In some instances, since it was forbidden to proselyte among non-Mennonites, Polish nationals went to Holland to become members of the Mennonite Church, and after their return married a Mennonite and transferred their membership to the local church. Some of the names which are still common among Mennonites which are likely of Polish origin are Delsky, Ratzlaff, Rogalsky, Sawatzky, Schepanski, Tetzlaff, Tilitzky, and Utesch. Quiring (107) lists fifty words in the Low German language which are of Polish background. These are adaptations made by Mennonites while living in a Polish environment. (See also West Prussia, Danzig, and other cities.)

C.K.

General: Richard Winkel, Die Weichsel (Leipzig, 1939); Viktor Kauder, Das Deutschtum in Polen (Leipzig, 1940); Kurt Lück, Der Mythos vom Deutschen in der polnischen Volksüberlieferung und Literatur (Leipzig, 1938); Walter Kuhn, Deutsche Blätter in Polen (Posen, 1928); Hans Schadowaldt, Polish Acts of Atrocity (New York, 1940); Kurt Kauenhowen, "Das Schrifttum zur Sippenkunde und Geschichte der taufgesinnten niederländischen Einwanderer (Mennoniten) in Alt-Preussen und ihrer Abzweigungen," Mitteilungen der Niederländischen Ahnengemeinschaft I (Hamburg, 1939); Postma, "Literatuurlijst over Nederlandsche Mennoniten in Pruisen, Polen en Rusland" (manuscript, 1942).

Mennonite: C. Henry Smith, Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1957); Abraham Hulshof, Tentoonstelling van Kaarten, Boeken, Plaatwerken Nederland-Danzig 15 April-15-Mei 1942 (Utrecht); Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863); Unruh, Hintergründe; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Horst Penner, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet von der Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts bis zum Beginn der preussischen Zeit (Weierhof, 1940); idem, "West Prussian Mennonites Through Four Centuries," MQR XXI (October 1949) 232-45; William T. Schreiber, The Fate of the Prussian Mennonites (Göttingen, 1955); Walter Kuhn, "Deutsche Taufersiedlungen im westukrainischen Raume," Zeitschrift für Ostforschung IV (1955) 481-505; Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934); Zdzislaw Ludkiewicz, Osady Holenderskie na nizinie Sartawicko-Nowskiej (Torun, 1934); Namenverzeichnis der Aeltesten, Lehrer und Diakonen oder Vorsteher der Taufgesinnten Mennonitischen Gemeinden in Ost- und West-Preussen, Litthauen, Polen und den neu angesiedelten Kolonien in Russland (Elbing, 1835, 1843, and Danzig, 1857, 1881); Jacob Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (München, 1928); Edward Kupsch, Geschichte der Baptisten in Polen 1852-1932 (Zdunska-Wola, 1932); Walter Kuhn, "Swiss Galician Mennonites," Menn. Life VIII (January 1953); Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952); Felicia Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Preussen gedurende den poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913); Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1883; Gnadenberg Mennonite Church; from Michalin to Gnadenberg, 1811-1950 (North Newton, 1950); W. Kerber, Mennoniten in der Weichselniederung (Bromberg, 1936); Christian Neff, "Die Mennoniten in Deutschland, Danzig und Polen in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart," Allgemeiner Kongress der Mennoniten (1936) 40-47; Martin Schrag, "The Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Background," Menn. Life VII (October 1954); John D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ (Scottsdale, 1952); ML III, 381 f.

Polau: see Pollau.

Polehraditz: see Pellertitz.

Polderman de Zeeuw: see Cornelis Polderman.

Poliander (Gramann, Graumann), Johann (1487-1541), a Lutheran clergyman, was a pastor at Königsberg, the reformer of East Prussia (q.v.), Germany, attacked Schwenckfeld (q.v.) and the Anabaptists at the colloquium at Rastenburg (q.v.) in 1531 and again in 1535 (HRE, 525). His hymn, "Nun lob, mein Seel, den Herren," was included in the hymnal of the Mennonites of the Palatinate and Hesse. (ML III, 382.)

NEFF.

Polish Brethren: see Socinianism.

Polk County (Iowa) Amish Mennonite settlement, now extinct, was founded near the Story County line by five families from Johnson County, Iowa, in 1868-69. John Mishler, an Amish deacon who moved to Johnson County from Ohio in 1859, was dissatisfied with the progressivism and the leadership of the Iowa Amish church, and when he ceased to co-operate with the Iowa church leaders his church office was taken from him in 1864, and he became one of the leaders of the dissatisfied group which moved to Polk County in 1868-69. Because, contrary to expectations, only five families moved to Polk County and no church was established, two families left the community, one joined the Methodists, and two attended the services of the Church of the Brethren.

M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 124-26.

Polk County (Iowa) Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, was organized in 1858 in the home of John B. Neuenschwander of Polk City. In August of that year Christian Sutter ordained Joseph Schroeder as minister and John B. Neuenschwander as deacon. Two years later Schroeder was a delegate to the first General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America, held in Lee Co., Iowa, in 1860, and was appointed a member of the committee that prepared plans for the union of the Mennonites of America. Schroeder had been trained for the Catholic priesthood, later rejoined the Catholic Church, and died in that faith in 1893.

The Polk County Mennonite community was founded by the Neuenschwanders and Nussbaums, who moved there from Putnam Co., Ohio, in 1849. Other families in the congregation were the Singers, Gehmans, Snyders, Gefflers, Berrys, Beutlers, and the Leichtys. In 1863 John Singer was ordained minister for the congregation and Peter Neuenschwander bishop. When, a few years after this date, Singer and John B. Neuenschwander moved to Missouri, the church was left without leadership and passed out of existence. In 1933 the only family name of the above list still represented in the community was Leichty. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939)) 146-49.

Poll Tax: see Taxation.

Pol(l)au, a village in the domains of Lord Leonhard von Liechtenstein situated on the slope of the Polau Mountains between Nikolsburg (q.v.) and Auspitz (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.), in which some Swiss Brethren had settled. Their preachers Hans Klopfer (q.v.) with four other brethren left the group on account of differences on several points of doctrine. Later on the congregaton joined the Hutterian Brethren. The Bruderhof had several vineyards and a fishpond in lease from the barons of Nikolsburg. When the domain passed into the hands of the fanatically Catholic Dietrichsteins (q.v.), the Jesuit Cardaneus, who had been called in by the barons to force the Brethren to become Catholic, together with Christoph Erhard, the Nikolsburg dean and priest, caused the Brethren to be expelled from Polau in 1590. P.De.

Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 382.

Polonie Jansdochter Lonts, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pleuntgen van der Goes.

Polrus (Pulrus, Pilraust), Erhard, an Anabaptist martyr, baptized by George of Staffelstein in Esperstedt, near Frankenhausen in Thuringia, in 1529, was arrested in early January, but released when he recanted. But he almost immediately returned to the Anabaptists, was seized in the middle of 1530 with six fellow believers, and since he again recanted was released with the penalty of having his cheeks burned through. Soon, however, he was persuaded by the Anabaptist leader Alexander to return to the brotherhood. He was arrested the third time and executed with two companions in mid-November 1532 at Allstedt. (Wappler, Thüringen, 92-97; ML III, 382.) NEFF.

Poltzinger (Boltzinger), Hänsel, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor, was captured with Marcus Eder (q.v.) on April 24, 1605, at Mernbach in Bavaria, now Upper Austria, and taken to Ried (q.v.), where the two men lay in prison for 15 weeks, tormented by judges and priests, besides two Jesuits from Oetting (q.v.), and were twice tortured on the rack. On Aug. 26, 1605, they were beheaded and then burned. Their death is the theme of a hymn (with 20 stanzas), which begins with the words, "Hört, hört und merkt, ir Gotteskindt, die ir liebhaber Gottes sind."

NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 789-90; Mart. Mir. D 803, E 1103; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 481; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 626 f.; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 812; Wolkan, Lieder, 236; ML III, 382 f.

Polzinger, Leonhard, an Anabaptist martyr, a maker of clocks: see Boltzinger, Leonhard.

Pond Bank Mennonite Church (MC), located 10 miles southeast of Chambersburg, Franklin Co., Pa., a member of the Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Conference, began as a rural mission April 3, 1910, and was organized as a congregation in July 1942, when Andrew Lehman was ordained deacon. William W. Hege, a minister from Marion, was largely responsible for the beginning of the work. In 1921 Hege was succeeded by Harvey E. Shank, who was ordained bishop in 1946. The latter's son Luke J. Shank was ordained to the ministry Dec. 29, 1946. They were still serving in 1957; the membership was 57. H.E.S.

Pondman, Dutch Mennonite family. G. Pondman P. Az. was with an interruption of one year from 1886 until his death in May 1917 a deacon of his home church at Zaandam-West. A. B. F. A. Pondman, professor of medicine at the Groningen University, has since 1951 been a curator of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. vöZ.

Pontanus, Isaac (c1625-1710), a Remonstrant (q.v.) minister at Friedrichstadt, Brielle, and Amsterdam, and after 1666 professor in the Remonstrant seminary, was the author of Tractaet van de sichtbare Kerke Christi op aerden (Amsterdam, 1660), in which he opposes the spiritualistic views of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.). The treatise is followed by an Aensprake (address) tot de Vereenigde Duitsche, Friesche en Waterlandsche Gemeenten and by Van de Vrijheid van spreken in de Gemeente der Geboovigen tegen Laurentius Klinkhamer (q.v.). vöZ.

Poole (Ont.) Amish Mennonite Church, established in 1874, had a membership of 270 in 1957. It is a member of the Ontario A.M. Conference. M.G.

Poole, Le, a Dutch Mennonite family. Anthony le Poole (d. 1658) of Hondschoote in West Flanders, Belgium, moved to Leiden, Holland, where he obtained citizenship in 1627. He may have emigrated because of his faith and settled at Leiden about 1625. His descendants have been loyal members of the Mennonite Church and many of them have served as deacons at Leiden. They were usually prosperous textile manufacturers. Anthony's son Jacob le Poole (b. 1624 at Hondschoote, d. 1693 at Leiden), a jute manufacturer, bequeathed a sum of money to the Waterlander Mennonite congregation, of which he was a member. His son Jacob le Poole (Leiden, 1651-1704), a textile manufacturer and a deacon of the Waterlander congregation, took part in the Collegiant (q.v.) meetings. The son of this Jacob le Poole, also named Jacob le Poole (1693-1750), a dealer in grain and a deacon of the church, was appointed as administrator by the last remaining members of the congregation of The Hague (q.v.), when this congregation was about to die out (DB 1896, 60). Lodewijk Gerardus le Poole

(b. 1848 at Leiden, d. there 1908), secretary of the church board at Leiden, studied the archives of this congregation and wrote its history: Bijdragen tot de kennis van het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden, ontleend aan het archief der Doopsgezinde gemeente te Leiden (Leiden, 1905). This outstanding work also contains many particulars about the le Poole family. (Ned. Patriciaat X, 1920, 354-59; ibid., XLI, 1955, 291-305.)
vdZ.

Poor, Care of. Organized care of the poor was unknown in the pre-Christian era; it is a product of Christianity. The Old Testament frequently emphasizes the duty of aiding and supporting the poor according to ability, but only in the New Testament do we find congregational care of the poor. This was the object of the ordination of the seven deacons in Acts 6. In the second century the provision was fully organized. The necessary funds were raised by voluntary donations, partly gifts in kind given at the communion service; there was no compulsion. II Cor. 9:5. Only those really in need and worthy of help received support. Special provisions were made for widows and orphans. In the original Christian church none suffered want. This orderly provision for the poor came to an end when, after Constantine, the church accumulated greater and greater wealth. Ineffectual mass provision for the poor followed.

In the Reformation the Anabaptists were pioneers in the care of the poor. They made it one of their first obligations from the very beginning, at a time when the established churches let other duties have priority over the care of the poor, even though the Anabaptists had no church or monastery property to draw on as the large churches had. They appointed deacons to manage funds voluntarily given for that purpose. The first of these deacons were probably those chosen by the nonresistant group who left Nikolsburg (q.v.) in the spring of 1528; they were Jakob Mändel and Franz Itzinger.

The opponents of the Anabaptists disliked and frequently attacked this arrangement, charging the Anabaptists with rating good works above faith. Even in the more recent literature the purpose of this provision for the needy is completely misunderstood; Hermann Hering of Halle, for instance, says about the Mennonites, "More than in true baptism, their interest lay in other ideals, which, playing in apocalyptic and eschatological colors, had as their end happiness in this life." In Augsburg the Protestant clergy argued that the Anabaptist practice of caring for the poor was dangerous to the state. Friedrich Roth (p. 399) has shown the invalidity of this charge: "There was among them [Augsburg Anabaptists] no thought of proposals that would tend toward community of goods . . . yet the common purse from which the funds were taken to provide for the poor—not only those of their own brotherhood—was in the eyes of the council an absolutely illegitimate arrangement, because it interfered with civic care of the poor and still more because it attracted foreign Anabaptists and other sectarians."

The principle that no one should suffer want in a Christian brotherhood has always been considered a sacred duty in the Anabaptist-Mennonite churches. Wherever there was need, brotherly love gave aid. It was the particular task of the deacons (q.v.) to take an interest in the poor and to supervise their relief. The larger congregations in Holland and Germany built homes to take care of their poor. (See Homes for the Aged in Europe.)

The Chortitza Mennonite Church, the largest and oldest in South Russia, maintained the institution of caring for the poor to the end. Deacons managed the funds given by voluntary donation, and gave an annual report, usually between Christmas and New Year, on their work and their use of the money. Chortitza had no building dedicated to this care, since it was thought better to provide for the poor in private homes, for which suitable remuneration was given. Though the other congregations did not have so thorough an organization for this purpose, there was some provision everywhere. The congregations of the Molotschna settlement built a large home for their needy aged. The provisions for orphans in orphanages were similar and based on a long tradition dating to the early days in Holland. These institutions and practices were transplanted from Russia to the prairie states and provinces of North America and to Mexico and South America, where they are perpetuated in similar or modified forms. (See also Alms, Homes for the Aged, Mutual Aid, Orphanages.)
HEGE, NEFF, D.H.E.

Hermann Hering, "Die Liebestätigkeit der deutschen Reformation," in Theologische Studien und Kritiken, 1885; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 75; J. Loserth, "Die Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," in Mitteilungen des historischen Vereins für Steiermark (1894) 127; Friedrich Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte II (Munich, 1904) 399; Menn. Bl., 1896, 87; ML I, 84.

Poperinge, a town in West Flanders, Belgium, where Anabaptists were active as early as 1538. Later there was a Mennonite congregation here, concerning which there is little information. This congregation is said to have been wiped out in 1561 by Inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), but in 1568 Mennonites at Poperinge still held meetings in the home of Augustijn Gloribus, who in this year escaped arrest by flight. A few Mennonites of Poperinge died as martyrs in other Belgian towns. In the 16th century Mennonites moved from Poperinge to Holland, particularly to Haarlem, bringing their craft of linen bleaching with them.
vdZ.

Poperingehe, Willem van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Willem de Clercq.

Popitz, a parish village southwest of Auspitz (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.), in which the Hutterites had a Bruderhof on the lands of the barons of Lomnice in 1537. In the great persecution of 1570 the Brethren had to flee and concealed themselves in holes and caves, the lochy (q.v.). The Polau Mountains, especially Mt. Maydenberg (Mayberg) near Popitz, offered possibilities for hiding. The Hutterite chronicle records that especially around the Mayberg they had in many places pits and holes concealed in clumps of bushes, in which they with their children lived for a time, also "in the clefts of the rocks in the valley and in the high rocks of the Mayberg, the same at other places in the country, wherever they could." At Popitz the authorities were about to smoke them out of the caves, but were prevented. In their former Bruderhof the householder Gabriel Aichhorn died in 1551. But they did not really begin to live there again until 1573. In 1599 the deacon Thomas Pruckner died in the Popitz Bruderhof. The Thurn cavalry did much damage in 1600. Popitz is not named among the Bruderhofs abandoned in 1622.

P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 242; ML III, 383.

Popkes, Tiete (1695-1770), in 1721 became a lay preacher and in 1732 an elder of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation in Humsterland (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Groningen. He was a farmer, living near Oldehove. By order of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite conference he drew up a confession of faith, Een beknopt ontwerp of schets van de Geloofsbelijdenisse der Mennonyten onder de benaminge van oude Vlaamingen, published at Groningen in 1749. His son Jacob Tietes (1734-1821), a farmer at Ter Horne near 't Zandt in the province of Groningen, who was a preacher of the Leermens (q.v.) Mennonite congregation after 1763, took the family name of Huizinga (q.v.). The grandson of Tiete Popkes, also called Tiete Popkes (1772-18?), took the family name of Gaaikema (q.v.).
vDZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Derk Pieters en Katrina Tomas (Groningen, 1883) 6, 7; idem, Stamboek van Fiepke Foppes en Diver Olferts (Groningen, 1887) 5, 6; DB 1879, 4; 1890, 104, note 106.

Poplar Grove Mennonite Mission (MC) was begun in May 1908 by the Missions Committee of the Weaverland (MC) congregation to serve eighteen members of the congregation with twenty-seven children, who were living on rented farms in Chester County, Pa. The services were held in a schoolhouse on the farm of A. S. Wenger. By 1911 it was a prosperous and self-supporting work, but in 1912 the work was abandoned and by 1914 all the families had moved nearer to Lancaster County churches, to be replaced by Old Order Amish families.

I.D.L.

Poplar Point Hutterite Bruderhof in Manitoba, founded in 1938. Their preacher Joseph Waldner, chosen Oct. 15, 1905, by the Bon Homme Bruderhof in South Dakota, confirmed March 17, 1907, by the Huron Bruderhof in South Dakota, left the Huron settlement with 11 families, bought land and built the necessary buildings at Poplar Point, Man. In 1939 Friedrich Waldner was chosen preacher. When Elder Joseph Kleinsasser died in 1947, Joseph Waldner was chosen in his place.

In 1950, 75 persons from the Poplar Point Bruderhof, including 21 baptized members, established the Springfield Bruderhof at Vivian, Man., with Joseph Waldner (d. 1951), the elder of the entire body of Schmiedeleut (q.v.), as preacher. Samuel S. Waldner was chosen as assistant pastor in 1950 at Poplar Point for the Springfield Bruderhof. Friedrich Waldner, the present pastor at Poplar Point, confirmed in the ministry at the Huron Bruderhof in 1946, stayed at Poplar Point with 80 persons, 26 of whom were baptized members. The present (1958) membership at Poplar Point is 42, in a population of 151. John Waldner was chosen as assistant pastor in 1957.

D.D., F.W.

Popodin (Pobudin), a village in the neighborhood of Holitsch (q.v.) in Slovakia (q.v.), not far from Göding (q.v.) in Moravia, where some Hutterian Brethren settled during the period of persecution in Moravia, which began in 1547, in the domain of Peter Bakich de Lák (q.v.), who was at first their protector, but later proved to be one of their most violent opponents. In Popodin the deacon Michel Kramer died in 1551, who "made the song of the great Hungarian tribulation, how the brotherhood fared at that time," and in 1553 occurred the death of Simon Waindl, who had been ordained only the year before at Kutí (Gátte in the chronicles). (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 383.)
P.DE.

Poppingawier, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland (q.v.), where there has been a Mennonite congregation since earliest times. It was usually united with the Irnsum (q.v.) congregation. Only in 1871-79 did it have its own preacher (J. J. Honig 1871-75, G. Vrijer 1875-79). Nothing is known of its early history. Until 1848, when a church was built, the congregation met in a private home. The baptized membership in 1899 was 95, and in 1958 it was 41. (DB 1870, 140 note, 152; 1872, 191; 1887, 147; ML III, 383.)
vDZ.

Pordenau, a Mennonite village name transplanted from Prussia to the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, Russia. (See Villages.)
C.K.

Pordenau Mennonite Church was located in the village of Pordenau, Molotschna settlement (q.v.), South Russia. The village was established in 1820, and in 1869 consisted of 48 farms with 4,676 acres. The settlers were primarily "Flemish" and belonged originally to the "Grosse Gemeinde" (q.v.) of the Molotschna. When Elder Jakob Warkentin was deprived of his office in 1842, Pordenau became one of the three congregations emerging from the Grosse Gemeinde or Ohrloff-Petershagen-Halbstadt Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1887 Pordenau had 984 baptized members and 1,033 children.

The first elder was Heinrich Töws (q.v.) of Pordenau, succeeded by Isaak Peters (q.v.) who migrated to America in 1874. After this the congregation was subject to Elder Friedrich Barg of the Margenau Mennonite Church for a number of years. The following elders were Gerhard Regehr (q.v.) and Peter Epp (q.v.). Other ministers who served this church were Isbrand Friesen, Franz Töws, Peter Dyck, Johann Görzen, Johann Neufeld, Isaak Braun, Johann Töws, Peter Ewert, Jakob Dyck, Jakob Gerbrandt, and Gerhard Dürksen.

The first church building was erected in 1828 which was replaced in 1860 by a larger building. In 1905 the congregation had a total population of 1,771 and membership of 806. Little is known about the later development of the congregation. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 706; Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 20, 63; ML III, 383.)
C.K.

Porrentruy (German, Pruntrut), a government district in the northwestern part of the Swiss canton of Bern on the Alsatian border, with a capital by the same name, close to the French border.

Mennonite families have been living in this area for decades. They first attended the meetings of the neighboring congregations of Grand Lucelle (q.v.) and Florimont (q.v.), and also maintained connections with the Seigne (q.v.) congregation in France, whose members were of Swiss descent. Since they were too far away from the other congregations Isaak Gerber (q.v.), who had leased the mountain farm called Vacherie-Mouillard, began to hold meetings in his home, at first occasionally, and after 1895 every month. This was the beginning of the Porrentruy congregation. The first meetings were conducted alternately by Heinrich Schmutz of La Lave of the Seigne congregation and Samuel Gerber (q.v.) of Paturatte (q.v.), Bernese Jura.

At the outbreak of World War I Heinrich Schmutz had to flee from France because he was a German citizen. Deprived of all his possessions, and leaving his wife behind in an internment camp in southern France, he escaped with his two children to Switzerland and found a temporary home with the David Gerber (son of the above) family in Mavaloz near Porrentruy.

The Porrentruy congregation soon increased, making it necessary to provide a larger room for their meetings. In 1918 a suitable hall was rented for this purpose in the western part of the city on the farm of the old tile factory. The first meeting at this place was held on May 12, 1918, and from that time on twice a month. For twenty years this simple room served the congregation as a place of meeting.

As the congregation grew inwardly and outwardly, the young people organized a chorus, and the small room was no longer suitable. After lengthy consultation a members' meeting decided on Jan. 6, 1938, to build a new chapel on the farm of Elder Schmutz in Courgenay (q.v.), where this family was now living. This has become one of the most beautiful of the Mennonite churches in Switzerland. It was dedicated on Jan. 22, 1939.

A factor in the development of the Porrentruy congregation was the annual Bible course, which was usually conducted by Mennonites from the outside.

For a time the congregation was affiliated with the Alsatian Mennonite Conference but for a considerable period it has been affiliated with the Swiss Mennonite Conference.

For many years Elder Heinrich Schmutz was the only preacher of the Porrentruy congregation. His first co-minister was Samuel Geiser, who was living in this area at that time and served for two years, until he moved away to the Kleintal congregation. In 1932 two men were ordained to the ministry—Christian Schmutz, a son of the elder, and Jakob Lehmann. In 1941 Daniel Nussbaumer, formerly of Basel (q.v.), and two "trial" preachers, Abel Baumgartner and Gaston Gerber, preached for a while. In 1955 the elder was Christian Schmutz of Courgenay, the preachers Albert Nussbaumer, Gaston Gerber, and Abel Baumgartner. The baptized membership in 1958 was 140. (Gem.-Kal. 1951; ML III, 402 f.) S.G.

Port Rowan Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Port Rowan, Norfolk Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian Conference, was organized on Nov. 20, 1932, under the leadership of Jakob Penner. The first meetinghouse was an old frame church which was at first rented, then bought and remodeled. Ministers who have served the congregation are P. Reimer, Abraham Pauls, Peter Lodde, and J. A. Penner. The pastor in 1958 was P. Reimer; the membership was 131. H.H.J.

Port Elgin Mennonite (MC) Church: see Bruce County, Ont.

Portage County, Ohio, south of Cleveland, was formed from Trumbull County in 1807. It is so named from the old Indian portage path seven miles long between the Cuyahoga and Tuscarawas rivers. It is the home of the flourishing Plain View Mennonite Church (q.v.) located between Kent and Aurora. J.S.U.

Porter Mission (MC) in the foothills near Estacada, Ore., was established in 1939 as an outgrowth of a rural visitation project of the Bethel Mennonite Church of Canby, Ore. In 1956, 20 members organized as a congregation of the Pacific Coast Conference. Ernest J. Bontrager was the minister in charge. Services were held weekly in a small church built in 1943. O.G.M.

Portielje (originally Portille), a Dutch family, which is thought to have fled from French Flanders because of persecution, moving to Amsterdam. The first generations of this family seem to have been Mennonites, but in the 17th century they became Reformed. The descendants of Pieter Portielje (1781-1847), who was married to Clara van Aken (a Mennonite), however, became Mennonites, and some of the family have been very active members of the church. David Abraham Portielje (Amsterdam, 1814-52), married first to Catharina van Eeghen and after her death to Alida Johanna Fock, studied law and then became a director of the Dutch Association of Life Insurance Companies (Hollandsche Sociëteit van Levensverzekeringen), founded in 1807 at Amsterdam by Anthonie Hartsen, also a Mennonite. His son Jan Pieter Portielje (1843-1909), married to Cécile Dorothée Fock, studied law, and became a director in the same company. Besides this he was a trustee of the Collegiant-Mennonite orphanage Oranjeappel (q.v.), treasurer of many Mennonite corporations, and a trustee of the A.D.S. 1893-1909. His son David Abraham Portielje (1872-1927), married to Anna Helena Voûte, also studied law and was like his father and grandfather a director of the life insurance company at Amsterdam. He was also a trustee of the Oranjeappel orphanage, manager of the "Christina Stichting" (q.v.), a trustee of the North Holland Widows' Fund, and member of the church board at Amsterdam. As a member of the executive committee of the A.D.S. he was active in the matter of pensioning retired and invalid pastors. He was also a curator of the Mennonite Theological Seminary. P. B. Westerdijk commemorated him in a warm-hearted In Memoriam, found in the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje of 1928. vDZ.

Ned. Patriciaat VI, 1915, 314-16; DB 1910, 202-10; DJ 1928, 21-30; De Zondagsbode XXII (1908-9) No. 53; XL (1926-27) No. 42.

Portier, Hermanus, a Mennonite of Harlingen in Friesland, Netherlands, who on March 14, 1739, wrote a "Remonstrantie" (petition) to the States of Friesland in behalf of Wytze Jeens Brouwer (q.v.) and Pieke Tjommies (q.v.), two Mennonite preachers of Heerenveen who had been suspended from their ministry in 1738 on the charge of teaching Socinian (q.v.) views, and whose suspension was extended on March 13, 1739. In this petition Portier wrote that the States were committing practices of intolerable inquisition, and this word "inquisition" so offended the authorities of Friesland that the petition was fruitless. Portier also published Omslandig en Waaragtig Bericht (Harlingen, 1742), in which he particularly attacked Daniel Gerdes (q.v.), of Groningen, who supported and defended the States of Friesland in their intolerant attitude toward the Mennonites. (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 209; Catalogus Amst., 139.) vDZ.

Portland, Ore., chief city (pop. 375,690) and largest in the state, and county seat of Multnomah County, situated just above the confluence of the Willamette and Columbia rivers, the "vacation capital" of the Pacific Northwest, in the midst of a magnificent landscape.

There are over 300 churches in Portland; but of Mennonite churches there are only the Mennonite (MC) Mission Church, the Rock of Ages Rescue Mission (MC), and the Alberta Community Church (GCM) in this vast area. There are only some 125 Mennonites living in Portland's vicinity; within 100 miles to the south of Portland there are approximately 1500 Mennonites, most of whom are farmers. Directly north of Portland across the Columbia River which is the Oregon-Washington line, there is a small U.M.C. group. The Mennonites came to Oregon in 1890, and to Portland in 1922. G.M.H.

Portland Mennonite Church (GCM): see Alberta Community Church.

Portland Mennonite Church (formerly called Mennonite Gospel Mission and later Mennonite Mission Church), located at 2235 Northwest Xavier Street, Portland, Ore., was opened by the Pacific Coast District (MC) Conference on Nov. 12, 1922, and organized as a church July 27, 1924, with 23 members. In 1955 it became an independent congregation. During its first 25 years the following served as superintendents: Allan Good, Henry Yoder, Paul Roth, Glen Whitaker, Marcus Lind, Paul Yoder, and Claud M. Hostetler. In 1947 there were 58 members; in 1958 there were 93. The erection of the church building in 1927 was a church-wide project. A city-wide evangelistic campaign in 1939 conducted by C. F. Derstine of Kitchener, Ont., helped to present the church and her doctrine to the public.

M.Mr.

Portner (Portzner), Jakob, an Anabaptist evangelist in Upper Austria, had been chaplain of the baron of Regensdorf in the castle at Steyr until Hans Hut (q.v.) arrived in town (June 15, 1527). He introduced Hut into the homes of the respected citizens and saw to it that Hut could preach soon after his arrival. Soon afterward Portner was chosen by lot with three other Anabaptists, Jerome Herrmann (q.v.), Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), and a former people's priest from Nürnberg, to go out as Anabaptist evangelists. The ceremony of the lot was conducted by Hans Hut. The government ordered the council of Steyr on September 20 to pursue Portner with placards. In Augsburg (q.v.) he was imprisoned. When Charles V (q.v.) came to Augsburg in 1530 he demanded that Portner be turned over to imperial authorities. His accusers asserted that he had misled the entire community. The prisoner was transferred after the Emperor had assured the council that this transfer would not diminish their jurisdiction (Roth, 255). Nothing more is known with certainty concerning Portner's fate, but it may be assumed that an Anabaptist leader like Portner who fell into Charles's hands would be executed. HEGE.

J. Jäkel, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich," in 47. Bericht des Museums Franciscus-Carolinus (Linz, 1889) 30, 31, 39; Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformations-Geschichte I (Munich, 1901) 255; ML III, 384.

Pos, Heyndrick Jacobs, a Dutch Mennonite of the 17th century who probably lived in Edam or Mid-delie, is the author of the booklet Geestelycken Co-meet (Edam, 1665); he also composed the 131 hymns of the Middelieer Lied-boeck (q.v.). vDZ.

Posen (Polish, Poznan), a province in the valley of the Warta (Warthegau), formerly belonging to Prussia (q.v.), now to Poland. In 1939-45 Mennonites from Galicia (q.v.) and Russia (q.v.) found temporary asylum here, being settled on lands provided by the German government. (ML III, 385.)

E.C.

Posjager, C. A., was a Dutch Mennonite preacher of the Waterlander branch, serving at Noordeind van Graft. In collaboration with E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.), the Mennonite preacher of neighboring De Rijp, he published a book for the use of Mennonite sailors, who were numerous in the congregations of De Rijp and Graft, and who often had to leave their home towns for long periods when they sailed for herring fishing or for whaling as far as Greenland. This book is entitled Ryper Zeepostil (Amsterdam, 1699). It contains twenty-two sermons, a number of prayers, and a short history of Holland, especially of the home towns of the sailors, Schermer, Graft, and De Rijp. Concerning Posjager there is no further information. He is supposed to have been the son of Albert Cornelisz Posjager, who was probably also a Mennonite preacher at Noordeind van Graft, and who was once in 1655 for some unknown reason fined by the magistrate when he was preaching in De Rijp. Posjager died about 1730. (Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 572 f.; DJ 1837, 96; DB 1917, 35-38.) vDZ.

Post: see Steinbach Post.

Post Oak (Indiahoma), a mission station of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America serving the Comanche Indians of Oklahoma, situated on a 160-acre farm one mile east and 4 miles north of the village of Indiahoma, near Lawton, Okla., was opened in 1894 when Henry Kohfeld and his wife were appointed for this work, assisted by a conference committee which included E. C. Deyo, a Baptist missionary to the same Indians, and Dr. Morrow, supervisor of all Baptist Indian Missions in the United States. The opening of the work was made difficult by the indifference of Chief Quanah Parker. Finally, however, yielding to the pleas of the missionary and some of his own people and one of his wives, Parker led the missionary to the place where he believed the mission should be founded. He cut a sign to indicate this location in a post oak tree; hence the mission was named Post Oak. The religious indifference of the Indians was gradually overcome. The first converts were baptized in 1907; approximately 400 adults have been baptized at the station. At present some 150 members constitute the Post Oak Comanche Mennonite Brethren Church.

The congregation has yielded some fine assistant workers such as George Koweno, Deacon Urheyah, Shelby Tenequer, and Ruben Tabbytosavita, all four of whom have died. Those specially active today are the deacons Felix Koweno, James Chebahtah, and Pete Coffey, and the lay members Herman Asenap and Max Pacheka. The last named deserves special credit for having opened a promising work at the Fort Sill Indian School for children near Lawton, conducting Sunday school and worship services there.

The work in the main has been of an evangelistic type, but in 1948 a school for Indian children was opened at Post Oak under the supervision of D. J. Gerbrandt with Ruth Wiens as teacher. In 1949 the school was transferred to a new building in Indiahoma. There are some 60 to 70 Indian children and four teachers in the first eight grades.

Missionary families who have served at Post Oak are as follows: Henry Kohfeld 1894-1907, A. J. Becker 1901-40, J. S. Dick 1941-42, C. E. Fast 1942-44, J. J. Wiebe 1944-45, D. J. Gerbrandt 1945 (now at Indiahoma), H. J. Neufeld 1949, who is now (1954) in charge of the Post Oak Mission. Among the helpers who have served on special occasions we mention only Mrs. Anna Hiebert Gomez, who has been with the mission since 1911 in various capacities, and is still doing a very commendable work, especially among the women. J.H.L., G.W.P.

G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1947).

Post und Volksblatt was a weekly German newspaper edited by H. P. Krehbiel and C. E. Krehbiel and published by the Western Book and Publishing Co. (q.v.) at Newton, Kan., 1904-9. It was formed by combining the Hillsboro Post and the Kansas Volksblatt. The 1904 volume of Post und Volksblatt was volume 18. In 1910 the name was changed to Der Herold (q.v.) but the volume numbers were kept in consecutive order. The Kansas Volksblatt had at one time been edited by D. Goerz and W. J. Krehbiel and sold by them to the Newton Kansan in 1899. D. R. Krehbiel served as editor until the Kansan sold the Kansas Volksblatt to the Western Book and Publishing Co. (q.v.). J.F.S.

Newton Kansan, Fiftieth Anniversary Edition, 1922: Post und Volksblatt (BeCL).

Postel, Wilhelm (Elias Pandocheus, pseudonym), a mystic and friend of the Anabaptists of the 16th century, used the pseudonym for reasons of personal security, wrote books advocating religious tolerance, e.g., Panthenosia (1547), was a friend of Jean Bantin of Basel, Switzerland, the physician of David Joris (q.v.), of Joris (q.v.) himself, and of Blesdijk (q.v.), the son-in-law of Joris. He testified at the trial of David Joris in 1559, but said nothing personally detrimental to Joris. He ascribed great religious illumination to Joris, which had, however, been misused through the sumptuous living of the sectarian leader, who had grown wealthy from gifts of love. E.T.

Roland H. Bainton, in Nederlandsch Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XXIV, II (1931) 17 f.; idem, "David Joris," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., supplementary volume VI (1937); ML III, 385.

Posthuma, Folkert Evert, b. May 20, 1874, at Leeuwarden, a Dutch Mennonite, who studied agriculture at the National Agricultural College at Wageningen and the University of Halle, Germany, and then was engaged in agricultural and dairy industries and director of the farmers' national co-operative bank. In 1914 he was made Dutch minister of Agriculture and Trade and organized the distribution of food in the Netherlands during World War I. By his executive ability he managed to keep the Dutch population adequately fed. He remained a state cabinet minister until 1918. During this period he lived at The Hague, and was a trustee of the Hague Mennonite congregation. During World War II Posthuma sympathized with the National-Socialist principles and co-operated with the German occupation authorities. Consequently he lost the sympathy of both the Mennonite brotherhood and the Dutch nation. In 1942 he was shot by Dutch partisans. vnz.

Postlawitz (Poslawitz; Czech, Bohuslavice), a village near Gaya in Moravia, belonging to the domains of Bucovice. In 1545 the Hutterian Brethren acquired a house here with a mill, in the spring of the following year another house, and on May 7, 1547, the third house. Although this seems to have been one of the larger Bruderhofs, it was apparently abandoned later. Nothing more is heard of it, nor is it mentioned in the list of the Bruderhofs vacated in 1622. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 249; ML III, 386.) P.De.

Potbaker, Jan Sibes: see Sibes, Jan.

Potemkin, Prince Gregor (1739-91), appointed governor general of New Russia by Catherine the Great, whose favorite he was, with instructions to open and settle the newly acquired territory in the South.

Potemkin accomplished this task by resettling Russian peasants and settling foreign pioneers, by founding cities (see Kherson and Ekaterinoslav), developing roads, and planting forests and vineyards. The war with Turkey, which broke out in 1787, came inopportunistically for him, but the acquisition of Crimea (q.v.) in 1783 was one of his achievements. Upon the suggestion of Count Peter Rumiantsev (d. 1796), a Russian general, Catherine sent George von Trappe as her plenipotentiary to invite foreign settlers, with an especial commission to the Danzig Mennonites, whose pioneering capabilities had come to the attention of the Russians in the Seven Years' War. As governor general of Little Russia Count Rumiantsev was much interested in agriculture, and in 1770 he had permitted the Hutterian Brethren, who had been designated as Mennonites by the immigration laws, to settle on his Vishenka estate in the province of Chernigov. After Rumiantsev's death the Hutterian Brethren established a Bruderhof at Radichev (q.v.). In other respects also the Hutterian Brethren were the forerunners of the Mennonites in settling in Russia.

Potemkin, whose colonizing achievements have been described by Theresia Adamczyk, in 1786 received in Dubrovna on the Dnieper Jakob Höppner (q.v.) and Johann Bartsch (q.v.), the delegates sent by the Danzig Mennonites to examine the land offered by Catherine. In the spring of the following year the delegates were received at Kremenchug by Catherine in the presence of her dignitaries, and also, on the return journey, by Paul, the heir apparent to the throne. They had selected the region of Berislav, not far from Kherson, for settlement, but "on account of warlike events" (Heese) were compelled by Potemkin to settle in the Chortutza area in the district of Ekaterinoslav, the capital of which Potemkin was planning to make the center of the Black Sea region. B.H.U.

Theresia Adamczyk, Fürst G. A. Potemkin, Untersuchung zu seiner Lebensgeschichte (dissertation, Berlin and Emsdetten, 1936) 28-49; Alexander Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (translated into German from Russian by Jakob Töws, Odessa, 1887); Margarete Woltner, Die Gemeindeberichten von 1848 der deutschen Siedlungen am Schwarzen Meer: Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt IV (Leipzig, 1941) p. 3, note 1, and p. 4, note 5; ML III, 385.

Pott, Nicolaas (d. May 7, 1872), was a Dutch Mennonite minister, about whose training little is known; he studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1812-13, and was appointed ministerial candidate in 1816 by the trustees of the Mennonite conference in Friesland. He served as Mennonite pastor at Warns 1821-24 and at Hippolytushoef on the island of Wieringen 1824-68. He married a Catholic wife, which seems to have been well accepted by the congregation. At Hippolytushoef, even after her marriage, she kept a vegetable shop, in which she also sold liquors. She gave up the sale of liquors when the church board censured this business. vdZ.

DB 1891, 54 f., 56; 1900, 55; 1901, 87 f.; De Zondagsbode LII (1938-39) No. 17.

Pottere (Potbacker), Bastiaen de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Bastiaen.

Pottinga, a Mennonite family at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland. A descendant of this family was Jetze Pottinga Hz. (b. 1846 at Harlingen, d. 1927 at Apeldoorn), who after completing his studies at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary in 1866-71 served the following Mennonite congregations: Noordhorn 1871-74, Hindeloopen 1874-78, IJlst 1878-80, Irnsum-Poppingawier 1880-86, Joure 1886-90, Hoorn 1890-93 and 1893-1912; in 1912 he retired. His son Dirk Pottinga Jz. (b. 1876 at Hindeloopen, d. June 1925 at Arnhem) studied at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam and served the congregations of Baard 1903-6, Veendam-Wildervank 1906-8, Purmurend 1908-12, and Arnhem 1912-25. vdZ.

Pottstown First Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, was located at Oak and Evans Streets, Pottstown, Pa. The first public service was held Jan. 27, 1894, in a rented hall. In the fall of 1894 a brick building 27 x 49 ft. was erected and dedicated April 21, 1895. The congregation was organized on Dec. 30, 1895, with William S. Gottshall as the pastor. Congregational difficulties arose and the church was discontinued about 1904. W.S.S.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 374.

Pottstown Mennonite Church (MC), located in Pottstown, Montgomery Co., Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, began as a mission station under the Franconia Conference Mission Board on Nov. 23, 1930, with Elmer G. Kolb as superintendent, who was ordained as pastor June 7, 1938. A new church building with a seating capacity of 180 was dedicated May 4, 1952. On March 6, 1954, the congregation was organized with a membership of 60, mostly rural. Norman H. Bechtel (ordained 1953) also serves as minister. E.G.Ko.

Potvliedt (Potvliet), a Mennonite family at Amsterdam, members of the Flemish and later of the Zon (q.v.) congregation. This family, now extinct, originally came from Flanders. Probably the martyrs Jelis (q.v.) and Pieter (q.v.) Potvliet belonged to the same family. vdZ.

Potzbach, a somewhat remote village in the northern Palatinate, Germany, between Otterberg (q.v.) and Winnweiler, where since the beginning of the 18th century several Mennonite families had been located who were members of the Sembach (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. Deacon "Weissebutzbach," who is named by Ernst Müller (Berner Täufer, 212), was Hans Weiss of Potzbach, who was one of the first leaders and deacons of the Sembach congregation. Until 1784 there was a Mennonite cemetery in Potzbach. The group here has greatly declined, partly through emigration and partly through mixed marriages and transfers of memberships to other churches. Some families, such as Beutler and Fuchs, have died out. In 1951 the names Bally, Blickensdörfer, and Krehbiel were still represented. G.H.

Ernst Crous, "Mennoniten im Regierungsbezirk Trier 1827-1870," in Gem.-Kal., 1940, 62-73; ML III, 386.

Poughkeepsie, N.Y., is the location of the Hudson River State Hospital, an institution with more than 5,000 mental patients. Civilian Public Service Unit No. 144 was located here from April 1945 to April 1946. Nearly all of the men in this Mennonite unit were in relief training and pursued courses of study designed to prepare them for relief service in war-devastated countries. The thirty members of the 1945 women's summer service unit also took courses in relief training. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 242-46.

Poutschy (Eduardsdorf), a village in Volhynia (q.v.) situated some fourteen miles west of Dubno, was the leading center of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite group in 1815-61. It was settled by Swiss Amish Mennonites from the Polish villages of Urszulin and Michelsdorf (q.v.), who had come from Montbéliard, France, in 1791. Dissatisfaction with farming conditions at Urszulin-Michelsdorf and a liberal offer by Prince Edward Lubanirsky were the basis of the move to Poutschy. Families found their way to near-by villages, such as Zahoris (q.v.), Futtur, and Hecker.

The Poutschy settlement was reinforced by some members of a small group of Swiss Amish Mennonites who had settled near Dubno (q.v.) in 1801-2. In the course of time the two groups, those at Poutschy and those located nearer Dubno in the villages of Wignanska and Futtur, merged. The group near Dubno had its historical roots in the movement of Mennonites from South Germany to Galicia.

The land at Poutschy was leased from the Prince for periods of 24 years. New names added to the church roster here were Waldner, Wedel, Archlus, Strauss, and Prieheim. The traditional earlier family names were Albrecht, Flickinger, Gering, Krehbiel, Miller, Schrag, Stucky, Sutter, Voran, and Zerger. In its earlier years the congregation adhered to the Amish Discipline of 1779, but there is some evidence that by 1860 the distinctive practices were waning. Officials of the church were Joseph Schrag, Johann Albrecht, Johann Müller, Johann Schrag, Johann Gering, and Jacob Stucky. Almost the entire Eduardsdorf group moved to Kutuzovka and Neumannovka (q.v.) in 1861. The families who remained related themselves to the congregation found in the villages of Zahoris and Futtur.

M.H.S.

Martin H. Schrag, "European History of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Ancestors of Mennonites now living in Communities in Kansas and South Dakota" (unpublished master's dissertation, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1956).

Powder Spring Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located 12 miles west of Mt. Jackson, Shenandoah Co., Va., was probably the first rural outpost under the Virginia Conference. The meeting-house was originally built in 1858 for school and church services by three denominations, the Lutherans having one-half interest, and the Brethren and Mennonites each one-fourth interest. Here the Mennonites held services once a month and sometimes twice a month until the Woodland Tabernacle was built in 1944. A more permanent church was built in 1954. James Gross was ordained pastor in 1957. The work here was never flourishing, since it was in the midst of a strong German Lutheran community. T.S.

Powellville, Md., near which was located Camp Pocomoke, a former Civilian Conservation Corps camp, which the Friends operated as a Civilian Public Service camp in 1942-44. In the latter year the Mennonites took charge of this soil conservation project and continued the work of building a 14-mile drainage canal. By the autumn of 1946, the labor expended had already lowered the water table of the surrounding farms sufficiently to improve 34,000 acres of farm land and to make arable 37,000 additional acres that were formerly unproductive. Camp No. 52 was closed in March 1947. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 123-24.

Powwowing, a superstitious custom, no doubt descending from medieval European folk superstitions, which professes to heal sicknesses by the pronouncement of a mysterious formula handed down from one practitioner to another, still practiced to some extent among the Pennsylvania Dutch of Pennsylvania and other regions. Some Mennonites and Amish have indulged in the practice. According to the theory the ability to powwow (i.e., to cure by powwowing) is handed down from a male to a female and then in turn from a female to a male practitioner. Powwowing is not "faith healing" nor healing by prayer. Similar practices involve the ability to cast off "the evil eye" which may have been "cast" upon beast or man by a person able to do so. H.S.B.

Practical Christianity rather than theology was the actual primary concern of the Anabaptists and Mennonites. A brief comparison of the first Anabaptist confession of faith, the seven articles of the Schleithem Confession of 1527, and the general Protestant confession, viz., the Apostles' Creed, makes this very clear. As early as 1526 Hans Denk (q.v.) expressed this interest in his familiar words, "No one can truly know Christ without following Him in life." Hänsel Gremser (q.v.), who was on trial in 1533, said that the Anabaptists, in case they were asked, recognized each other by the phrase, "I do Christian works." In his Reply to False Accusations Menno himself defends the Anabaptists and their charitable deeds: "No one among them is allowed to beg. They take to heart the need of the saints. They entertain those in distress. They take the stranger into their houses. They comfort the afflicted; assist the needy; clothe the naked; feed the hungry; do not turn their face from the poor; do not despise their own flesh." And about 150 years later, in 1693, George Thormann (q.v.), the Reformed pastor of Lützelflüh in the Emmental, used very similar words concerning the Bernese Mennonites in his book, Probierstein (q.v.). Only on such a basis could the church ban and church discipline in general become of such importance to the Anabaptists. With their aversion to all luxury, their ethics lean toward sanctification and good works, and criticize the one-sidedness of Luther's doctrine of justification. Their home missions, and homes for the poor, the aged, and the orphans are expressions of this inclination. Indeed, relief and nonresistance have always appeared as two sides of the same principle. The Mennonite relief organizations, such as Christenpflicht (q.v.), Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge (q.v.; relief organization of the Vereinigung, q.v.), the Dutch Committee for Foreign Needs (q.v.), and Stichting voor Bizardere Noden (q.v.), the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.), as well as the numerous orphanages, old people's homes, and hospitals in several countries where Mennonites are living, are evidence of this fact, as well as the history of all the various groups which at times gave and at other times received help, from Switzerland to Lithuania, in the Ukraine, and in mission fields, especially in Java (q.v.) and India (q.v.). E.C.

Ernest Crous, "Hilfswerke der Mennoniten in früherer Zeit," Unser Blatt III (1949) No. 42; also Gem.-Kal., 1952, 68-72; Menno Simons, Complete Writings, 558; ML III, 387 f.

Prader, Carius, an Anabaptist martyr, who was put to death in the territory of Salzburg, Austria, in 1529. He was locked into a house with several other Anabaptists, which was then set afire. Van Braght gives no further particulars. Zieglschmid's (Chronik, 66) suggestion that he is identical with Eucharius Binder (q.v.) is very plausible. (Mart. Mir. D 24, E 433.) vDZ.

Prague (Czech, Praha) (pop. 932,000), capital of Bohemia and since 1919 of Czechoslovakia, the center of the Hussite movement of the 15th century. In 1521-22 Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) visited the city and on Nov. 1 and 25, 1521, announced his peculiar religious views in his "Manifesto of Prague." Volkmars Fischer (q.v.), an Anabaptist of Hesse, was imprisoned at Prague in 1532. Julius Lober's (q.v.) list of martyrs (1531) names four martyrs beheaded in Prague, and the list of the Geschicht-Buch names eleven by 1542. The archives of the Ministry of the Interior contain some source materials on Anabaptist history. No Anabaptist congregation was ever established here. E.C.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 312; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 182; F. Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XXX (1933) 1-36, 170-211; XXXI (1934) 61-102; XXXII (1935) 1-40; TA Reichsstädte (Bayern II); ML III, 387.

Prairie Rose Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde) is located near Lorette, Man., in a different municipality (county) from the other three church districts, about half-way between Steinbach and Winnipeg. This district was settled in 1918-19, by rural people of the other districts, with H. R. Reimer as minister. Two others, Bernhard D. Reimer and Franz D. Reimer, both sons of H. R. Reimer, were later elected as ministers. Bernhard D. Reimer left this district and moved to the Steinbach district. In later years Abram P. Unger and Vernon Reimer were elected as ministers, and Franz D. Reimer was ordained as bishop. A modern meetinghouse has been erected. The baptized membership in 1957 was 285 (besides 275 not baptized). A German young people's meeting is held every four weeks, alternating with an English young people's meeting also held every four weeks. D.P.R.

Prairie Street Mennonite Church (MC), located at 1316 Prairie St., Elkhart, Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was organized by John F. Funk (q.v.), a minister who had moved into the city in 1867 and set up a publishing company there. Preaching services had been held in the city every two weeks in the homes of the members since Dec. 4, 1870. The meetinghouse was built at the present site in 1871 and the first service held in it on Nov. 26, 1871. Elkhart at that time had a population of some 3,000. The meetinghouse, a frame building, which was enlarged in 1895 and 1901, burned to the ground in 1935 and was replaced by a brick building seating 550. Its membership in 1957 was 288. Two daughter congregations have developed in Elkhart out of mission outposts: Belmont in 1929 and Roselawn in 1949, with (1957) memberships of 100 and 44 respectively, making a total membership in Elkhart of 492. The chief ministers in the congregation have been J. F. Funk 1871-1935, J. S. Coffman 1879-99, J. S. Lehman 1892-1904, G. L. Bender (deacon) 1907-21, J. E. Hartzler 1910-14, W. B. Weaver 1914-23, J. S. Hartzler 1923-33, J. E. Gingrich 1933-53, J. B. Shenk 1953-57, and Howard Zehr 1958-. The congregation was organized in 1871.

The Prairie Street congregation has been one of the most progressive and active M.C. congregations, partly because of the presence of the Mennonite Publishing Company (q.v.) and the early progressive leadership of Funk, who was also bishop of the congregation from 1891 until his removal from that office in 1900. Here the Mennonite Aid Plan (q.v.) was organized in 1882, the Mennonite Evangelizing Committee (q.v.) in 1882, which developed into the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), which has always had its headquarters here, and the Elkhart Institute (q.v.) in 1894, which developed into Goshen College in 1903. The first Young People's Meeting (MC) was started here in 1897, and the Mennonite Book and Tract Society (q.v.) was organized in 1894. In the Prairie Street church the first M.C. foreign missionaries were consecrated in 1899, viz., W. B. Page and his wife and J. A. Ressler. Prairie Street was also one of the first M.C. congregations to engage a seminary-trained minister and adopt the one-pastor system, when it engaged J. E. Hartzler in 1910. H.S.B.

Minutes of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference 1864-1929 (Scottsdale, 1929) contains a brief historical sketch of the congregation.

Prairie View Hospital, a mental hospital located near Newton, Kan., established by Mennonite Mental Health Services, Inc. (q.v.), a section of the Mennonite Central Committee, and operated by a local board representing ten Mennonite groups in the central area of the United States, is a treatment center for acute mental illnesses and longer term rehabilitation with limited service for care of the chronically ill. There is room for 41 inpatients. Possible expansion to 100 beds is envisioned. Outpatient services reach a large number of former inpatients and others not requiring hospitalization. The hospital, a one-story brick construction on a 50-acre tract east of Newton, was opened on March 15, 1954. The cost of the plant and equipment was approximately $280,000, nearly all of which was given by the MCC constituency in the central area of the United States. The total staff averages about 40 including professional and nonprofessional personnel. The hospital, with other Mennonite mental hospitals, grew out of a concern for better treatment of the mentally ill which developed during World War II when Mennonite conscientious objectors served in state hospitals. It furnishes an outlet for Christian service for young people on a voluntary service or remunerative basis. This includes many young men giving alternative service to military training. Plans are in progress to include a training program for graduate nurses wishing to specialize in psychiatric nursing. M.Eb.

Praktische Landwirt, Der, a periodical published monthly by the Mennonites of South Russia. It was proposed on Oct. 11, 1922, by a Mennonite conference in the Alt Samara settlement, but it was not established until three years later. The conference chose a committee to found an association for the purpose of promoting the re-establishment of Mennonite agriculture and related industries in close co-operation with existing German agricultural organizations and the authorities, and of serving the neighboring populace. They cited the precedent of the Alexandertal seed co-operative as an example of what a Mennonite organization was able to achieve even without state funds (Praktischer Landwirt, 1926, No. 12, p. 2). The efforts to form a closer association led to the founding of the All-Russian Mennonite Agricultural Association (q.v.) with its seat at Moscow. As the organ of the organization Der Praktische Landwirt was called into being with P. F. Froese as editor, a valuable specialized journal, which gave the German farmers practical suggestions for successful management, and also published statistics on the Mennonite settlements in Russia. The first number appeared on May 15, 1925. The office of censorship put difficulties in the way of publication, so that the journal had to cease with its December number in 1926. A complete file is found in GCL, except for the first two numbers. HEGE.

Bericht über die Mennonitische Welthilfskonferenz, 1930, in Danzig (Karlsruhe) 54; ML III, 387 f.

Pralitz (Prahltz, Präles), a market village situated on the right bank of the Iglava, Moravia, southeast of the neighboring Kanitz, usually called Präles in the Hutterian chronicles; they used this form to identify the near-by Bruderhof of Klein-Niemschitz ("ob Präles"; see Klein-Nembschitz), in order to distinguish it from other Moravian towns having the same name. P.DE.

Prangenau, a village in the Marienburg Werder (q.v.), West Prussia (now Poland), four miles northwest of Neuteich. Located in the area of the Ladekopp (q.v.) community, it was rather late in receiving Mennonite settlers. Some of these settlers lived on the three farmsteads (Höfe) "built into the field." One of these farms belonged to Johann Penner (see Penner family), the elder of the Ladekopp congregation until his death in 1943. Since he was also chairman of the Committee of Elders of the Conference of the Mennonite Churches of East and West Prussia (q.v.), this village became one of the better-known villages. (ML III, 388.) H.Q.

Prangenau, a village in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia, was established in 1824 on the right bank of the Yushanlee River, about 50 miles from Berdyansk. The first elder, Gerhard Wall, proposed that the village be named for Prangenau of West Prussia. Originally the village had 23 families, about half of whom had come from the Chortitza Mennonite settlement of South Russia, and the others from the Marienburg and Tilsit areas of Prussia. B.H.U.

Margarete Wolter, "Die Gemeindeberichte von 1848 der deutschen Siedlungen am Schwarzen Meer," in Sammlung Georg Liebbrandt IV (Leipzig, 1941) 151 f.; ML III, 388.

Prater, a former Mennonite family on the Dutch island of Ameland; its members usually were sailors and skippers. Pieter Jacobs Prater was a preacher of the Janjacobsgezinden (q.v.) congregation of Ameland 1793-d.1831. (DB 1889, 179.) v.v.Z.

Prayer (Dutch Mennonites). The martyrbooks such as the Offer des Heeren and T. J. van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror emphasize that it was prayer that strengthened the Anabaptists in prison, gave them the power to endure trials and torture; and that with prayer on their lips they faced execution. If the executioner permitted them to do so, they knelt on the scaffold or near the stake and prayed. The old martyr literature gives striking testimony to their fervent prayers. Though there is little information, it may be assumed that in their early secret meetings the Anabaptists and Mennonites not only read and explained the Scriptures, but also prayed. Of an Anabaptist meeting at Maastricht in 1534 and of one in Amsterdam about the same time it is expressly said that "they knelt down to send up their prayers to the Almighty God."

Later on, after conditions had improved and religious life had become settled, prayer became a regular element of the worship service. They then used to pray twice in a service. Prayer was then always silent (stil gebed): the preacher admonished his hearers to pray and thereupon all knelt down and silently offered their individual prayers. The conservative groups, like some Old Flemish and the Janjacobsgezinden, maintained this practice of silent prayer until the end of the 18th century; on the island of Ameland it continued until 1809, in Balk until 1853, in Giethoorn until 1865, in Aalsmeer until 1866. The Waterlanders (q.v.), under the influence of their elder Hans de Ries (q.v.), had by 1590 abolished the practice of silent prayer, introducing the audible prayer (then called stemmelyk gebed) by the minister, as was the practice in other Protestant churches. The Flemish and Frisian Mennonites adopted audible prayer shortly after 1640. With the abolition of silent prayer, the practice of kneeling for prayer was also dropped. For some time, in a few country churches in Friesland until recently, the men in the congregation sometimes arose for prayer, as is often done in Reformed churches. In some congregations the change to audible prayer led to discord, as for example in Grouw (q.v.), where the magistrate had to settle the quarrel.

After about 1665 both the Lamists (q.v.) and the Zonists (q.v.) adopted the practice of prayer at worship services similar to the present Mennonite practice; i.e., the service is opened with a votum and closed with a benediction. Besides these two prayers, which are short, there are two longer prayers, one before the sermon and one after. This practice undoubtedly was taken over from the Reformed Church liturgy.

It is probable that after audible prayer had been adopted, the Lord's Prayer was rarely used, the minister composing his own "free prayer." At present the Lord's Prayer is very often used, perhaps nearly always used, either before or after the sermon.

Family worship has never been very popular among the Dutch Mennonites, though it has been held occasionally. Formerly it was customary to offer prayer, usually silent, before and after meals; in many Mennonite families this is still the practice.

There are no special Dutch Mennonite prayer-books. In the early days sometimes a few prayers were added to hymnals, to confessions, to collections of sermons, or to devotional books. vdZ.

J. de Backer, Kort onderwijs van de christelyke gebeden (Amsterdam, 1707); F. S. Knipscheer, "Geschiedenis van het stil en stemmelyk gebed bij de Doopsgezinden," DB 1897, 77-120 and 1898, 55-77; S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1745) 42 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 611, 712 f.; DB 1863, 147 f.; 1864, 2; 1877, 81; 1890, 6; 1891, 46; 1892, 57; F. H. Pasma, De Doopsgezinden te Grouw (Grouw, 1930) 9 f.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen II, 143; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 26 f.; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 110 f.

Prayer Books, Mennonite. Collections of prayers by Mennonite authors for use by Mennonite preachers in public worship or in private devotions were first published in Holland. Hans de Ries (q.v., 1553-1638), the noted Waterlander preacher of Alkmaar, was probably the author of the first prayer collection, a group of 11 prayers attached as an appendix to the Waterlander confession of faith prepared by him and Lubbert Gerrits and published at Amsterdam in 1610 and 1618 as Corte Belijdenisse des Geloofs (numerous reprints). This collection of "eenige aandachtige Gebeden" was added to the hymnal edited by de Ries called Gesangh Boeck, published in 1643, also (with 3 additional prayers) to a book by Jan Gerrits, Vijf stichtelijke Predicatieën, published in 1650. It also appeared in Korte Belijdenisse des geloofs, published at Amsterdam in 1700. The second collection was by a Flemish preacher, François de Knuyt (q.v.), who added a small prayer collection to his Corte Bekentenissen onses Geloofs, first printed at Amsterdam in 1618 (many reprints). The third Dutch prayer collection, containing 18 prayers, was by Leenaert Clock (q.v.), published in Dutch in 1625, entitled Forma eenigher Christelijker Ghebeden, the first distinct prayer book. This was translated into German and as Formulier eilicher Gebäthe appeared as an appendix to the first German Mennonite confession of faith, the Prussian confession of 1660 (Elbing?) with only 13 of the 18 prayers, and T. T. van Sittert's first German edition of the Dordrecht Confession of 1632, published at Amsterdam in 1664, which had the full 18 prayers of Clock's Forma. Through these two books, both of which were often reprinted, Clock's collection became the standard "prayerbook" model for all German Mennonites and their descendants. However, neither Dutch nor German Mennonites have used any of these prayer books since the middle of the 19th century.

The Clock collection, enlarged by 2-20 prayers, was made a part of the Swiss Brethren devotional book, Göldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen (Basel? 1702, 1742, and Ephrata, Pa., 1745), where the title became simply Eiliche christliche Gebett without the Formulier heading. A second Swiss Brethren devotional book of c1715, Send-Brieff von einem Liebhaber Gottes wort, took over 12 of the Clock prayers from the Göldene Aepffel and added 3 new prayers taken from Johann Arndt's Paradiesgärtlein of 1612, and gave the whole a new title, Gebeten auf allerhand Anliegen und Nothen gerichtet. It also added an 8-page Schönes Gebett made up of parts of two Clock prayers and the prayer of Hans Reist (which had been published in booklet form about 1700).

But the outstanding German Mennonite prayer book was Die ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.), darinnen schöne, geistreiche Gebäthe, darmit sich fromme Christenherzen zu allen Zeiten und in allen Nothen trösten. The first edition was at Kaiserslautern in 1739, followed by at least 10 other editions in Europe to 1852, and at least 24 editions in America between 1745 and 1940. It finally became the prayer book of the Amish. Early editions contained 36 prayers, later increased to 50 and finally 53. It is used by the Amish as the exclusive source of prayers for the minister to use in public worship, as well as being a private devotional book. Its prayers come from varied sources, the Formulier (later editions contain all its prayers), Caspar Schwenckfeld's Deutsches Passional of 1539 represented by five prayers, Johann Arndt's Paradiesgärtlein, with 3 (from the Send-Brieff), and others.

The last Swiss prayer book was Kleines Handbüchlein, darinnen Morgen- und Abendgebetter, of which six European editions are known from 1786 in the Palatinate to 1867 at Biel, Switzerland, with two American imprints of 1835 and 1872. It contained 12 prayers, 8 from the Formulier.

The Elbing Katechismus of 1778, later called the "Waldeck Catechism," with many reprints, contained a collection of 14 prayers for children. The 1727 edition of the Christliches Gemüthsgespräch by Gerhard Roosen has an appendix of 28 prayers which was not included in later editions.

It is worth noting that none of the Dutch or German prayer collections have ever been translated into English. English-speaking American Mennonites have never produced nor used prayer books in public worship, and seldom, until recent times, in private or family worship.

Non-Mennonite prayer books used by Mennonites include Johann Habermann's Gebetbuch, first published in 1567, which was used by Mennonites chiefly in the smaller form, Der kleine Habermann, Johann Arndt's Paradiesgärtlein, first published in 1612, Johannes Zollikofer's Neueröffneter himmlischer Weichrauchsschatz of 1691, and Johann Friedrich Starck's Tägliches Handbuch of 1727. But the most popular prayer book of this character among Mennonites was doubtless the Geistliches Lustgärtlein, which appeared at least as early as 1787, and in later editions was called Neu vermehrtes geistliches Lustgärtlein frommer Seelen. Several times the Ernst-hafte Christenpflicht appeared in combination with part of the Lustgärtlein, the last time at Scottdale in 1915 for the express use of the Amish. H.S.B.

Robert Friedmann, "Mennonite Prayer Books, Their Story and Their Meaning," Chap. VI of Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 176-202, on which the above article is based; F. S. Knipscheer, "Geschiedenis van het stil en het stemmelijk gebed bij de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden," DB 1897, 77-120; 1898, 55-77.

Prayer Guide, officially the Daily Prayer Guide for Missions, Relief, and Home Activities of the Mennonite Church, is issued by the Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), Elkhart, Ind. The Booklet of Prayer for Missions of the Mennonite Church was first issued by the Mennonite Women's Missionary Society for 1925. In 1936 "Handbook of Information" was added to the title. By 1940 the title had become Booklet of Prayer and Handbook of Information for Missions and Institutions of the Mennonite Church. Six years later it became the Daily Prayer Calendar for Home and Foreign Work of the Mennonite Church. Its present title and format (1958-59) were established in 1951. It is a 5¼ x 7½ in. 136-page booklet. A Bible reading, meditation, and prayer suggestions, followed by birthdays of missionaries and their children, are given for each day. The last 17 pages list officers of the women's missionary organizations and church boards, all missionaries serving under the Mennonite Church (MC), and a missionary book list. In 1958-59 Mrs. Fred Gingerich was editor. Since the daily Bible readings follow the International S.S. Lessons, the Guide is used widely in Mennonite family worship. M.G.

Prayer, Kneeling Posture, in public services seems to have been a custom of the Basel Anabaptists of the Reformation period. Paul Burckhart says, "As soon as they entered the house where their services were held, they fell upon their knees, and after inexpressible, soundless sighs they arose, wiped the perspiration from their faces, and urged each other to expound the Holy Scriptures." Ernst Müller says of the Bernese Anabaptists, "At their services they sang from the Ausbund, the chorister (Vorsänger) reading two stanzas aloud before they were sung. For prayer they knelt together, continuing the custom until the beginning of the century." Ludwig Keller says, "The congregation always knelt for prayer. This was also the custom in the previous century in many Mennonite churches." He cites Anna Brons, but her description concerns the Swiss Mennonites in Holland. In West Prussia the kneeling posture was observed until the dissolution in 1945. From Switzerland and South Germany the custom of kneeling in prayer was brought to Pennsylvania and became the universal practice among Mennonites and Amish of all groups of this background in America. Only in the past 10-15 years has the custom been changing in the Mennonite Church (MC) in some sections. The Mennonites in Russia all practiced the kneeling posture, as did their descendants of all groups who came to America. However, only the most conservative groups of this background (Old Colony, for example) have maintained the practice; the others have discontinued it for some considerable time. NEFF, H.S.B.

Prayer Meetings, gatherings of Christians for prayer and mutual admonition and edification, are held in many Mennonite congregations in North America weekly, usually on a midweek evening, either in the meetinghouse or in a member's home. The term cottage meeting or cottage prayer meeting is sometimes used in the latter case. Leadership of the meeting may be in the hands of a layman or in the hands of the pastor. In the latter case the pastor may conduct a Bible study or give a devotional address. A common practice is for a number of those present to offer testimonies or admonitions, possibly based upon a portion of Scripture assigned in advance as the basis of the evening session.

The prayer meeting was borrowed from other Protestant groups, especially of the Pietistic type, and its introduction into American Mennonite circles earlier frequently caused trouble and even schism. The Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.) of the Gehman group arose as a schism in the Oberholtzer (GCM) group in Eastern Pennsylvania in 1858 when 24 members of the Upper Milford congregation were expelled because they refused to accept the conference decision forbidding such meetings. The attempt to introduce prayer meetings into the Mennonite Church (MC) in the period of 1870-90 caused serious trouble in Indiana and elsewhere and contributed to the schisms of the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (Daniel Brenneman group) in Elkhart County in 1871 and 1875, as well as of the Solomon Eby group in Waterloo County, Ont., about the same time.

The counterpart of prayer meetings in Europe, called Gebetsstunde or Bibelstunde, were and still are important aspects of Pietism and the Gemeinschaft (q.v.) movement. Through the influence of such movements they have been introduced into some Mennonite areas in France, Switzerland, and South Germany, although they are seldom regular features of the church life, because of the scattered rural membership. Such meetings were more readily held in the village type of settlement in Russia, where they were a prominent feature of the Mennonite Brethren movement. Mennonite educational institutions in North America commonly have student or faculty prayer meetings on a regular weekly (or even daily in some cases) basis. H.S.B.

Prayer Veiling, also known as the devotional covering or worship veil, is worn in worship and prayer services by the women members of certain American Mennonite bodies, and formerly by most Mennonites of Europe as well. Indeed the principle that women should worship with veiled heads can be called a historic Christian practice. Catholic women are still generally not permitted to enter the church with uncovered head, as is largely also true of the Anglicans. In the 18th century the Reformed churches of Switzerland required women to wear a Tuechli, or head covering, when they attended church services. The ancient church father Tertullian (c160-c230) reports that it was customary in most of the churches founded by the apostles for the women to worship veiled, including the virgins. The Episcopal Church Encyclopedia (1883) reports that in England as well as in some American parishes it was customary for women and girls who were confirmed to wear "a light veil." One of the last remnants of the worship veil in general Christendom is the wedding veil.

The Biblical basis for the worship veil is I Cor. 11:2-16. In the section in I Cor. 11 dealing with the practice of the Lord's Supper in the church and the exercise of the gifts of the Spirit in the assembly, the apostle treats of the worship veil. He begins by commending the Christians of Corinth for obediently following his instructions (the Greek term does not mean ancient traditions, nor does it assign the status of a sacrament or ordinance to the veil). He then expounds the order of creation as to the headship of man; he likens this relationship of equal persons, the one of whom is to serve as "head," to the relationship which obtains between God and Christ (Paul does not make a four-level hierarchy: God, Christ, man, woman; he simply makes an illuminating comparison to clarify the meaning of man's headship). The symbol of man's administrative headship is his bared head as he worships. The symbol of woman's role in the order of creation is her veiled head. The apostle is evidently correcting the socially revolutionary practice of some Corinthian women who cast aside their veils in the mistaken notion that the equality of men and women in grace had destroyed the order of creation as to their relationship on earth. He says severely that if a woman wishes to abandon her true role as given her by the Creator when He made her nature, she might as well also abandon her true role as a Christian woman and shave and shear off her hair as the women of the street did in Corinth in that day. The woman ought therefore to wear a sign-veiling that she accepts man's leadership in the church. It should also be noted that Paul does not limit this veil to the married, for it is with man as male and with woman as female that he is concerned. The relationship has to do with the very nature of each sex, and is not confined to the home. Finally Paul appeals to the universal Christian practice in the churches; all of them, he declares, support him.

Although social propriety still generally calls for a covered head in worship in the Western culture of the mid-20th century, American denominations generally make no point of requiring this, either by custom or regulation. The more conservative Mennonite groups, however, have clung to the traditional veil. This veil still resembles that portrayed by Rembrandt in his painting of 1641, "The Mennonite Minister Cornelis Claesz Anslo," which painting shows the preacher strengthening a veiled woman through the ministry of the Word. It is also similar to that shown in the painting of a Lancaster Mennonite Woman by Jacob Eichholtz about 1815 (ME, I). S. F. Rues reports (Aufrichtige Nachrichten, 1743, 50) observing a baptism among the Mennonites in Holland where the bishop pushed the cap (Haube) back from the woman's forehead before pouring the water. In Elbing c1869, according to an eyewitness report in Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes (February 1937, p. 67), "every married woman had to wear a cap (Haube) on entering the church. Every unmarried woman, regardless of age, had to wear a hat."

In modern times the prayer veiling in the Mennonite (MC) and related groups has become a small light cap made of a fine organdy or similar material, usually white in color, but sometimes black. The form of the veil in the past 150 years in America has always been that of a cap, not a true veil, formerly almost always tied with strings. The strings are now seldom used except in the most conservative sections, and the cap is usually pinned lightly to the hair. In the Russian Mennonite groups the veil took the form of a kerchief or head-shawl, customarily black. In the Church of God in Christ and Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde) the kerchief is still black and has become quite small. In the Ohio (MC) churches of Swiss extraction as well as in certain A.M. churches of Alsatian extraction (e.g., Central Illinois and Croghan, N.Y.) the cap was black (still worn by a few).

John A. Hostetler has shown that the Pennsylvania Mennonite veiling or cap was probably imported from Europe and is very similar to the cap worn by Palatinate women universally in the 18th century. The last Mennonite women of Europe to wear the prayer veiling (a black lace kerchief called a Fischelein from the French fichue) were those of the Badischer Verband in South Germany. The practice gradually disappeared there in the first quarter of the 20th century.

Historically the veil was also once worn (uniformly) by the women of certain Protestant denominations: the Society of Friends (note Whistler's painting, "My Mother"), the Church of the Brethren, the Brethren in Christ, and other denominations. The Mennonites of Russia had the veil for married women only. The North American Mennonite bodies which observe the wearing of the veil are the Mennonite Church (MC), the Old Order Amish, the Old Order Mennonites, the Conservative Mennonites, the Holdeman Mennonites (CGC), the Evangelical Mennonites of Canada (KG), the Hutterian Brethren, the Old Colony Mennonites, and related groups. In the Mennonite Church (MC) the leaders of the congregations east of Ohio have since about 1900 taught the constant wearing of the veil throughout the day and this practice is now fairly uniform in the Eastern United States. Elsewhere it has been worn usually only in public worship, or in some places also at the table. J.C.W.

Clayton Beyer, "Meaning and Relevance of the Devotional Covering, A Study in the Interpretation of

I Corinthians 11:2-16" (unpublished Th.M. thesis, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1954); Harold S. Bender, "An Exegesis of I Corinthians 11:1-16" (Ms in GCL); The Catholic Encyclopedia XV, "Veil, Religious"; Arthur M. Climenhaga, "The Doctrine of the Veiling" (unpublished M.A. thesis, Taylor University, 1938); Mahlon M. Hess, "The Devotional Head-Covering" (unpublished Th.B. thesis, Eastern Mennonite School, 1941); Daniel Kauffman, "Christian Ordinances," Doctrines of the Bible (Scottsdale, 1928) 378-439; D. D. Miller, "The Devotional Covering," Bible Doctrine (Scottsdale, 1914) 416-27; Paul M. Miller, The Prayer Veiling (Scottsdale, 1956); Albert C. Wiegand, "The Prayer Veil" (Ms in GCL); J. C. Wenger, Separated unto God (Scottsdale, 1955) 207-12; Richard Detweiler, The Christian Woman's Head-Veiling: A Study of I Cor. 11:2-16 (n.p., n.d.-1958).

Preacher (German, Prediger; Dutch, Predikant; French, Predicateur), a widely used title among Mennonites in all countries, especially in former days. In those groups which have adopted the practice of a single minister-pastor the title pastor or minister has been introduced. "Preacher" has generally been displaced by pastor or minister in America, in Germany by Pfarrer (South Germany) or Pastor (North Germany), and in the Netherlands by Dominine. In all these cases the function of the office is more than simply preaching, and includes pastoral care and full responsibility for leadership. Preacher is then reserved for those ordained or licensed men who have no exclusive pastoral charge but serve with other ministers (bishops, elders, or preachers) in a given congregation. Among the Mennonites of Russia the titles Pfarrer, Pastor, or Diener were never used; only Prediger and Aeltester (elder) were used. Among the Hutterites the title Diener am Wort (q.v.), and among the Amish Diener zum Buch were used instead of Prediger or preacher. In the Netherlands in former times the title Leeraar (teacher) was used, and in North Germany the corresponding term, Lehrer, also Vermaner (Dutch) and Vermahner (German), meaning "admonisher." The term preacher or its equivalent is still the standard term in the Badischer Verband (q.v.) in South Germany, in France, Switzerland, South America, and the more conservative groups and areas in North America, as also in the German-speaking bodies in Canada. Predikant is still used some in Holland. H.S.B.

Predigerfonds, a fund established in Germany for the improvement of Mennonite ministers' salaries, pensions for retired ministers, support of ministers' widows, etc. Such funds were once established in the North German city congregations. A general fund for salaries was established in 1897 by the German Mennonite Conference known as the Vereinigung (q.v.), also a fund for widows' support. In 1921 a third fund for ministers' pensions was created. Each of these funds is independently established and is operated apart from the general treasury of the Vereinigung, on the basis of using only the income from invested capital. In 1918 the total capital of the three funds was as follows: Salary Fund DM 75,785.65, Widows' Fund DM 39,733.55, Pension Fund DM 15,500.00. Unfortunately the capital funds were almost wiped out in the inflation of 1923, and again in 1948. The current status is very weak. (ML III, 390 f.) H.S.B.

Prele (Präle), Paul (in Beck erroneously called Pretten), of Esslingen, Palatinate, Germany, was seized in Neuffen on April 15, 1573, together with Matthias Binder (q.v.) or Schneider, a preacher, on a journey through Württemberg. Prele had come to Württemberg previously as an apostle of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia. This is inferred from a letter Paul Glock (q.v.) wrote to Peter Walpot (q.v.) on Sept. 29, 1570, which says that Prele brought Glock a veil as a greeting from Moravia. He was acquainted with the country; Glock referred to him when he wrote of imprisoned Anabaptists. Thus Glock reported that Lienhard Sommer of Necklinsberg, one of the Swiss Brethren with whom he shared a prison on Hohenwittlingen, and with whom he had many an argument on the differences between Hutterian Brethren and the Swiss Brethren, must be acquainted with Prele. After their arrest Prele and Binder were held for several days in Neuffen. On April 24 they were cross-examined by a committee consisting of Johann Rucker, dean of Kirchheim, three clergymen, the magistrate Isaak Jäger, and a nobleman, probably Klaus von Greifeneck. The two were supposed to collect a debt in Frickenhausen, but the mayor arrested them and turned them over to the magistrate Isaak Jäger. Binder's cross-examination was lengthy, Prele's quite brief. In a letter written by Binder to Walpot dated May 16, they reported that they were well and that they were together in prison. At that time the magistrate said: "I have never heard of a Hutterite in this country who recanted his faith." On May 15 they were both questioned again. Prele was informed that by order of the prince he was to swear to leave the country permanently. He refused to render this oath, and was released without it. His petition to permit Binder to leave with him was rejected. Binder was held in Maulbronn and later in Hohenwittlingen. Presumably Prele took Binder's letter with him to Moravia. Nothing more is known of Prele. (TA Württemberg; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 381 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 491 ff.; ML III, 392.)

G.Bos.

Premont, Tex., a town (pop. 2,500) located in the southern part of Jim Wells County in southern Texas. There are 59 Mennonites living within shopping distance of Premont, who represent the M.C. and M.B. groups, each of which has a church. There have been Mennonites in this area for 30 years. The surrounding area is largely agricultural and ranch country, with some oil and gas. The Mennonite Brethren maintain a mission for Latin Americans.

H.F.R.

Premont Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Jim Wells County, southern Texas, had its beginning in settlement of a number of M.B. families in 1927. On Nov. 3, 1929, this group organized as a local church and at a subsequent meeting elected Elder H. H. Flaming as leader and pastor. Meetings were at first held in homes and in other buildings. In 1935 the congregation purchased some land and built its own church. Elder H. H. Flaming was followed by J. P. Kliever 1941-47, John W. Duerksen 1947-52, Lewis H. Boese 1953-56 and 1958—, Ruben Wedel 1956-58. In 1958 the membership was 53. The church now has a parsonage and Sunday-school annex. J.W.D.

Prenner (not Renner, as in ML I, 142), Jakob (Jörg), an Anabaptist martyr, a day laborer of Schmiechen, Upper Bavaria, Germany, who baptized about eighteen persons, was beheaded at Munich (q.v.) in 1528. W.W.

S. Riezler, Geschichte Bayerns IV (Gotha, 1899) (Geschichte der europäischen Staaten LVIII) 194; J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutions-Periode von 1522 bis 1526 (Freiburg, 1851) 745; ML III, 392.

Prenzlau, a town 60 miles north of Berlin, Germany, was the location of one of the three camps (the other two Mölln in Lauenburg, and Hammerstein) provided by the German government for the temporary quartering of Mennonite refugees from Russia from November 1929 to the late summer of 1930, while they were waiting to move on to Brazil and Paraguay. H.S.B.

Preparatory Schools (Vorbereitungsschulen) were schools among the Russian Mennonites of the prairie states and provinces, which came to their bloom at the turn of the last century. In the complex system and development of education among the Mennonites of this area the following criteria can be used to establish whether a certain school falls under this category or not: (1) the age of pupils was usually fourteen or above; (2) the curriculum included Biblical and high-school subjects; (3) the more advanced preparatory schools prepared students for teaching or college entrance. Originally the preparatory school was modeled after the Russian Mennonite Zentralschule (q.v.) and later more after the American high school. In this process of adjustment a number of the schools, not having enough students to develop according to the original plan, had to be satisfied to convey an elementary knowledge of the German language and Bible. These became known as Bible schools (q.v.).

The terms "Zentralschule" and "Fortbildungsschule" were used when the Emmatal School (q.v.) was established (1878). Already before this Peter Balzer had been teaching secondary courses in his school. Those preparatory schools able to pursue their goal to prepare students for teaching and college entrance later became known as academies (Bethel, Tabor, Freeman, etc.) of which some have been discontinued or have become colleges. Some are still functioning in this category, e.g., Meno and Corn, Okla., the Mennonite Collegiate Institute at Greta, Man., and Rosthern Junior College in Saskatchewan. Recently established academies are Central Kansas Bible Academy (q.v.) and the Berean Academy (q.v.).

Two of the most prominent preparatory schools were the Hillsboro Preparatory School (q.v.), with H. D. Penner (q.v.) as founder, and the Mountain Lake Preparatory School (q.v.). The following is a partial list of the schools which fall under the category of preparatory schools (not included are those which have become colleges): Beatrice Bible Academy, Berean Academy, Central Kansas Bible Academy, Corn Bible Academy, Emmatal Fortbildungsschule, Goessel Preparatory School, Gotebo Preparatory School, Henderson Bethesda Preparatory School, Hillsboro Preparatory School, Hoffnungsau Preparatory School, Meade Bible Academy, Mennonite Collegiate Institute, Moundridge Preparatory School, Mountain Lake Preparatory School, Oklahoma Bible Academy, Rosthern Junior College, Zoar Bible Academy.

The catalogs of the various preparatory schools which have been preserved are quite uniform in content. The one prepared by H. D. Penner for the Hillsboro Vorbereitungsschule probably served as a model for most of them. It states that the objective of the school is to prepare Mennonite youth for a higher school, for a special vocation, or for an intelligent concept of duties of life in general, and that boys and girls of at least fourteen years of age were accepted. The school year consisted of two semesters beginning September 28 and closing March 26. The tuition per semester was $7.50 and board and room $2.00 per week. The nine rules of the school emphasized standards of conduct generally observed in schools even in our day. Among the subjects offered in the first catalog were Bible history, world history, language, singing, and geography. During the second year two new subjects, church history and composition, are included in the curriculum. These schools usually had a two-year course. (See Secondary Education.) C.K.

Preparatory Service, the name given to the regular Sunday morning service preceding the communion service, or to a special service held on Saturday afternoon or evening preceding communion Sunday (as in the Franconia Mennonite MC Conference district in Eastern Pennsylvania) at which the intent of the sermon and the entire worship is to contribute to an inner preparation of the congregation for a better celebration of the communion. The custom is no longer as common as it once was among the Mennonites of North America or other countries. It is to be distinguished from the Counsel Meeting (q.v.), whose function, though also in a sense preparatory to the communion, was rather to deal with matters of church discipline. H.S.B.

Pressburg: see Bratislava.

Preston, a town (pop. 8,819) in Waterloo County, Ont., is situated 8 miles south of Kitchener and 60 miles west of Toronto. Led by George Clemens about 1800, the first Mennonite settlers here (from Pennsylvania) were soon followed by others. The settlement grew and prospered with the construction of a grist mill and sawmill. Known first as Cambridge, later Preston, it became a village in 1833. An important industrial center today, it has over 35 diversified industries. The Mennonites first met in homes for worship until 1842, when a church building was erected north of the town, called Hagey's. Twice destroyed by fire, it is now located within the town limits. Early leaders were Joseph Bechtel, first minister; Benjamin Eby, bishop and organizer; Martin Baer, David Sherk, and John Baer ministers. A 26-capacity home for the aged (Braeside) was dedicated in 1943. It was replaced by a new and larger building at the north edge of the town in 1956 called Fairview Mennonite Home. H.E.S.N.

Preston (Ont.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Ontario Conference, was from 1842 to 1953 known as the Hagey church because of the Hagey families in the congregation and because it was located at Hagey's crossing about one mile northwest of Preston. The meetinghouse, erected in 1842, was destroyed by fire in 1950; its successor was likewise destroyed by fire in 1953. The present brick meetinghouse at 791 Concession Road was dedicated May 16, 1954. In 1957 the membership was 119, with Howard Good as minister.

The Preston area was the place of earliest Mennonite settlement in Waterloo County, which began in 1799. The first ordained man in the area was Jacob Bechtel, a deacon who arrived in 1800. The first minister was Joseph Bechtel, who arrived in 1802 and was ordained preacher in 1804. Other ministers, with dates of arrival and ordination, were Martin Baer 1801 and 1808; Abr. L. Clemens, deacon, 1809 and 1815; John Baer, a son of Martin, ordained in 1838, but withdrew to join the "New Mennonites" (MBC) in 1874; Jacob Hagey, deacon, 1822 and 1832; Joseph Hagey 1822 and 1844, bishop 1857-76; David Sherk (1801-82), the most important early preacher of the congregation, ordained 1838; and Ben B. Shantz, 1908. Howard Good, the present pastor, was ordained in 1948.

Although the Preston area settlement was the oldest in Waterloo County, the history of the Hagey congregation before 1842 is obscure. The congregation must have met in the homes of the members for some time, since the first meetinghouse in the county, at Kitchener, was erected in 1813. There is some evidence that a meetinghouse was erected near Preston about the same time. The Wanner (q.v.) congregation (first meetinghouse 1829) has always been closely related to Hagey, and apparently for a long time the ministers served both the Hagey and Wanner congregations. For a time the Weber (Strasbourg) (q.v.) church was included in the circuit. This area has for the past 70 years been progressive in outlook and activities. H.S.B.

Pretle, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, named in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror: see Brötli, Johannes.

Pretoria, a Mennonite village name of the Orenburg and Terek settlements, Russia, given to the newly established villages because of sympathy for the Boers of South Africa during their independence struggle (see Villages). C.K.

Pretoria Zentralschule. This four-class school, located in the village of Pretoria in the Orenburg Mennonite settlement of the Orenburg province, Russia, owed its existence to the energy and sacrificial spirit of Peter P. Dyck, a minister now living at Rosemary, Alberta. In 1907 Dyck organized an association to raise the educational standards of the Orenburg Mennonites, and in the same year began a school by teaching about 25 students in a private home in Pretoria. The attendance soon rose to about 100. During World War I instruction was halted on government orders. It was resumed in 1918-19, with as many academically trained teachers as possible. Beginning in 1921, the school passed gradually into Soviet hands, leaving no authority to the Mennonite settlement. But in 1907-21 the school was of great benefit to the settlement, for many of the preachers, most of the teachers, and many other local officials attended it and then worked successfully for the settlement and the congregations. W.Q.

Prette, Hans: see Brötli, Johannes.

Pretten, Paul: see Prele, Paul.

Pretty Prairie Amish Mennonite Church, now extinct, located about 10 miles north northeast of Lagrange, Ind., the meetinghouse of which, built in 1872, is still standing on the farm of Simon Bontrager. Early settlers were Christian K. Mast (born in Lancaster County, Pa., in 1822) 1864, Christian J. Plank of Adams County, Ind., 1859, Christian Nafziger (served as a preacher), Christian Stuckey, Christian Plank, Joseph Bontrager, and Jacob Hooley. Other ministers who served at Pretty Prairie were Christian Warye, who moved to Johnson County, Iowa, in 1884, Jonas C. Yoder, who moved to Logan County, Ohio, and Jonathan B. Hartzler (1850-1950), ordained preacher May 18, 1879, but who did his lifework in the Crown Hill (MC) congregation in Ohio. At the communion service in 1869 bishops J. D. Troyer of Marshall County, Ind., and Isaac Smucker of Lagrange County (Hawpach congregation at Topeka) were in charge. Daniel Brenneman visited the congregation as early as 1866. The congregation had died out by 1915. The membership never exceeded 40. J.C.W.

Pretty Prairie First Mennonite Church (GCM), located 3 miles east of Pretty Prairie, Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized Oct. 10, 1884, with 88 members of Swiss German descent, from Volhynia (q.v.), under the leadership of J. J. Flickinger, the first pastor. The first services were held in the homes of John B. Graber and Andrew Schwartz.

In 1886 the first meetinghouse was moved on the church ground. This church was sold in 1891. The second church, built in 1891, was destroyed by a tornado in 1897. A third structure, built in the same year on the same foundation, burned down in May 1905. The fourth church, built in 1905, was replaced in 1927 by a larger building, which seats 900. The parsonage was acquired in 1919. This church has a Sunday school, Christian Endeavor, and a sewing society.

Ministers who have served this congregation are: J. J. Flickinger 1884-1919, with John G. Graber assisting 1887-1917, J. B. Epp 1919-21, N. W. Bahnmann 1922-25, J. W. Lohrenz 1925-32, S. M. Musselman 1932-37, P. P. Tschetter 1937-48, and Howard G. Nyce 1948-58. The membership in 1957 was 622. H.G.N.

Arthur J. Graber, "The Swiss Mennonites—Pretty Prairie," Menn. Life V (April 1950).

Pretsch, Friedrich, an Anabaptist martyr, a cleric at Nordheim in Franconia, South Germany. Pretsch had previously been a monk but, perhaps out of sympathy for his brother Martin Luther, he left the monastery. On a suspicion that Pretsch was an Anabaptist, the Bishop of Würzburg had him arrested on Feb. 17, 1528, and taken to Würzburg. George, Margrave of Brandenburg, having heard of his arrest through the magistrate of Kottenheim, interceded for him and a lengthy correspondence ensued, in which the bishop asserted that according to the testimony of two executed Anabaptists as well as his own confession Pretsch was guilty of performing adult baptisms. Thereupon the margrave withdrew his petition for clemency. Pretsch was put to death on April 15, 1528. W.W.

H. Clauss, "Kleine Beiträge zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Franken," in Ztscht für bayrische kirchengesch. XVI (Erlangen, 1941) 174; K. Schornbaum, "Zur Einführung der Reformation in die Herrschaft Schwarzenberg," in Jahresbericht des Hist. Vereins für Mittelfranken, No. 58 (Ansbach, 1911) 136 f.; TA Brandenburg; ML III, 394.

Preubler, Andreas, an Anabaptist leader around Steyr in Upper Austria (q.v.). Little is known of his life and work except that he was a shoemaker, and the author of a booklet of "seventeen pages" on baptism, which has, however, not yet come to light. Its contents are known through a refutation by the Lutheran scholar Gall Steininger (in 1566 appointed as preacher in Peuerbach, Upper Austria, and in 1584 the author of a book on original sin, attacking the Flaccians), who indulged in violent accusations against the Anabaptists, using vulgar expressions, hardly to be duplicated in any other writing against them.

According to Preubler's booklet the Anabaptists taught as follows: the nations should first have the Gospel preached to them, and then, if they accept the Word, they should be baptized; since little children cannot be taught, they should not be baptized. The apostles first gave instruction in the mysteries of faith and did not baptize until that was done. The baptism of children should be postponed until they are grown and able to understand the doctrine. Those who let baptism precede indoctrination are not messengers of Christ, but of Antichrist. All who are to be baptized must first through the Holy Spirit acknowledge the forgiveness of their sins through the preaching of mercy in the New Testament, otherwise baptism has no value. Infant baptism was invented by men and was instituted and preserved by the spirit of Antichrist. Only through faith in the name of Christ is one saved, and not through infant baptism, nor indeed through adult baptism nor through other good works. Christ has given to all, while we were yet dead in sin, life with Him; by faith in Him one is born anew. If justification comes through Christ's righteousness, it cannot come through baptism. God accepts little children by grace, even without baptism or other service of the church, in case of early death. But the baptizers of infants wish to make children acceptable to God through baptism, which is a work of the law, thereby denying God's grace. By trying to make little children acceptable to God by baptism faith is extinguished and the Word, the office, and the work of Christ are weakened and blasphemed. The Jewish infants who died before they were circumcised on the eighth day were certainly not damned. Likewise our children are not damned without baptism. He who attaches his salvation to external ceremonies honors the creature more than the Creator; this is what baptizers of infants do, for they attach salvation to baptism. They thereby deny the finished work of Christ, who has won and sealed our salvation with His blood. The Holy Spirit alone is the assurance of our salvation, and not infant baptism. Christ says (John 15): Ye are clean through the Word; hence one is not made clean through baptism. Christ urges inner purification (Matt. 23); but infant baptism is only an external cleansing, a work performed by man. True inward cleansing and washing away of sins is done through the Spirit of our God (I Cor. 6; Heb. 8, 9, and 10).

Steininger expressed his opinion that such terrible blasphemies against Christ and His sacraments had never before been heard; such a devilish rascal should have his tongue pulled out of his throat; the Jews would not have tolerated such a blasphemer, but would have stoned him, especially since God has commanded it. (Source: Collection of Joseph Beck's papers in the Moravian Archives at Brno; ML III, 394 f.) W.W.

Preussisch Holland (Polish, Paslek), originally called simply Holland, a town (1946 pop. 3,278) in East Prussia southeast of Elbing (since 1945 in Olsztyn, formerly Allenstein, a province of Poland), in which there were a few Mennonites until the collapse in 1945, members of the Heubuden and Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart congregations. The articles of the founding of the town, dated Sept. 29, 1297, mention that it was named for settlers from Holland. In 1527 a new immigration from the Netherlands set in, at first east of the city toward Bardeyn, consisting of Sacramentists (q.v.). Others, including Anabaptists, under the leadership of Hermann Sachs, on Feb. 1, 1539, received permission to settle the village of Schönberg (and also Judendorf) north of the town in the district of Preussisch Holland (document printed in Schumacher, 176-78). Their names and the occupations of some are given by Schumacher (184). Their deviation from the religion of the duchy, however, soon became apparent; hence they were expelled by the great church inspection of 1542-43; only a few adjusted themselves to the dominant church in order to be permitted to remain in the country. (See East Prussia.) E.C.

Mennonitisches Adressbuch (Karlsruhe, 1936); Bruno Schumacher, Niederländische Ansiedlungen im Herzogtum Preussen zur Zeit Herzog Albrechts 1525-68 (Leipzig, 1903); Felicia Sper, Niederländische niederzettelungen in West-Preussen gedurende den poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913); B. H. Unruh, "Kolonisatorische Berührungen zwischen den Mennoniten und den Siedlern anderer Konfessionen im Weichselgebiet und in der Neumark," Deutsches Archiv für Landes- und Volksforschung IV (1940) 256-60; Hans Egon Wolfram, Die Niederlande und der deutsche Osten (Berlin, 1943); ML III, 397.

Preussisch Rosengart, a village (1944 pop. 367) in the Marienburg district of West Prussia, in which 55 Mennonites, members of the Thiensdorf-Preussich Rosengart congregation, were living in 1945. In 1776 and again in 1888 there were 23 Mennonite families here; in 1936 there were only 17. In 1888, when the Nogat River dam broke, the church at Markushof (q.v.) was severely damaged. Without awaiting an appeal for help to come from West Prussia, Pastor van der Smissen of Hamburg issued an appeal for aid to the victims of the flood. A committee composed of pastors van der Smissen of Hamburg, Mannhardt of Danzig, and Harder of Elbing, requested permission of the Dutch Mennonites to set aside 18,000 Marks of the Dutch relief fund for the erection of a church for the congregations of Thiensdorf and Markushof, which had been divided into two congregations for about a century. Thus they were reunited. The church was built (1891) in Preussisch Rosengart, rather than in Markushof, which was too close to Thiensdorf. This church was one of the few Mennonite churches to have a bell. With the assistance of a Wiehler family, Eva von Tiele-Winckler (q.v.) built two homes for the homeless here in 1916-18. G.R., E.C.

Mennonitisches Adressbuch (Karlsruhe, 1936); Eva von Tiele-Winckler, Nichts unmöglich! (Dresden, 1929) 206-13, 311; ML III, 397.

Pribitz (Priebitz), a Hutterite Bruderhof located several miles south of Selowitz (q.v.) in Moravia on an elevation on the left bank of the Iglava; when the Brethren settled here in 1565 it belonged to the Selowitz domain, which had been acquired by their great benefactor Friedrich von Zierotin (q.v.), who later became lord of Moravia. The Brethren built the entire Bruderhof; it soon developed into one of the best in the land. On Feb. 17, 1572, this Bruderhof confirmed Wendel Holba (or Müller) and Rupp Gellner (q.v.) as preachers, and on April 19, 1573, three additional preachers, and again on April 27, 1575, three preachers. On May 23, 1575, five more were confirmed by the elder by the laying on of hands. Here the deacon Valtin Preindl died in 1576, and the well-known Peter Walpot (q.v.) on Jan. 30, 1578, one of the three elders, "highly endowed with the Spirit of God and an ornament of the entire brotherhood." Here also occurred the death of the preacher Josef Doppelhammer (or Schuster) on Dec. 24, 1580, "who from his youth had been with and was raised in the brotherhood." In 1582 the deacon Christian Häring (q.v.) died, who had served the brotherhood for forty years and was one of the Brethren who had been condemned to the galleys, but who escaped in Trieste; also on Dec. 30, 1586 (in some manuscripts Feb. 2, 1587), occurred the death of the preacher Georg Planer or Uhrmacher.

A thriving industry in Pribitz was that of clock making; its fame was spread throughout the land. The town of Mödritz obtained a tower clock from the Bruderhof in 1572 for the price of thirty florins. But also the medical arts were given special attention here as they were also in Nikolsburg (q.v.). Especially the noblemen preferred to employ the Pribitz physicians (barber-surgeons). The baron of Vostitz (Wastitz) and Pürschitz (q.v.), Franz, Count Thurn Valsassina, for instance, summoned Tengler, a physician of the Bruderhof, to care for his son, who was wounded in the war against the Turks in 1583; the treatment was successful in restoring him.

According to a tax list of the Selowitz domain the Bruderhof in the 1590's owned a smithy with a garden, a meadow, some vineyards, a hop garden, a river fishery, and a cemetery, for which an annual tax of 16 florins had to be paid. On Jan. 8, 1594, occurred the death of Jakob of Hinnen (or Kiss), and on Sept. 2, 1599, David Hasel (see Michael Hasel), both preachers; on Jan. 10, 1606, Johann Rath, "an outstanding preacher of the Gospel." Here Michel Grossman was confirmed as an elder on Feb. 5, 1606, and two brethren were chosen to the office of preacher. On Feb. 12, 1609, the deacon Mathes Pühler died here.

In 1609 the parish of Freiberg in Moravia purchased of the Pribitz Brethren a clock for the church tower for 250 florins. For Franz, Cardinal of Dietrichstein (q.v.), they made a clock in 1613 for the sum of 170 talers, and an equally costly one for the Archduke Maximilian, who requested their baron, Johann Dionys von Zierotin, to place the order for him.

In Pribitz occurred the death of the two deacons, Michel Ritter on Feb. 27, 1615, and Merthin Hederich on May 1, 1616; also the death of the preacher Hänsel Stam on Dec. 1, 1616. In autumn 1619 the fateful invasion of Moravia by Dampierre's troops took place; twelve Bruderhofs fell as victims to them. The Pribitz Brethren sought to escape the danger by removing the sick and aged as well as the children to Austerlitz (q.v.). On their return on September 14 the aged, the ill, and the children, being brought home from Austerlitz and Lettonitz on twelve wagons, fell into the hands of Dampierre's men, who at once shot down three Brethren accompanying the caravan, scattered the women and children into "the water, moor, and reeds," raping four of the women. The troops took all the wagons with their provisions and forty horses. The scattered victims did not venture to come out of hiding for three or four days, and "there was in this crowd such great misery, fear, and terror and distress, also a lamentable crying and weeping of the young and old that it would have moved a stone to pity."

But the Pribitz Bruderhof was to be visited by even greater disaster. On July 28, 1620, on a Tuesday morning at three o'clock, "while all the people were lying in bed without worry," the Bruderhof was attacked by imperial horsemen and musketeers, mostly Poles, who in less than three hours murdered 52 of the Brethren, including a young mother with her child, "tortured some for money" by burning them with glowing irons, cutting wounds into the calves of the legs and setting fire to powder placed into the cuts, pouring hot fat over their naked bodies, pinching off fingers, and other satanic measures. In addition about sixty persons were seriously wounded, "shot, stabbed, and beaten," some of whom died of their wounds; a total of 71 persons lost their lives. Most of the women, "married and single, also some girls of ten or twelve years," were abused before the eyes of their families. The wounded Vorsteher Hans Jakob Wolf, a large number of women, and several men, a total of 70 persons, "together with an inexpressibly severe robbery, also all the horses, cattle and oxen, all the cows, and much food, were taken away." The "Pribitzer Lied" describes this in detail. In December, when the neighborhood was plundered and pillaged, the brotherhood of Pribitz fled to Pausram (q.v.). On Jan. 5, 1621, the Pribitz Bruderhof was robbed and burned down by imperial troops. By order of Cardinal Dietrichstein one of the five caches of money betrayed by Vorsteher Hirzel (q.v.) was dug up by Count Breuner on July 23; after a long search a second was found on July 30. Adam von Waldstein, who acquired the Selowitz lands in 1616, complained to the Cardinal about the removal of this money; the latter referred him to the imperial court from whom the Cardinal claimed to have received a letter sanctioning the course. In October 1622 Pribitz had to be evacuated and all that they had rebuilt left behind. P.D.E.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Franticek Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXX-XXXII (1935); Th. Unger, "Ueber eine Wiedertäufer-Liederhandschrift des 17. Jahrhunderts," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Gesch. des Protestantismus in Oesterreich XV (1894) 24 f.; Gregor Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II: Brünnner Erzdiozese I (Brno, 1856) 294; II (Brno, 1858) 235 f.; the "Priebitzer Lied" is found in Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 379, 380, 382, 383, 385, 387; ML III, 397 f.

Prijntgen Maelbouts, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pierijntgen van Male.

Primavera, a Hutterite colony in East (Alto) Paraguay (q.v.), located about 80 miles northeast of Asuncion. This colony was founded in 1941 when the inhabitants of the Cotswold Bruderhof in Wiltshire, England, because of the outbreak of World War II, were forced to leave England. The movement to Paraguay was made with the assistance of the Mennonite Central Committee and the American Friends Service Committee, and the settlement was made adjacent to the Mennonite Colony of Friesland to the east. The colony consists of three separate village communities—Isla Margarita, established in 1941, Loma Jhoby, 1942, and Ibate, 1946. The total population was 350 in 1941, 650 in 1951, and 650 in 1958. Of the 650 persons in 1951, 350 were children under fifteen. Eighteen different nationalities (about 50 per cent are English, about 20 per cent are German) and 90 family names are found among the Primavera Hutterites. The chief source of income is agriculture; some industry has developed, particularly the extraction and bottling of orange juice, tangerines, and grapefruit. By their education programs and their hospital (Sanatorio Primavera) the community has proved to be very helpful to the native Paraguayans. The official corporate name in Paraguay is Sociedad Fraternal Hutteriana (q.v.). It maintains a home and business office in Asuncion (40 persons 1958). vdZ.

J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottsdale, n.d.-1953) 53-59; ML III, 398.

Princess Anne County (Va.) Amish Mennonites. Old Order Amish families moved to this county first in 1907 from Somerset and Lancaster counties, Pa.

Early arrivals were the families of Ben Smucker, Daniel Hershberger, Elias A. Yoder, Noah E. Yoder, Milton E. Yoder, and Peter D. Kinsinger. The first resident bishop was Daniel D. Yoder. William S. Yoder, Simon D. Schrock, and Jonas H. Hershberger were later bishops. A meetinghouse was erected in 1913 midway between Norfolk and Virginia Beach; it was enlarged in 1927 and in 1948.

In 1941 a division occurred, which resulted in a migration of many Old Order Amish members to Stuarts Draft, Va. Those remaining conceded the use of automobiles, and are now known as the Kempsville Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.), which belongs to the Beachy Amish group. The congregation has had a Sunday school since 1922, and has supported an elementary church school since 1946. The community is located in a favorable market area, with dairying and vegetable farming in the vicinity. The membership in 1957 was 136. J.A.H.

Prins, a common Dutch family name both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. A widely ramified Mennonite family by this name is found in the province of North Holland, originating from de Rijp, where Arent Claesz Prins, b. c1635, was a shipbuilder and shipowner, as were his descendants until c1750. They gave up shipbuilding after de Rijp was no longer an important shipping and whaling center. Members of this family thereupon moved to Purmerend and Wormerveer. In Wormerveer Simon Jansz Prins (1738-1814) was a merchant in grains and the founder of a starch factory, which business was also run by his son Cornelis Simonatz Prins (1771-1843, who was 1811-d.43 at the same time a burgomaster of Wormerveer) and his grandson Simon Cornelisz Prins (1796-1871) who added a linseed oil factory, gradually also becoming engaged in limited liability companies, running similar businesses.

In de Rijp some members of this family have been trustees of the Mennonite orphanage; in Wormerveer some of them were deacons. As far as known none of them served as a minister of the church. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XII (1921-22) 120-30; information by J. Aten, Wormerveer.

Prins, A. Winkler: see Winkler Prins, A.

Prischib, a village and volost of a Protestant and Roman Catholic German settlement west of the Molotschna River and the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in the Ukraine, Russia, province of Taurida, was established in 1804 and consisted of 125,000 acres and 27 villages. The village of Prischib, 33 miles north of Melitopol, was the administrative center of the settlement just across the Molotschna River from the Mennonite administrative center of Halbstadt (q.v.). In 1913 the population was 810, in 1919, 1,185. Numerous business enterprises and a Zentralschule, established in 1873, a girls' school, an institution for the deaf, and a bookstore were located in the village. Gottlieb Schaad published the Molotschnaer Volks-Kalender at Prischib from 1881 on. There was a lively exchange of cultural and economic values between the Molotschna Mennonites and their Prischib neighbors. C.K.

Emil Blank, "Die Prischiber Volost," Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913) 107 ff.

Privileges (Privilegium), i.e., grant of privilege or special license, known sometimes as letters of protection, were documents which granted a release from military service and the oath, usually issued by a ruler; they occurred in Mennonite history principally in the 17th century, but also as late as the 20th century. Following is a list of all known Privileges:

(a) Netherlands (q.v.): Jan. 26, 1577, Prince William of Orange; printed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 747, E 1054); printed in DJ 1930, 120-23.

(b) Palatinat (q.v.): Aug. 4, 1664, Elector Charles Louis (q.v.); printed in ML II, 461 f.

(c) Wied (q.v.): Dec. 16, 1680, Count Frederick I for Neuwied (q.v.); printed in Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 152 f.

(d) East Friesland: May 26, 1626, Count Rudolf Christian (q.v.); printed in J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland vom 16. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert I (Emden, 1887) 41.

(e) Holstein (q.v.)—Gottorp: Feb. 13, 1623, Duke Frederick III (q.v.) for Friedrichstadt (q.v.); printed in Corpus Statutorum Slevicensium III 1 (Schleswig, 1799) 587.

(f) Denmark (q.v.): June 6, 1641, King Christian IV for Altona (q.v.); printed in Johann Adrian Bolten, Historische Kirchennachrichten von der Stadt Altona (Altona, 1790/91) 283 f., and Berend Carl Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 37 f.

(g) Prussia (q.v.): Jan. 30, 1721, King Frederick William I (q.v.) for Crefeld (q.v.); printed in Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 56 f. March 27, 1780, King Frederick II (q.v.) for West Prussia (q.v.) and East Prussia (q.v.), also printed in Reiszewitz and Wadzeck, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennonitengemeinden (Berlin, 1821) 212 ff., and in Max Beheim-Schwarzbach, Hohenzollernsche Colonisationen (Leipzig, 1874) 420.

(h) Poland (q.v.): Dec. 22, 1642, King Ladislaw IV (q.v.); printed in Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) LX-LXI (1, Lat.) and 80 ff. (German)—Aug. 22, 1694, King John III (q.v.) Sobieski; printed in Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) LXV-LXVI (4, Lat.) and 87 ff. (German)—Oct. 12 (or 18), 1732, King August II (q.v.); printed in Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) LXVII-LXVIII (5, Lat.) and 90 f. (German), also printed in Hermann Nottarp, Die Mennoniten in den Marienburger Werdern (Schriften der Königsberger Gelehrten Gesellschaft, geisteswissenschaftliche Klasse VI, 2, Halle, 1929) 89 f.—Sept. 19, 1750, King August III (q.v.); printed in Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreuussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) 93 ff. (German).

(i) Russia (q.v.): Sept. 6, 1800, Czar Paul I (q.v.); printed in David Heinrich Epp, Die Chor- titzer Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889), also in Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Amsterdam, 1912) 278 ff.

(j) Mexico (q.v.): Aug. 26, 1921, Declaration of President Alvaro Obregon; printed in J. Winfield Fretz, Mennonite Colonization in Mexico (Akron, 1945) 11 (English) and also in ML III, 120 (German).

(k) Paraguay (q.v.): July 26, 1921, Law No. 514; printed in Las Colonias Menonitas en el Chaco Paraguayo (Asuncion, 1934) 5 ff. (Spanish and German), also in Walter Quiring, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Schriftenreihe des Deutschen Ausland-Instituts 7, Karlsruhe, 1938) 51 ff., in Der Mennonit, March 1950, 32 (German), in Sanford C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Scottsdale, 1945) 275 ff., and in Willard H. Smith and Verna Graber Smith, Paraguayan Interlude (Scottsdale, 1950) 174 ff. (English). E.C.

E. Crous, "Die Mennoniten in Deutschland seit dem Dreissigjährigen Kriege," in Der Mennonit III (1950) 7; ML III, 398 f.

Proba Fidei: see Valerius de Scholmeester.

Probiar-Stein. Oder Schrifftmässige und auss dem wahren innerlichen Christenthumb Hargenommene Gewissenhafte Prüfung dess Täuferthums In der Forcht des Herrn Herrn zu Allegemeiner Erbauung Abgefasset (Bern, 1696) is a small octavo volume of 610 numbered pages, besides 82 pages of introductory material including a short history of Anabaptism, written by a Reformed minister, Georg Thormann (1655-1708), at that time serving as pastor at Lützelüh in the Swiss canton of Bern. It was prepared at the request of both the civil and ecclesiastical authorities of Bern and printed by the government printery. The author states his purpose to be to give the common people a book which will strengthen them against the "strongly growing" Anabaptism, and indicates that he intends to do this in a good way, different from the usual polemics. He even states that he will not use the term "Widertäufer," because "it is so hated by them," but will use "Täufer" instead.

Thormann actually presents a very fair picture of the Bernese Anabaptists, making no effort to show them in a bad light. He says repeatedly that his readers are well informed concerning the doctrine of these people and their commendable life and conduct. He writes, "Among our country people the opinion prevails in general that whoever sees an Anabaptist sees a saint, a person who is dead to the world, having experienced true conversion, and that there are no more earnest and consecrated people than they." And again, "If among all Christian communions there is one which seems to be upright and give assurance of personal salvation to the soul, it is certainly that of the Anabaptists. And this is true to such an extent that their religion appears to very many of our country people as by far the surest way of salvation." And again, "Their regard for them is such that many look upon them as saints, as the salt of the earth and the very kernel of Christendom. Their opinion concerning them is so favorable that many believe a good Christian and an Anabaptist to be one and the same thing." The latter part of the book contains earnest challenges to follow the good example of the Anabaptists. Thormann's book gives abundant light on the question why the Bernese in spite of tremendous effort found it impossible to exterminate them. It was because the general population in the area where the Anabaptists lived sympathized with them and gave them assistance and help in every possible way.

The book is divided into four parts described by the author as follows: (1) "an account of the apparent reasons why the country people have such a great regard for the Anabaptists"; (2) "a discussion of the points of difference: infant baptism, preacher's office, ban, oath, war, etc., and which shows that it is quite unnecessary to be an Anabaptist to be saved"; (3) "proof that it is rather highly dangerous to one's salvation to be an Anabaptist"; (4) "conclusion, directions showing how a true Christian among us should live and serve the Lord to all pleasing, and should fulfill all righteousness in spirit and in truth."

This is one of the most remarkable books ever written by an enemy of the Anabaptist-Mennonites, and is very valuable for a knowledge of these people in the Emmenthal in the canton of Bern in the late 17th century. The above description is taken in part from John Horsch's account of the book in his Mennonites in Europe (Scottsdale, 1942), pp. 398-40. The Goshen College Library copy of the Prober-Stein was once the possession of Adolf Fluri (q.v.) of Bern. H.S.B.

Proefdienaar. This former Dutch Mennonite term was used in two different senses: (a) When a member of a congregation was chosen as preacher or deacon he was frequently "beproeft" (examined) by the elder(s) who were present concerning his views on the basic principles and doctrines of the church, and asked whether he was willing to accept the call. If the examination was satisfactory, he was called a "proefdienaar" and after a longer or shorter interval he preached his installation sermon. This practice existed, for example, on the island of Ameland (q.v.) until the middle of the 19th century. (DB 1889, 28-30.) (b) In a somewhat different sense the word is found in the congregation of Leiden and other Dutch congregations, where a chosen candidate had to "in de proeve staan," i.e., he was obliged to deliver two or three or even more sermons to show his capacities in speaking and expounding the Scriptures, and was during this period called a "proefdienaar." vöZ.

Proentgen (Peronne, Pronken, Pierrine, Pierrette, Pierotte Pertrij), an Anabaptist martyr, the daughter of Willem van Meteren, wife of Karel van de Velde (q.v.), and sister of Claesken, who was the wife of François de Swarte. She was arrested at Hondschoote in Flanders, with Claesken and her husband and three other Anabaptists. The others were burned at the stake; but she and her sister were secretly drowned there in a tub on Oct. 3, 1562. "One of the women, when she saw that they intended to put her to death secretly, complained of it, since she would have preferred to testify publicly to the truth with her death, whereupon her sister said: 'It is all the same, for God sees it; He will reward us and avenge our wrongs.'" (Mart. Mir. D 298, E 663; ML III, 399.) E.C.

Proentgen, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of Karel Tancreet, was put to death with eleven other Anabaptists at Gent, Belgium, in 1559. This meager account found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror can be amplified by information published by Verheyden from the records. Peronne Witgans (her official name) was a native of Belle (Bailleul) in Flanders. Her execution took place on July 5, 1559, at seven o'clock in the morning. She was burned at the stake with five other martyrs, while on July 4 four others, arrested several days earlier, had been burned at the stake, among whom was Karel Tancreet, Proentgen's husband. These martyrs are commemorated in a hymn, "Ick moet ein Liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), found in the Lietboeckken. (Offer, 348, 556; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 66; ML III, 400.) vöZ.

Proeve, Een Christelijke, ende overlegginge ofte rekeninge, waerin dat allen B. en S. vermaendt worden tot een scherp ende neerstich ondersoec haers selfs, ende der gantscher menichte, is a Dutch Mennonite book, published in 1570, reprinted in 1610 (n.p.) and at Haarlem in 1626. It was published after the Dutch Mennonites had been divided by the Frisian-Flemish schism, in which the Zierikzee (q.v.) congregation had remained neutral, and were therefore called Stilstaanders (q.v.). They were banned both by Frisians and Flemish. In Een Christelijke Proeve they give the motivation of their neutrality, criticizing the dissentious groups and urging peace and reconciliation. vöZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 8-12.

Prook, a Dutch Mennonite family found at Aalsmeer, province of North Holland, since at least the 17th century. Some members of this family have been preachers of the "Oude Vermaning" (Frisians) on the Uiterweg, viz., Cornelis (Pieters) Prook serving 1746-c80, Gerrit Jansen Prook 1786-c1825, Pieter Gerrits Prook, preacher 1810, elder 1850-d.55, and Willem Cornelis Prook 1855-d.60. vöZ.

W. Tsj. Vleer, De aloude Aalsmeerse familiën (De Kaag, n.d.-1953); Naamlijst; Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lector (1856), appendix 30 f.

Prophets, Worms Translation of, by Hans Denk (q.v.) and Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.): see Worms Translation.

Proponent, Dutch designation for a ministerial candidate. Formerly and particularly in the last decades of the 18th and early 19th centuries a young man who had been trained by a Mennonite minister was in many cases examined by a local church board, and if the outcome was satisfactory he was appointed "proponent." The students of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary (q.v.), founded in 1735, were until 1810 examined and appointed as proponents by the church board of the Amsterdam congregation and after 1811 by the trustees of the

A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) or by a committee appointed by the A.D.S. for the examinations, as is done today. Occasionally, but not since 1849, the Mennonite Conference of Friesland also appointed proponents. vdZ.

Propst, Jörg: see Rothenfelder, Jörg.

Protection Fee: see Taxation.

Protection Mennonite Church (MC), six miles south of Protection, Comanche Co., Kan., a member of the South Central Conference, was organized March 7, 1907. Services were first held in a schoolhouse two miles south of Protection. Early ministers included Bishop George R. Brunk, and ministers N. E. Ebersole, Ben Horst, and C. W. Miller. When George R. Brunk moved away, S. C. Miller assumed bishop oversight. On Nov. 1, 1908, the first church was dedicated. In 1917 the church was enlarged. The membership increased from 37 in 1907 to 86 in 1956. D. D. Miller served as minister (1917) and as bishop 1927-41. Charles Schweitzer served 1935-53. From 1956 Sanford C. Oyer was the minister in charge. C.Sc.

Protestantenbond Hymnal: see Nederlandse Protestantenbond.

Protocol dat is, de gantsche handelinge des ghespreck ghehouden tot Leeuwarden . . . : see Leeuwarden Disputation.

Protocol. Dath is, alle handelinge des gesprecks tho Emden in Oistfrieszlandt mit den Wedderdöperen . . . : see Emden Disputation.

Protocoll of the religious disputation of Leeuwarden, 1595: see Leeuwarden.

Protocoll, Das ist Alle handlung des gesprechs zu Franckenthal inn der Churfürstlichen Pfaltz, mit denen so man Widertäufer nennet: see Franckenthal Disputation.

Protokoll, dat is alle handeligen des Gesprecks tot Emden: see Emden.

Protzka (Czech, Broczko, today Brodsko), a Slovak village in Hungary, now in the Nitra (German, Neutra) province of Czechoslovakia. During the severe persecution of 1547 the Hutterian Brethren who had to flee from their Bruderhofs in Moravia turned to Hungary, where they were given domicile in Berencs (Präntsch) by Count Franz Nizry von Bedek and in Holitsch and Schossberg by Peter Bakich de Lâk (q.v.). Here, with considerable difficulty in clearing the land, they built houses. One of the Bruderhofs set up at that time was Protzka. Here in 1554 the deacon Jörg Ladendorfer died, and on Dec. 1, 1556, in his fiftieth year, Peter Riedemann (q.v.), the revered leader, whose confession of faith, the noted Rechenschaft (q.v.), was printed probably by 1545 and who was also the author of a long series of letters, which are among the principal sources for the study of Anabaptist doctrine, as well as nearly fifty songs. He had been a preacher for twenty-seven years.

On March 4, 1597, Hans Zuckenhammer (q.v.) was publicly excommunicated in Protzka. After serving as a preacher for seventeen years, he proved himself unworthy by his unjust decisions and other wrong deeds, and finally rebelled against his removal from this office in Lewär. Before his death he "made his peace" with the brotherhood, and was restored to fellowship; he died in Protzka on April 29, 1598.

On May 4, 1605, rebel Hungarians attacked the Bruderhof here. Most of the Brethren succeeded in escaping before the soldiers plundered and burned the house. Three men and several women who had remained were mistreated. Not until 1616 did the Brethren rebuild, having first concluded a new contract with the current owner, Michael Czobor, who wanted them to resettle there. Work was begun on June 4. But by Feb. 6, 1621, the Bruderhof was attacked by Polish auxiliaries of the imperial army and pillaged anew. On the afternoon of April 28, 1623, a fire broke out in the smithy, which destroyed half the house with the goods in it, as well as some of the cattle. In the late fall the Bruderhof was involved in the conflict between Gabriel Bethlen and the emperor. When Janos Czobor plundered Lewär, others following his example fell upon Protzka on October 28, plundering, driving away the cattle, and finally burning down the whole house including the newly rebuilt part. But in spite of these bitter experiences the Brethren again rebuilt their house, completing it in a few months.

In 1625 the Brethren were struck by new misfortune. Without any justification the baron demanded of the Brethren a tribute of 200 talers, several knives, and a piece of cloth. The Brethren pointed out that their house in Protzka had been burned twice in three years, and that they had been charged an extremely high price by the baron for protection during the Turkish invasion, and were therefore unable to pay the required sum. Because of this refusal the householder and the purchaser, "two aged Brethren," were arrested. The brotherhood sent a delegation consisting of a preacher and two lay Brethren to the baron, who was not at home, but "several miles behind Kascha(u)," to ask for the release of the prisoners. After his return from the Landtag at Oedenburg, Czobor summoned the elders of Protzka and Sobotiste (q.v.) "to settle the debt once for all." Czobor owed the Brethren 313 florins, which he wished to cancel against a debt of 80 florins the Brethren owed him, and also demanded the payment of 2,000 talers in return for the protection he had given them during the Turkish disturbance, in order to pay for the fields the Turks had devastated, though Czobor had fully compensated himself for the lodging he had given the Brethren by confiscating all their hogs. When they rejected this demand he threatened to have the Bruderhof plundered by his Hussars, and could only with difficulty be deflected from this plan. After lengthy negotiations he finally agreed on a sum of 100 florins and a quantity of grain and promised to observe the terms of the contract signed with the Brethren by his father.

Scarcely was this danger past, when a band of fifty imperial cavalymen of Wallenstein's army plundered Protzka on Sept. 21, 1626, and took nearly all the cattle. On Feb. 20, 1627, the Bruderhof was attacked by wandering Croats, and more cattle taken away. When more and more imperial troops continued to threaten the Moravian-Hungarian border, the Brethren were compelled to seek safety in the castle. In 1628 their oppressor Czobor died, and his widow demanded a payment of 40 florins. The refusal of the Brethren to make this payment was countered by her taking their four best oxen.

On March 5, 1632, a band of newly recruited Croats and Hungarians fell upon the Protzka Bruderhof at night, and robbed it of much woolen and linen cloth. The new baron, Emmerich von Czobor, had his Hussars pursue the robbers and recover the booty, but the Brethren did not get half of it back. An imperial army under Puchheim's command crossed into Hungary in 1644 and plundered Protzka, even finding the caches where the Brethren had hidden some goods, and took everything away. On July 27, 1645, Protzka was plundered again; all the buildings but the tannery and the mill went up in smoke, and the tanner was murdered.

In 1662 the householder and deacon Hans Schütz died in Protzka. After an abnormally cold spring the crops failed and famine set in, "so the brotherhood came into dire poverty, for at Lewär, Protzka, and Johanni they had only empty straw to harvest." The attack by the Turks in 1663 finally brought the Bruderhof to an end. On Sept. 4, 1663, the house in Protzka was robbed; even the persons who had fled to the woods were carried away by the Turks. After making an attack in Moravia the arsonists returned, finished plundering Protzka, drove away the cattle, about 100 oxen and cows and 1,350 sheep, and burned down what was still standing. In the neighboring St. Johannes the Brethren were able to maintain themselves, but Protzka was apparently abandoned for good. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 400 f.

Providence Conservative Mennonite Church, located 1½ miles southwest of Kempsville, Va., on Providence Road, was started in 1952 as a Sunday school conducted by a small group from the Kempsville Amish (Beachy Amish) Church. In the same year the church was organized by the Executive Committee of the Conservative Mennonite Conference. The meetinghouse was built in 1953. Simon Colblentz, a minister from the Maple Grove C.A.M. Church, Hartville, Ohio, was called to take charge of the congregation of 16 members, and was ordained as bishop on October 11 of the same year. A few other families also moved in from Ohio. The membership in 1957 was 65, with Noah Miller as minister. S.J.C.

Providence Mennonite Church (MC), a small congregation located in Upper Providence Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., is a member of the Franconia Mennonite Conference. It originated about 1815 (although some claim 1740) and has been a part of the Skippack circuit, which includes the Skippack, Worcester, and Providence congregations. By 1890 the congregation had grown to 65 members; in 1936 the membership had dropped to 40, and by 1957 reached 65 again. The minister in that year was Jesse M. Mack. Providence had the oldest meetinghouse in the Franconia Conference, probably built in 1815. It was razed in 1958 and replaced by a new one. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 110-11.

Providence Mennonite Church (MC), located south of Versailles, Mo., in the hill country, was formerly called the Wilson Bend congregation. In 1930 the Wilson Bend meetinghouse had to be disposed of because of a dam built in the Osage River. In 1947 the present church was built, about five miles from the former location. Meanwhile the work was carried on in schools and abandoned churches. When the land was flooded, many members had to move away. The congregation was last listed in the Yearbook and Directory in 1956; the minister was J. R. Shank. There were only seven members in 1954. Before the move across the creek to Wilson Bend the congregation was called Carver. J.R.S.

Providence Mennonite Church (MC), Denbigh, Va., located on Route 60 near Oyster Point, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. The congregation was organized in 1900 and its church dedicated the following year. D. Z. Yoder was the first minister. It had 31 members in 1957. Wilbur H. Smoker was minister. M.G.

Fifty Years. Building on the Warwick (Denbigh, 1947) 32-35.

Provo, Utah, the location of the Utah State Hospital, had a Civilian Public Service unit, under Mennonite administration, from January 1943 to April 1946. The twenty-five men in Unit No. 79 served in various positions in this institution of 1,150 mental patients. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 227-28.

Prozess wie es soll gehalten werden . . . (1557): see Bedenken; also Handbüchlein wider den Prozess.

Pruckh, Leonhard von, a participant in the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) held at Augsburg (q.v.), Germany, on Aug. 20, 1527. He was sent with Leonhard Spörle (q.v.) as an Anabaptist missionary to Bavaria. His identity is not clear, and his fate unknown. (ML III, 402.) E.C.

Pruckmaier: see Bruckmaier.

Prugner, Nicolaus, formerly a Reformed preacher at Mühlhausen, was the coauthor with Balthasar Fridberger (Hubmaier, q.v.) of Acht unnd dreissig schlussrede so betreffende ein gantz chrislich leben war es an gelegen ist (n.p., 1524). A copy of this rare booklet is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. About Prugner no further information was available. vbZ.

Pruntrut: see Porrentruy.

Pruschanek (Pru(t)schän) is a Moravian village situated between Kostel and Göding (q.v.), which belonged to the domain of the Závis of Vitchkov in 1566, when the Hutterian Brethren settled there. It suffered great hardship during the wars of the 17th century. It was plundered and burned by Bocskay's troops on July 12, 1605; four of the inmates were murdered, thirty-five kidnaped—men as well as women. The householder Cornelius Harb was held responsible for their seizure and was expelled from the brotherhood; he was later restored to fellowship. In spite of the high price demanded by the Turks and Hungarians for their captured Hutterites, the women priced at 100 or even 200 ducats depending on their appearance and age, the elders decided to redeem them. They were apparently not successful in this undertaking, for in 1607 complaints from the sisters held in Ofen were still reaching Prushanek, and Sigel (Sigmund) Pühler was in this year tardily called to account for his negligence in providing for the safety of the sisters. Salomon Böger (q.v.), a miller, whose wife and son were among the victims taken into slavery in Turkey, made a courageous journey into Turkey to try to redeem them as well as the others.

In 1609 the Brethren began to clear away the rubble and to rebuild the Bruderhof; but after another decade, on Sept. 23, 1619, it was again burned down, this time by Dampierre's troops. Scarcely had the Brethren completed rebuilding it, when Polish auxiliaries and peasants pillaged it on Jan. 12, 1621, murdering the householder, Hans Walmann. It was not reopened. In 1624 the Jesuits of Olomouc purchased the Tschekowitz estate and built the chapel of St. Catherine in Pruschanek. P.D.E.

Robert Friedmann, "Adventures of an Anabaptist in Turkey, 1607-1610," MQR XVII (April 1953) 73-86; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 421 f.; G. Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II: Brünner Erzdiözese II (Brno, 1858) 197; ML III, 405.

Prussia was an earlier designation for the territory that later became the provinces of East and West Prussia (previously Polish Prussia), and in 1701 the Kingdom of the Hohenzollerns, which, having originated from the Electorate of Brandenburg, became after World War I a Free State, and after World War II was dissolved. In 1914 Prussia consisted of the "old provinces" (acquired before 1866) of East Prussia, West Prussia, Pomerania, Posen, Brandenburg, Saxony, Westphalia, and the Rhine Province, and of the "new provinces" (acquired in 1866) of Schleswig-Holstein, Hanover, and Hessen-Nassau. In 1850 the principalities of Hohenzollern were added. In 1854 the principality of Neuenburg and Valengin (today the Swiss canton of Neuchâtel) was given up. The rulers were Frederick I until 1713, Frederick William I until 1740, Frederick II (the Great) until 1786, Frederick William II until 1797, Frederick William III until 1840, Frederick William IV until 1861, William I until 1888, Frederick III 1888, and William II until 1918.

In Pomerania, Posen, and Silesia there were no great numbers of Mennonites. Within the other parts of the state the various groups of Mennonites long developed in regional independence of each other, also in relation to the state. Frederick William I (q.v.) took a very different attitude toward the Mennonites in East Prussia than to the Mennonites in Crefeld. Frederick II (q.v.) granted specific privileges to the settlements in the Netzebruch (q.v.) in 1765 and to the Mennonites in the East in 1780. In 1830 Frederick William III, after careful preparation, issued a law particularly designed for the Mennonites in the West. But the Order of Cabinet of 1827 concerning the oath was valid for the entire state; likewise the elimination of exemption from military service of 1867, the permission granted the old Mennonite families to do noncombatant military service, and in 1874 the law concerning the rights of the Mennonite churches to incorporate.

E.C.

The 1925 German census gives the following statistics (total population) for the Mennonites in Prussia:

District Königsberg	251
" Gumbinnen	491
" Allenstein	40
" West Prussia	3120
Total Province of East Prussia		3902
Berlin, city		599
District Potsdam	144
" Frankfurt/Oder	74
Total Province of Brandenburg		218
District Stettin	40
" Köslin	50
" Stralsund	9
Total Province of Pomerania		99
Province of Grenzmark Posen-West Prussia		24
District Breslau	128
" Liegnitz	11
Total Province of Lower Silesia		139
Province of Upper Silesia		10
District Magdeburg	105
" Merseburg	62
" Erfurt	9
Total Province of Saxony		176
Total Province of Schleswig-Holstein		227
District Hanover	75
" Hildesheim	29
" Lüneburg	49
" Stade	24
" Osnabrück	34
" Aurich	231
Total Province of Hanover		422
District Münster	131
" Minden	16
" Arnsberg	159
Total Province of Westphalia		306
District Kassel	46
" Wiesbaden	89
Total Province of Hessen-Nassau		135
District Koblenz	66
" Düsseldorf	1121
" Cologne	76
" Trier	33
" Aachen	5
Total Rhine Province		1301
Hohenzollern		21
Grand Total		7599

CITIES—MENNONITE POPULATION

Berlin	599	Frankfurt/Main	35
Königsberg	78	Wiesbaden	47
Stettin	15	Essen	43
Breslau	74	Düsseldorf	59
Magdeburg	38	Duisburg	21
Halle/Saale	14	Barmen	8
Erfurt	6	Elberfeld	19
Kiel	29	Crefeld	791
Altona	87	Mühlheim/Ruhr	8
Hanover	66	Hamborn	11
Münster	7	München-Gladbach	2
Dortmund	31	Oberhausen	32
Bochum	15	Cologne	58
Gelsenkirchen	12	Aachen	2
Kassel	20		—
		Total	2227

(See also pertinent articles in this ENCYCLOPEDIA.)

Prussian Lithuania: see Lithuania.

Prutschän: see Pruschanek.

Pruyckmair, Georg: see Bruckmaier, Georg.

Pruys Liedtboeck (Prussian Songbook) is a Mennonite hymnal in the Dutch language, which was used by the Mennonites of Prussia, Germany. Its author was J. J. (Jan Jansz?) of Danzig. It was printed at Amsterdam in 1604 and contains 205 pages with 44 hymns without notes. Most of the hymns are composed by the editor, who signs with the motto "Ledigh-gangh leert veel quaets." The Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (1837, 64) mentions a Pruys Liedtboeck by H. v. D. (i.e., Hans van Dantzich). This is the same as the above hymnal, Jan Jansz being identical with Hans van Dantzich (or Dantzich). Of a Tweede Pruys Liedtboekskén by S. H., published at Alkmaar in 1607 (mentioned in DJ 1837, 65), nothing is known. vbZ.

Pruyt, Hendrik, an Anabaptist martyr: see Hendrik Spruit.

Przechovka (German, Wintersdorf), West Prussia, was formerly the seat of an Old Flemish congregation, the mother congregation of the Brenkenhoffs-walde congregation (q.v.) in the Netzebruch (q.v.) and of Alexanderwohl (q.v.) and Gnadenfeld (q.v.), the leading congregations in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. It was situated inland from the villages of Deutsch-Konopath and Divorciezka (German, Wilhelmsmark) and along the Vistula River with the villages of Glugovka, Kossovo, and Christkovo (German, Christfelde), southwest of Schwetz with Ostrov (German, Ehrenthal) up the Vistula in the Klein-Schwetz marsh, south of the Frisian communities of Montau-Gruppe (q.v.) and Schönsee (q.v.). Przechovka and Divorciezka were royal villages, Deutsch-Konopath, Kossovo, and Christkovo noble villages, Glugovka part royal and part noble. The settlements are thought to have originated about 1540; in 1661 they were a part of the Groningen Old Flemish Sociëteit, which held most tenaciously to the old traditions. In the 18th century there were settlements of Old Flemish to the northwest in the noble village of Jeziorka (German, Kleinsee), straight north in Tuchel, and northeast across the Vistula in Schönsee, Posterwolde, and Horst.

The estate of Przechovka was originally sold to five Mennonites from the Netherlands by the heirs of a Polish nobleman; these settlers attracted other Anabaptists, so that the village community finally embraced 15 home sites. The first contract of lease was granted to the village in 1642 for 50 years. In 1653 there was an association of Dutch inhabitants for the support of the schoolteacher, the burial of members of other faiths; in 1668 a "Manist Johannes" touched his breast as affirmation instead of an oath. The privilege granted by John II Kasimir (q.v.) was confirmed a number of times; on Feb. 9, 1672, it was confirmed expressly for Przechovka, Kossovo, and Christkovo.

Early in the 18th century the elders Alle Derks (q.v.; 16?-1733) of Groningen (q.v.) and Hendrik Berents Hulshof (q.v.; 1664-1745) of Zenderen, near Borne, in the province of Overijssel (q.v.), visited their brethren here, Derks in 1723(?) and probably in 1719, Hulshoff in 1719 and 1733. In 1732 they had a collection taken in the Dutch congregations for the needy fellow members in Prussia and Poland. Both listed the families they visited. The baptized membership was as follows:

	Derks	Hulshoff
Przechovka	39	57
Deutsch-Konopath	32	52
Posterwolde	10	14
Schönsee	9	13
Horst	3	21
Jamerau	1	—
	94	157

In general, children were not counted, especially by Derks. At Deutsch-Konopath there were Lutherans living among the Mennonites. The most common Mennonite names were Ratzlaff, Unruh, Becker, Foth, Nachtigal, and Wedel. Hulshoff, whose diary of 1719 is extant, stayed at Przechovka July 5-17, and on the other side of the Vistula in Posterwolde and Schönsee July 18-29. On Sunday, July 9, Wednesday, July 19, and Tuesday, July 25, he preached on Ephesians 6:11-13, Hebrews 1, and on the fruits of the Spirit in general. On Thursday, July 13, two preachers, Abraham Unruh in Przechovka and Jakob Isaaks in Posterwolde, were chosen, and on the following Sunday confirmed. On a Sunday they observed footwashing. One or two days before the official actions Hulshoff spent "with the books." The Polish brethren had requested the Dutch to send them Biestkens Bibles (q.v.), old hymnals, martyr books, and Menno Simons' and Dirk Philips' works. The joy caused by their visit is mentioned several times. Rye was at that time the outstanding crop. In 1738 and 1765 collections were again taken among the Dutch Mennonites for those in this region.

The Dutch Naamlijst of 1742-1802 and the German Namensverzeichnis of 1759-1805 give the following names of elders and preachers: Benjamin Wedel, elder before 1719-c47; another Benjamin Wedel (grandson of the former?), preacher? elder 1747-85; Jacob Wedel, preacher 1779, elder 1785-91; Abraham Richart, preacher 1785, elder 1791-99; Benjamin Wedel, preacher 1791, elder 1799-?; and the following preachers: Jacob Isaac, d. before 1755; Hans Voet (Voht, Foth) 1719-after 1755; Abraham Unrau c1723-c60; Peter Ratzlaff, before 1743-c80; Jacob Wedel 1747-65; Laurens Sparling ?-?; Ernst Schmidt (Smit) c1760-80; Jacob Schmidt (Smit) c1765-74; Hans Ratzlaff c1765-?; Heinrich Unrau 1779-?; Andreas Pancratz 1785-?; Heinrich Ratzlaff 1791-?; Hans Unrau 1799-?

Under the leadership of Peter Wedel and Heinrich Buller most of the Mennonites left in the Schwetz area emigrated to the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in Russia in 1819-20 and 1823-24, and founded the Alexanderwohl congregation. Concerning the end of the congregation Stobbe reports: "The meetinghouse was in the present school yard. . . . In 1832, when the town of Przechowka built its own school and wanted to rebuild the Mennonite meetinghouse for that purpose, the few remaining Mennonites opposed the move and sold it to be dismantled. What happened to the meetinghouse cannot be ascertained, since the records of the town were destroyed by a fire in 1857. The last elder was a Richart and lived in Deutsch-Konopath. The congregation that at the end of the 18th century had about 300 members was extinct by about 1830. The few remaining old Flemish united with the Frisians in 1849."

E.C.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 90; H. Ch. Hulshoff, "Bezoekereis van Hendrik Berents Hulshoff aan de Doopsgezinde gemeenten der Oude Vlamingen in Pruisen en Polen in 1719," in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap 1908, 32-82; Hans Maercker, "Eine polnische Staroste und ein preussischer Landratskreis. Geschichte des Schwetzer Kreises 1466-1873," in Wegener, Geschichte des Schwetzer Kreises II, in Zeitschrift des Westpreussischen Geschichtsvereins, 17-19 (Danzig, 1886, 1887, 1888) Wilhelm Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Alpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); (August Gottlieb) M(eissner), Leben Franz Balthasar Schönberg von Brenkenhof (Leipzig, 1782); Józef Paczkowski, Opis królewsczyn w wosowodztwach Chemińskim, Pomorskim i Malborskim w roku 1664 (Societas Literaria Toruniensis, Fontes 32) (Torun, 1938) 237 and 246; Horst Penner, "Die Westpreussischen Mennoniten im Wandel der Zeiten," in Gesch.-Bl. VII (1950) 17-31; Georg Leopold, Freiherr von Reiswitz, and Friedrich Wadzeck, Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Europa und America (Berlin, 1821); Leonard Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe (Montau und Gruppe, 1918); Felicia Szper, Nederlandsche nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913); B. H. Unruh, "Die Mennoniten in der Neumark," in Gem.-Kal. 1941, 58-76; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal zwischen Fordon und Weissenberg bis zum Ausgang des 18. Jahrhunderts (Marburg, 1952); Menn. Bl., 1918, 93; 1919, 5, 10, 36, 37, 55, 80; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1702; II, 2, Nos. 738, 740; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechowka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76-82; ML III, 404-7.

Psalmen Davids, De C.L., ende eenige Schriftuurlijke Lof-sangen . . . Met de Belijdenisse des geloofs ende eenige al-gemeijne Gebeden, printed at Emden, was published by Karel de Fleger (De Vliet) at Hamburg, Germany, in 1652. This collection, all in the Dutch language, contains a complete psalter after the rhymed version of Dathenus (q.v.) with notes, 92 hymns also with notes, the Apostolic Creed, the Jan Cents (q.v.) Confession of 1632, and a number of prayers. The preface is undated and unsigned. vdZ.

F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 175, No. CXXXIV.

Psalmen Davids, De, nieuwlyx op rym-maat gestelt, a Dutch psalter containing the 150 psalms rhymed by Joachim Oudaen, Dirk R. Camphuyzen, Joost van den Vondel, Antonides van der Goes, Anso, van Hoogstraten, Galenus Abrahamsz, and others. This version was made by order of the church board of the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) congregation. The preface is dated April 10, 1684. There are copies of the editions of 1684, 1685 (with notes), 1721, and 1727; of other known editions there are no copies. This version was introduced in the Amsterdam Lamist congregation to replace the rhymed version by Dathenus (q.v.). It was used until 1793. (DB 1865, 69 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 34-36) vdZ.

Psalmen Davids, De, in't Nederduyts berijmd, a Dutch psalter, edited by the church board of the Peuzelaarsteeg Mennonite congregation at Haarlem. The first edition is of 1713; the following editions, 1734 and 1756, are with notes. This psalter contains the whole collection of 150 Old Testament psalms. In this edition a number of psalms were taken from the Amsterdam psalter of 1684, but most of them were revised (by Vondel, Pieter Cornelisz Hooft, Reinier Rooleeuw, Jacob Westerbaen, and others). This psalter was also introduced in the Mennonite congregation of De Rijp and a few other congregations. In Haarlem it was used until about 1804. (DB 1865, 70 f.; 1910, 88 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 36 f.) vdZ.

Psalmen Laus Deo, a Dutch rhymed version of the Psalms: see Laus Deo, Salus Populo.

Psalms as Hymns: I. Switzerland and Germany. The earliest known edition of a Protestant translation of the Psalms as a hymnal appeared in Paris in 1541 and contained 30 Psalms, which Calvin (q.v.) republished at Geneva in 1542. It was the work of Clement Marot (c1419-1544). In 1543 appeared a third edition increased by 20 new Psalms and with a foreword by Calvin. The rest of the psalms were translated by Theodor Beza (q.v.) in 1550-52. In 1552 appeared the first complete Psalter with a poetic foreword by Beza. Melodies for most of these Psalms were composed by Loys Bourgeois; the four-part version of the music was composed by Claude Goudimel (the martyr of the massacre of St. Bartholomew's night in 1572 at Lyon). This Psalter became the hymnbook of many Reformed churches.

This precious treasury of songs soon became the common possession of German church music. The French Psalms by Marot and Beza were translated into German by Ambrosius Lobwasser (1515-85), and published in 1573 in Leipzig as Die Psalmen Davids nach französischer Melodey in deutsche Reymen gebracht durch Dr. Ambrosius Lobwasser. It was inevitable that the verse suffered some deterioration in the process of translation. Nevertheless the work was used in Reformed circles, especially in Switzerland. In the 17th century the Bern government commissioned Johann Ulrich Sulzberger, the music director of Bern, to revise the music and republish the Psalter. This revision with Lobwasser's text, of which several editions were printed, soon became the common possession of the Swiss Reformed Church.

In the course of the 18th century the inadequacy of this translation of the Psalms became more and more apparent. Johann Jakob Spreng (1699-1768), a professor at the University of Basel, therefore undertook the task of producing a rhythmically improved edition of the Psalms. A little later, Johannes Stapfer (1719-1801), a professor of theology at the University of Bern, revised the Lobwasser Psalms on the basis of Spreng's edition. The new revision of the Psalms for Germany was made by Mathias Jorissen (1739-1833). The work of these men made a real contribution in poetic improvement. Their texts follow the Scripture closely. Musically these Psalms are also valuable. The leading voice (cantus firmus) lies in the tenor. In the 19th century when many of these Psalms were included in the newer hymnals the leading voice was changed to the soprano part.

Among the Swiss Mennonites the Lobwasser Psalms were used until the late 19th century, rarely also the Stapfer version. In order that these strictly conservative Anabaptists would not feel that this was a state church hymnal, the title page with the imprint of the Bernese government was simply torn out of their copies. With the appearance of modern hymnals, especially of those of English melodies, the old books of Psalms had to yield. In Switzerland many of these old well-bound books can still be found. In more recent times an effort has been made to revive at least a few of the beautiful old Psalms. The Lobwasser Psalms were also taken to Lancaster County, Pa., by Swiss Mennonite immigrants in the early 18th century. (See Hymnology.)

In Anabaptist circles (see Hymnology) Sigmund Salminger (q.v.) of Munich was the first to make a translation; in 1537 he issued Der gantze Psalter, das ist alle Psalmen Davids an der Zahl 150 in gesangweiss gestellt (Keller, 426). Jakob Dachser (q.v.), also an Anabaptist preacher, made a rhymed version of several Psalms and in 1538 published Den gantz psalter Davids nach ordnung und anzahl aller Psalmen. The Hutterite Chronicles relate concerning Wolf Sailer (q.v.), that he rhymed the entire Psalter, "as we have and sing it in the brotherhood" (Geschicht-Buch, 257). Unfortunately little is known about these songs. This translation is said to be in the Archiepiscopal library in Gran as Manuscript III, 190. S.G.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; L. Keller, Die Reformation u. die älteren Reformparteien (Leipzig, 1885); ML III, 407 f.

II. Netherlands. In the early 16th century and even before, some of the Psalms had been translated into Dutch; they were usually called Souterliedekens. A complete rhymed version of all the Psalms, published in 1540 at Antwerp, went through at least ten editions, and other rhymed versions of the whole psalter or parts of it were published in the same period. These Souterliedekens may have been sung by the early Anabaptist-Mennonites in the Netherlands. But until the end of the 16th century the Dutch Mennonites preferred to sing the hymns composed by the martyrs and the songs dealing with their faith and sufferings (see Hymnology). The Waterlanders (q.v.) were the first among the Dutch Mennonites to use Psalms; by 1581 the singing of Psalms was usual in the Waterlander congregations. This was largely due to the influence of Hans de Ries (q.v.). In his hymnal of 1582 he included a number of Psalms, and the 1618 edition of his hymnal contained all the Psalms. In the early 17th century it was an exception, not only among the Waterlanders, but also among the Flemish Mennonites, to sing any hymn but a Psalm. Harmen Hendriks van Warendorp (q.v.), who had given a meetinghouse to the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation (see Lamist Church) in 1632, stipulated in his will that a fine was to be paid whenever a hymn other than a Psalm was sung. The Psalms used by both the Waterlanders and the Flemish were in the Dathenus (q.v.) version. Since the artistic quality of this version was not very satisfactory, efforts were soon made to get a better version. It is not clear why the excellent rhymed version of D. R. Camphuysen (q.v.) was not used by the Mennonites. In 1684 the Amsterdam Lamist congregation introduced a new version, rhymed by Joachim Oudaen, Joost van den Vondel, Antonides van der Goes, Anslor, van Hoogstraten, Camphuysen, Galenus Abrahamsz, and others. In 1713 the Peuzelaarsteeg congregation of Haarlem introduced a new version, different from the 1684 Amsterdam version; this psalter was also used by a number of other congregations. A version, rhymed in 1759 by the rhetorical society "Laus Deo, Salus Populo," was introduced in 1762 in the Amsterdam Zonist congregation, and soon after in the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and other churches. In 1900 this version was still used by three Mennonite congregations. The new version introduced in the Dutch Reformed Church in 1773 was also used by the Mennonites; in 1900 at least 81 congregations were using it. In 1900 (reprinted in 1906) an anthology of Psalms in a somewhat revised version was published in the Leidsche Bundel (q.v.). The present Doopsgezinde Bundel (q.v.) (Mennonite hymnal) of 1944 contains 46 Psalms. (DB 1865, 69-83; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 33-37.) vdZ.

Publication, Board of, a former organization of the General Conference Mennonite Church, consisted of 6 members and was elected directly by the Conference. It was in charge of publishing the church papers—The Mennonite, Der Bote, the Junior Messenger, and Der Kinderbote; the Sunday-school quarterlies—Sonntagsschul-Lektionen, the Mennonite Adult Quarterly, Mennonite Junior Quarterly, the Mennonite Junior Quarterly Teacher's Handbook, the Mennonite Young People's Quarterly, as well as the Mennonite Hymnary, and many other special publications in the field of theology, Mennonite history, doctrine, etc. In 1950 at the General Conference held in Freeman, S.D., this board was merged with the Board of Education to form the Board of Education and Publication (q.v.).

H.J.A.

Publication Committee of the Mennonite Brethren Conference was called into being at the 1884 General Conference sessions when a committee of three was elected to (1) work toward a written history of the brotherhood; (2) arrange to have the conference reports printed; and (3) establish a periodical for the denomination. Largely through the efforts of this committee, the Zionsbote, Conference Yearbooks, Sunday-school material, and other literature as well as the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House were brought into being. From its inception until 1936, the committee consisted of three to five members. In 1936-51 it consisted of five members, and since that time seven members. Since the establishment of the conference publishing house in 1904 the major effort of the committee has been the operation of this enterprise on a sound financial basis. Since 1954 this committee has been known as the Board of Publications. O.H.

Publication Society of the United Missionary Church. The work of publication was begun when the church, since 1947 called the United Missionary Church, was known as the Evangelical Mennonite Church. The first publication was the Gospel Banner, an 8-page semimonthly, which was begun in July 1876. In the early years this periodical was published in Goshen, Ind., and was printed part in English and part in German. It still continues as the church organ, has 16 pages, and is published weekly. For twenty years, 1900-20, the publication work of the church was carried on in Kitchener, Ont. Besides the church organ, the Publication Society published the disciplines, songbooks, and some other church literature.

In 1910 the Bethel Series of Sunday School Literature using the International Uniform Series was launched for the church by an independent publishing company, the Bethel Publishing Company, headed by J. A. Huffman, an ordained minister in the church. Headquarters of this publishing house were first at New Castle, Ohio, and then Dayton, Ohio. In 1920 the publication work of the church under the Publication Society was merged with that of the Bethel Publishing Company and was located in Elkhart, Ind., in 1928. Since the change made in 1920, the recognized publishing house of the church has continued to be known as the Bethel Publishing Company, under the management of the Publication Board of the church and with an Agent employed by that board. J.A.Hu.

Publications of the Dutch Mennonites. In addition to privately published books and hymnals (see Hymnology), some editions of the confessions (q.v.), and accounts of peacemaking among the divided branches and of other meetings, such as Handelinghe (q.v.) der Doopsgezinde, ghenaeemt de Ver-eenigde Vlaemsche en Duytsche Gemeynthe, the first—semiofficial—publication was the Naamlijst (q.v.), appearing first in 1731, at first at long intervals, then annually 1759-76 and 1778-94, and finally biennially 1796-1810, the last editions being 1810, 1815, and 1829. It contained an enumeration of the Dutch Mennonite ministers; most issues of the Naamlijst also listed the congregations in Germany and elsewhere. From 1788 they also contained some items of church news (Kerknieuws).

The Naamlijst was succeeded by the Jaarboekje voor de Doopsgezinde gemeenten in de Nederlanden, commonly called "Muller's Jaarboekje" (q.v.), published in 1837, 1840, and 1850. This contained a list of the congregations, news about the congregations, and also a number of historical papers. It was succeeded by Gorter's Doopsgezinde lectuur (1854, 1856, 1858) and Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (q.v.), which was published annually from 1861 to 1919 (except 1866, 1871, and 1913-15). In 1887 the first number of the Zondagsbode (q.v.), a weekly, was published, which appeared until June 21, 1942. Since 1942 it has been the official periodical of the A.D.S. In 1945 the A.D.S. published De Noodbrug (June 1945, and monthly from August 1945 to September 1946), and from October 1946 the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad (q.v.).

From about 1911 to about 1943 most congregations or groups of neighboring congregations published their own periodicals, usually monthly. After 1947 some congregations again undertook this kind of publication.

Other regular publications are Verslag wegens de Staat der Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit since 1811, the annual report of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association since 1849, Brieven (q.v.) of the Vereniging voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk (q.v.) 1918-56, De Hoeksteen, a monthly periodical of the youth organization, since 1935, the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (q.v.) since 1901, an annual calendar 1937-57, Stemmen uit de Doopsgezinde Broederschap since 1952, and Koers, a monthly edited by the youth organization. Most of these publications did not appear during World War II, because they were forbidden by the German occupying forces or could not appear because of lack of paper. v.v.Z.

"Doopsgezindeperiodieken in Nederland," in Stemmen uit de doopsgez. broederschap I, No. 1 (January 1952).

Publishers, Mennonite: Holland—Though there have never been any special Mennonite publishing houses in the Netherlands, and books written by Mennonites have from the very beginning been published by non-Mennonites, as for example as early as 1577 by Gillis Rooman (q.v.), who probably was not a Mennonite, yet there have been a large number of Mennonite printers and publishers, who have also published Mennonite books. Among those to be mentioned, the first is Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.), who at first operated a printing shop at Emden, and from c1580 one at Amsterdam; his business was taken over by his son A. Biestkens. Reiner Wylicks at Utrecht published Mennonite books in 1593. About the same time Passchier Wesbus(ch) (q.v.) was a Mennonite publisher at Haarlem as were his son Hans Passchiers van Wesbusch and his grandsons Passchier and Isaac van Wesbusch. They published numerous Mennonite books. Other Mennonite publishers of the 17th century were J. A. Calom (q.v.) at Amsterdam, Zacharias Jansen (Hartevelt) and his son Pieter Sacharijansen at Hoorn, Jan Theunisz (q.v.) at Amsterdam, Claes Jacobs at de Rijp, Pieter Arendsz at Amsterdam, Geleyn Jansz (q.v.) and his son Jan Geleynsz at Vlissingen, and Pieter van der Meersch at Leiden. In the 18th century we find Isaac Tirion (q.v.) at Amsterdam, Denys van der Schuere, Jan Bosch, and Isaac van der Vinne at Haarlem, Folkert van der Plaats at Harlingen, and Hendrik Rintjes (q.v.) at Leeuwarden. In the 19th century there were several members of the Plantinus family at Drachten, Johannes Müller at Amsterdam, and in the 19th and 20th centuries the publishing houses of François Bohn and Tjeenk Willink (q.v.) at Haarlem, the J. H. de Bussy publishing house at Amsterdam, H. Born and L. Hansma (q.v.) at Assen, J. Overa and son at Borne, D. Rooda (firm A. H. Schut Azn) at Groningen, and A. H. Veenbaas (G. Taconis Lim) at Wolvega. The ADS (q.v.) has recently issued several pamphlets under its name, thus being in a sense the only official church publishing agency, except possibly a committee of the ADS called De Commissie tot de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, which published a series of pamphlets, 61 in number, from 1897 to 1940, under the general title Geschriftjes ten behoeve van de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing.

vdZ.

Germany, Switzerland, and France—Mennonites in these countries have never had an official conference publishing agency, and very few Mennonites here have ever gone into the printing or publishing business. No Anabaptist presses were known except the one which operated for a time in Lübeck and later in near-by Wüstenfelde which published a number of Menno Simons' writings c1550-61, and Simprecht Sorg, called Froshouer, who followed Hubmaier to Nikolsburg in 1526, where he published some of the latter's writings. In modern times the South German Mennonite Conference (1885) published a few pamphlets and the hymnbook of the conference. Heinrich Schneider, a Mennonite minister and printer in Karlsruhe, Germany, has published a number of Mennonite books since 1930 and printed others. Recently some evidence has been uncovered to suggest that Pilgram Marpeck had a printing press.

United States and Canada—The first Mennonite publishing agency in the United States was established at Mountain Valley (Singers Glen), near Harrisonburg, Va., in 1847 by Joseph Funk (q.v., MC) and continued as Joseph Funk & Sons until 1862, when Funk died. His sons, who were not Mennonites, continued the business. John H. Oberholtzer (q.v., GCM) published alone at Milford Square, Pa., 1848-56 (press from 1852), followed by the Mennonite Printing Union (Mennonitischer Druckverein) 1856-66, a semi-official private company, which was taken over by J. G. Stauffer 1867-1908(?), a Mennonite who did some Mennonite printing for about 20 years. John F. Funk (q.v., MC) started publishing in Chicago in 1864, moved to Elkhart, Ind., in 1867, and established there in 1875 the Mennonite Publishing Co. (q.v.), which continued as a vigorous and influential private company with a substantial Mennonite publications list until 1908, when most of the business was sold, although Funk operated the MPC until 1925 for the full length of its 50-year charter. David Goerz and others operated the Western Publishing Co.

(q.v., GCM) at Halstead, Kan., 1875-81. The Mennonite Book and Tract Society (q.v., MC) operated under several addresses 1889-1908.

The era of official conference publishing agencies began with the Evangelical United Mennonite Publication Society (MBC) in 1875-85 (Goshen, Ind.), followed by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Publication Society 1885-1908, and the Bethel Publishing Co. (1910, as a private concern, from 1920 as an MBC conference agency, from 1928 at Elkhart, Ind.). The next conference publisher was the Christliche Central-Buchhandlung der Allgemeinen Konferenz (q.v., GCM) at Berne, Ind., and Halstead, Kan., 1882-93, followed by the Mennonite Book Concern (1893-? q.v.), which in turn was followed by the Mennonite Publication Office (q.v.) at Newton, Kan., 1939-. A private publishing agency was established at Newton in 1900 by members of the G.C.M. Church, called Western Book and Publishing Co. (q.v.). It has continued to the present, operating since 1920 under the name Herald Publishing Co. D. W. Friesen & Sons have operated at Altona, Man., as publishers largely for the Manitoba Mennonites since 1933.

The official publishing agency of the Mennonite Church (MC) since 1908 has been the Mennonite Publishing House (q.v.) at Scottdale, Pa., owned and operated by the Mennonite Publication Board (q.v.). It was preceded 1905-8 by the Gospel Witness Co. at Scottdale. The Board bought out this latter company and the periodicals of the MPC at Elkhart. The MPH has become a relatively large agency, and has been for years the major Mennonite publishing agency in the western hemisphere, the only one with a substantial list of Mennonite books and pamphlets. The Amish Publication Society, started in 1912, represents most Old Order Amish interests in a church paper, the Herold der Wahrheit, though a purely private organization. Several individuals of the O.O.A. group, such as L. A. Miller at Arthur, Ill., and J. A. Raber at Baltic, Ohio, have for many years served as publishers for sections of the group.

The official Mennonite Brethren Publishing House was established as a conference agency in 1915 at Hillsboro, Kan., displacing several previous private M.B. publishers. A Canadian M.B. minister established the Rundschau Publishing House in 1923 at Winnipeg, Man., to serve the Canadian M.B. churches. This agency became the Christian Press, Ltd. in 1940, owned in part by the Canadian M.B. Conference and in part by private persons. The K.M.B. Publishing House was established at Chicago in 1915 as a conference agency of the K.M.B. Church. The Central Conference Publication Board served the Central Illinois Conference 1910-58.

A number of private publishing agencies have been established, most of which have had only a limited publishing scope, and some of which continued only a short time. Chief of these is the Echo Verlag founded at Winnipeg in 1944, which has published a notable historical series on the former Mennonite settlements in Russia. Others to be noted are the Warte Verlag (A. B. Dyck) at Steinbach, Man., the Prairie Press (Jacob Regehr) at North Kildonan, Man., the Salem Publishing House

(J. H. Klassen) at Inman, Kan., Peniel Publishing House (J. W. Tschetter) at Chicago, Ill., Bethel College Press at North Newton, Kan., which became the Mennonite Press (q.v.), jointly owned by the college and the General Conference. Sometimes the term Press means only a printing shop; sometimes it is equal to "publisher." H.S.B.

Pudespitz (Putschowitz, Butschowitz; Czech, Bucovic), a market village east of Austerlitz, Moravia, in which the Hutterites set up a Bruderhof in 1537. Ulrich Stadler (q.v.) of Brixen, Austria, who had led the Brethren (q.v.) from Austerlitz to Poland during the persecution in Austerlitz, had returned to Moravia and united with the Hutterites, bringing with him about 100 persons, and served as Vorsteher in Butschowitz. He is known for the letters he wrote advocating an extension of the authority of the preachers. He died here in 1540. Five years later an additional five hundred Gabrielites (q.v.) united with the Hutterian Brethren here. The persecution of 1547 apparently brought this Bruderhof to an end. (See Bucovic, which the present article supplements.) P.D.E.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Gregor Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II: Brünner Erzdiözese IV (Brno, 1861) 2; ML III, 408.

Pueblo (Col.) Mennonite Brethren Church existed for a number of years as a small city congregation under the leadership of John H. Boese. It was last listed in the M.B. Yearbook in 1914. H.S.B.

Pueblo (Col.) Mennonite Church (MC) had its inception in 1941 when Mennonites working in the city began to hold regular fellowship and Bible class meetings. The use of a building and lot was secured in July 1942. The congregation was organized in 1947, with 19 charter members. Marcus Bishop served as pastor until 1956. He was followed by Cletus S. Miller. The membership in 1956 was 30. The meetinghouse serves as the church home for the Mennonite student nurses who affiliate with Pueblo hospitals. For 18 months (1952-54) 36 conscientious objectors performed their I-W service here. M.M.C.

Puerto Casado, Paraguay, situated on the west bank of the Paraguay River, 190 miles north of Asuncion, was founded in 1889 by the Carlos Casado Company of Buenos Aires, Argentina, with 50 Paraguayan families. Serving largely as the center of the large tannery and cattle ranch owned by the Casado Company, it gained significance as a Chaco river port with the coming of the Mennonites, and was, until the establishment of the air service, almost exclusively the port used by the three Chaco Mennonite colonies for all travel, exports, and imports. Narrow-gauge railroads run into the interior to facilitate the shipment of logs to the tannery. One of these railroads is used up to Kilometer 145 (Station Fred Engen) by the Mennonite colonists. It operates one train weekly and has special small cars (autovia) for passenger hire. Many of the 130 Mennonites who died in the typhoid epidemic in 1927-28 are buried in the town cemetery. Puerto Casado today has approximately 6,000 inhabitants, most of whom are in the employ of the Carlos Casado Company factories. It has one Catholic church. The town is approximately 240 feet above sea level. During the Chaco War of 1932-35 the port became invaluable to the Paraguayan army as a railroad and supply center. C.J.D.

Walter Quiring, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Karlsruhe, 1938); Philip Raine, Paraguay (New Brunswick, 1956).

Puerto Rico, an island about 100 miles long and 35 miles wide, is the smallest of the four Greater Antilles (Cuba, Jamaica, and Hispaniola). San Juan, the capital of Puerto Rico, is 1600 miles southeast of New York City, and 1000 miles southeast of Miami. The island's 3,435 square miles of land surface support a population of 2,276,000 (1957) or a density of 663 persons per square mile, with a 10 person per square mile increase each year. The island was discovered by Columbus in 1493, and remained a Spanish colony for 400 years. It was ceded to the United States in 1898 following the Spanish American War, and in 1952 became an American commonwealth with almost complete self-government. Puerto Rico has a subtropical climate; its chief agricultural products are sugar cane, tobacco, and coffee. Puerto Rican culture is more Spanish than American, though Spanish customs have been modified considerably by American influence. During a ten-year period Puerto Rico intensified its industrial economy. More than 400 American industries have entered Puerto Rico, changing the economy from an agricultural to an industrial one. The average family income increased from $660 in 1940 to $2,400 in 1956.

Mennonite interest began in 1943, when the Mennonite Central Committee responded to an invitation of the Brethren Service Committee to establish a CPS medical and social service program in the La Plata Valley. The Brethren CPS unit was begun at Castaner in August 1942, after the door was closed to CPS men in foreign countries. The MCC service program included medical, recreational and educational, and agricultural service. In January 1950 the MCC service program was transferred to the Mennonite Relief Committee, an agency of the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities, which had begun evangelistic work at Pulguillas in December 1945. In 1947 a Mennonite (MC) church was also organized at La Plata.

The present Mennonite program in Puerto Rico includes a service and evangelistic program administered by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The service and evangelistic programs were merged into one administration on April 1, 1958. MRSC continues to supply personnel to assist with the service aspects of the church program in Puerto Rico. Included in the program are a 32-bed modern hospital in Aibonito and a number of medical clinics in rural communities, a community agricultural program and a community center program in La Plata. There are eleven congregations and outstations and an elementary and junior high school. There is also a language school and the Spanish radio (see Radio Broadcasting) program. The total church membership was 339 in 1957 with an active Sunday school and summer Bible school. The Bethany Mennonite School (Escuela Menonita Betania), with grades one to nine, at Pulguillas had an enrollment of 165 in 1957. Approximately 65 American Mennonite workers are engaged in the service and evangelistic program in Puerto Rico. A number of other Mennonite workers are also serving in Puerto Rico with the Ulrich Foundation, a Mennonite service agency with headquarters in Roanoke, Ill. J.G.H.

Justus G. Holsinger, Serving Rural Puerto Rico (Scottsdale, 1952); The Power of the Gospel in a Changing World, Mission Board Report, 1954; ML III, 408-10.

Puerto Rico Mennonite Church (MC), the result of mission work by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, is the outgrowth of the work of the Civilian Public Service unit at La Plata near the center of the island, which was sponsored by the MCC during World War II. The first Mennonite meetinghouse on the island was built at La Plata by the MCC and was dedicated on March 18, 1945. The congregation was organized in 1947. A second center was opened and a congregation organized at Pulguillas, 12 miles from La Plata, in 1947. In 1948 the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities purchased from the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration the entire La Plata Unit, consisting of the hospital, community center, store, dwelling houses, and other buildings, and operated the work jointly with the MCC, for the benefit of the community, until 1953. In 1957 the hospital at La Plata was discontinued and is now operated as a clinic. In the same year a new 32-bed hospital of fire- and hurricane-proof construction was opened at Aibonito, where a new nurses' home is in process of erection. In addition to the hospital there are now (1958) four medical clinics and one dental clinic, staffed by three doctors and one dentist. There are now on the field a language school, a Bible school, an elementary and junior high school, and a broadcasting station, Luz y Verdad, which reaches 21 stations scattered throughout the Latin countries of the world. There are 8 organized congregations, 3 mission stations with a membership of 339 in charge of 7 ordained and 3 licensed ministers. In 1955 the churches of Puerto Rico were organized into a conference which was admitted to membership of the Mennonite General Conference in that same year. In addition there is also maintained under private management a farm project, store, and related interests for the benefit of the people of the community. S.C.Y.

Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration (PRRA) was established under the (U.S.) Congressional Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. During a five-year period, PRRA purchased more than 40,000 acres of coffee, tobacco, and sugar absentee-owned land and redistributed it as small farms among poor rural people. PRRA constructed more than 12,000 new homes, thirty-eight modern concrete second-unit schools, and sixty-four rural medical dispensaries. Extensive agricultural, recreational, and social service programs were organized in the larger resettlement projects. In 1942, when money was no longer available to finance the extensive social service and medical programs, PRRA made available government community center property at three different locations to the Brethren Service Committee, the Mennonite Central Committee (La Plata, q.v.), and the Friends Service Committee, for CPS medical and social service programs. PRRA also became the government-sponsoring agency of the CPS program in Puerto Rico and worked in close co-operation with the Brumbaugh Reconstruction Unit, the central agency of the three church service organizations. J.G.H.

Justus Holsinger, Serving Rural Puerto Rico (Scottsdale, 1952) 5-18.

Pulaski Mennonite Church (GCM), located 3 miles southwest of Pulaski, Davis Co., Iowa, a member of the Middle District Conference, was organized in 1861. Christ Kropf and Christ Sharp from Indiana were the first preachers for the group, which was made up of Mennonite settlers from Canada, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. Meetings were held in homes and schools until the first church was erected in 1866. The second was dedicated in 1885, with extensive remodeling in 1914. Among those who have served were two pastors, Philip Roulet from Ohio and W. W. Miller from Indiana, whose two terms totaled more than 60 years. The pastor in 1958 was Kenneth Shelly, from Pennsylvania, with a membership of 154, mostly rural. V.E.S.

Pulaski Street Mennonite Church (MC), 223 S. Pulaski, Baltimore, Md., established in 1952, is a mission congregation under the Lancaster Conference. It had 26 members in 1957, with Lloy A. Kniss as pastor. M.G.

Pulgram (Pulgern), a village about 10 miles east of Nikolsburg in Moravia, situated on the Thaya River, belonged to the Nikolsburg domain of Liechtenstein (q.v.). In the period of persecution of 1535 Hans Tuchmacher or Amon (q.v.) gathered the Anabaptist brotherhood "between Nikolsburg and Pulgram in the Föhrenwald," and secretly administered the "glorious and beautiful memorial of the Lord's Supper with great peace."

When persecution subsided, a group of Philipites (q.v.) settled in Pulgram; in the fall of 1538 they joined the Hutterite brotherhood, whereby the latter came into the possession of a stately Bruderhof which included "the bake house, also the great house in which the school was located, the smithy, and the new house below the smithy." Other buildings were soon erected.

But in the next year danger threatened under the pressure of royal decrees. Amon wrote that the Brethren were about to be expelled from Pulgram, "and the sick and the children put out without pity." In 1545, on a shallow pretext but with the consent of the authorities, a quantity of cattle, leather, and wine were taken from them; in 1547 the great persecution brought with it greater damages.

In 1551 the preacher Peter Hag died here, who was one of the Brethren taken to the galleys from the Falkenstein castle, but managed to return home and memorialized his fate in a song.

In this year also, with the silent consent of the government, the settlement was robbed of much goods by a butcher Kunther and his associates, and the Brethren driven into the forest for a time. Later they prospered and were even able to lease a dairy farm from the Nikolsburg lords. In 1591 Siegmund von Dietrichstein (q.v.) expelled them and also the Swiss Brethren from Bergen and Voitelbrunn. Some of them settled in Wastitz (q.v.), and others in Sobotiste (q.v.). In 1619 Dampierre's troops quartered in Pulgram and severely damaged the Bruderhof at Neumühl (q.v.). P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus, 190; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Gregor Wolny, Kirchliche Topographie von Mähren II: Brünnner Erzdiözese II (Brno, 1858) 93; ML III, 410 f.

Pulrus: see Polrus.

Pulversheim, a village (pop. 1,040) in the Upper Alsace lowland, Guebwiller area, located at the intersection of the Guebwiller-Mulhouse and Sennheim (Cernay)-Ensisheim highways, the seat of a Mennonite congregation. It is situated between the congregations of Colmar (81 members in 1951) and Neufbrisach (108 in 1951) in the north, and Pfattatt (263 in 1951) in the south, and further, Altkirch (95 in 1951) and Birkenhof (77 in 1951). Of the 23 families in the congregation, four have the name Tschantz and three Peterschmitt; one has Amstutz, one Widmer, names which are found particularly in Birkenhof and Pfattatt.

In the Reformation time there was a substantial Anabaptist movement in this region. According to Sebastian Franck, 600 (probably exaggerated) Anabaptists were executed in Ensisheim, which is only about 6 miles from Pulversheim. In spite of the severest measures it is probable that Anabaptism was never completely uprooted in this region, but the modern Mennonite community here had its origin in the immigration of Swiss Mennonites who were welcomed by the princes in this area after the close of the Thirty Years' War in 1698, to help repopulate and restore the partially devastated lands. The first documentary evidence of a Mennonite congregation in this area is from the end of the 18th century, when a "Mühlhausen" congregation is mentioned. This congregation became the largest in Alsace but suffered from a constant stream of emigration. At first families in search of land moved to Austria and Germany, and about the turn of the century particularly to Galicia and Bavaria (Augsburg to Regensburg). After the Napoleonic Wars the tide turned toward America (Waterloo County, Ont., 1824, Lewis County, N.Y., 1833, Central Illinois 1829 ff., etc.), a major purpose being to escape military service.

Before 1856 the congregation met in homes in rotation. In that year a former inn in Pulversheim was purchased and a room in it renovated as a meeting room, a Mennonite family occupying the rest of the building. The purchase was made in the names of two members, Joseph Eicher of Pulversheim and Jacob Zimmermann of Mühlhausen, and the congregation now received the name Pulversheim. In 1888 it had 150 baptized members. At the turn of the century a number of families moved in from Switzerland. By 1911 it had 185 baptized members and 78 children. By an unfortunate division in 1912 a portion of the membership withdrew to establish a congregation in Pfattatt (q.v.), a few miles distant at the edge of Mulhouse. In 1951 the membership was 101 with 11 children, in 1958 72 including children.

The church, destroyed in 1914, rebuilt in 1923, was again severely damaged in 1939-45. On the map Reichskarte 642 it is called "Wiedertäuferkirche." During World War I services were held in St. Georgenhof. Later the congregation was united for a time with Pfattatt, and then for a time it was served by the Alsatian Conference. Later Emil Kempf, of Colmar, was the pastor. Albert Peterschmitt, of Ungersheim near Ensisheim, has succeeded Jean Peterschmitt, of Strohschadt-Biesheim, as elder. Worship services are held on the second and fourth Sundays of the month; on the second Sunday a Bible study is conducted in connection with the worship service. A Bible course is held in the winter, and the harvest festival of thanks in October. Communion is observed four times a year. (See articles Alsace, Altkirch, Birkenhof, Colmar, Pfattatt.) E.C.

Gem.-Kal., 1903 ff.; Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire 1901-1905 (Montbéliard, 1951); Christ Seul, Christmas issue, 1951; "Die Mennonitengemeinde Pulversheim im Elsass," Gem.-Kal. 1958, 61-63; ML II, 411.

Punishment of the Anabaptists. A general discussion of this theme will be found in the article Juridical Procedures. The article Mandates gives further information and contains a fairly exhaustive list of decrees against the Anabaptists including prescription of punishments. The articles on Luther and Melanchthon discuss the changing attitudes of these leading Reformers toward punishment of the Anabaptists. The articles on the individual rulers of the various states which took legal action against the Anabaptists give detailed information on the legal measures taken. See also the article Persecution in the Supplement, and the article "Bestrafung der Täufer" in ML I, pp. 201-9. The following article treats the punishment of Anabaptists in one area, the Low Countries. H.S.B.

Punishment of the Anabaptists in the Low Countries. Concerning the Netherlands and Belgium, which in the 16th century constituted the "Netherlands" of the empire of Charles V, the following is to be said.

The question of the punishment of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites in the Netherlands and Belgium is an extremely complicated problem, not only because the laws of the various provinces were very dissimilar, but also because at the time of the rise of Anabaptism in the Netherlands (1530) Charles had not yet gained possession of all the provinces. The present Belgium and the southern provinces of the present Netherlands, Holland and Zealand, were hereditary lands belonging to Charles. Here persecution was most severe. In 1524 Charles conquered Friesland, in 1528 Utrecht and Overijssel (and Drenthe); in 1536 Groningen passed into his possession and finally Gelderland in 1543. In these newly conquered territories persecution was usually not severe; although the number of Anabaptists in Groningen and Friesland was very large from the beginning, the number of victims of persecution is not nearly so great here as e.g., in Holland and Flanders. In the province of Friesland there was not a single martyr.

Charles V, who like his son Philip II, was firmly determined to eradicate heresy in his lands, had a number of proclamations (placcaten) issued, some of them intended for the entire empire, and some only for the Netherlands, in which a "falling away" from the Roman Catholic Church was made punishable by death, as was also the possession or printing of heretical books. The proclamation of June 1535 was issued specifically against the Anabaptists.

In order to combat Anabaptism Charles created a new form of the inquisition for the Netherlands. Whereas previously the bishops were responsible to keep heresy out of their territory, Charles appointed imperial inquisitors who were authorized to appoint regional inquisitors. By this act Charles made the conflict with heresy a matter of state, although the fact that the inquisitors appointed by the emperor were all members of the clergy, who also usually (but not always) received the pope's approval, gave the matter an ecclesiastical stamp. The first imperial inquisitor was Frans van der Hulst, 1522-24. The Anabaptist martyrs had to deal with the following inquisitors: Barend Gruwel of Grouwel, appointed in 1546; Pieter Titelman, who worked in Flanders; Lindanus, appointed in 1563. In addition to the inquisitors appointed by the emperor there were also inquisitors serving by papal appointment, while the bishops and their assistants also remained active. Thereby and also because the inquisitors did not receive exactly determined commissions and were not assigned to well-defined territory, the question of the inquisition became extremely involved. Some insight is given by an instruction for the inquisitors defined by the emperor and issued on Feb. 28, 1546.

Actually there were two crimes for which the heretics were persecuted, viz., real heresy, and disobedience to the imperial mandates. There was also some mention of disrespect for divine and human or temporal majesty (lese majeste). This double aspect carried with it some ambiguity and haziness, in the trial as well as in the sentence. The sentence usually stated that the heretic was condemned to death because he "disregarded the doctrine [or: the sacraments] of the Holy Church, and contrary to the faith and ordinances of the same church, the written laws and proclamations of the Imperial Majesty, our gracious lord."

The course of the trials was usually as follows: whenever the inquisitors, the clergy, or anyone else noticed a heretic, he had the heretic arrested; the prisons, usually foul, dark, unwholesome dungeons in the towers of castles, were used only to confine the heretics. (Imprisonment as punishment for a crime dates back only to the 17th century.) After a longer or shorter time the prisoner was cross-examined by the court. These were secular courts, to which usually clergymen were added, and on which also the inquisitors sometimes sat.

The Anabaptists were tried either by the city courts or by the provincial courts.

The cities had their own courts, known as the schepenbank; in addition there was in most provinces a Hof, i.e., a supreme provincial court (thus Anabaptists were tried, e.g., by the Hof of Holland or the Hof of Friesland). There was in principle no difference between the trial before a city court or a provincial court. Frequently the city governments did not wish to transfer the heretics to the provincial court for trial. They based this refusal on the ancient privilege that no citizen was to be sentenced outside the limits of the city (ius de non evocando). A second point of controversy between the city and the Hof, true particularly in the province of Holland, was the question of the confiscation of the property of the defendant. Usually the possessions of Anabaptist martyrs were declared forfeit to the use of the emperor, while sometimes the accuser received some of this property as a reward. (The proclamation of 1535 stipulated that anyone who reported an Anabaptist should receive one third of his goods.)

However, while the Hof, which represented the affairs of the emperor, demanded the entire inheritance, the city authorities, on the basis of the privilege noted above, simply claimed a part of the possessions of the condemned man. These privileges were abolished in 1549. There were other points of controversy between the city governments and the Hof; whereas the emperor strove for centralization in authority as well as in courts, and to this end wanted to give the Hof greater authority, the cities opposed this policy. Finally the city of Amsterdam, especially in the beginning, refused to send Anabaptists to the Hof in The Hague, because it wanted to protect them.

We have in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror sufficient accounts of trials to be able to conclude that these took a fixed course. The inquisitors apparently made use of a prepared list of questions. One fixed point in the cross-examinations of martyrs (concerning the questions of the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church) is the question where the defendant was baptized, by whom, and who was present. If these questions were inadequately answered, which was usually the case, the "sharp examination" took place, i.e., the victim was racked by the executioner in the torture chamber (pijnkel-der) in the presence of the judges. Very often the Anabaptist martyrs, in spite of the most brutal torture, refused to betray their fellow believers. Then the "sharp examination" was sometime later repeated. If the unfortunate one then named some names, then his confessions were read to him later, with the assertion that the suspect had made these confessions "without torture or force."

Whether the trial had come to this desired result or whether the martyr remained silent, an effort was made to convert him. This end was served not only by the cross-examinations, but more especially by visits made to the prisoner in his dungeon by priests and monks, who even after the death sentence had been pronounced accompanied the condemned man to the site of execution.

Finally the sentence was pronounced; in the early period, until 1536, burning at the stake was not as frequently pronounced as was beheading for men and drowning for women. Later the penalties became more severe. On Oct. 4, 1540, Charles V announced as an eternal edict that those who would recant (peniteeren) and return to the Catholic Church would, in the case of men, be executed by beheading, and in the case of women, by burying alive ("executed with the sword and the women with the pit"). If, however, the victim persisted in his error, both men and women were to die at the stake ("be executed with fire"). This then became the general practice, although there were many exceptions; in Amsterdam the names are known of many persons who repented and were not put to death but exiled. In a few instances an Anabaptist was also put to death in the Netherlands without the process of the law. But this was contrary to law and order; the government wanted a regular hearing, especially since by this method it was possible to obtain names and other facts concerning the leaders of the Anabaptist movement. This practice was very deliberately followed in order to be able to arrest the leaders, so that the rest, like sheep without a shepherd, would be conveniently scattered. But in this respect the authorities were mistaken. Although most of the elders and preachers were executed, the movement continued. The prophetic words of one of the martyrs, "But know, where they kill one, a hundred shall arise," were fulfilled.

The first Anabaptist martyr in the Netherlands was Sicke Freerks Snyder, executed for his faith at Leeuwarden on March 20, 1531, and the last martyr who fell in the northern Netherlands was Reyte Aysesz, also executed at Leeuwarden, on April 19, 1574. In the southern Netherlands, now Belgium, Anneken van den Hove (Uyttenhove), executed on July 19, 1597, at Brussels, closed the long list of martyrs.

vdZ.

Offer; Mart. Mir.; I. M. J. Hoog, De martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland tot 1566 (Schiedam, 1885).

Puppius Robertus was a Reformed minister at Mid-delie and after 1617 at Edam, who attacked the Mennonites, especially the Waterlander preacher Anthony Jacobsz (q.v.), in three books: Bewijs van den Kinder-doop, dat de selve uyt Gode is, ende niet uyt den Menschen; teghen de Mennisten (Amsterdam, 1614); Bewijs van den Weder-doop, dat de selve uyt den Menschen is, ende niet uyt Gode; teghen den Mennisten (Amsterdam, 1614), and Bescherminghe des Kinder-dooops, teghen Anthoni Jacobsz (Amsterdam, 1617 and 1629). Puppius was opposed by Cornelis Jacobsz in his Proces op en tegen het Protest gedaen van R. Puppius aengaende den Kinder-doop (Amsterdam, 1618).

vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 278-83; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 52.

Pur, Bartlime, also called Bartlime Pfister (i.e., baker), belonged to the Zürich group around Grebel und Manz. The letter of Sept. 5, 1524, sent by this group to Thomas Müntzer was also signed by Pur.

About him there is no further trace in Anabaptist history. His wife was a member of the first Zürich congregation, baptized by Hans Oggenfuss (q.v.). (TA Zurich, 19, 65, 385.)

vdZ.

Pürcher, Andreas (Andries Pirchner), an Anabaptist martyr, a tile-maker, born in Stertzing, Tirol, Austria (now Italy), resident in Scharlach in the Engadin, was captured on May 26 (June 5), 1584, at Latsch on the Adige, a village in the Vintschgau not far from Schländers; he was taken to Goldrain and brutally tortured. He was commanded to report where and with whom he had lodged. This he refused to do, since he would not be a Judas to those who had been kind to him. As concerned his faith, he would remain by the vows he had taken at his baptism, and not become a liar to God, even if he should have to suffer death in consequence. Neither the arguments of the priests nor the request of sympathizers influenced him. Thus he willingly suffered martyrdom on Oct. 19, 1584, at Schantzen near Schländers. He is the author of the song of 36 stanzas which begins, "Singen wollen wir unserem Gott, der die Frommen in ihrer Not."

NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 289 f.; Mart. Mir. D 752, E 1058; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 416 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 536; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scott-dale, 1914); Wolkan, Lieder, 235; ML III, 413.

Pürchinger, Matthäus, a knifsmith, one of the six Anabaptist martyrs executed at Steyr, Austria (q.v.), on March 30, 1528. (See Penzenauer; ML III, 413.)

E.C.

Pürchner (Pichner), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Saalen, a village near Bruneck, Austria (now Italy), was captured in 1555 at Kortsch in the Adige (q.v.) on a missionary tour with Gelg Federspiel and taken to Schländers. Federspiel escaped. Pürchner was brutally tortured to make him betray where and with whom he had lodged; but he betrayed none of them. After the trial he was unable to stand or to raise his hands to his mouth to eat. For six months longer he was held in a dark dungeon with chains on his hands and feet. Many learned men, priests, monks, noblemen, and others "beset him hard for two days and an entire night," to bring about his conversion; but he remained "steadfast in the Lord." Since he was unable to kneel he was leaned in a sitting position against a pillar and thus beheaded. One of the priests who debated with him was Leonhard Dax (q.v.), who later became an Anabaptist.

Two songs were written to commemorate his death: "Fröhlich wollen wir singen jetzund in Gottes Nam," by Sigmund Hosauer (q.v.), and "Mit Freuden wollen wir singen, wie wir's beschlossen han," by Claus Felbinger (q.v.). Zieglschmid suggests that both of these hymns may be revisions of a hymn written by Pürchner.

NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 240; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 262; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 346 f.; Ethelbert Stauffer, "Martyrertheologie und Täuferbewegung," Ztscht für Kirchengeschichte, 1933, 591; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 436-46; Wolkan, Lieder, 209 f., 229; Mart. Mir. D 162, E 550; ML III, 413.

Purmerend, a town (pop. 6,737, with 164 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of North Holland. In 1534 it was noted that the Anabaptists were numerous here; many of them belonged more or less to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism; 30 Anabaptists of Purmerend who had joined the trek to Münster in March 1534 were seized en route. On Sept. 22, 1540, Lambrecht Jacobs Grootboot of Purmerend, a follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), was executed. But soon there were also peaceful Anabaptists and Mennonites. At the end of the 16th century there were three Mennonite congregations in Purmerend, a Waterlander, a Frisian, and a Flemish. Of their history not much is known. Delegates of the Purmerend Waterlander congregation attended a general Waterlander conference at Amsterdam in 1581. In 1695 the Waterlander and Frisian congregations merged and in the next year built a new church on the Pottenmarkt. A Flemish congregation had merged with the Frisians before 1695. In 1727, 1733, and 1734 it contributed liberally for the needs of the oppressed Prussian Mennonites. The Purmerend congregation, which in the 18th century belonged to the Waterlander Conference as well as the Zonist Conference, was at that time in a state of serious decline. During 1731-94 it had no preacher, in 1795 only 33 members. In the 19th century it began to increase: 67 in 1836, and 246 in 1899. Then it declined again, having 220 members in 1926, and 164 in 1958. The present meetinghouse with organ was built in 1864. In 1944 the congregation joined the Beemster (q.v.) congregation for preaching service and religious instruction. Since 1794 the following ministers have served here: Klaas Honig Jzn 1794-1832, P. Cool, the first minister serving here who had been educated at the Amsterdam Seminary, 1833-36, L. G. Bavink 1836-73, L. F. Goteling Vinnis 1873-90, J. Westerman Holstijn 1891-1908, D. Pottinga 1908-12, F. ten Cate 1912-16, M. J. Kusters Gzn 1917-23, F. J. de Holl 1926-29, W. Banga 1930-44, Miss Aafke Leistra 1944-56, and A. Zwartendijke 1957-. There is a ladies' circle, a youth group, a church choir, and a Sunday school for children. vbZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 37, 56, 60, 80, 98, 232, 474, 745, 1180; II, Nos. 2187-93; II, 2, Nos. 304-31; DJ 1837, 16; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 24, 28, 252, 354; II, 68, 201 f., 204, 232; DB 1864, 176; 1865, 167; 1872, 57; 1877, 79; 1910, 71; 1917, 111; Naamlijst 1796, 58 f.; ML III, 413.

Pürschitz, an estate near Selowitz (q.v.) in Moravia, which Burian Zabka of Limberg in 1563 sold to Albrecht von Boskowitz and Cernáhora. The latter maintained friendly relations with the Anabaptists, had them build for him an ornamental carriage and lay the water pipes in his house in Brno in 1569, and also had them help in building his Wostitz (Wastitz) castle. Their Vorsteher he addressed in a letter as "Brother Bastl, good friend." In 1571 he turned the estate over to his brother John Schembera von Boskowitz, who sold it together with Wostitz and Ursnitz to Franz, Count of Thurn. The fate of the Brethren in the Wostitz Bruderhof under him and under his son John Jacob, who married the Countess Magdalene Serenyi, is recorded at length in the chronicle. P.DE.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Franciticec Hruby, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," in Arch. für Ref.-Gesch. XXX-XXXII; Gregor Wolny, Die Markgrafschaft Mähren II 2 (Brno, 1837); ML III, 413.

Puslawitz: see Postlawitz.

Puslinch, a "preaching appointment" (MC) in Wellington County, Ont. The Mennonite Conference of Ontario shared in holding services in the Union Church (Puslinch) at the crossroads of the Cober settlement, east of Hespeler, about 1878. This work failed, but was revived about 1892. The Brethren in Christ (Tunkers) and the Mennonites, both having families in this community, alternated services in this church. The adjoining cemetery carries considerable history. Neighboring churches supplied ministerial help. By 1899 meetings were discontinued. Most of the Mennonite families moved to organized congregations in Waterloo County. No Mennonite congregation was ever organized at Puslinch. J.C.F.

Pustertal (Puster Valley), one of the most important routes of traffic in Tirol (formerly Austria, now Italy), falls into two halves. One half, traversed from east to west by the Rienza River, has a number of villages extending from the Toblach plateau to the Mühlbach cove, which are frequently named in Anabaptist history, such as Welsberg, St. Lorenzen, Bruneck, Ehrenburg, Vintl, and Mühlbach. The other half, traversed by the Drave River from Toblach via Lienz (q.v.), has Innichen, Sillian, Abfaltern, etc., though these enter the Anabaptist scene later than those in the half lying nearer the center of the movement.

The Anabaptist movement entered the Pustertal in a southeasterly direction from Stertzing (q.v.) and in a northeasterly direction from Brixen (q.v.). The first traces of the movement are found in the region of Welsberg, Bruneck, Toblach, and Michelsburg in April and May 1529. From the Michelsburg parish thirteen Anabaptists were taken to the court in Brixen in April of this year, four of whom were executed on June 4, one of them being Gregor Weber (q.v.), a preacher and the friend of Jakob Hutter (q.v.).

Though the Pustertal has fewer blood witnesses than the Adige (q.v.) Valley and the Inntal (q.v.), Michelsburg shows the considerable figure of twenty-four, Sillian two, Taufers (q.v.) one, Rodeneck four, and Schöneck four. But this list is incomplete, as the court records show. As early as 1529 Anabaptists were brought to trial from Lienz and St. Lorenzen, among them Agnes, Jakob Hutter's sister; Hutter had not yet come to public attention. Benedict, a former people's priest of Bruneck, was also seized. In the Schöneck jurisdiction Anabaptists were arrested, taken to Brixen, and sentenced.

St. Lorenzen (q.v.), near Bruneck (q.v.), was Hutter's home town; he, however, apparently first became acquainted with the Anabaptists in Klagenfurt. As their apostle he now made his first appearance in the Pustertal. He was the leader of the small group at Welsberg. Persecution began here in May 1529. Soon the Tirolese Anabaptists—a large group from the Pustertal—were emigrating to Moravia (q.v.). In Schöneck and Rodeneck the prisons were filled with Anabaptists in 1532. Also in Lienz the presence of Anabaptist leaders was suspected in 1533; in Sillian some were arrested and reported to Vintl.

The trial of Anton von Wolkenstein (q.v.) and his family falls into this period and this region. He belonged to one of the first families of the Tirolean nobility and was closely associated with the Anabaptists, and for a long time resisted the attempts of the Catholic clergy to convert him.

In the period just preceding and during Hutter's imprisonment the Anabaptist movement was extremely active throughout the Pustertal; later, though it still continued, it was no longer so successful. However, Anabaptists were arrested in Lüssen, Michelsburg, and Schöneck.

The attitude of the populace toward the Anabaptists is shown by a letter written by the church councillors of Brixen to the authorities in Innsbruck on June 17, 1527, which states that in this persecution the people could not be trusted. And it was still possible for members of the nobility to join the Anabaptists, as did Agnes von Waltenhofen, the widow of the clerk of Michelsburg, and her daughter. Since it was feared that others might follow their example, orders were issued in 1539 not only to apprehend her, but also to recruit men to "exterminate Anabaptist persons in the realm of Michelsburg, Schöneck, and Lüssen."

The vigorous steps taken by the authorities set a limit to the spread of the movement in the Pustertal as elsewhere. In the next few years fewer Anabaptists were brought to trial. The villages of Ehrenberg, Schöneck, Michelsburg, Uttenheim, and Heunfels still had Anabaptists, and as late as 1548 the Innsbruck authorities demanded of the governor (Stadthalter) and the councillors of Brixen that they restore order in the Pustertal. Some Anabaptists were found in the villages in 1551 and 1554 and 1561. In 1569 it was reported that Anabaptism was becoming increasingly troublesome in the Pustertal. In 1580 the priest of Taufers reported to Brixen that several leaders of the Anabaptist sect were stirring up the people, and two years later large crowds were reported to be on their way to Moravia, a movement which lasted into the 1590's. In 1590 Georg Wenger was seized in St. Lorenzen and put to death on Aug. 5, 1591, after a lengthy trial. On June 19, 1591, Jakob Platzer (q.v.) was arrested in Sillian and beheaded on August 7 of the same year. Not until the situation of the Hutterites in Moravia deteriorated did the migrations thither diminish; they ceased altogether when disaster struck the Moravian brotherhood in 1622. In the Pustertal there were still some Anabaptists in the early years of the 17th century—in Mühlbach, in the Rodeneck parish, in Bennfels, Sillian, Vintl, and Lüssen. After this the records contain no further evidence of the presence of Anabaptists in the Pustertal. (Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML III, 413 f.)

LOSERTH.

Putnam County, Ohio, lies in the "Black Swamp" area of northwestern Ohio and was formed from Old Indian Territory in 1820. The land is level and wet but very fertile when drained. Between 1834 and 1850 a large Swiss Mennonite settlement sprang up in southeastern Putnam and northeastern Allen counties (q.v.). The struggling Blanchard Mennonite Church (q.v.) (MC) was founded in the west-central part of the county in 1836. J.S.U.

Putschowitz: see Pudespitz.

Quadendorf, a village 3 miles southeast of Danzig, in which Mennonites appeared for the first time in 1571. In 1845 the Neunhuben Mennonite congregation built a church here as a subsidiary of the Fürstenwerder congregation, which remained in use until 1945. (ML III, 415.) H.P.

Quakers: see Society of Friends.

Quakertown, Pa., a town (pop. 6,000) located in the southeastern part of the state in Bucks County. There are about 1500 Mennonites living within the shopping area, belonging to three branches: M.C., G.C.M., and M.B.C. The earliest known settlement of Mennonites in this area dates back to 1717, when Pastor Valentine (Felty) Clemmer arrived here from the Palatinate in Germany. Quakertown derives its name from early Quaker settlers. It was incorporated as a borough in 1855.

There are ten Mennonite churches in town and vicinity. The M.C. group has established a school near the town. Mennonites of the area also have an interest in such near-by institutions as the Eastern Mennonite Home at Souderton, the Mennonite Home for the Aged at Frederick, the Grandview Hospital at Sellersville as well as the Quakertown Community Hospital. A.S.R.

Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer (before 1940, Wiedertäufer), a series of possibly fifteen volumes of Anabaptist archival sources, published by the German Society for Reformation History (Verein für Reformationsgeschichte; hereafter indicated as VRG) in its series Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte beginning in 1930. The series was planned and its preparation directed by the Kommission zur Erforschung des Täuferturns (Commission for Anabaptist Research) appointed by the VRG in 1920. To date the following volumes have appeared: I. Herzogtum Württemberg (1930) 1199 pp., edited by Gustav Bossert Sr., completed by his son, Gustav Bossert Jr.; II. Markgraftum Brandenburg (Bayern, I. Abteilung) (1934) 375 pp., Karl Schornbaum, editor; III. Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter I (1938) 270 pp., Lydia Müller, editor; IV. Baden und Pfalz (1951) 574 pp., Manfred Krebs, editor; V. Bayern, II. Abteilung (1951) 314 pp., Karl Schornbaum, editor; VI. Strasbourg I (1958) 500 pp., edited by Karl Adam, J. Rott, and Manfred Krebs. Volumes in preparation include: Strasbourg II (Adam, Rott), Alsace (Adam, Rott), Glaubenszeugnisse II (Müller, Robert Friedmann), Epistel der Hutterischen Brüder (Friedmann), Württemberg II, Niederrhein (G. Goeters). A volume on Silesia was assigned to Theodor Wotschke (Breslau) before the war, but nothing has been delivered. Unassigned as yet are three more volumes on Bavaria including such important places as Augsburg and Nürnberg. The section on Switzerland, originally assigned to Leonhard von Muralt, was withdrawn from the German series, and is now being published as a Swiss series of 4-6 volumes, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz, of which I. Zürich (1952) 428 pp., edited by L. von Muralt and Walter Schmid, has appeared. Additional volumes planned include Berner Gespräch of 1538, Canton Bern, Basel, and Ostschweiz. The volume on Hesse, Wiedertäuferakten 1527-1626, 574 pp., edited by Walther Köhler, Walter Sohm, Theodor Sippell, and Günther Franz (1951), appeared in Volume IV of Urkundliche Quellen zur hessischen Reformationsgeschichte, which was Volume XI of Veröffentlichungen der Historischen Kommission für Hessen und Waldeck. For a report on other Anabaptist source publications see Historiography.

The VRG, a German learned society founded in 1883, undertook in the period following World War I the publication of all the documents in the German language area of Europe bearing on the history of the Anabaptist movement from its beginning in 1525 down to the Thirty Years' War (1618). This great undertaking was made possible by the grant of a generous subsidy from the Prussian state. Attempts to secure financial support in America failed. Unfortunately the inflation of the German currency in 1922-23 reduced the amount of the subsidy so much that the project was handicapped from the beginning. In spite of this, the editors for the various projected volumes were chosen and the majority of assignments completed before World War II, although only three volumes were actually published. Only one of these, Vol. I, Herzogtum Württemberg, prepared by Gustav Bossert, a stately volume published in 1930, appeared in full size according to plan with documents in extenso and full indices, although even this volume was not exhaustive. Volumes II and III, published in 1934 and 1938, appeared largely in extract form, and with meager indexing. Four additional Täuferakten volumes had been largely completed in manuscript before World War II, but not published since even the reduced subsidy from the Prussian state was finally canceled, and the resources of the VRG were too slender to continue without outside help, which was not forthcoming in adequate amount although the Mennonite Historical Society (Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, q.v.; founded by Christian Hege; hereafter designated as MGv) made a small annual cash grant of 200 Marks for this purpose from 1937 to 1942. The publisher of the first three volumes, M. Hensius—Paul Eger Nachfolger in Leipzig, who was the publisher for all the publications of the VRG, being now in the Russian Zone and operating only on a restricted basis, surrendered his publication rights in 1947.

When it became fully clear after the close of World War II that the VRG would be unable to continue and complete the original Täuferakten undertaking, the MGv, encouraged by the prospect of American Mennonite financial aid and stimulated by the initiative and urgings of Eberhard Teufel of Stuttgart, decided at its annual meeting in May 1948 to undertake the project with the consent and co-operation of the VRG. The procedure set up by the MGv for the revived Täuferakten project was the creation of a Täuferakten-Kommission (TAK) to be composed of three representatives of the MGv and two of the VRG. The two societies function as joint publishers of the remainder of the series beginning with Volume IV. The VRG will make available all its completed manuscripts, and the MGv will endeavor to furnish the necessary finances through its American Mennonite connections. This is being done by direct subsidy contributions by the Historical Commissions of the two largest Mennonite bodies in North America, the Mennonite Church (MC) and the General Conference Mennonite Church, and by subsidy purchases of 200 copies per edition by the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottsdale, Pa. All net profits from sales are pledged to further publications in the series.

The TAK was formally organized at a meeting in Heidelberg on July 5, 1948, as follows: chairman Ernst Crous (MGv), vice-chairman Heinrich Bornkamm (VRG), secretary Eberhard Teufel (MGv), treasurer H. S. Bender (MGv). Later Cornelius Krahn and Manfred Krebs were added. Upon the death of Eberhard Teufel in 1957, Heinold Fast was elected secretary.

The publication of the Anabaptist documents of the 16th century as envisaged in the above plans is an enterprise of the greatest importance not only to Anabaptist historiography but to church history as a whole. After centuries of neglect and even abuse, the Anabaptist movement is coming into its own in the modern understanding of the history of the Christian Church particularly in the Reformation period. The comprehensive and exhaustive account of the movement which is so urgently needed and which is essential for a final evaluation of Anabaptism awaits the publication of these documents and other source materials. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Täufer-Akten Publication Series of the Society for Reformation History," MQR XXIII (1949) 48-52; Walter Eisenbeis, "Anabaptist Sources and Research," Menn. Life XII (1957) 69 ff.; Roland H. Bainton, "Anabaptist Source Materials," Menn. Life VIII (1953) 69 ff.; ML III, 417 f.

Quelles, Les (sometimes written Yquel) Mennonite Church was a continuation of the Salm congregation (q.v.), which was renamed after the death of Elder Nicolas Augsbürger (1890) to correspond with the new meeting place in the hamlet of Les Quelles, a short distance south of the hamlet of Salm. The congregation grew weaker, but revived somewhat with the visits of ministers of the Colmar congregation, especially Henri Volkmar, the first Reiseprediger (q.v.), of the Alsatian Conference. In 1924, one of the families living in near-by Bénauville offered its home as the meeting place, hence the congregation was renamed Bénauville (q.v.). Actually Salm-Les Quelles-Bénauville was a continuing congregation, and Blanc-Rupt was a schismatic daughter of Salm. H.S.B.

Quese, a former Mennonite family of merchants in Friedrichstadt (q.v.), Germany. Gerrit Jansz Quese was preacher of the Friedrichstadt church 1698-1745, and his brother (?) Jacob Jansz Quese 1730-1740. q.v.

Questinckx (Questincksz), Tobias, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr: see Tobias Quintincksz.

Quincy (Mo.) Amish Mennonite Church: see Hickory County.

Quins, a Mennonite family of Hamburg-Altona, Germany. Its ancestor was Hans Quins (b. 1557 in Flanders, d. of the plague 1597 at Hamburg), whose wife's name was Rinske, and who was a cutler and a sword-maker. About 1580 he moved from Flanders, probably from Diest or its surroundings, to Hamburg. His daughter Jannecke (Hannchen, d. 1663 at Altona) was married to Paul Roosen (b. 1582 at Oldesloe, d. 1649 at Altona). q.v.

B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 12, 22.

Quirijn Jansz (better called Jan Quirijnsz as in the Martyrs' Mirror and the Mennonitisches Lexikon), an Anabaptist martyr, a boatman, born at Utrecht but a citizen of Amsterdam, was baptized by the Mennonites about 1562. He rejected the attempts of the Catholic priests and the city council to convert him and was therefore sentenced to death. After two questionings on the rack (March 4 and 5) he was burned at the stake at Amsterdam on March 12, 1569. The Martyrs' Mirror contains a letter written by him. (Mart. Mir. D 490, E 832; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 181; ML III, 418.) E.C., q.v.

Quirijn (Quirinus) Pietersz, b. at Kruiningen, Dutch province of Zeeland, an Anabaptist martyr who lived at Groningen and died at the stake at Amsterdam, April 16, 1545, because he was (re)baptized. It was Menno Simons who had baptized him in 1539 in Groningen. He steadfastly confessed his faith. q.v.

NEFF, q.v.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 323 f.; Mart. Mir. D 73, E 474; DB 1864, 141; 1906, 14 f.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 67, 247; ML III, 372.

Quirin Vermeulen: see Meulen, Quirijn van der.

Quiring (Quiering), a Mennonite family name, occurring first as a Christian name in Quirin van der Meulen (d. 1600), the second elder of the Danzig congregation, who latinized his Frisian name Kryn. The final g is the Frisian patronymic; Quiring means "son of Quirin." The name was most frequently found in the Ladekopp, Orloffsfelde, and Tragheimerweide congregations. Many preachers and deacons in the West Prussian congregations since 1650 had this name. Johann Quiring (q.v.) was a minister in Russia.

From Russia the name Quiring spread to North and South America. Today it is found in Canada, the United States, and South America. Outstanding representatives were Johann Quiring (q.v.; 1851-1912), elder of the Trakt Mennonite Church, Samara, Russia; his son Jacob Quiring, evangelist and Old Testament scholar, who taught at Bluffton College and Witmarsum Theological Seminary; Walter Quiring, educator and journalist, since May 1955 editor of Der Bote, Rosthern, Sask.; Horst Quiring, minister, Mennonite historian, formerly pastor in Berlin, and now manager of the Evangelische Missionsverlag of Stuttgart, Germany. (See also Meulen, Quirijn van der.) H.Q.

Quiring, Johann (1851-1912), a Mennonite teacher and elder in Russia, was born at Fessendorf near Marienburg, West Prussia, Germany, on Sept. 12, 1851. In 1855 his parents settled at Köppental (Trakt settlement), Samara, Russia. He obtained his teacher's certificate in 1870, upon completion of the course at the Marienkirchenschule, Saratov. He taught at Köppental 1870-89, and after the school was reorganized into a secondary school (Ministerialschule) he was instructor in Bible there 1898-1911. He served on the school board 1884-1911.

On Oct. 25, 1881, Johann Quiring was elected minister and in 1884 elder to succeed David Hamm (q.v.). Quiring was a very gifted and successful teacher and preacher and became known far beyond his own settlement. He was active in the work of the Bundeskonferenz (General Conference of Russian Mennonites), of which he attended many sessions and served as chairman for three years. He also administered baptism and the Lord's Supper in the neighboring provinces of Ufa and Orenburg and made a trip to St. Petersburg in behalf of all the Mennonites. Jacob Quiring (q.v.), evangelist, educator, and scholar, who went to America, was his son. Johann Quiring died at Köppental on April 9, 1912. C.K.

D. H. Epp, "Unser Schmerzensblatt, 1912," Menn. Jahrbuch 1911-12 (Berdyansk) 137-39; J. J. Dyck, Am Trakt (North Kildonan, 1948) 48 ff.

Quitt, the title of a novel written in 1891 by Theodor Fontane (1819-98), one of the leading German novelists of the later 19th century; the novel is of importance to the Mennonites in that the second half of it has its setting in a Mennonite (GCM) home and community in Oklahoma.

Lehnert Menz, a young West Prussian, shoots a game warden and leaves him for dead. Later he hears the warden call, but is morally unable to go to the rescue. When the authorities are about to apprehend him he flees to America and finally comes to the farm of Obadja Hornbostel, a Mennonite elder. Lehnert confesses his crime to Hornbostel and becomes a member of his congregation. Lehnert meets his death from a fall while out looking for the son of the family, who has supposedly come to some harm. While awaiting death he has the conviction that he has atoned for his crime and is now "quits."

Fontane's charming and sympathetic portrait of Hornbostel is carefully drawn, based probably, as Zieglschmid has shown, on reports given by his friend Paul Lindau, who visited the American Mennonite settlements in 1883. The story, however, has some rather un-Mennonite pietistic and Calvinistic characteristics which invalidate certain aspects of Fontane's interpretation of the Mennonite faith. (See the excellent discussions by Ernst Correll, "Theodor Fontane," ML I, 661, and Paul Schowalter, "Literatur," ML II, 665.) E.H.B.

Elizabeth H. Bender, "The Mennonites in German Literature," especially the chapter "Theodor Fontane's Novel Quitt, 1891" (M.A. thesis, Minnesota, 1944); Ernst Correll, "Theodor Fontane's Quitt," MQR XVI (1942) 221 f. (reprint from ML I, 661); Otto Schowalter, "Die Mennoniten in der allgemeinen deutschen Literatur: Bibliographie," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1938); A. J. F. Zieglschmid, "Truth and Fiction and Mennonites in the Second Part of Theodor Fontane's Novel Quitt: the Indian Territory," MQR XVI (1942) 223-46.

Quynende Kercke der Waterlandse Doops-gesinde tot Wormer-veer (Amsterdam, 1677) is an 18-page anonymous pamphlet which deals with a conflict in the Mennonite Waterlander congregation of Wormerveer (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, during 1669-76. This booklet is clear evidence of the growing conservatism among the Dutch Waterlander group about the second half of the 17th century. The authors of the booklet were probably Pieter Adriaensz (Hardloop) and Sijmen Pietersz Schilp. vdZ.

Raabe, Friedrich, was elected minister of the Karasan Mennonite Church (q.v.), Crimea, Russia, in 1874 and elder in 1883. In 1884 he became the elder of the Busau Mennonite Church (q.v.), and served until 1890, when he was relieved of his responsibilities as elder. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 709; H. H. Friedrichsen, "Die Geschichte der Busauer Menn.-Gemeinde," Unser Blatt II, No. 8 (May 1927) 236-38.

Rab, a Mennonite family found from the 17th century on the Dutch island of Texel (q.v.), many of whose members have served as deacons. Some Rabs were skippers of Greenland whalers, the last of whom was Willem Rab in the early 19th century. vdZ.

Rabbit Lake is a village about 100 miles northwest of Saskatoon, Sask., with the Hoffnungsfeld General Conference Mennonite Church of 100 members (1957) a few miles outside the town. In 1926 the first settlers, who came to Canada from Russia in 1923 ff., settled here. In 1927, after clearing the land, the first crop was totally frozen. But the newcomers did not give up. Soon two more stations to the east, Mullingar (q.v.) with an M.B. church which has been razed and Mayfair with the Hebron G.C.M. church of 26 members (1957), were settled, and two stations to the west, Bornemouth with a G.C.M. church which has been razed and Glenbush with an M.B. church of 144 members (1957). The churches in Mullingar and Bornemouth were razed when the boom of the Rabbit Lake country collapsed in the 1930's. At present there are in the area roughly 250 each of the M.B. and the G.C.M. groups.

J.G.R.

Rabe (Rabus), Ludwig (1514-92), was born at Memmingen, Germany, went to Strasbourg (q.v.) about 1540 to assist Matthäus Zell (q.v.), a reformer and Lutheran pastor, and became his successor in 1548. In 1556 he was appointed church superintendent at Ulm. As a church leader he opposed the doctrines of the Anabaptists and the Schwenckfelders (q.v.).

Rabe is to be specially mentioned for his martyr book. In 1552 he published at Strasbourg Tomus I de S. Dei confessoribus, veterisque ecclesiae martyribus. A German edition of this first volume appeared at Strasbourg in 1554, entitled Historien der Heyligen Auszerwöllten Gottes Zeugen, Bekennern und Märtyrern. The first volume was followed by seven more. There are a number of reprints, of which the best known is the folio edition in two volumes (Strasbourg, 1571-72) titled Historien der Märtyrer. All the editions are illustrated by woodcuts and deal with 209 persons. Rabe's book is somewhat different in character from other martyr books such as the Offer des Heeren and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. Rabe listed not only persons who had suffered and died for their faith, but also men like Luther who had been defenders of the faith. (The discussion on Luther occupies 488 pages of volume IV.)

Rabe's martyr book includes three Dutch Anabaptist martyrs, Wendelmoet (Weynken) Claes (q.v.) and the two noble ladies of Beckum (q.v.) (all in volume III, 1557). The account on Wendelmoet follows an old pamphlet under the title Ein wunderliche Geschycht . . . von . . . Wendelmoet Clausen dochter. For the article on Maria and Ursula van Beckum Rabe used other sources than those used by the Offer des Heeren. He adapted two songs, both found in the Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais (Vol. II, 553-59). The first song begins, "Allhie will ich übersummen, was ich in kurtz hab vernummen, von zweyen Juckfrauen sagen," and the second, "Nun lasst uns fröhlich heben an und Gott zu Lobe singen, von zweyen Juckfrauen wolgethon." It is possible that the account on Wendelmoet Claesdochter in the Offer des Heeren, which does not occur here until the fourth edition (1570), was borrowed from Rabe's book. vdZ.

Offer, 422 f., note 1, 509, note 1; Bibliographie II, 533-82; F. Pijper, Martelaarsboeken (The Hague, 1924) 120-33.

Rabensburg, a castle and village in Lower Austria near the confluence of the Thaya into the March. In May 1605 three Hutterian Brethren were murdered here. Rabensburg was the home of Gabriel Krettle who wrote about Pilgram Marpeck's Verantwortung. (See Codex III, 19 at Olomouc.) Krettle is thought to have united with the Hutterian Brethren (according to H. Maier in 1592). E.C.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 341; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 485; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 632; ML III, 424.

Rabenska (Rabentzkj; Czech, Rovenszko), a village between Sobotiste and Senitz in the province of Nitra (Neutra), Czechoslovakia, the site of a Hutterite Bruderhof in Hungary which was settled in 1547, and burned down by Bethlen Gabor's (q.v.) troops on Nov. 21, 1623.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 420, 443; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 241, 572, 595; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 319, 759, 791, 817; ML III, 419.

Raber (Räber, Reber), a Mennonite family name, found in Switzerland. In 1567 Peter Räber, of Buchholterberg near Diesbach, canton of Bern, was arrested; after severe torture he recanted and promised to swear an oath of allegiance. About 1670 the Räbers lived in the Emmental (q.v.). In 1711, when a number of Bernese Anabaptists were compelled to leave the country and to settle in the Netherlands, Samuel Räber then was arrested and finally released to be conducted to the ship. He seems to have left the ship at Mannheim (q.v.) with others of this group and joined the Mennonites who had settled here some years earlier.

In 1837 Jacob Raber with his wife and six children emigrated to America from Germany. The 1955 history of this Amish family lists 1571 descendants, many of whom live near Baltic, Ohio; others are widely scattered in Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa. In this group of descendants over 280 bear the name Raber and 99 are or have been ministers, mostly in the Old Order Amish Church. In 1957 three Rebers and eleven Rabers were in the Mennonite (MC) and Amish ministry. J. A. Raber of Baltic, Ohio, has been publishing (Der) Neue Amerikanische Calendar (q.v.).

Christian Raber, very likely an older brother of the above Jacob, also emigrated to America in 1837 and with his family settled north of Cincinnati, Ohio, where he served as an Amish preacher. Later he moved to Lee County, Iowa, where he continued his ministry. Some of Christian's descendants moved to Hickory County (q.v.), Mo., from where they have scattered to many Mennonite communities. Among Christian's descendants was Daniel B. Raber, a widely known Mennonite minister, who worked among the mountain people of Southern Missouri. Daniel's son Frank was for twenty years the pastor of the Detroit (Mich.) Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.).

John Reber, born in Alsace in 1820, came to America as a young man to escape military service. He was ordained to the Amish ministry in Elkhart County, Ind., but in perhaps 1853 moved to Johnson County, Iowa. His descendants are found principally in Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, and Illinois, among whom have been the following ordained Mennonite ministers: David Reber, Joseph Reber, George Reber, and Don D. Reber. voZ., M.G.

Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 194 f.; Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 48, 61 f.; Daniel J. Raber, Raber Family History 1837-1937 (n.p., n.d.); David M. Raber, Mrs. Roman E. Yoder, and Joe D. Yoder, Descendants of Jacob Raber 1794-1955 (Nappanee, 1955).

Raber, J. A., an Old Order Amish book dealer, born Sept. 8, 1885, who has maintained a bookstore at his farm, 2 miles south of Charm, Holmes Co., Ohio, since 1915. He has supplied Amish readers with numerous German publications and published the following reprints: Die vollständigen Werke Menno Simon's (1926), Nagler's Handwörterbuch der heiligen Schrift (1934), the Märtyrer-Spiegel (1950), and numerous smaller works. An annual publication by Raber since 1930 has been Der Neue Amerikanische Kalender, which contains a register of Amish ministers. J.A.H.

Räbl, Wilhelm, was a leader of the Hutterites at Austerlitz (q.v.), who in 1531 disagreed with Jacob Widemann (q.v.). Räbl was supported by Jörg Zaunring (q.v.). (Wolkan, Lieder, 25.) voZ.

Rabus, Ludovicus: see Rabe, Ludwig.

Race Relations. By the mid-20th century the rights of subject peoples, especially those of color, had become a burning social and political issue throughout the world. With other Christians, Mennonites found it necessary to speak out on this question, especially on the Christian attitude toward persons of a color other than one's own.

It could be pointed out that Mennonites have never owned slaves, that slavery was forbidden in the Plockhoy (q.v.) colony of 1663, and that in 1688 the Germantown Mennonites had a share in the first public protest against slavery on record in America.

In 1955 the Committee on Economic and Social Relations (q.v.) and the Mennonite Community Association (q.v.), both of the Mennonite Church (MC), sponsored a conference on Christian race relations; a significant pronouncement, "The Way of Christian Love in Race Relations," was drafted here and was later that year adopted by the Mennonite General Conference (MC) as its official position. The statement proclaims the unity of man in the order of creation and in the order of grace, and the unity of the one fellowship in Christ. It holds that the Scriptural teaching and New Testament practice are opposed to distinctions based on race or color and that racial discrimination is a recent phenomenon and a sin, in that it does wrong to the victim, scars the soul of the offender, contributes to social tension and hatred, is a major cause for war, invalidates the central meaning of redemption, discredits the Christian church and the Gospel before the world, and weakens its missionary program. The statement includes a confession of the failure of the church to witness against this sin as it ought and a commitment to a renewed emphasis on the way of Christian love in race relations.

Obviously the members of the younger Mennonite churches in Africa and Asia are persons of color. In the United States, however, both the Mennonite Church (MC) and the General Conference Mennonite Church had a Negro membership with at least one Negro minister in each group in 1958. These groups as well as others were conducting church extension work, voluntary service units, and other forms of evangelistic and social service work among Negroes, Latin American, Indian, and other non-Caucasian groups. (See Negro Missions.)

In 1956, 1957, and again in 1958 the Peace Section of the MCC sent a group of visitors to the South to study race conditions there and to encourage Christians who were engaged in a witness against racial discrimination. In 1957 a group of students from Goshen College gave a week of service to Koinonia Farms in Georgia. While prejudice and discrimination were not completely overcome in all Mennonite groups, there was positive teaching against these evils. All Mennonite schools and colleges, even in the South, were open to persons of color without discrimination, although this was not true of all homes for the aged. Attempts were being made to maintain Mennonite congregations and institutions on an integrated basis, and there was a limited amount of intermarriage among American Mennonites of Caucasian background with Latin Americans, Puerto Ricans, Filipinos, and Negroes. G.F.H.

Christian Race Relations: Proceedings of the Conference on Christian Community Relations (Scottsdale, 1955); C. N. Kraus, Integration: Who's Prejudiced (Scottsdale, 1958).

Rack (Räck), Jörg (Georg) (Georg Mair), a Hutterite martyr, a deacon from Pfons, a village under the jurisdiction of Steinach, Tirol, Austria, was seized with Hans Mändl (q.v.) and Eustachius Kotter (q.v.) on Nov. 15, 1560, in the neighborhood of Rosenheim. On Jan. 26 and 27, 1561, he was cross-examined both without and with the use of the rack. He remained steadfast. The confession of faith made by the three martyrs has been preserved in the library of the University of Vienna. On June 10 they were sentenced to death and were executed at Innsbruck on the same day. Kotter was beheaded first, then Räck, who died happily with the words, "Here I forsake wife and child, house and property, life and body for the sake of divine truth." He is the author of two songs: "Ich ruf zu dir, o Vater mein" (nine stanzas), and "Mein Gott, ich tu dich bitten von ganzem Herzen mein" (ten stanzas). Loserth's statement (ME III, 454) that Rack wrote three songs is apparently inaccurate. Jörg Rack, Hans Mändl, and Eustachius Kotter are the subjects of a hymn by Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.). NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 210, 222-25; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 398, 403-6; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 302, 308-10; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914) 634-36; Wolkan, Lieder, 280, 282; Mart. Mir. D 276, E 645, where he is called Juriaan Rack; ML III, 424.

Rackschitz (Rakschitz), a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren near Kromau (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.), was founded in 1545 by the purchase of a house. At this time the village belonged to the baron of Lipa-Kromau. Johann von Lipa, who came from a line noted for its tolerance, accepted the Brethren on his estate. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 164; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 195, 240; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 250, 316; ML III, 424.

Racovian Catechism: see Rakow and Socinianism.

Rade vorm Walde, a town (1944 pop. 13,861) in the Düsseldorf area of the Rhine Province of Prussia, Germany. A "Catalog of the Anabaptists in Rade vorm Walde in 1638" lists fourteen Mennonite families, mostly embroiderers, who were expelled from the town. They had come from the area of Jülich (q.v.) and Berg (q.v.). After the expulsion Andreas Linnich went to Friedrichstadt (q.v.); the von Voss and Wienberg families settled on the Lower Rhine (q.v.). One of the refugees, destined to become the most important, was the embroidery worker "Entgen, widow ahn der Leyen," the mother of Adolf van der Leyen (q.v.); he moved from Rade vorm Walde to Crefeld (q.v.) in 1656. From a tailor, Isaak Becker, who was presumably a Mennonite, and who was living in Rade vorm Walde in the middle of the 18th century, Jung-Stilling (q.v.) found religious encouragement and inspiration. E.C.

Wilhelm Niepoth, "Der 'Catalogus der Widdertauffer zu Rade vorm Walde Anno 1638,'" Zeitschrift des Bergischen Geschichtsvereins LXXIII (1952) 74-84; idem "Zur Frühgeschichte der Familie van der Leyden," Die Heimath (Krefeld) XXI (1950) 156-58; ML III, 424.

Radecke (Radecius), Matthäus (1540-1612), was born at Danzig, educated at Königsberg, served as city clerk of Danzig 1566-92. He was christened a Catholic, and later became successively Lutheran, Reformed, Mennonite (baptism by aspersion), and Socinian (q.v.; baptism by immersion). In 1592 he was deposed from his office because of his Socinian beliefs and left the city with his wife and eight children. After a brief stay at Schmiegel, near Posen, he went to Buskow in 1593 and then to Rakow (q.v.; Poland) in 1608. Here he died on March 29, 1612. (He is erroneously called Martin Radecke in ME I, 76.) E.C.

F. S. Bock, Historia Antitrinitariorum I, Part 2 (Leipzig, 1716) 700-9; Matthäus Radecke, Ursachen, warumb sich Matthäus Radecke, welcher der Stadt Dantzick, 26 Jahre lang, für einen Secretarium gedienet, von dar gemacht, undt sich mit den seinen ahn andere Ort begeben hab (Rakow, 1593); RGV V, Col. 660; ML III, 424.

Radegundis (Saint Radegundis), a hamlet southwest of Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, where in the spring of 1528 the Anabaptists assembled in the open (see Augsburg). E.C.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte 1517-1530 (Munich, 1901) 246; ML III, 425.

Rademacher (Radermecher), Reinken, an Anabaptist martyr, who baptized Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.), is probably identical with Remken Remakers (q.v.), who was put to death at Sittard in 1550. (DB 1890, 58; 1909, 120, 124; Mart. Mir. D 98, E 497; ML III, 424.) NEFF.

Radical Reformation, a collective term for all those groups of religious innovators of the 16th century on the European continent who were neither Lutherans, nor Zwinglians, nor Calvinists. Occasionally all these groups are broadly conceived as the "Fourth Reformation." No doubt the Protestant revolt against Rome opened the floodgates for all forms of separatism which continued what is often called "medieval sectarianism." In German official church history it has become customary to call all those who opposed the Lutheran Reformation Schwärmer (Enthusiasts, q.v.) or Ketzer (hence Ketzerhistorie, q.v.), a derogatory term which did grave injustice to all dissidents. In the 20th century the conceptions have changed somewhat under the impact of the new science of sociology of religion. Now these groups are often simply distinguished as "sects" in contrast to "church" (Kirche), i.e., state church. Ernst Troeltsch was a leader in this reclassification. In America the church historians, having no use for these typically continental concepts (since in America all churches are "denominations"), had to find another type of classification. In 1941, Roland H. Bainton of Yale proposed the generic term "Left Wing of the Reformation," using the political connotation of "left" and "right" for a characterization of the different groups. "Left" then meant opposition to the state-church idea (the established church), and championship of the free or nonconformist church idea. (But Bainton also thought in part of a "left" wing in theology, namely, anti-Trinitarianism.) Bainton also at times used the term "Anabaptists" for all these groups, since most (though by no means all) advocated adult baptism. By this broadening of the term Anabaptism a Menno Simons and a Michael Servetus, for instance, were lumped together in a strange fellowship. In spite of its vagueness, the term "Left Wing of the Reformation" was rather widely accepted, chiefly for lack of a better term, and to a certain extent proved its usefulness in American church historical studies. Franklin Littell and recently Leonard Verduin showed also an inclination to use the term "Restitutionism" for the greater part of these groups. Littell pointed out (50) that the idea of restitution (q.v.) binds together Anabaptists and Spiritualists, Schwenckfelders and Polish Brethren, etc., even though it must be admitted that not all Spiritualists had the vision of the restoration of the primitive church.

That a common term for all these "dissident" groups is hard to find must be granted, even though the need for it is obvious. Certain men who were for a time Anabaptists adopted anti-Trinitarian views (Adam Pastor, apparently also Ludwig Haetzer), while certain anti-Trinitarians accepted adult baptism though otherwise far from any of the well-known evangelical Anabaptists. Müntzer was just as disinterested in the question of baptism as was Sebastian Franck or Bänderlin. Particularly difficult is the delineation of "Spiritualism" (Rufus Jones's "Spiritual Reformers") because of the extreme individualism of its defenders. In the Netherlands a section of evangelical Anabaptism was always "spiritualistically minded," while the Swiss Brethren opposed this trend radically. "Unitarians": H. Richard Niebuhr has suggested a strange and unusual subclassification of "Unitarianism of the Father"—Socinians; "Unitarianism of the Son"—Schwenckfeld, Swedenborg; "Unitarianism of the Holy Spirit"—Spiritualists.

In view of the motley nature of the "Fourth Reformation," the proposal by George H. Williams of Harvard Divinity School (1957) of a new and rather adequate descriptive term together with a more refined subclassification of the historical phenomena is welcome as a real aid in the understanding of the spiritual life of the 16th century. Williams distinguishes between "magisterial Reformation" (also called territorial Protestantism), where the princes were the real heads of the church with magisterial prerogatives and an excessive ecclesiasticism (establishment), and its opponents, called "Radical Reformation." Common to all the radical reformers is their opposition to "the suffocating growth of ecclesiastical tradition," to the above-named prerogatives, and above all to the compromises and adjustments of the new territorial churches to the "world" in its broadest sense. No one of these radical reformers had any place for state powers within the church. All of them wanted to cut back to the Biblical roots of faith and order.

Among these radical reformers Williams then distinguishes three clearly separated groups: (a) the Anabaptists, (b) the Spiritualists, and (c) the Evangelical Rationalists. (See the similar classification by Johannes Kühn, q.v.) The first two groups were mainly Germanic (German, Dutch, Swiss), while the Evangelical Rationalists belonged pre-eminently to the Romance cultural area—Italy, Spain, and to a lesser degree France (Juan de Valdés, Servetus, Ochino, Castellio, Biandrata, Socinus, etc.).

While the Protestant reformers advocated the medieval idea of a corpus Christianum, a Christian society composed of saints and sinners, this concept was absolutely unacceptable to the radical reformers. They visualized a selected society of true believers, that is a Corpus Christi, as their final ideal. As to how such a Corpus Christi should look, ideas naturally differed. Some would look back to the apostolic model, the primitive church and the church under the Cross (1st—3rd centuries); they would then represent the "restitutionists" proper (by and large the Anabaptist group). Others of the radical reformation took their lead from the Book of Revelation and looked into the future for the kingdom or new world to come. Some would simply wait for this event, others would fight (like Müntzer). Williams claims that this look into the future is nearer to the spiritualistic type than to the Anabaptist one, although this is not always true.

Williams sees three distinct groups in each of his three main sections, namely:

Anabaptism: (1) evangelical (Swiss Brethren, Mennonites, Hutterites, etc.); (2) revolutionary (the Münsterites above all; Troeltsch called them "Taborites," Littell suggests the term "Maccabees"); (3) contemplative (mainly Hans Denk, to whom the inner word or inner Christ is more important than any external form).

Spiritualism: (1) evangelical (Schwenckfeld and Gabriel Ascherham); (2) revolutionary (Thomas Müntzer, also the Zwickau "prophets" and perhaps Karlstadt); (3) rational (Sebastian Franck, Paracelsus, and many more).

Evangelical Rationalism: here Williams does not offer any subdivision except that he finds some staying in their old church, "evangelical Catholics" (Erasmus, LeFevre, Valdes), while others broke away (Servetus and Ochino), being either lonely wanderers over the earth, or founders of conventicles or churches like Faustus Socinus (Polish Brethren, Transylvanian Unitarians).

The Anabaptists are the representatives of the idea of restitution in its broadest sense; the question is only what they aim to restore. The evangelical Anabaptists look back to the apostolic church; that is, to them the New Testament is the only norm, while the Old Testament has but figurative or allegorical value. They look to a church (Gemeinde) of discipline and order, with ban, shunning, and inner-worldly asceticism. The revolutionary Anabaptists (Münsterites) in contradistinction accept the Old Testament as their norm, desiring to erect the New Jerusalem in the here and now; hence the sword, which was abhorred by the evangelical brethren, is here glorified (as it is also by Müntzer). The contemplative Anabaptists finally (if there are such) are more indifferent to the externals of discipline, and thus draw nearer to the Spiritualists. Only the evangelical Anabaptists, emphasizing discipleship, know also the idea of a suffering church, called "theology of martyrdom" by Ethelbert Stauffer.

Spiritualists hold the inspiration by the Holy Spirit above the word of the Scriptures (inspirationism). The revolutionary group among them are strongly influenced by the books of Daniel and Revelation; they are visionary and apocalyptically minded. The evangelical Spiritualists, among whom Williams also counts Schwenckfeld (this classification is open to debate), base their teachings primarily upon the Johannine writings, in which the "spirit" or light is emphasized. The rational Spiritualists, finally—individualists through and through —are the nearest to what Rufus Jones called "spiritual reformers," a sort of bridge between rationalism proper and Christian mysticism.

Here might then be found also the bridge to the Evangelical Rationalists, who in spite of their strong reliance upon reason (see Reason and Obedience) nevertheless resist a complete surrender to a humanistic rationalism (which eventually leads to rational philosophy). They do accept the Holy Scriptures, but are inclined to interpret them by the light of natural reason. Hence their inclination either to anti-Trinitarianism or to a moral Pietism, as it is so well known from the later 17th and 18th centuries (Dutch Collegiants, Galenus Abrahamsz).

It is clear that no classification can do absolute justice to the many-sidedness of the actual historical phenomena, but the suggestions by Williams are useful and may help to clarify terms and stereotypes. (See Anabaptist and Kühn, Johannes.) R.F.

George H. Williams, Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers, Documents Illustrative of the Radical Reformation (Library of Christian Classics, Vol. XXV) (Philadelphia, 1957); R. H. Bainton, "The Left Wing of the Reformation," Journal of Religion XXI (1941) 127 ff.; John T. McNeill, "Left Wing Religious Movements," in A Short History of Christianity, ed. by Archibald G. Baker (Chicago, 1940); H. Richard Niebuhr, "The Doctrine of the Trinity and the Unity of the Church," Theology Today III (1946) 371 ff.; Robert Friedmann, "Concept of the Anabaptist," Church History IX (1940) 341-65; idem, "Recent Interpretation of Anabaptism," Church History XXIV (1955) 132-51; Johannes Kühn, Toleranz und Offenbarung (Leipzig, 1923); Franklin H. Littell, The Anabaptist View of the Church (American Society of Church History, 1952; second ed. Boston, 1958); George H. Williams, "Studies in the Radical Reformation: A Bibliographical Survey," Church History, March and June 1958.

Radichev on the Desna, a village in the Russian province of Chernigov, a Hutterite Bruderhof. Count Peter Rumiantsev (q.v.) brought the Hutterian Brethren to Vishenka (q.v.) in the province of Chernigov, Ukraine; but his son restricted the liberties promised them. Therefore they were given some crown land at Radichev in 1801, and established a new Bruderhof there. Soon, however, a decline set in. Health conditions were poor; of the fifty families only two persons passed the age of fifty, and the natural increase for half of a generation was only 58. More serious was the division within the settlement, one group under elder Johann Waldner wishing to retain the ancient practice of community of goods, and the other group under Jakob Walter wanting to give it up. The government authorities summoned from St. Petersburg were unable to establish peace. The Walter group left the Bruderhof, but many of them returned within a year. The old Bruderhof buildings burned to the ground. The groups then remained together but abandoned community in 1819, for the second time in Hutterite history. In 1820 Johann Waldner died. The settlement made some recovery in the ensuing years. New villages were established in the Molotschna at Hutterthal (q.v.), Johannesruh, Neu-hutterthal, and again a Bruderhof Hutterdorf. In 1874 Hutterdorf emigrated to South Dakota; in 1877 Hutterthal and Johannesruh followed, and the rest in 1879. E.C.

Alexander Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (translated from the Russian by Jakob Töws) (Odessa, 1887) 46-92; C.

Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950) 380-83; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; ML III, 425.

Radio Broadcasting, Mennonite. 1. The Mennonite Church (MC). Commercial radio broadcasting began in the United States in 1920. By the early 1930's numerous evangelical Christian groups were producing religious broadcasts. The first Mennonite radio broadcast program, so far as is known, was begun in November 1936 by William Detweiler (d. 1957), a Mennonite minister of Smithville, Ohio, and was called "Calvary Hour." It began as a weekly half-hour broadcast with one station at Canton, Ohio; in 1939 a station in Pennsylvania was added; finally 20 stations were included. It is still broadcasting. The broadcast is managed by a family type incorporated board, with the two minister sons of the late William Detweiler continuing in their father's stead as the radio preachers. The second broadcast was established in 1940 at Kitchener, Ont., by a layman, who offered a musical program by a "Night-ingle Chorus" for shut-ins, but which discontinued after about six months. By 1951 a total of 32 broadcasts had been started in local congregations, about one third by laymen; some 15 had been discontinued. Only one broadcast was sponsored by a conference, namely, the Ontario Mennonite Conference project begun in 1945. A Spanish language broadcast was begun at La Junta, Col., in 1945 by the local Mexican Mennonite Church; it is still on the air. In August 1947 Lester Hershey started a Spanish broadcast from Puerto Rico, where he was engaged in mission work; it is still on the air, affiliated with the Mennonite Hour. The 32 broadcasts started were sent over a total of 76 stations distributed as follows: Ohio 13, Pennsylvania 10, Ontario 8, Illinois 7, Maryland 5, Puerto Rico 4, Indiana 3, Kansas 3, Iowa 3, Virginia 3, Oregon 2, New York 2, Michigan 2, and one each in Florida, Colorado, Missouri, Louisiana, Washington, Nebraska, California, Ecuador, Costa Rica, Panama, and Haiti. Discontinuance of programs, which often were short-lived, was due chiefly to lack of financial support and difficulty in securing talent.

The year 1951 marked a significant change in radio broadcasting work in the Mennonite Church. By action of the General Council of the Mennonite General Conference in that year, the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities was urged to establish a national Mennonite broadcast under its supervision. By 1953 the board had established a national and international broadcast operated through the Mennonite Crusaders, Inc. (q.v.), a local group established at Harrisonburg, Va., in June 1951 to operate the Mennonite Hour (q.v.), which had been established in March 1951 on the campus of Eastern Mennonite College, using a college musical group. The Mennonite Crusaders was supplanted by Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. (q.v.) in 1956. B. Charles Hostetter has served as radio pastor since January 1952. The Mennonite Hour was broadcasting over 70 stations in early 1957, of which 56 were in the United States, and 2 in Canada, plus broadcasts in Ceylon, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Jamaica, Liberia, Panama, the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Viet-Nam. The weekly listening audience was estimated at 5 million, with broadcasts in English, Spanish, and Japanese. Since then an Italian language broadcast in Italy and a Navajo Indian language broadcast in Arizona have been added, and plans are being made for German, French, and Russian broadcasts in Europe. The European headquarters is at Basel. Since 1958 Menn. Broadcasts sponsors the Heart-to-Heart program, a weekly women's broadcast by Ruth Stoltzfus, which she began in 1950. Mennonite Broadcasts is normally self-sustaining, being supported by the contributions of the listeners.

Partly because of the establishment and the development of the Mennonite Hour, most of the local broadcasts have been discontinued or have been replaced by local sponsorship of the Mennonite Hour. Except for the Calvary Hour, the Spanish broadcast at La Junta, and the Sunday School Hour at Sarasota, Fla., started respectively in 1936 and 1945 and 1946, no other Mennonite broadcast started before 1950 was still in existence in 1958. Seven other local broadcasts however were still operating, started respectively in 1950, 1951 (2), 1953 (2), and 1957 (2). The day of local broadcasts is pretty well past in the church.

2. Other Mennonite Bodies. The radio broadcasting work has not found extensive use in other Mennonite bodies in North America. In 1952 Andrew Shelly reported only five broadcasts in the General Conference Mennonite Church in the United States, two of which were Bethel College and Freeman College, and one was the Mountain Lake (Minn.) Mennonite Home. Shelly reported only two broadcasts by Mennonite Brethren Churches—Buhler, Kan., and Delft, Minn. Grace Bible Institute at Omaha, Neb., also had a broadcast. Ed. J. Peters, an M.B. layman, owned and operated a private station at Wasco, Cal., broadcasting only good musical and religious programs. The M.B. churches at Kitchener and Virgil, Ont., also had broadcasts. Tabor College now broadcasts "The Chapel Hour" over at least 10 stations.

Bethel College has presented weekly "Chapel Meditations" over KFH, Wichita, every Sunday since 1951, consisting of meditations presented by Erland Waltner and at present by D. C. Wedel, and choir music by the Mennonite Singers under the direction of W. H. Hohmann. The General Conference Mennonite Church has been conducting a radio ministry twice daily since 1953 over KJRG, Newton, Kan. The First Mennonite Church of Newton has been broadcasting its Sunday worship services over KJRG for a number of years. Other churches, as for example the First Mennonite Church of Beatrice, Neb., are also broadcasting their worship services.

J. G. Rempel's report of 1952 on Mennonite radio broadcasts in Western Canada reported somewhat more broadcasting in that area by both G.C.M. and M.B. groups. He listed nine programs in the Western provinces—Manitoba two, Saskatchewan 5, Alberta one, British Columbia one; by conferences G.C.M. four, M.B. four, and E.M.B. one. Several Mennonite programs in this area were integrated into nondenominational broadcasts or were sponsored by the Canadian Sunday School Mission.

Numerous individual Mennonites were appearing on nondenominational broadcasts. The first Western Canadian Mennonite program was the M.B. broadcast from Saskatoon in 1940, the second the G.C.M. program in the same city in 1948.

A radically new development in Canada, and the only one of its kind anywhere, was the establishment of a Mennonite-owned and operated radio station, CFAM at Altona, Man., by the Southern Man. Broadcasting Co. (q.v.) (A. J. Thiessen, pres. D. K. Friesen, sec.-treas.). It went on the air on March 13, 1957. It is intended to serve "the economic, cultural, and religious needs of Southern Manitoba." It furnishes a good outlet for a considerable amount of religious broadcasting by Mennonites of several branches in the area. The Mennonite Radio Mission, the radio arm of the Manitoba Mennonite Conference (GCM), sponsors several broadcasts in three languages, English, German, and Low German. Several of the Mennonite programs in other provinces broadcast in two languages and some in Low German also. A group in Steinbach has also applied for a broadcast license.

In 1957 the Mennonite Brethren started a Russian language broadcast over a station in Winnipeg, designed to reach Russia. The M.B. broadcast is under the name "The Gospel Light Hour" in German, English, and Russian. Reports by letter from Russia indicate that both Russian and German religious broadcasts are being received by Mennonites in Russia.

The Janz Brothers, a small M.B. group, originally attached to the Prairie Bible Institute at Three Hills, Alberta, have been broadcasting in German with headquarters in Basel and in Canada. They operate on an independent basis. Theodore Epp, a former G.C.M. minister in Nebraska, has been broadcasting on a large scale through the Back to the Bible Hour, Inc., with headquarters at Omaha. This is also independent and nondenominational. Eastern Mennonite College (1957, 10 watt power) and Goshen College (1958, 250 watt power) operate local FM stations broadcasting over a radius of about 15 miles, 2-3 hours daily, partly as an opportunity for student experience.

The purpose of the Mennonite religious broadcasts has been uniformly primarily evangelistic, but also edificatory and devotional, and intended to reach the general public as well as Mennonites. Without doubt much has been accomplished, especially by the stronger programs, but probably little direct increase in membership of the Mennonite church can be attributed to the broadcasts.

The first reaction of the more conservative Mennonites to the use of the radio and radio broadcasting was rather negative. A number of more conservative conferences in the Mennonite Church (MC) in the East at one time had regulations forbidding the use of the radio in the home. This attitude has now changed, although one conference still maintains an official ban.

H.S.B.

Andrew R. Shelly, "Mennonites on the Air," Menn. Life VII (1952) 65-71; J. G. Rempel, "Mennonites on the Air in Western Canada," ibid., 125-27; Earl Meyers, "Mennonite Radio Broadcasting 1936-1951," unpublished manuscript in GCL (1951); Eugene Sauder, "A Radio Broadcasting Program for the Mennonite Church," ms in GCL (1952); "The History of the Radio Ministry of the General Conference Mennonite Church," ms in BeCL; Frank H. Epp, "Radio as It Should Be," Menn. Life XIV (January 1959).

Raduga ("Rainbow"), a Mennonite publishing company established at Halbstadt, Molotschna settlement, Russia, after H. J. Braun (q.v.) had purchased of P. Neufeld the print shop in Halbstadt. At first (1904-9) the imprint was "Druck und Verlag von H. J. Braun." In 1909 the Raduga Publishing Company was organized. Among the directors and shareholders were H. J. Braun, A. J. Kroeker (q.v.), and J. S. Prochanov, the leader of the Evangelical Christians. The company purchased the bookstore of Jakob Löttkemann of Halbstadt and had an interest in the bookstore of David P. Isaak of Schönwiese. Later a subsidiary was established in St. Petersburg.

Among the most important publications were the semiweekly Friedensstimme (q.v.), a devotional calendar, Abreisskalender, in German and in Russian (highest circulation 45,000), Liederperlen, a monthly periodical containing songs (first published in 1889), P. M. Friesen, Die Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Bruderschaft in Russland (1789-1910) im Rahmen der mennonitischen Gesamtgeschichte (1911) (q.v.), B. H. Unruh, Leitfaden für den Religionsunterricht, (1913), and Choralbuch zum Gebrauch für Kirche, Schule und Haus . . . of the General Conference of Russia (1914).

A. J. Kroeker was the manager of Raduga and the editor of the Friedensstimme and the Christlicher Familienkalender (q.v.). Jacob Kroeker (q.v.) also had an active part in the publishing enterprise particularly as writer and editor. In 1910 he went to Germany. In addition to the books and periodicals mentioned, Raduga published, printed, and distributed many tracts and much devotional literature in the Russian and German languages which made a substantial contribution to the spread of the evangelical movement in Russia. After the Revolution H. J. Braun went to Germany and A. J. Kroeker to the United States. B.H.U., C.K.

"Abraham J. Kroeker—Writer and Publisher," Menn. Life VII (October 1952) 165; Friesen, Bruderschaft, p. 669 ff.; A. Kroeker Jr., "Abraham J. Kroeker" (manuscript); ML III, 425.

Raegh-besem, seer bequaem om sommige Mennonitische Schuren te reynigen van de onnutte spinnewebben, sotte grollen en ijdelheden eeniger Geest-drijveren (Dustmop to Clean Some Mennonite Barns of Noxious Cobwebs, Dull Notions and Vain Ideas of some Rattle-brained [i.e., spiritualistic] Fanatics) (Amsterdam, 1625) is a book written by Nittert Obbesz (q.v.). It was published without the knowledge of Obbesz by Jan Theunisiz (q.v.), one of his followers, under the pseudonym of Nicodemus Letterknecht van Wt-gheest, appearing during a conflict in the Mennonite Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam, Holland, in which Obbesz was a preacher, when Obbesz accused his co-preachers Reynier Wybrands (Wybma), Cornelis Claesz (Anslo), and Pieter Andriesz (Hesseling) of neglecting the Scriptures (verminderingh vant beschreven Woordt Gods) in favor of the inward working of the Holy Spirit. Not only the preachers of the Amsterdam congregation but particularly Hans de Ries (q.v.), the leader of the Waterlander group, was attacked in the book because of his spiritualism. About this conflict and its issue see Nittert Obbesz(z). vdZ.

W. J. van Douwen, Socinianen en Doopsgezinden (Leiden, 1898) 146-63; W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 115-30.

Rack, Juriaen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Räck, Jörg.

Raemburg, Jan Ariens van, of Rotterdam, Holland, was appointed preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation in his home town about 1650, but by 1655 van Raemburg and three of his co-preachers and many members left this congregation to join the Waterlanders. The reason for this act was that the Flemish congregation was at this time growing more and more conservative; e.g., it did not tolerate the free-speaking meetings of the Collegiants (q.v.). In the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation van Raemburg was an elder 1655-March 1677; he died at Schiedam in 1678 at 55 years. He was a well-to-do merchant, who is said to have been a good Christian, humble, pious, and always a good example by his efforts to maintain peace. vdZ.

DB 1909, 158, 160; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (reprint Rotterdam, 1907) 17, 42, 43.

Raermakers, the wife of Severin, and also her son and daughter were executed in March 1536 at Limburg, Belgium, because of their Anabaptist convictions. vdZ.

L. E. Halkin and F. Lemaire, "Un proces d'Anabaptistes à Limbourg en 1536," in Bulletin de la Comm. Royale d'Histoire CXXI (1956, repr.).

Ra(e)rop: see Ransdorp.

Rahusen, a Mennonite family, which, according to a family tradition based on a record in an old family Bible at Leer, but as yet unproved, came from Switzerland. The first Rahusen on record is (1) Gabriel Otto Rahusen at Hamburg, Germany, who in 1695 married Anna Roosen, of Altona. His grandson was (2) Reinhard Rahusen (q.v., 1735-93), a Mennonite preacher. Another grandson, (3) Herman Rahusen, b. 1738 at Hamburg, moved to Leer in East Friesland, where he died in 1799. He was a grocer and tobacconer, married to Margaretha Vissering of Leer, and after her death, her sister Elske Vissering. He had a large posterity, mostly living at Leer, later also at Emden, Norden, and Amsterdam. Most of the family in Emden and Norden left the Mennonite Church to join the Lutherans. (4) Herman Rahusen, a son of (3) Herman, b. 1766 at Leer, moved to Amsterdam, where he died in 1839, as did his half brother (5) David Jacobus Rahusen, b. 1786 at Leer, d. 1830. In Amsterdam they founded a trading company, which was continued by their descendants, who, however, gradually turned to banking. By marriage the Amsterdam branch became related to prominent Mennonite families like de Clerq, Huidekuiper, van Eeghen, and van Lennep. The Amsterdam Rahusens have been loyal Mennonites, and from 1796 to 1947 eleven of them served as deacons, some serving three or four periods. (6) Herman Jan Rahusen (1817-75), married to Jacoba van Eeghen, a merchant at Amsterdam; (7) David Rahusen (1823-83), married to Elisabeth J. van Lennep, a banker; (8) Pieter Rahusen (1827-92), married to H. J. Hooglandt, a vintner; and (9) Eduard Nicolaas Rahusen (b. 1830-19?), unmarried, a lawyer, were sons of (5) David Jacobus Rahusen. (9) Eduard Nicolaas Rahusen was a delegate of the Dutch government to the Peace Conference at The Hague in 1901; in 1898, when the government introduced a law on compulsory military service which was to abolish the system of substitutes, which had made it possible for Mennonites (and others) to avoid military service, Rahusen, then a member of the First Chamber, as a Mennonite declared that he had no objections to compulsory service and that the Dutch Mennonites had abandoned the old doctrine of non-resistance; this view was opposed by Enno ten Cate Fennema (q.v.), a Mennonite who was also a member of the First Chamber. (10) David Rahusen (1858-1932), of Amsterdam, married to Jkvr. A. L. Hooft, a son of (8) Pieter Rahusen, was a managing director of the Dutch State Bank; he was also a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation and a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) from 1899 to 1929, serving as its chairman 1902-3 and its treasurer 1915-29. His son (11) Gerit Hendrik Rahusen, b. 1905 at Amsterdam, also engaged in banking, was a deacon of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation 1935-42 and treasurer of the A.D.S. 1941-. Another branch of the Rahusens has been prominent in the Mennonite congregation in Gronau (q.v.), Germany, where Reinhard Rahusen (d. 1952) was an elder. vDZ.

Ned. Patriciaat V (1914) 326-30; G. ten Cate, Ge-slachtslijst der familie Vissering (1903); DB 1898, 128-30; Zondagsbode XLIV (1931-32) No. 25.

Rahusen, Reinhard, b. Aug. 23, 1735, at Hamburg, Germany, d. March 8, 1793, the son of Hermann Rahusen and Sara Janssen. He was educated at the University of Leiden. He married twice. His first wife was Catharina van Calcar, of Groningen, and his second wife Catharina van Hoorn, of Leer. His son died in 1770; only one daughter survived him. He served as pastor of the Mennonite congregations of Enkhuizen 1760-63, Leer 1763-85, and Hamburg 1785-93, with unusual success, both as preacher and as pastor. He introduced German preaching in the Hamburg Mennonite Church. Rahusen was a prolific writer in both Dutch and German, publishing a large number of writings, especially sermons and smaller catechetical and devotional works. Some of the titles follow:

Die lieblichstärkenden Erquickungen der guten Streiter Jesu Christi (Hamburg, 1754); Erweckliche und erbauliche Anwendungen einiger Sprüche heiliger Schrift (Hamburg, 1757); De zalige Werkzaamheid van Jesus met de Ziel (Leiden, 1757); De uitmuntende Heilbelofte aan de geestelyke Overwinnaars toegezegd, een gezang uit het hoogduitsche vertaald (Enkhuyzen, 1761); Messias herders last het volk des Heeren te weiden . . . en Davids onwankelbaar . . . volyverig aankleeven aan zynen

Verbands God, of Afscheids Reden te Enchuisen en Intreerede te Leer (Groningen, 1765); Het Gode betamelyke Stilzwygen in harddrukkende Beproe- vingsweegen (Groningen, 1766); Het gelukkige lot der geestelyke Overwinnaars door den Dood (Groningen, 1766); Verhandeling over het borgtogtelyke gelove onzes Zaligmakers (Groningen, 1768); Afge- perste Verdediginge van de Eere en Leere der Men- noniten te Leer in Oostfriesland (Groningen, 1768); Catechetischer Entwurf der christlichen Lehre (Hamburg, 1778); Catechetischer Unterricht über alle hohen Feste (Hamburg, 1778); Tweetal van Leerredenen (Groningen, 1782); Sammlung einiger Predigten und Reden bey feyerlichen Gelegenheiten, nebst Beygefüigten Ceremoniel (Bremen, 1784); Broes der nachdenkende Christ, translated from the Dutch (Bremen, 1784); De geloofsvolle en blyde Roem eenes in den Heere stervenden Leeraars, a funeral sermon for Pastor Arisz of Norden (Aurich, 1785); Kurze Abhandlung über das wahre Christenthum (Minden, 1786), also in Swedish (Gothenburg, 1787); Katechetische Verhandeling der 3 eerste Versen van het Kerkgezag: O Zion, loof den Heer der Heeren (Altona, 1786); Empfindungen des Herzens bey dem tödtlichen Hintritt des Hrn. S. Deknatel's (Altona, 1787); Tiental van Leerreden- en over de wyze en dwaaze Maagden (Altona, 1787); Etwas von dem Leben der seligen Frau Wittve E. van Eden (Altona, 1788); Gedachtenis- reden over wylen den Heer B. Roosen (Altona, 1788); Zweite Sammlung einiger Predigten bey feyerlichen Gelegenheiten, nebst einer kurzen Beschreibung des Ursprungs und der jetzigen Beschaff- enheit der Mennoniten (Bremen, 1788); Kurze Erläuterung des wichtigen Passions-Liedes: Brich durch, mein angefochtne Herz (Altona, 1789); Handboek over den H. Doop en het H. Avondmaal . . . ten Dienst der aankomende Jeugd . . . (Altona, 1790); De beste en vertigste Troostgronden waar- door wy ons den anderzins hoogstmarte lyk en dood onzer naebestaende Bloedsverwanten verzagten en verligten kunnen (Altona, 1790); Denkmal der Hochschätzung und Freundschaft der im Herrn entschlafenen Frau Witwe Alida van der Smissen, geb. Veen, errichtet (Altona, 1790); Väterliche Empfindungen bey dem frühzeitigen Tode seines einzigsten Sohnes, H. G. Rahusen (Altona, 1790); Freundschaftliches Trostschreiben an Hrn. J. G. van der Smissen bey dem schmerzlichen Tode seiner Ehegattin, Helena van der Smissen (1790); Etwas über den Zustand Europens (Altona, 1793); Nach- richten vom gegenwärtigen Zustande der Men- noniten (in Christian Wilhelm Franz Walch, Neu- este Religionsgeschichte XIX, Lemgo, 1782, 303-18); Essays in Aussätze aus dem Briefwechsel der Deut- schen Gesellschaft thätiger Beförderer reiner Lehre und wahrer Gottseligkeit I-III (Basel, 1783-85).

NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1854, 36 f.; Johann A. Bolten, Historische Kirchen-Nachrichten von der Stadt Altona und deren verschiedenen Religions-Partheyen I (Altona, 1790) 305-8; Blaupot t. C., Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Fries- land 228; Berend Kordes, Lexikon der jetzt lebenden Schleswig-Holsteinischen und Eutinischen Schriftsteller (Schleswig, 1797) 490; J. G. Meusel, Lexikon der vom Jahr 1750 bis 1800 verstorbenen teutschen Schriftsteller II (Leipzig, 1811) 13-15; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Allona II (Hamburg, 1887) 71-77; J. A. Starck, Geschichte der Taufe und Taufgesinnten (Leipzig, 1789) 391; ML III, 425 f.

Raid (Raide, Raidt, Reide, Rhaide), Balthasar, of Fulda, pastor of Hersfeld (q.v.), Germany, 1525-65, "the first really Protestant preacher of the city church" (Freudenstein, 35). He was frequently called to debate with the Anabaptists of Hesse; by 1544 he claimed to have dealt with three hundred of them, among whom he had many a success. In 1533 he wrote against Georg Witzel (q.v.): Widder das lester und lügen büchlin Agricole Phagj, genant Georg Witzel antwort (Wittenberg). In 1539 followed Concordia vnnd vergleichung der Papisten, Widderteuffer, Rotten, Witzelianer vn Lutheraner inn vnnd mit der heiligen catholischen Christlichen kirchen, an die zweien Ept zu Fulda vnd Herssfelt (Erfurt), both with a foreword by Luther. Both are in the Library of the University of Göttingen. E.C.

TA Hessen, Nos. 5, 5a, 17, 24, 27, 28, 54, 115, 121, 124; Erich Freudenstein, Bilder aus der Kirchengeschichte Hersfelds (Hersfeld, 1938); Wappler, Thüringen, 53, 74, 102, 180, 294-302, 329, Nos. 30, 40b; ML III, 426.

Raiffer, Hans, a Hutterite martyr, missionary, and hymn writer, d. 1558 at Aachen: see Schmidt, Hans.

Rainham Mennonite Church (MC), once known as "Stoney Creek" and also as "Lake Shore," a member of the Ontario Conference and located in Rainham Twp., Haldimand Co., Ont., was founded by Jacob Hoover (d. 1810), of York County, Pa., who settled here in 1790 with his family of five sons and three daughters. Among the early names were Strickler, Shank (a preacher here in 1816), Swartz, Byers, and Miller. Trouble apparently arose early in its history because of the westward movement in Ontario, for the Wayland List of Ministers and Deacons of the Mennonite Church in Canada (1853) names those of Cayuga Township but omits the neighboring Rainham group entirely. The Mennonite ministers of the Rainham congregation were probably out of fellowship with the Conference (MC) at that time. The center of the schism was at the Twenty (Vineland), the home of the leader, Daniel Hoch, only 50 miles from Rainham. The profusion of cemeteries is also indicative of division. There are two small burial grounds south of Selkirk; there are also plots in Walpole to the west, Fisherville to the north, Sweet's Corners to the east, and the principal one at Hoover's Point on the lake. There was also a settlement of Mennonites from the Strickler (q.v.) church of Clarence, N.Y., who came to Selkirk after the middle of the 19th century. In 1956 the membership of the Rainham congregation was 39, with A. Lewis Fretz as minister and bishop, who also serves the South Cayuga congregation. (See also Strickler Mennonite Church and Miller Mennonite Church.)

When the first meetinghouse was built is not known, possibly in 1836, when the first deed was granted for church purposes, although the oldest marker in the cemetery is for a death occurring in 1812. The present meetinghouse, located 2½ miles east of Selkirk and one mile north of the Lake Erie shore, was erected about 1870. The only other Mennonite congregation near by is South Cayuga, with a meetinghouse 9 miles east. The two congregations have been served by one pastor since 1887. J.C.F.

Rainham Old Order Mennonite Church, located in Haldimand County, Ont., was formed in 1889 as a schism from the Rainham Mennonite (q.v.) Church (MC) under the influence of Christian Gayman, bishop of the adjoining South Cayuga Old Order Mennonite Church, who left the Ontario Mennonite Conference in 1889. The Rainham Mennonite minister, Leonhard Hoover (1842-90), identified himself with the Old Order group in 1889, as did the deacon Andrew Sherk (1827-1908). For lack of aggressive work many of the young people drifted into other churches or made no profession. The small congregation was long served by John Sherk, preacher at South Cayuga, and later by ministers of Waterloo and York counties. The membership in 1957 was only three, without a minister.

J.C.F.

Rainy River Mennonite Church (MC), International Falls, Minn., had 26 members in 1957. Lester Mann was its minister. The North Central Conference district mission board established it as a mission in 1950. M.G.

Rakov (Rackau), a town in Poland, near Cracow, was in the early 17th century the center of Socinianism (q.v.), a unitarian movement. Here the annual synod of the Socinians was held 1603-37. In Rakov they had their seminary, where Lutherans, Reformed, Mennonites, and even some Catholics attended the lectures of their learned professors. In Rakov too was the printing and publishing house of these "Polish Brethren," which printed many theological books, including their catechism, drawn up by Fausto Sozzini (Faustus Socinus). The first edition in the Polish language appeared in 1605, followed by a German edition in 1608 and a Latin edition in 1609 (the Latin edition was reprinted at Amsterdam, Holland, in 1665, 1680, and 1684). A Dutch edition was published at Amsterdam in 1659.

After some students of the seminary had wantonly damaged a Catholic crucifix, the Polish diet on May 1, 1638, resolved to put an end to "this blasphemous anti-Trinitarian heresy." The printing shop at Rakov was closed, the school was destroyed, and the church was confiscated and given to the Catholics. This was the end of Socinian activity in Rakov and soon in all of Poland; it continued for some time in the Netherlands. vñZ.

W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 9, 135 f., 139 f.; E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and Its Antecedents (Cambridge, 1946).

Rakowitz (Rakowitz, Rakvic), a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren, today a village with 1600 Slavic inhabitants, north of Eisgrub in Moravia, where the Anabaptists purchased several houses and settled in 1540. Johann von Lipa sold and also leased some lands to them. The chronicles relate that a brother was killed here on July 16, 1605. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 149, 344 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 157, 175, 240, 487; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 223, 316, 636; ML III, 427.

Rameaux, Jean (Jan) des, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of "den Blok" at Haarlem, Holland, about 1650. With his colleague Koenraad van Vollenhoven (q.v.) he took the side of the more progressive Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) of Amsterdam, against Isaac Sney (q.v.) and other conservative leaders of the Haarlem Flemish congregation. This led to serious discord in 1665 and to a schism in this congregation in 1671. (DB 1863, 137 f.)
vDZ.

Ramer Mennonite Church, a local designation for the progressive wing of the Wisler Mennonite Church in Elkhart (and St. Joseph) County, Indiana. The origin of the group was as follows: Over a period of time a degree of tension and loss of mutual confidence arose in the Wisler Mennonite Conference of Ohio and Indiana. The respective leaders were Henry Hursh (1839-1916), bishop of the County Line and Chestnut Ridge congregation in Wayne County, Ohio (progressive), and John W. Martin (1852-1940), bishop of the Yellow Creek and Blosser and County Line congregation, in Elkhart County (conservative). The tension came to head, ostensibly over the use of the telephone, at the spring conference of 1907 which met in the County Line meetinghouse, St. Joseph County, Ind. John Weaver, a preacher who had played a major role in the division of 1872 (Wisler-Funk), tried earnestly to prevent a schism in the Wisler Conference in 1907, but in vain. Bishop Martin withdrew from the conference, taking along all of his fellow ministers (Christian Z. Weaver, Henry Schrock, and Martin Ramer, besides the deacons Elias Z. Martin and Isaac Martin) into his new Old Order Mennonite Conference. The majority of the lay members of Elkhart County, however, refused to follow the ministers; they stood rather with the aged preacher John Weaver, a feeble old man who died on Sept. 2, 1907. About six months after the division Martin Ramer (1858-1928), a preacher who had been ordained about 1886, reconsidered his stand and transferred to the progressive side in Indiana. Meanwhile the progressives had chosen Levi Ressler (brother of J. A. Ressler, q.v.) as deacon, and his son Christian L. Ressler as preacher. In 1911 Ramer was chosen bishop of the progressive group. In 1919 his son William Ramer was ordained as preacher, and in 1929 as bishop. Because the ministerial leadership has been in the hands of the two Ramers, father and son, since 1907, the group has come to be known locally as the Ramer Mennonites. They themselves prefer the name Wisler Mennonites, while the Martin group call themselves the Old Order Mennonites. The chief differences relate to the adoption of new cultural items such as the automobile. Neither group has a Sunday school. The Ramer services are held largely in English, while the Martin services are largely in German. Both groups use the two jointly owned meetinghouses, Yellow Creek Frame and Blosser's, alternating Sundays. The Ramer group numbers 200 members, the other group 102.
J.C.W.

Ramond (Raemund, Raymond, Rémon, Raemond), Florimond (c1540-1601), a lawyer of Bordeaux, France, concerning whom it was said, "He judged without conscience, wrote books without knowledge, and built without money." His principal work was Histoire de naissance, progres, et décadence de l'hérésie de ce siècle, which was published after his death (Paris, 1605) and was translated into Latin, German, and Dutch, appearing in many editions. It refutes Protestantism with temporary effectiveness, and concerning the Mennonites it says (following Stanislaus Hosius, q.v.): At the same time the Mennonites arose, under the banner of Menno Simons, a crippled Frisian who had been a Lutheran preacher in Wismar. These miserable people deny that Christ, the Son of God, was born from the body of Mary and took His body from hers; they think instead that He brought it from heaven, and like Luther they say that He is to judge the angels and the princes of this world. It is Ramond who stated that Obbe Philipsz (q.v.) returned to the Catholic Church after his apostasy, a misconception accepted by some Mennonite historians, e.g., Kornelius van Huyzen (q.v.) and Herman Schijn (q.v.).

E.C., vDZ.

Karel Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 320; Hans Joachim Schoeps, Von himmlischen Fleisch Christi (Tübingen, 1951) 47; BRN VII, 95; DB 1884, 17 note 1; ML III, 467.

Ramos Mejia, Argentina, located about 19 miles from the center of the Argentine capital, belongs to the Greater Buenos Aires, that is, the part of this great metropolis that lies outside the federal district. Pastor Albano Luayza with his family moved to this city in 1942 to open a Mennonite (MC) mission. The work was actually started on May 3, 1942. The first believers were baptized in August and the first communion service with 13 participating was celebrated in September of the same year. In December 1954 there was a membership of 52 in a well-organized church with Sunday school, young people's and women's organizations. The Mennonite Board of Missions contributed land on which the congregation built a church, dedicated in 1955. In December 1954 Pastor Agustin F. Darino became the leader of the congregation, Luayza having reached the age of retirement.
N.L.

Rampersdorf, a Hutterite Bruderhof in Moravia (q.v.), located between Kostel (Gostal) and Lundenburg. As early as 1545 the Brethren here and at Pulgram and Schäckowitz were plundered by An derle von Villach, who wanted to take back into his own possession the estate which his brother Stoffel von Villach had granted the Hutterian Brethren when he united with them. In 1576 Johann von Zierotin confiscated four horses; "he needed them down in Hungary for use in war or things in which we do not help; therefore he took them by force; he, to be sure, repaid a part, but spoiled enough." In the Hungarian war a brother was killed and three persons taken away on June 28, 1605. At the beginning of the Thirty Years' War, Sept. 19-20, 1619, Rampersdorf was plundered and burned, and on Oct. 8, 1621, the miller's wife was drowned.
E.C.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 163, 268, 356, 374, 402; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 204, 369, 371, 486, 496, 539, 561; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 263, 478, 481, 634, 649, 711, 742; ML III, 427.

Ramseier (Ramseyer, Ramsayer), a Mennonite family name originating from Eggwil, Signau, and Trub in the Emmental (q.v.), canton of Bern, Switzerland. The name was given to persons who came from a village named Ramsey (Ram, raven; ei, flat meadow near a stream).

The first mention of an Anabaptist member of the family occurred in a list of 1710, where Hans Ramseyer was one of 57 persons listed for deportation to America. However, he escaped en route. During the early 18th century the Ramseyers with other Anabaptist families from the Emmental fled to the Jura (q.v.). Some who had a brief time before become followers of Jakob Ammann (q.v.) settled in the Prussian owned province of Neuchâtel (q.v.). Peter Ramseyer (q.v.; b. 1706) lived on the Münsterberg in the Jura. He was chosen as minister in 1730 and elder in 1732. He took a prominent part in bringing accord among the Palatinate brethren in 1760-84, making at least four trips to them for this purpose.

From the Jura, members of the family moved to western France. From Neuchâtel and France most of the Ramseyer families migrated to America during the 19th century settling especially in Stark and Wayne counties, Ohio, central Illinois, Ontario, and the "thumb" of Michigan. The ancestor of most of the families living in Ohio was John Ramseyer (1776-1853). His son Peter settled in Stark County, Ohio.

Prominent members of the family include Joseph E. Ramseyer (q.v.; 1869-1944), a founder of the Missionary Church Association, Lloyd L. Ramseyer (1899-), president of Bluffton College, 1938- , and Edna Ramseyer, a professor at Bluffton College. D.L.G.

Ramseyer, C. Auguste, a Swiss Baptist, author of the Histoire des Baptistes (Neuchâtel, 1897), which P. M. Friesen used repeatedly in his Geschichte der Alt-Evangelischen Mennoniten-Brüderschaft in Russland (Halbstadt, 1911), (ML III, 427.) NEFF.

Ramseyer, Joseph Eicher (1869-1944), one of the chief founders and for forty-four consecutive years president and spiritual father of the Missionary Church Association (q.v.), was born Feb. 7, 1869, near New Hamburg, Waterloo Co., Ont., the son of Michael and Mary Ramseyer, members of the Amish Mennonite Church. His father died when the boy was only four years old, and he was reared in his grandfather's home near New Hamburg. The family moved to Zurich, Hay Co., Ont., and from there in 1890 to Elkton, Mich., in the Huron Peninsula. While living at Zurich Joseph had a conversion experience in 1885, influenced in part by reading the biography of George Müller of Bristol. Soon after his arrival in the Elkton community he felt the call to preach and began preaching in his home community, though he was not yet ordained. He was ordained in March 1892 by Bishop Joseph Rediger of Gridley, Ill., and Joseph Egly of Berne, Ind., both leaders in the Defenseless Mennonite Church. He served as pastor of the Elkton church (meetinghouse erected in 1894) until his evangelistic work became too heavy. He had been baptized (by pouring) several years before as a member of the Defenseless Mennonite Church by Bishop Henry Egly (q.v.), founder of that church.

Ramseyer began his very effective evangelistic work in January 1893 in the Defenseless Mennonite Church at Archbold, Ohio. On Aug. 11, 1896, he had himself baptized by immersion while attending a Christian and Missionary Alliance conference at Cleveland, Ohio. On Dec. 8, 1896, he was expelled from his church by action of its General Conference, meeting near Berne, Ind. The grounds of the excommunication were his teaching of such doctrines as the second work of grace (baptism by the Holy Spirit subsequent to the new birth), premillennialism, and baptism by immersion. The struggle in the Defenseless church over these matters had lasted for 5 years (1891-96).

In August 1898 the Missionary Church Association was organized at Berne. Elements from the Defenseless Church and the Christian and Missionary Alliance united to form the new denomination (see Missionary Church Association for the full account of the origin and subsequent history of this group). Ramseyer was the leading spirit in the group throughout the remainder of his life, almost 50 years. It is clear that Alliance influence was a strong factor in Ramseyer's life and theology as well as in the M.C.A.

Ramseyer became the first superintendent of the Bethany Bible Training School founded on Nov. 1, 1895, at Bluffton, Ohio, which continued until 1901, serving in that office 1895-97. However, the school of the Missionary Church Association was to be the Fort Wayne Bible Institute (now called the Fort Wayne Bible College) founded in January 1904, largely due to the efforts of Ramseyer, who served as president from 1923 until his death.

Ramseyer was married Oct. 27, 1896, to Katherine Zeller of Bluffton, Ohio, who died in 1899. His second wife was Mary Garth of Union City, Tenn., whom he married May 1, 1902. He had no children. He died in Fort Wayne on Jan. 25, 1944, and was buried in Lindenwood Cemetery there.

Ramseyer was a man of unusual ability as a preacher and evangelist and of undoubted spiritual power, universally beloved and respected. At his death his denomination had grown to 6,500 members, and his school to an enrollment of 300 students. "He was an honorary vice-president of the Christian and Missionary Alliance for many years and carried on a wide and influential ministry in other denominations" (Lugibihl and Gerig, 53).

H.S.B.

M. G. Ramseyer, Joseph E. Ramseyer—Yet Speaking (Fort Wayne, 1945); W. H. Lugibihl and J. F. Gerig, The Missionary Church Association, Historical Account of its Origin and Development (Berne, 1950).

Ramseyer (Ramseier), Peter (b. 1706), of the Münsterberg in the Bernese Jura (q.v.), Switzerland, was ordained as a minister in 1730 and as an elder in 1732. Ramseyer was one of the most important leaders of the Mennonites of the Jura of that time. One of the responsible services of these Jura preachers was the care of the orphaned Emmental Mennonites following the last severe persecutions and emigrations. Traveling was in those days no easy matter. The official records found in the state archives at Bern report that meetings in the neighborhood of Thun were held by brethren from the Jura in 1767. On the other hand, young couples of the Emmental traveled to the Jura to be married by Ramseyer.

In the spring of 1762 Peter Ramseyer went to the Palatinate (q.v.), Germany, with two other preachers and brought back a certificate signed by 25 elders and preachers, showing that these three men "paternally and sincerely comforted the congregations in the Palatinate and pointed them to true constancy in the faith." In 1766 the Jura ministers were again called to the Palatinate to try to settle a serious difference that had arisen among the preachers there in consequence of the pietistic preaching of Peter Weber (q.v.). The matter was to be discussed at a conference of the Palatine brethren and the Swiss visiting ministers. In September Abraham Zeisset (q.v.) wrote the letter of invitation with the following address: "An den bescheidenen Petter Ramseyer zu Minster im bischofsgebit brunatrut [Pruntrut, q.v.] 12 stund ober Basel." (To the humble Peter Ramseyer at Münster in the bishopric of Pruntrut—q.v.—12 hours above Basel.)

Believing that the matter had come to a peaceful settlement, the Swiss preachers returned to their homes. But only a few months later the dissension had become so general that the Easter communion service of 1767 was omitted throughout the Palatine congregations, the laymen demanding of their preachers that they first make peace among themselves. A further attempt at unification was made by the Jura brethren in 1770, though with the same negative result. More letters were sent from Illfingen near Biel dated May 24, 1779. In 1782 the aged Peter Ramseyer made a final journey to the Palatinate, accompanied by Hans Lehmann (q.v.), Bendicht Wahli, Hans Steiner, and David Baumgartner; they met at the Himmelhäuserhof, and this time succeeded in restoring peace. On July 13, 1784, he and the other ministers wrote a letter at Biderichgraben to Johannes Weber on the matter of the Amish division, and on April 24, 1787, he received a letter from a number of brethren in the Palatinate. Nothing more is known about Peter Ramseyer. S.G.

"Geschichtliche Beiträge aus den Mennonitengemeinden," Gem.-Kal., 1928, 118-33; 1929, 139-44; 1930, 91-102; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 452, 456 f.; ML III, 427 f.

Randall, Gilles (c1600-50), an English clergyman concerning whose life little is known. He was the son of Edward Randall of Chipping Wycombe, Bucks, and earned his bachelor's degree at Oxford in 1626. In 1643 he was charged with having preached Anabaptism, Familism, and Antinomianism. In the fall of 1644 he was deposed from his office as a clergyman "on account of his Anabaptism." He apparently held confused ideas. HEGE.

Rufus M. Jones, Spiritual Reformers of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (London, 1914) 253-63; RGG IV, Col. 1698; ML III, 428.

Randt, Erich Otto (1887-1948), a historian and archivist at Berlin, Germany, was born at Neu-Paleschken, East Prussia, on May 17, 1887, the son of the preacher (Lehrer) Richard Randt. He received his elementary instruction at Mausdorf in the Elbing district, and later attended the Gymnasium at Marienburg for eight years and studied geography and history at the universities of Breslau and Königsberg. In 1912 he published his dissertation, Die Mennoniten in Ostpreussen und Litauen bis zum Jahre 1772, a thorough piece of research, which gives detailed information on the origin of the Mennonites of East Prussia and their life and achievements in the early period. He became an archivist and died at Berlin on May 6, 1948. (ML III, 428.) HEGE, E.C.

Randville Bible Church (E.M.B.), located near Iron Mountain, Mich., in 1957 had 20 members with Max Eisenbraun as pastor. It is a mission church subsidized by the conference, started c1944, and for a time had a second place of meeting at Chinning. The church building, formerly a store, has been remodeled. H.S.B.

Ransdorp (often Ra(e)rop), a village near Amsterdam, Holland, formerly the seat of a Flemish Mennonite congregation. About its history very little is known. The martyr Thijs Joriaensz van Rarop, executed at Muiden in 1569, was from here. In 1563-65 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) is said to have baptized 82 persons at Ransdorp, but this is not correct, since 49 of these 82 were not baptized at Ransdorp, but at Weesp (q.v.). From this time until the late 17th century a Flemish church existed at Ransdorp, which throughout the 17th century was without a preacher. At the Flemish conference held at Haarlem in 1649 it was represented by Sievert Arentsz and Hendrik Dirksz. About 1665 it sided with the conservative Zonists (q.v.), but it soon dissolved or perhaps merged with the Zonist congregation in Amsterdam. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 412; DB 1892, 108.) voZ.

Ransom Mennonite (MC) settlement, now extinct, in Ness County, Kan., was founded by Shellenberger, Ummel, Schrock, Miller, Troyer, and Stutzman families; the date of the founding is not known. E. M. Shellenberger, a Mennonite minister from Freeport, Ill., lived in the community for a few years, but the congregation was never organized. Services at first were held in a store building and later in a schoolhouse in Ransom. In 1918 fourteen members of the Ransom community were received into the West Liberty (q.v.) Mennonite Church. Monthly preaching appointments were held at Ransom until 1925. Preacher S. C. Miller moved to Ness County in 1886, and a year later was ordained bishop, but in the following year moved back to McPherson County. M.G.

Ransom First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in the small town of Ransom, Ness Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference was organized in 1886 by the Abraham Ummel, Julius Jaehde, and Jacob Aeby families. They held their regular meetings in a small sod school located three fourths of a mile east of Ransom until 1900, when the church was built in Ransom, replaced in 1956 by a brick church. When Jacob Aeby returned to Missouri, Abraham Ummel (d. 1921) became the elder. Not only Mennonites, but also Lutherans joined the church. The congregation had 115 members in 1957; the pastor was R. L. Siemens.

M.J.

Ranst, Jan van, b. 1634 at Rotterdam, Holland, d. there March 1684, a flax-dealer, married to Neeltgen Conincs, was from 1661 until his death a preacher of the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation. Through his activity, his honesty, and his forethought, he was of importance not only for his Rotterdam home church, but also for the Dutch brotherhood in general. He was the first to draw up a "resolutions book" of the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation, writing down all that seemed to him worth remembering. His notes are an important source of information concerning this Rotterdam congregation. He was very broad-minded, participating in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement; and after the failure of an attempt by his church to merge with the Flemish Mennonite congregation in Rotterdam he considered a union with the Remonstrants (q.v.) at Rotterdam, which proposal was, however, declined by the Remonstrants.

When the needs of the Swiss Mennonites who had been expelled from Switzerland and emigrated to the Palatinate became known in Holland in 1671, the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation, on the initiative of van Ranst, made a proposal to help them by bringing them all to the Netherlands and settling them there at the expense of the Dutch Mennonites; but this plan was not carried out because the Swiss Brethren wished to stay among their coreligionists in the Palatinate, even hoping to have an opportunity to return to Switzerland, which indeed some of them clandestinely did.

Van Ranst also initiated the founding of the Waterlander or South Holland Conference in 1675. Although this conference was short-lived it was of the highest importance for the future practice of training ministers, for van Ranst in 1675 and again in the following yearly meetings proposed the founding of a seminary. He called attention to the fact of the decay of most of the (Waterlander) congregations, which van Ranst thought was largely caused by the lack of preachers (many pulpits were vacant) and the incompetence of many untrained preachers. The seminary was not realized at this time, mostly because of the unwillingness of the Haarlem congregation; nevertheless one result was that the Amsterdam Lamist congregation in 1680 directed its preacher Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) to train young men for the ministry.

Besides all this, van Ranst in 1681 traveled to Friesland and Groningen, combining business and church matters, and visited a number of congregations in this area, stimulating them to unite into a conference. This had no direct result, but led to the founding in 1695 of the Mennonite Conference of Friesland.

Cornelis van Ranst and Reyer van Ranst, apparently both sons of Jan van Ranst, were deacons of the Rotterdam congregation, Cornelis from 1689 and Reyer from 1705. vDZ.

K. Vos, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (reprint 1907) 25, 43; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1060; II, No. 2208; II, 2, No. 378; DB 1872, 61, 64, 66; 1918, 49; J. C. van Sleen, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1896) 114.

Raphaël (Raphel) van de(n) Velde, an Anabaptist martyr, who after being tortured several times was burned at the stake on the Veerle Square at Gent, Belgium, on July 14, 1576, together with Jeronimus Scheepens. The Dutch martyr books, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, contain six letters written in prison by this martyr. All of these letters, four of which were written to his wife, one to his son Raphaelken, and one to the Gent congregation, bear witness of his strong faith. The letters are undated except the first (to his wife), which bears the date of May 24, 25, 1576.

In the first letter to his wife he wrote of the terrible tortures he suffered, but gave thanks to God, who strengthened him. With striking words he proclaimed his tender love to his wife and his child. He thanked his wife in very moving words for all the good she had conferred upon him, comforting her with the coming bliss in the Lord, admonishing her to faith and fidelity. To his son he wrote a "Testament" (q.v.): "See, my dear son Raphaelken, . . . the Lord has so ordered it, that I must be taken from you . . . My dear son, walk in the way of the Lord, . . . depart from evil, . . . love not the world, neither the things that are therein; . . . my dear son, though you lose me, be not impudent to your mother, but obey her the more . . . I commend you and your mother to the Lord. . . . Written by me, your father. Adieu, my dear son, whom I love more than any silver or gold or precious stones; but God must be the dearest. . ."

Verheyden has published some particulars about this martyr from the official records: Raphael van de Velde was a master mason, a citizen of Gent, living on "Abeelestraete." He was apparently a rather young man, since his only son was still a small child. His wife was also a member of the congregation.

Other members of the van de Velde (q.v.) family also suffered martyrdom. Karel van de Velde (q.v.) was executed at Gent (not at Hondschote as stated in ME III, 151) in 1562, Janneken van de Velde (q.v.) died as a martyr at Antwerp in 1573, Sebastiaen van de Velde, who was arrested at Gent in 1563 and condemned to the galleys, may also have been a relative.

Since the 17th century there has been a Mennonite van de Velde family at Amsterdam. This family is said to stem from the van de Velde family at Gent. (Mart. Mir. D 715, E 1026; Verheyden, Gent, 65 f.; No. 236.) vDZ.

Rapp, Georg, the name of two Anabaptists of Pforzheim (q.v.), Germany, who were arrested in Vaihingen, examined by Johannes Brenz (q.v.) in Stuttgart in 1577, but released, since they were merely passing through the country. One of them had spent five years in Moravia (q.v.) in the 1540's. (ML III, 428.) E.C.

Rappenau (Bad), a village (1945 pop. 2,688) in northern Baden, Germany, 10 miles southeast of Sinsheim. In 1766-1862 the neighboring Martinshof (q.v.) was the seat of a Mennonite congregation. In 1862 the center was transferred to Rappenuau. In 1887 the congregation had 50 members besides 33 children. In 1914 and 1924 there were 48 members. The Adressbuch of 1936 lists 19 baptized members: a Hotel family living in Rappenuau, Fellmann and Schmutz in Fürfeld, Fellmann and Glück in Wimpfen. Jakob Glück of Wimpfen had been elder since 1919, and Oskar Fellmann, also of Wimpfen, preacher since 1935. The congregation was listed for the last time in the Gemeinde-Kalender of 1940; its members joined the Heilbronn (q.v.) congregation. E.C.

Menn. Adressbuch (Karlsruhe, 1936) 160; Gem.-Kal., 1914, 141; 1924, 135; 1935, 133; 1939, 127; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch (Danzig, 1888) 32; ML III, 429.

Rappites, or Harmonists, an American Christian communistic society founded in 1804 by Johann George Rapp (1757-1847), a peasant linen weaver of Württemberg, Germany, who separated from the Lutheran Church of that region and gradually built up, under persecution, a following of some 300 families. He emphasized a simple Biblicism, including particular emphasis on the imminent Second Coming of Christ, and criticized vigorously the social order of the time which he held to be in strong contrast to the New Testament way of life.

In 1803 Rapp emigrated to America to find a home for his group where they might be free of persecution. He bought 5,000 acres of land in the Conoquenessing Valley north of Pittsburgh, Pa., and in 1804 settled there with 600 of his followers who had emigrated from Germany. In a colony called Harmony, located within the limits of the town of Ambridge, they soon adopted communism as their economic order. In 1807 they decided to adopt celibacy. They also rejected infant baptism.

In 1814 the group sold Harmony and relocated on a large tract south of Evansville, Ind., on the Wabash River, founding the New Harmony Colony. This they sold in 1824 to Robert Owen. The group then relocated a second time near the first Harmony location, naming their new colony Economy. Economy was highly successful. Rapp died in 1847. After this the colony declined but did not dissolve until 1892, at the death of the leader Jacob Heinrich, who had emigrated from Grosskarlbach in the Palatinate and had become a leader in 1868.

It is of considerable interest to note that in 1884-85 the Rappists negotiated an agreement with the Hutterites in South Dakota whereby the entire group was to leave South Dakota and take over a large tract of land owned by the Economy colony, located near Tidioute, Pa. At that time there were about 380 souls in the Hutterite group. The Hutterites accepted the offer but were unable to carry it through because of difficulty in selling their Dakota land. The Tripp Bruderhof, however, sold its land and arrived at Tidioute on May 1, 1884, with 19 families, 3 families having moved in 1883. The land, located 4 miles south of the city of Tidioute in Warren County, was too difficult to farm. Hence in two years the entire group returned to South Dakota, arriving there on July 2, 1886.

The Rappists had been very generous in lending money to the Hutterites in South Dakota at different times, and there were long-continued warm and friendly relations between the two groups. The first loan was granted for the building of a mill, requested on May 31, 1875, by the Bon Homme Colony. The first visit of a Rappist to Bon Homme was in September 1875, when Jonathan Lenz came. A considerable correspondence between the two groups has been preserved, and was to be published by Professor Karl J. Arndt (according to Zieglschmid).

H.S.B.

J. A. Bole, The Harmony Society: A Chapter in German-American Culture (Philadelphia, 1904, reprint from German-American Annals XXI); Karl J. Arndt, "The Harmonists and the Hutterians," American German Review X (1944) 24-27; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 461; Mark Holloway, Heavens on Earth, Utopian Communities in America 1680-1888 (New York, 1951).

Rasquert, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. This congregation probably existed as early as 1550. The following ministers are named: Jacob Derks (d. 1620) from c1560, Luy (Luirt) Cornelisz c1685, Jacob Lippes (d. 1735), Waalke Eises from 1729, Tjaard Michiels (d. before 1754), Tonjes Klasesen (Teunis Clasen) 1736-d.65, Tamme Pieters (Huizinga) 1741-70, Luitje Olferts Wiersema 1757-91, and Hendrik Bakker 1792-95. Tjaard Michiels and Teunis Clasen were at the same time elders of the Groningen Old Flemish Conference. All of these preachers except the last were chosen from the congregation of Rasquert; they were farmers, and had no training for the ministry. After 1795 the pulpit remained vacant.

The Rasquert congregation was small: in 1710 there were about 100 baptized members, 97 in 1733, 59 in 1754, 22 in 1809. It built a plain meetinghouse in 1708, which is reported to have been in a state of ruin in 1815. The members, most of whom were farmers, lived around the village of Rasquert or near-by Baflo; hence the congregation is sometimes called Baflo. In 1686 and again in 1717, when the ocean dikes burst and the country was flooded, the congregation suffered great damage and lost some of its members. In 1816 the Rasquert congregation merged with Den Hoorn and Obergum-Winsum, together forming the new congregation of Mensingeweer (q.v.).

Karel Vos surmised that after Menno Simons left the Catholic Church in January 1536, he lived for a time at Rasquert, enjoying the hospitality of Christoffer van Ewsum, a rural nobleman, who possessed a country house at Rasquert. vbZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 127, 131, 140, 142, 202; II, 54, 224, 225; DJ 1840 (table facing 52); DB 1879, 5; Naamlijst 1829, 65; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1918, 149-64; 1919, 139-46.

Ratheim, Gisbert von (Gys van Rothem) (c1500-36 or after), one of the "Wassenberg preachers," was identical with Gisbert von Breberen, but not with Gillis von Aachen (q.v.). The difference in their Christian names (Gisbert and Gillis, which is the equivalent of Aegidius) makes it impossible to consider them a single person. His confessions give some facts about his life, his doctrinal views, and the occasion of his journey to Münster. (Two of his confessions are found in Redlich; Cornelius published a third one, which conflicts with some of the statements of the first two.)

Gisbert was born about 1500 in or near Breberen, the son of Gys in Broich and Lyssken van den Dyck. He was a chaplain in Hoengen in the Millen district in Jülich. The records of the church inspection of 1533 show that he was still drawing some income from this position, though he was no longer there. It says of him, "Herr Gys, he also became Luther's." In February 1531 he married Gertrud Valkenberg, a nun who had fled from the convent of Nieuwenhof in Maastricht on account of pregnancy. His marriage was performed in Wassenberg (q.v.) in the home of Johann Kloppeis (q.v.) either by Kloppeis, or by Heinrich von Tongern (see Slachtscaep) in Kloppeis's presence. His wife was the sister of the Mayor Valkenberg of Nieuwstad near Sittard, who later vainly attempted to assist Jan Revens, a sexton of Hoengen imprisoned in Maastricht, to freedom.

Under the influence of the Wassenberg preachers, of whom Dionysius Vinne (q.v.) and Heinrich von Tongern had been preaching in Hoengen, especially however under the influence of Kloppeis, Gisbert resigned his priestly office in the year of his marriage and became the chaplain of the Stadholder Heinrich von Olmissen, called Mülstroe, at Haus Hall near Ratheim, a protector of these preachers. Here he continued to preach Protestant doctrine, served the Lord's Supper in both forms, performed marriage ceremonies, and had large audiences. In 1531 Slachtscaep preached in his home. Between them a dispute arose concerning communion, in the course of which the usually gentle Gisbert showed him the door. The ducal regulation expelling heretical preachers compelled Gisbert to leave Ratheim. For a few days he was able to stay with Junker Hermann auf der Erft (Arft). He could stay nowhere for any length of time—neither with the aged Baron von der Heyden at Tüschbroich, nor with Junker Wilhelm von Kinsweiler at Müdersheim, nor with his wife's brother at Maastricht, nor with the Baronesses von Elssen, near Schynnen in the Valkenberg area, in Hoengen and Havert, nor in Cologne. He fled from place to place until through the mediation of the elder and younger lords of Mülstroe the magistrate (Vogt) of Heinsberg permitted him to stay in the country if he would promise to be quiet.

At the end of 1533 Gisbert lodged in his home the Münsterite agitators Jacob von Ossenbrug (q.v.) and Peter Schönmacher of Dremmen. They described to him the splendors of the "New Jerusalem" so convincingly that "he should not have looked at this matter." Under the leadership of Jacob and Gisbert 40 men and women, chiefly from the region of Hückelhoven and Dremmen, met at Eschenbroich east of Heinsberg, and went to Neuss via Odenkirchen (q.v.). There they boarded a boat but were stopped at Düsseldorf on Feb. 28, 1534, and imprisoned. Gisbert was examined on March 4. His statements concerning his doctrinal views were extremely cautious and indefinite. Concerning infant baptism he believed it to be sufficient for salvation! Concerning the office of the Mass, he thought that it was a true symbol of the body and blood of Christ if it was observed as the Lord had instituted it. When he was asked whether it was not in essence the body and blood of Christ he remarked that on this point he was still too weak but wanted to be instructed in it. He and his wife had not been rebaptized and were not going to be rebaptized. After this examination he was apparently released. Shortly after he was living in Maastricht (q.v.), Dutch province of Limburg, where he conversed with the Anabaptist Ruth Ketelbueter (q.v.) and attended a baptismal service conducted in a home by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.).

Gisbert von Ratheim as well as the other Wassenberg preachers had left the old church but, judging from his confessions, they were all, with the exception of Campanus, unclear, indefinite, and wavering in their convictions. Gisbert had no precise doctrine and is not to be reckoned with the Anabaptists. For two years he remained in the custody of the Duke of Jülich. In 1536 he was handed over to Electoral Cologne with the priest Herman Tack of Cleve and imprisoned at Kaiserswerth. At this point all trace of him is lost. W.N.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 339 ff.; C. A. Cornelius, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster II (Münster, 1853) 223; O. R. Redlich, Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik II (Bonn, 1911) 506, 854-58; Peter Bockmühl, "Die Anfänge der reformatorischen Bewegung in der Stadt Neuss," Monatshefte für Rheinische Kirchengeschichte, 1914, 203 ff.; Willem Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht 1505-1557 (The Hague, 1937) 52-57; ML III, 429 f.

Rattenberg, Tirol, Austria, a small fortified town situated on the Inn River about 25 miles east of Innsbruck, with some copper mines near by. Ruins of the fortress are still present; also the picturesque town remains almost unchanged since the 16th century. In the 1520's Anabaptism was very vigorous here as everywhere else along the Inn (see Inn Valley), perhaps because of the miners (Bergknappen), the most alert section of the population. The Huterite Chronik reports (up to 1542) a total of 71 martyrs from this town alone. Only Kitzbühel (q.v.) with 68 martyrs and Schwaz, another mining town of the Inn Valley, with 20, had such large numbers. Kirchmaier, in his contemporary Chronicle of the Bishopric of Brixen (Tirol), reports that a thousand "heretics" were executed in Tirol prior to 1530, and that fagots were burning continually all along the Inn Valley.

Unfortunately little is known about the inner history of the Rattenberg congregation which had so many martyrs; no doubt it was a strong and vigorous group. Only two facts are certain: (1) The Anabaptist "bishop" Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) was caught in this town on Nov. 25, 1527, and beheaded on Jan. 14, 1528; and (2) Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) was born and educated here, became a mining magistrate (Bergrichter) and in 1525 a member of the inner council of the city. Very likely about 1527 he came into contact with Anabaptism, either in Augsburg or in Kitzbühel (see Freyberg, Helene von), and was baptized. Since he refused to hunt Anabaptists among the miners, as was demanded by the government, he was removed from his position (Jan. 22, 1528), and soon afterward went to Strasbourg and other places. That he was strongly influenced by the Anabaptist tradition of the Inn Valley (or of Rattenberg) is beyond doubt. The Kunstabuch (q.v.), a work of the Marpeck group, contains writings by Schiemer and Hans Schlaffer (executed at Schwaz in February 1528), among them even items otherwise unknown, which suggest Marpeck's dependence on this tradition.

Fortunately the Hutterite epistle books (see Epistles, Hutterite) allow us at least a few glimpses into the situation of these exciting years of the 1520's at Rattenberg (in the sources usually called Rottenburg or Rothenburg am Inn). Lydia Müller's Glaubenszeugnisse, Volume I, contains four epistles by Leonhard Schiemer to the Rattenberg congregation written in prison in 1527 (a fifth epistle or brief sermon for the Rattenberg brethren is found in the Kunstabuch). In one case he signs his name, "Leonhard Schiemer, humble servant of you all and unworthy bishop, elected by God and His church" (Müller, 77). This suggests that he was the Vorsteher or bishop of the Rattenberg congregation at least for a short while, all the more since he also commends his wife Bärbl to the care of the congregation. But in his "Confession" (Müller, 80-1) he claims that he was made a Lehrmeister (i.e., minister, preacher) at Steyr, Upper Austria, and was sent out as a missionary by that group, went to many places and was seized at Rattenberg on the very first night of his stay. Be that as it may, he felt himself a true shepherd for his flock; all his letters are full both of concern for the brotherhood and of teachings and guidance in the true faith. Thus it is probably correct to call the Rattenberg congregation the real congregation of Leonhard Schiemer.

Not long after the death of Schiemer (1528), Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), the Vorsteher or bishop of the congregation of Linz, Upper Austria, sent a long and unusually profound and moving pastoral letter to the now orphaned Rattenberg church, a true document of the spirit of early Anabaptism. Its exact date is not known, but no doubt Brandhuber had been deeply concerned about life and discipline of the Rattenberg congregation, in spite of considerable geographic distance between Linz and Rattenberg. It is most characteristic of the spirit of brotherhood, that one cares for those brethren who have lost their leader, wherever they may be. Brandhuber admonishes his brethren (whom he, most likely, had never seen) telling them of the great law of love which requires also a certain sharing of worldly goods with the brethren, telling them of the need for inner discipline and of the inevitable conflict with the "world." One year later, 1529, he himself had to seal his faith with his life, being burned at Linz, thus leaving fatherless not only his own congregation but also the one in distant Tirol.

The Chronicle of the Hutterites reports for the year 1529 a Gemeindeordnung, "Regulation or Discipline of the Church: How a Christian Should Live" (Geschicht-Buch, 60). Since at that time Hutterites did not yet exist as a group, the chronicler Caspar Braitnichel may have found this document later among his many sources (perhaps a small notebook or loose paper as such material still exists today among the Hutterites in Canada), and arbitrarily inserted it at the year 1529. Several codices of the Hutterites in North America contain the same Ordnung immediately following Schiemer's epistles, so that the likelihood is great that this church discipline had been drawn up also by Schiemer for the Rattenberg brotherhood, for which he felt so obviously responsible and concerned. That it is unsigned is nothing unusual among Anabaptist sources, and no argument against our conjecture. Its brevity (two pages in print) rather indicates the incipient condition of the group which needed just a few guiding principles, such as brotherly sharing (not full community of goods) and the idea of the suffering church which must expect martyrdom and accept it with a willing heart, etc.

The Rattenberg brotherhood, beginning so strong, was deprived too soon of leadership. Though the miners all along the Inn Valley continued to resist persecution, the Rattenberg group finally could not maintain an orderly life as a church (Gemeinde), and either collapsed or moved to Moravia (q.v.).

Rattenberg is mentioned again in the Chronicle in 1541, when the Hutterite brother Christoph Gschäll, on a mission trip, spent a whole winter there. But then the records cease, as they do of nearly every other place in Tirol. R.F.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse I; Loserth, Anabaptismus; R. Friedmann, "The Oldest Church Discipline of the Anabaptists," MQR XXIX (1955) 162-66; Kirchmaier, Denkwürdigkeiten des Stiftes Brixen (Fontes Rerum Austriacarum I, 1854). See also the Bibliography for the article "Marpeck." The Canadian sources have not yet been made available in print.

Ratzlaff (Raatslaf, Retzlaff), a family name found among the Mennonites of West Prussian and Danzig background in Russia and North and South America. The name appeared particularly among the Flemish Mennonites of Kleinsee (Jeziorka; q.v.), Przechovka-Konopath, and Kazun, and is supposed to have been derived from the Slavic name Ratislav. The Przechovka-Konopath congregation had the following ministers: Berent Ratzlaff (c1660), Peter Ratzlaff (1689-1775), Hans Ratzlaff (1727-88), Heinrich Ratzlaff (1742-1805), and Jacob Ratzlaff (1765-?). At Kleinsee-Jeziorka Peter Ratzlaff (b. 1742) became elder and Berent Ratzlaff, minister both in 1785. When the Przechovka Mennonite Church moved to Russia it was known as the Alexanderwohl Church (q.v.). The Ratzlaffs spread in Russia, many of them later coming to America, particularly to Kansas. Abraham Ratzlaff (d. 1939) was a minister at Buhler, and Abraham K. Ratzlaff is a physician in Goessel, Kan. Mary Ratzlaff has charge of the Salem Home for the Aged at Hillsboro, Kan. vdZ., C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 116; J. A. Duerksen, "Przechovka and Alexanderwohl," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76; Naamlijst 1766-1802; Unruh, Hintergründe, 369, 371.

Ratzlaff, Benjamin (1791-1874), an elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church (q.v.), Molotschna, South Russia, was born April 1, 1791, in Jeziorka, West Prussia (q.v.), a son of Peter Ratzlaff, and moved to Franztal, West Prussia. He was ordained minister in 1819, and emigrated to the Molotschna in 1820, where he was chosen elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church in 1835. He was active at the time of the revival and signed many documents and letters pertaining to the origin of the Mennonite Brethren. In 1874 he joined a group migrating to America. He died at Buhler(?), Kan., three weeks after his arrival. C.K.

B. H. Unruh, Hintergründe, 369; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 139, 167, 192, 197, 208, 499; Franz Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); ML III, 430.

Ratzlaff, Berent, was born about 1660 and was the first known elder of the Przechovka (q.v.) Old Flemish Mennonite Church near Schwetz in Poland. He was the grandson of the first Ratzlaff in this church. His grandfather was a soldier in the Swedish war. After hearing about the Mennonite peace teachings, he thrust his sword into a post and joined the Mennonite Church. Berent Ratzlaff lived in the village of Przechovka. J.A.D.

Raufer, Wolf(gang), a martyr of the Hutterian Brethren, a tailor, hence also called Wolf Schneider, was taken prisoner with Hans Zuckenhammer (q.v.) in 1579 at Tittmoning in Upper Bavaria but released; he returned safely to the brotherhood in Moravia (q.v.). In two songs Hans Zuckenhammer described the arrest and imprisonment. Wolf Raufer was seized again on the Wednesday following Easter in 1585 with Hans Aichner (q.v.) and Georg Bruckmaier (q.v.) in the vicinity of Ried (at that time belonging to Bavaria, now Upper Austria), taken to Burghausen on the Salzach, and executed on Aug. 14, 1585. He is the author of the beautiful song, "Weil ich so arm und elend bin." NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 274, 293; Mart. Mir. D 754, E 1060 f.; Wolkan, Lieder, 237 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 418-21; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 541-44; ML III, 430.

Rauschenbusch, August (1816-99), German and American theologian, was born Feb. 13, 1816, at Altena, Westphalia, Germany, the son of Dr. August Ernst Rauschenbusch, descendant of five generations of Lutheran pastors. He served as German professor at the Rochester Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., 1858-70. August Rauschenbusch began his service as a Lutheran pastor in 1840, and resigned in 1845 to go to America to serve the large number of German immigrants there, working under the American Tract Society 1846-53. In 1850 he joined the Baptist Church, of which he remained a member until his death. In 1851, on a 5-week trip to Ontario, he met the Mennonites. His biographer refers to this visit as follows: "The contact with the numerous Mennonites of that region served a preparatory purpose. The moral seriousness and the church life of the Mennonites had had a significant influence, but they lacked spiritual power; they had no mission work and did not insist on conversion, so that none of those reached by the Awakening joined them. Only their preacher Daniel Hoch preached repentance at that time and he therefore met much opposition" (p. 168).

Rauschenbusch early became interested in the history of baptism and also of Anabaptism. In 1868/69 he visited numerous university libraries doing research on Anabaptist history, preparatory to writing a comprehensive work, visiting also Professor C. A. Cornelius (q.v.) in Munich, whose work on Münster he admired. He adopted the correct theory of the origin of Anabaptism in the Reformation period in contrast to the widely prevalent Baptist construction of Anabaptism as a part of a chain of apostolic succession. He never produced his intended history of Anabaptism but did write a number of articles in encyclopedias and journals, among them articles on the history of the Baptists, Mennonites, and Tunkers for Schem's Deutsch-Amerikanisches Konversations-Lexikon (N.Y., 1873). J. G. de Hoop Scheffer published in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen for 1873, pp. 23-29, an article on the Mennonites in North America, based upon the above article by "my good friend A. Rauschenbusch," which the latter had sent him. The German Mennonite Gemeindeblatt (q.v.) published in its issue of November 1884 (pp. 84 f.) a reprint of Rauschenbusch's article from the same Lexikon entitled "Geschichte der Mennoniten in den Niederlanden, Westpreussen, Russland und der Schweiz." The Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.) of Aug. 1, 1888 (pp. 89 f.), published an original article by Rauschenbusch, "Verfolgung der Täufer in Salzburg im Oktober und November 1557." His major historical work was Die Entstehung der Kindertaufe in dritten Jahrhundert vor Christi und die Wiedereinführung der biblischen Taufe im 17. Jahrhundert nach Christi (Hamburg, 1897, sec. enlarged edition 1898). H.S.B.

Leben und Wirken von August Rauschenbusch, angefangen von ihm selbst, vollendet und herausgegeben von seinem Sohne Walter Rauschenbusch (Cassel, 1901); ML III, 430-32.

Rauschenbusch, Walter (1861-1918), an American Baptist theologian of great influence in the development of the "social gospel," Professor of Church History at the Rochester Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y., was born Oct. 4, 1861, at Rochester, the son of August Rauschenbusch of the seminary faculty. Following his graduation from Rochester Seminary he served in 1886-97 as a pastor in a slum section of New York with a strongly pietistic spirit. He was gradually driven into a deep social concern by his experience in New York, and modified his theology in a liberal direction to include a strong social dimension in redemption. He served as Professor of New Testament Interpretation in the German department at the Rochester Seminary 1897-1902, thereafter until his death, as Professor of Church History in the English department. He now became the leading figure in what was known as the "social gospel" movement in America. His Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907) made him a national figure, and his later books increased his influence: Christianizing the Social Order (1912), The Social Principles of Jesus (1916), A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917).

Rauschenbusch was definitely interested in Anabaptism and made it a vital part of his lectures in church history. In 1905 he published in The Ameri- can Journal of Theology IX (1905), 91-106, a translation of Conrad Grebel's letter of 1524 to Thomas Muntzer with an introduction and commentary, "The Zurich Anabaptists and Thomas Muntzer." Don. E. Smucker holds, in his 1957 doctoral dissertation on Rauschenbusch of the University of Chicago, that Anabaptism, communicated in part by his father August, in part the result of his own study, had an appreciable influence on the development of Walter Rauschenbusch's theology. E.C., H.S.B.

Dictionary of American Biography XV (1935) 392 f.; C. H. Hopkins, The Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism 1865-1915 (New Haven, 1940); Don. E. Smucker, "Walter Rauschenbusch" (unpublished dissertation, University of Chicago, 1957); ML III, 432.

Ravens (Raven, Rave), a Mennonite family name, found during the 17th and 18th centuries in the Lower Rhine area, Germany, and particularly at Rees (q.v.). In the 18th century a Ravens family lived at Gladbach. The martyr Wendel Ravens (q.v.) may have been a member of this family. Since about 1620 a Raven(s) family, which had moved in from the Rhineland, has been found in Amsterdam.

vdZ.

Ravens, Wendel (Windel Rauens), an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Cleve (q.v.), Germany, with Willem de Kistenmaker (q.v.) in 1551. (Mart. Mir. D 131, E 525; ML III, 430).

NEFF.

Rawley Springs Mennonite Church (MC), a rural mission located 12 miles west of Harrisonburg, Va., near Hinton, was established in 1932 under the Virginia Mennonite Conference. In 1957 its minister was Ralph Heatwole and its membership 79. M.G.

Rawlinsville Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, began in 1929 under the ministry of the Byerland-New Danville District when it leased the old Muddy Run Presbyterian meetinghouse which had been a Presbyterian center 1742-1916. In 1948 a new brick church was built by the District and the Mission Board. In 1958 David N. Thomas was bishop, and John Miller minister, assisted by Amos M. Hess; the membership numbered 61. A few Puerto Rican families (four of whom are members) are included in this community, served by the County Migrant Pastor.

I.D.L.

Reading, Pa., county seat (pop. 114,000) of Berks County in the heart of the Pennsylvania-German culture area of Pennsylvania, is the seat of the second largest congregation of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (373 members in 1957, 87 in 1911) and one congregation (started in 1922) and two mission stations of the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference with a total of 82 members. The Lancaster Conference also operates the Mennonite Girls' Home in the city, founded in 1935. The city lies outside the basic Mennonite settlements in Eastern Pennsylvania, the nearest congregation of the old established settlements lying some 15 miles to the south and southeast. It is a very strong center of the Pennsylvania-German culture area.

H.S.B.

Reading (Pa.) Mennonite (MC) Mission was opened as a result of the study of the Book of Acts in the Gehman District of Lancaster Conference. The first service was held on Jan. 8, 1922. Jacob Gehman became the first superintendent in January 1923. The center was moved to 558 North 11th Street and in 1926 to the former Lutheran church at 12th and Windsor Streets. In 1958 Arthur Good and Paul Angstadt were the ministers, with a membership of 40. The first regional Bible school was held here in 1955. The Girls' Home (see Mennonite Girls' Home) has been an aid to the Mission over the years.

I.D.L.

Reading Girls' Home: see Mennonite Girls' Home (Reading).

Realanstalt am Donnersberg, a Mennonite school at the Weierhof (q.v.), Palatinate, Germany. Michael Löwenberg (q.v.), the pastor of the Weierhof congregation, established a small school called the "Lehr- und Erziehungsanstalt," which opened at the Weierhof on Dec. 2, 1867. Responsibility for the school was borne by the School Association composed of Mennonite friends living at Weierhof and vicinity. Classes met in Löwenberg's home; the students were lodged in the "Weavers' Cabin." It was the purpose of this school to give the boys two years of training, particularly religious training, beyond the public school, similar to that offered in the Zeller institutions at Beuggen, Switzerland, and in the schools of the Moravian Brethren. The plan was to add a Bible school to train Mennonite ministers. The attendance was good.

A school building was erected slightly north of Weierhof and opened Sept. 22, 1869, with financial support from the Mennonites of the community, and also especially from Crefeld (q.v.). In 1873 the enrollment consisted of 25 resident students and 25 day students. There were probably three teachers. The plan for a ministerial school was dropped for lack of patronage. A crisis arose when the state insisted on the fulfillment of its requirements in the school and the founder died in 1874. Following this there were many changes in the office of principal.

In 1884 Ernst Göbel, a former student at Weierhof, consented to become principal of the school, which then had 9 resident students and 15 day students. He had been a teacher at the Rauhes Haus (q.v.) at Hamburg. The objective he set for himself was to give the boys a thorough secondary education as well as family style religious and moral training. In the autumn of that year the school was made a six-year Realschule with a dormitory. Under the direction of Ernst Göbel and his brother Gustav Göbel, who came to the school in 1892 and served on the teaching staff and as business manager, and the co-operation of David Krehbiel (q.v.) besides younger teachers, the school made rapid progress, becoming, in spite of tremendous difficulties, one of the outstanding secondary schools in the Palatinate. In the course of time the plant was also developed to provide for normal extracurricular activities. In 1935-36 the enrollment was 246, of which 20 were Mennonites. The local Mennonite pastor for almost 50 years, Christian Neff, regularly taught the Bible and religion classes, but the school otherwise did not have a particularly Mennonite character, even though the Board of Directors was Mennonite.

In 1936 the school was taken over by the Nazi Party, and after World War II (1945) by the French occupation forces. In 1957 the American military, which had used the school for several years for a specialized training school, promised to return it to the Mennonite owners. Meanwhile despairing of regaining the school property the Board had purchased in 1952 a building in Kirchheimbolanden, two miles from the Weierhof, to serve as a boarding and rooming dormitory (Schülerheim) for Mennonite and other boys attending the Kirchheimbolanden high school, using the rent received from the military authorities for the Weierhof school property to help maintain the new student home. In 1957 a total of 90 boys were occupying the student home, of whom however only 20 were Mennonites. There are in addition 30 Mennonite day students, making a total of 50 Mennonite boys in the school. No other such concentration of Mennonites in any school is found in German- or French-speaking Europe. The assistant principal, Dr. Horst Penner, is a Mennonite, several other Mennonite teachers from the old Weierhof faculty are on the Kirchheimbolanden school staff, and a Mennonite couple are serving as house parents for the student home. The Weierhof Mennonite pastor has been teaching Bible for the Mennonite students since 1953.

The Weierhof Board since about 1930 has no longer been exclusively Mennonite, even though the majority of the members still are. It is clear that the Mennonites are not able to finance a school alone, nor do they have a sufficient faculty. It also seems uncertain whether there will ever be enough Mennonite students to make the Weierhof school, should it be reopened, a predominantly Mennonite school. This would be highly regrettable, since the Weierhof school could fill a major role in German Mennonitism as a center for Mennonite education and activity. The Weierhof school board hoped to reopen the school in 1959.

C.G., H.A.

Gustav Göbel, "Ernst Göbel," Gem.-Kal., 1936, 47 ff.; Emil Händiges, "Zum fünfzigjährigen Jubiläum der Real- und Erziehungsanstalt auf dem Weierhof am Donnersberg," Menn. Bl., 1920, 91-97, with five photographs; Paul Schowalter, "Die Schule auf dem Weierhof," Gem.-Kal., 1958, 47-60; Helmut Haury, "Die Weierhöfer Schule," Menn. Jahrbuch 1955, 17 ff.; ML III, 432 f.

Reason and Obedience (to divine commands), one of the basic problems in the life of an earnest Christian, and in particular an issue in Anabaptist polemics. The Scriptural text from which the discussion proceeds is II Corinthians 10:5, "We destroy arguments and every proud obstacle to the knowledge of God, and take every thought captive to obey Christ" (with Luther: ". . . und nehmen gefangen alle Vernunft unter den Gehorsam Christ"); note that Vernunft is a far stronger term than "thought"). It is a perennial problem concerning the use of reason and its limitation by the unconditional obedience in faith to the Word of God, without further speculation. Rationalists have called this attitude a "blind faith," while Anabaptists would consider their opponents simply lacking that concrete faith which leads to evidencing or witnessing.

With the exception of its earliest period, Anabaptism had only a few scholars among its members. Only Grebel, Hubmaier, Denck, and a few more had humanistic training; only Hubmaier was a "doctor" of theology. This stood in sharp contrast to the state churches of the time in which university training was considered a necessary prerequisite for the ministry. A Hutterite tract of the 16th century entitled "Why Are There no University Graduates (Hochgelehrte) in our Midst?" answers that intellectual sophistication kills simplicity and with it faith, as Anabaptism understood the latter. Pilgram Marpeck, himself a learned engineer, praised Christ as "the unlettered son of a carpenter out of whom your [Schwenckfeld's] philosophy has fabricated such a high Christ" (Verantwortung, 55). All this seems to indicate that Anabaptism had chosen the type of faith which embraces the revealed truth with a simple heart no longer in need of theological speculation. But this acceptance of God's Word in obedience and discipleship in no way means dullness of the mind; it rather means the significant distinction between reason and "understanding" (the latter term used in the King James version at many places: Luke 2:47; Eph. 3:4; Col. 1:9 and 2:2; II Tim. 2:7; Rev. 13:18, etc.), that is, between logical (Greek) rationality and Biblical spirituality.

In the age of Reformation this tension between reason and obedience appears particularly impressive in the debates (Gespräche) between Anabaptists and anti-Trinitarians (Socinians, Polish Brethren, etc.). Naturally, the controversy with this group was much more relevant for Anabaptists than a controversy with Humanism (q.v.) since the latter had hardly any appeal to Anabaptists. Anti-Trinitarianism (q.v.) represented at that time the rationalistic wing of the "Radical Reformation" (q.v.) which for reasons of intellectual integrity could not accept the doctrine of Trinity and with it the doctrine of the divine sonship of Christ. We know of numerous contacts which these anti-Trinitarians had with some Anabaptist groups and of the different approaches of the two groups toward a closer union (see Ostorodt). Since they accepted adult baptism and the simple life of discipleship, and since they even experimented with communal life, they felt rather close (morally) to both Hutterites and Mennonites, and could not understand the cool reception they received by both groups. In this connection a correspondence is revealing which in 1571 the Hutterite bishop Peter Walpot (q.v.) carried on with an elder of the Polish church in Cracow by the name of Simon Ronemberg, an apothecary. (This correspondence is inserted into the great Hutterite Chronicle at the year 1571.) "You give the impression," writes Walpot, "that you have already surrendered yourself to the obedience of God and have taken your reason captive unto His obedience. To this I say . . . you have indeed given obedience, but only to act according to your own free will, desire and pleasure, . . . which obedience is not that which Paul and the apostles sought to establish among the heathen" (MQR, 1945, 35). The letter goes on in this rather sharp vein and it may be assumed that the Polish brother wondered about this apparent lack of Christian love. But without such strictness, or full surrender as Walpot calls it (see Gelassenheit), Anabaptism would not have been able to carry on a life of discipleship in a world utterly unsympathetic to this idea. In a later letter Walpot writes to the Poles: "Those of you who were sent to us desired to teach us, which we could not accept at all; it would have meant letting ourselves be judged by those who have not completely renounced the world and the heathen way of life" (ibid., 39, 40) (see also Friedmann, "Encounter").

That was in 1571. In 1833 a simple minister of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in Russia, Heinrich Balzer (q.v.), wrote a treatise for his church (which had recently separated from the main body of Mennonites in Russia for reasons of conservatism), which treatise sounds almost like a paraphrase of Walpot's letters. Balzer gave his tract the strange sounding title Verstand und Vernunft (Understanding and Reason—Simple Opinions Regarding the Difference Between Understanding and Reason According to the Teachings of the Gospel). Essentially it is a tract on the tension between reason and obedience, between intellectuality and spirituality, characteristic of both Anabaptists and conservative Mennonites. (For an English translation see bibliography.) The term Verstand the author seeks to explain as "Verstand des Herzens" (understanding of the heart), somewhat like Blaise Pascal's raison du coeur in the 17th century, which alone leads to a grasp of the genius of the Gospel message. Balzer approvingly quotes Paul's daring statement that "knowledge (i.e., Greek rationality) puffeth up" (I Cor. 8:1), and refers to II Cor. 10:5, just as it was used previously by Walpot and other Anabaptists.

The emphasis here as elsewhere is on simplicity (which alone enables absolute obedience and Nachfolge); but again this simplicity of the mind should not be understood as a renunciation of the gift of thinking. In 1560, when Claus Felbinger (q.v.) stood before inquiring authorities he told them that he intends to stay in the "simplicity of Christ," whereupon the interrogating officer answered, "I do not think that you are so simple. I think there would not be one in a hundred who could give an account of himself (his faith) as you do" (MQR, 1955, 141). But in spite of the clear distinction between the two forms of thought, whereby obedience is compatible with "understanding" but not with reason, the tension continues to exist and to face the Christian of the 20th century with the same dilemma which existed four centuries ago. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "The Encounter of Anabaptists and Mennonites with Anti-Trinitarianism," MQR XXII (1948) 139-62; idem, "Reason and Obedience, an Old Anabaptist Letter . . . and Its Meaning," ibid., XIX (1945) 27-40; idem, "Faith and Reason, the Principles of Mennonitism Reconsidered in a Treatise of 1833," ibid., XXII (1948) 75-93; idem, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949), Chapter XI, "Concept of the Spirit Among Anabaptists," 81 ff., also 43; Robert Kreider, "Anabaptism and Humanism, an Inquiry . . ." MQR XXII (1952) 123-41.

Reber (Räber), Samuel, a Mennonite living at Trub in the Emmental (q.v.), Swiss canton of Bern (q.v.), "having endured much persecution, oppression, and chains," was put on board a boat on March 18, 1710, with 44 men and 12 women and taken down the Rhine to be deported to America. He escaped and returned to Switzerland contrary to his promise, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. The Dutch ambassador at Bern, Runckel (q.v.), intervened and had him released. Reber was then, at the age of 75, against his will, put on a boat with Hans Bürky (q.v.) and taken down the Rhine to be settled in the Netherlands. But he left the boat at Mannheim with other passengers, mostly followers of Hans Reist. Then all trace of Reber is lost. (Müller, Berner Täufer, 277, 296, 302, 304, 307; ML III, 433.)

E.C.

Rebstock, Jakob (d. 1654). a Hutterite barber-surgeon, was chosen to the ministry on March 13, 1649, and confirmed at Sobotiste (q.v.) in 1651. Among his effects was found a manuscript, Kurtzes denkbuechl, darinen zum tail Begriffen, was sich von dem 1525 Jar biss auff gegenwürtig Zeit in unserer gemain zugetragen . . ., now Codex F ("Codex Rebstock") of the Moravian national archives at Brno.

NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, XXV, 477, 483; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 634, 642; Robert Friedmann, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Täufer," in Archiv für Reformations-Geschichte XXVI (1929) 44; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1317, 1339; ML III, 433.

Rechenschaft unserer Religion, Leer und Glaubens Von den Brüdern so man die Hutterischen nennt aussgangen was written by Peter Riedemann (q.v.) in 1540-41. Among the not too numerous doctrinal tracts of the 16th-century Anabaptists, Riedemann's Rechenschaft (Account of our Religion, Doctrine and Faith, the title according to I Peter 3:15, "Be ready to give an answer to every man that asks you a reason of the hope that is in you") is one of the most important and significant documents, a basic source for the knowledge of Anabaptist doctrine and theology, a true spiritual foundation for the Hutterite branch of Anabaptists, but beyond that, characteristic of this great movement at large, save for the one specific doctrine concerning community of goods. It is a book of much inner beauty and spirituality which did much to enable the Hutterites to survive through the centuries more or less loyal to their beginnings. Together with the great Article Book of 1547 (and 1577) (q.v.) and the Handbüchlein wider den Prozess . . . (q.v.) of 1558, it represents the official position of the Hutterites in matters both of doctrine and practice. That the Rechenschaft was better known to the outside world than the other two statements was mainly due to the fact that it is one of the few Hutterite books ever to have been published in print (1565).

The history and theology of this unique work has not yet been given a thorough study, although there have been some recent attempts in this direction. Thus it was not known until the present that Riedemann (who began this Rechenschaft during his imprisonment in Hesse, 1540-41, at the castle of Wolkersdorf) got the idea for this work when he wished to inform Landgrave Philip of Hesse about the true Anabaptist doctrine. "Since he has never interrogated us personally . . . since perhaps others slander us, he should at least know why he is keeping us imprisoned" (Epistle 21, of 1540-41, sent to Hans Amon and Leonhard Lanzenstiel).

The original manuscript is very likely lost; yet two old manuscript codices are still extant: one in the primatial library in Esztergom (q.v.), signature IV, 1, dated 1614, having 364 leaves in 16°, very carefully written, apparently intended as a pocket "companion"; and a second in private possession in Freeman, S.D. (of which no description is available). In 1565 the book came out in print; its last page says: "This year the Confession was reprinted by Philips Vollanndt." Nothing is known about this printer, and it may be assumed that he was an itinerant printer who chanced to pass by the Hutterite settlements in Moravia, offering his services to everyone, and there (perhaps at Neumühle, the seat of Bishop Peter Walpot; see Neumühle) accomplished this work. It was the Golden Age of the brotherhood, and the Brethren probably felt that each of the many Bruderhofs in Moravia and Slovakia should have a copy of this basic work. Nevertheless, the edition must have been small since only a very few copies have come down to our time (list at end of this article). The expression "reprinted" has puzzled scholars regarding the possibility of an earlier print, but it can hardly mean this since no such print has ever been discovered. Apparently it means: first written by hand but now also printed. In modern times the book has been republished three times (1870, 1902, 1938) and also translated into English (1950), thus making the text easily available to anyone interested (list of editions at end of article).

Although the Rechenschaft is the work of but one man, it must be assumed that the brotherhood after careful study promptly approved of it as an official church document. When the Brethren in their dire predicament in 1545 sent a collective letter to the Lords of Moravia (Beck, 169-73), they enclosed a copy (apparently in manuscript) of this Rechenschaft to inform the authorities about their stand both as to doctrine and practice. The work has kept its place of pre-eminence throughout Hutterite history because of its excellence and clarity.

The Rechenschaft is divided into two unequal parts (in the English edition of 1950 of 127 and 86 pages respectively), the first part being the more important while the second is made up of seven lengthy meditations on various topics, not considered as part of the official "Account." The first part is made up of ninety articles, most of them brief. The initial group of twenty-nine articles represents an interpretation of the Apostles' Creed, followed by the articles "What faith is," "Why God created man," "What sin is," "Concerning original sin," "Concerning remorse,—repentance," "Concerning the baptism of children," and the refutation of the arguments for infant baptism. Then follow articles about the Lord's Supper, community of goods (less than 4 pages), separation from the world, etc. The first part is concluded by a set of articles concerning practical matters: government, warfare, taxation, manufacture of swords (forbidden), litigation and swearing (both forbidden), traders, innkeepers, standing drinks (all forbidden), education of the young, ban and readmission, and finally an article concerning the whole life: conduct, dress, adornment, etc.

It is impossible to give here an adequate presentation of the ideas of this comprehensive document; reference to literature at the end of this article will be of some help as well as several other articles in this ENCYCLOPEDIA. That the theological emphasis is thoroughly different from that of Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin, is worth mentioning. The great issue of original sin (in many Anabaptist documents completely missing) is here dealt with on not more than three pages. Justification "by faith alone" is not mentioned at all, and the classical loci used by Luther for his basic doctrines are conspicuously absent. In short, Riedemann was not familiar with the Lutheran theological tradition. His sources are rather various texts from the Scriptures. Thus, for instance, baptism is called, after Titus 3:5, "the bath of rebirth"; and as for "the harm wrought by original sin" Riedemann refers back to the Old Testament locus in Ezekiel 18:20, where it is said that children shall not bear the iniquities of their fathers. "The mother of sin," however, Riedemann emphatically declares (English text, 56), "is disobedience" to the commandments of God, alluding to Romans 5:16-19. There is but one reference to Luther (English text, 35), followed by a passionate denial that the Brethren taught "work righteousness." "To this we say 'no,' for we know that all our work, in so far as it is our work, is naught but sin, but in so far as it is of Christ and done by Christ in us, so far it is truth, just and good" (English text, 36). There is nowhere an explicit theology of atonement but there is the emphasis that redemption follows repentance and inner rebirth: "fleeing from sin as from a serpent" (English text, 59). Thus "man is grafted into Christ." "We, redeemed from death through Him, might [thus] be the children of His covenant" (English text, 63) (Acts 3:17-26); indeed a "covenant of childlike freedom" (English text, 68) (Gal. 4:4). The emphasis is thus laid not so much upon justification from sin but upon sanctification of life, which is the very proof of inner rebirth and obedience, i.e., discipleship.

The church, however, of these reborn children of the "new covenant" (67) is basically a spiritual thing. "It is a lantern of righteousness" (39) in which "the light of grace is borne and held before the whole world." "Whosoever endures and suffers the work of the Spirit of Christ is a member of this church." It is the Spirit and not man who leads men to this church (39-41). This church, then, in the concrete here and now, is defined as "the fellowship of the Lord's Table" (Abendmahlsgemeinde), the assembly of the reborn ones. Such a fellowship, to be sure, is not established by the Lord's Supper, but the latter is rather an expression of this fellowship previously entered into. It is a church, as far as humanly possible, "without spot and wrinkle," and in order to achieve this end separation from the world and inner discipline are needed. This leads to all the ensuing statements concerning conduct of life and the practice of the ban ("exclusion," 131 f.).

For the world "which is without" (I Cor. 5:12) no further concern is expressed, for this world will eventually be judged by God Himself.

It is obvious that a document of such inner richness could not be drawn up without some forerunners who prepared the spiritual framework in which Riedemann developed the ideas which are specifically Hutterite in character. In 1894 Johann Loserth presented the thesis that the theological framework of this Rechenschaft was taken in its entirety from the work of Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and that therefore the Rechenschaft is not so much an original work as an adaptation of ideas developed by Hubmaier in 1525-27 and assiduously studied later by the Hutterites in Moravia. Loserth's claim was challenged by Franz Heimann in a doctoral dissertation (Vienna, 1927), in which he concludes that Riedemann borrowed from Hubmaier only in those parts which deal with the doctrines of baptism and the Lord's Supper, doctrines which are common to all Anabaptists. The assimilation of these ideas from Hubmaier does not detract from the originality and genuine spiritual eminence of Riedemann's comprehensive work. Hubmaier's most outstanding contribution to the Anabaptist vision is his very convincing discussion and refutation of the several arguments in favor of infant baptism. This discussion Riedemann takes over point by point into his Rechenschaft (English text, 70-77), according to Heimann.

Otherwise, Heimann emphasizes, in all practical and ethical items Riedemann is by and large independent of Hubmaier, rendering Loserth's theory invalid. It must not be forgotten, for instance, that Hubmaier approved the "sword," i.e., the right of the government to use force in the execution of its laws, while the Hutterites, like all evangelical Anabaptists, stood passionately for nonresistance and non-co-operation with any government.

Finally, Riedemann was not solely dependent upon Hubmaier in the shaping of his Anabaptist doctrines. He must certainly also have known the ideas of his earliest teachers such as Hans Hut, Hans Schlaffer, and Leonhard Schiemer. But no such research has as yet been undertaken. It is also possible that Riedemann was influenced in part by Ulrich Stadler (q.v.), the most important doctrinal thinker of the 1530's in Moravia, but again this question has never been studied. Since Riedemann's Biblical spiritualism was shaped in the second half of the 1520's, one might think of Hans Denk as a strong influence; but this was again the general Anabaptist vision of that time. The value and genuine contribution of the author himself should not be diminished by pointing to some forerunners. Since the work was written in prison in Hesse, it is very likely that Riedemann had no reading material on hand, and his formulations must be considered as his original personal viewpoints and conceptions arising out of his own spiritual pilgrimage.

Of the original Rechenschaft edition in 1565 only a few copies are known to exist: one at the British Museum in London (sign. 3908 a8), one in the University of Chicago Library, one in the National Museum of Brno, Moravia, one at a Bruderhof in the United States (formerly at Rockport, S.D., but now of unknown location), one used in 1870 by Calvary but supposedly acquired by the Prussian State Library, one reported by Beck to be in the University of Breslau Library, and one at the National Library of Vienna, Austria.

The following are known—modern reprints: (1) Mittheilungen aus dem Antiquariat S. Calvary (Berlin, 1870) 254-417, reprinted from a 1565 copy; (2) A reprint from the Chicago copy as Rechenschaft unseres Glaubens, . . . , neu herausgegeben von den Brüdern in Amerika (Berne, 1902). This edition was probably edited by John Horsch, who lived in Berne at that time, and who had been in close contact with Elias Walter, the leading Hutterite elder of that period. (3) A reprint from the copy in the British Museum in 1938 by the Society of Brothers (Plough Publishing House in England); (4) an English translation, Account of our Religion, Doctrine and Faith, . . ., published by Hodder and Stoughton (London) in conjunction with the Plough Publishing House in 1950, 283 pages. The English translation is by Kathleen E. Hasenberg. In this edition the nearly 1,800 Bible references are all collected in a special appendix of nearly 38 pages (229-66). (See Riedemann.) R.F.

Besides all major treatments of the Hutterites such as those by Loserth, Wolkan, Horsch, etc., see Franz Heimann, "The Hutterite Doctrine of the Church and the Common Life: A Study of Peter Riedemann's Confession of Faith of 1540," in MQR XXVI (1952) 22-47 and 142-60 (doctoral dissertation, University of Vienna, 1927, translated by Robert Friedmann); Robert Friedmann, "Peter Riedemann on Original Sin and the Way of Redemption," MQR XXVI (1952) 210-15; W. Wiswedel, "Peter Riedemann, ein Gefangener Jesu Christi," in his Bilder I, 169-94; Lydia Müller, ML III, 500-5.

Rechlinger, Ulrich: see Rehlinger, Ulrich.

Rechperger, Henslin, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death with several other Anabaptists at Ipfhofen in Middle Franconia, Germany, in January 1528. (Wappler, Thüringen, 36 and 283; ML III, 433.) NEFF.

Reck-Malleczewen, Friedrich (1884-1945), a German literary figure, was born at Malleczewen, Lyck district of East Prussia, on the Russian border, descended from an old landed family, studied medicine, but also lived in the world of music, literature, and history. After an extended tour of America in 1912 he settled in Stuttgart and later in Munich and in the Chiemgau of Upper Bavaria. In 1925 he made a journey to Africa. "In 1933 he joined the Catholic Church, which seemed to him the last bulwark against increasing brutalization and impersonalization." In despair he wrote Bockelson, Geschichte eines Massenwahns (Berlin, 1937, and Wiesentheid, 1946), a belletristic historical study based on the Münster revolt of 1534 f. (see Jan van Leyden). It is hardly surprising that in his view of the Münsterite (q.v.) "kingdom" as the preview of the Nazi regime he saw in Anabaptism only fanatical chaos and spiritual disease which resulted in maniacal behavior. The treatment is based on some older works, viz., the source work, Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster, the collection of documents by Niesert and Neudecker, Löffler's collection of documents, contemporary presentations such as Hamelmann, Bolandus, and Dorpius, and six contemporary reports. More recent works used by Reck-Malleczewen were those of Fässer (1852), Ranke's history of Germany, and unpublished letters in the archives at Cassel. Recent material, which must have been available in Munich in 1937, is untouched. Reck believed that all revolution has the same source, in alienation from native culture and real religion, and that as the Münsterite revolution resulted in catastrophe, so the Nazi revolution would follow the same course. Hitler he viewed as a parallel to Bockelson. Reck was taken to the Dachau concentration camp on Dec. 31, 1944, and died there without trial or sentence on Feb. 17, 1945. E.C.

Mary E. Bender, "The Anabaptist Theme in Modern German Literature, unpublished Master's thesis, Indiana University, 1958; ML III, 438.

Reconstruction Work in France. During World War I, as early as November 1914, English Quakers had begun reconstruction work in war-devastated areas of France. In April 1917, the month in which the United States entered the war, the American Friends Service Committee was organized at Philadelphia, Pa. In June a commission of investigation was sent to France following which an AFSC reconstruction unit was set up under the general direction of the civilian service of the American Red Cross.

In July 1917 a unit of 100 men, including one Mennonite, was gathered at Haverford, Pa., to be trained for the French service. It was the hope of the AFSC that this service would be recognized by the War Department as noncombatant service. On Sept. 4, 1917, 54 of the Haverford unit men, including the Mennonite, started for France, with the understanding that any men subject to the draft could be called back. In March 1918 the War Department declined to recognize the project for purposes of assignment, but Congress enacted the "furlough law" providing that men in the army might be furloughed for other essential work. The War Department now applied this law to the CO's and by the close of the war 1,300 CO's in the army had been recommended for furlough, of whom 200 (including a number of Mennonites) were assigned to the AFSC.

In January 1918 the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers (MC) took official action to support the AFSC project in France and began processing Mennonite applicants for this service. By the close of the war (Nov. 11, 1918) less than a dozen Mennonites had arrived in France, but after the armistice the men were processed more rapidly, and eventually 54 Mennonites joined the AFSC reconstruction unit, a number of them following release from prison at Fort Leavenworth. Those who had gone to France as furloughed soldiers were given their discharges at discharge camps in France and then continued with the AFSC as civilians.

The French reconstruction work was located in the region between Verdun and Paris, which for four years was ravaged by the constant moving back and forth of the opposing armies. The earlier work was concentrated in the Marne region west of the Argonne Forest. In 1919, when the Mennonites began to arrive, the AFSC center shifted to Clermont-en-Argonne at the edge of the Meuse-Argonne battle front west of Verdun. Here the AFSC medical work centered in a Catholic hospital in the city which had been taken over by the army and was largely ruined by shell fire. The AFSC rebuilt the hospital and operated an inpatient and outpatient service.

In 1919-20 the AFSC headquarters were located at Grange-le-Compte, an estate near Clermont-en-Argonne. From Grange-le-Compte and its subsidiary warehouse refugees and war sufferers were supplied with food, clothing, and various forms of first aid. An important part of the work was the construction of temporary prefabricated housing for the homeless; in many cases whole villages had been wiped out. Before the Mennonites arrived the Quakers had built 543 such homes and repaired others in the Marne-Somme area. In 1919 the AFSC was assigned 40 villages in the Verdun area and later the assignment was enlarged. In the village of Neuville, where a number of Mennonites were stationed, 70 houses were built. In comparison with other areas the AFSC construction work advanced the return of the refugees to their villages by at least a year.

The AFSC agricultural department introduced machinery to restore ruined land to cultivation, and distributed young fruit trees, rabbits, chickens, goats, sheep, bees, and hatching eggs to enable farmers to begin their work. When the French program ended on April 1, 1920, most of the Mennonites had been with the service a year and a very few two years. Several gave additional service with the AFSC in other parts of Europe. (See Relief.)

In the summer of 1919 S. E. Allgyer and Vernon Smucker visited the French project as representatives of the MRCWS. They visited the various work units, held religious services with the Mennonite men on a number of successive Sundays, and on June 20-22 attended a conference of Mennonite reconstruction workers at Clermont-en-Argonne. Smucker then sailed for home on July 6, while Allgyer spent two weeks with the French and Alsatian Mennonites. He then went to Paris with A. J. Miller, J. C. Meyer, and J. Roy Allgyer, where from July 30 to August 2 they interviewed a number of government officials and relief administrators including Herbert Hoover of the Allied Food Commission regarding further opportunities for relief work in Europe. Allgyer sailed for home on August 9 and following his report the MRCWS appointed A. J. Miller and J. Roy Allgyer to investigate further relief needs in Europe, and these two men named A. E. Hiebert as the third member of the committee.

A significant outcome of the Mennonite work in France was the visits of reconstruction workers and of S. E. Allgyer with the French and Alsatian Mennonites. Pierre Sommer (q.v.) at the conference at Clermont-en-Argonne in June 1919 appealed for help from America in rebuilding the scattered Mennonite congregations in France. The conference then asked the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC at Elkhart) to "consider the advisability of rendering to these churches such personal help as could be given in this their time of great need." In addition, S. E. Allgyer was also asked to present this matter to the Mission Board personally. It was not until 1927, however, that the Board took action in this matter.

The French reconstruction work represents a significant event in recent Mennonite history. The young men who served in the project regarded the manner in which the church supported the new relief program as "the crucial test of her sincerity" with respect to nonresistance and they believed that "the future of the church is closely related to the present problem of reconstruction." In evaluating the Mennonite contribution to the AFSC program Rufus M. Jones said: "The young men stood the test of the [military] camps with insight and with much bravery. They had the backing of their church and they were conscious that they were its standard bearers. They became closely united in fellowship with our men in the camps and they shared with them the desire to make a positive contribution to service abroad. . . . They were excellent workers and they brought a fine spirit of devotion and co-operation to the mission." The American Mennonites contributed a total of $291,000 for the support of the French reconstruction work.

Out of the experience of the Mennonite (MC) workers in France came the stimulus for the initiation of the Young People's conference (q.v.), a forward-looking movement in the Mennonite Church (MC). G.F.H.

Rufus M. Jones, A Service of Love in Wartime: American Friends Relief Work in Europe, 1916-1919 (New York, 1920); Report of General Conference of Mennonites in France in Reconstruction Work (June 20-22, 1919) (n.p., n.d.).

Recreation: see Amusements and Holidays.

Red Moon Mennonite Mission Church (GCM): see Hammon Cheyenne Mennonite Church.

Red River Valley Mennonite Church (MC), located in Casselton, Cass Co., N.D., is a member of the North Central Conference. In the spring of 1928 the families of I. S. Mast and Daniel L. Martin, now a minister in Sheldon, Wis., moved into this community. The following spring several families moved in from Nebraska, and on June 19, 1929, the congregation was organized with 15 charter members. I. S. Mast was chosen as pastor. In 1942 Mast left the district; the congregation was without a resident pastor until July 27, 1947, when Abraham J. Stoll was ordained, who was still serving in 1956, with a membership of 47. A.J.S.

Red River Valley Mutual Insurance Company of Altona, Man., was founded in 1941 as a private commercial mutual insurance agency, which took over some of the members of the former Mennonite Church fire insurance association in the West Reserve, which had been founded in 1900 as a break-away from the East Reserve association (see Canada and States Mennonite Insurance Association), but which had had its own "insurance elder" under the East Reserve plan since the original settlement in the West Reserve in 1875. The remaining members continued in the Manitoba Mennonite Mutual Insurance Company (q.v.) with headquarters at Steinbach, Man., which was incorporated in 1940, one year earlier. The Red River Company, which does not restrict its patrons to Mennonites as does the Manitoba Mutual, but serves the general public (although the majority of its policyholders are still Mennonites), had 5,800 policyholders in 1955, with about $37,000,000 property coverage. Approximately one third of its 5,520 members were members of the Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde, q.v.). D.P.R.

Red Run Mennonite Church (MC), near Denver, Pa., formerly called Martin's, a member of the Lancaster Conference, in 1957 had a membership of 50, but actually was considered a sub-congregation of Bowmansville (q.v.) and served by the ministry of that congregation. A Sunday school was conducted here 1912-27 in the Martin's Schoolhouse between Fivepointville and Terre Hill by the Weaverland (q.v.) congregation, and thereafter preaching once a month until in June 1946, when the Sunday school was reopened. More recently preaching services have been held every two weeks. I.D.L.

Red Run Mennonite Church (MC), Grantsville, Md., established in 1947, is a mission in the Allegheny Mennonite Conference. In 1957 it had a membership of 15, with Vernon Yoder as pastor.

Red Top Mennonite Church (MC), located 30 miles north of Glendive, Mont., and 5 miles east of Bloomfield, a member of the North Central Conference, was organized in March 1917 with 18 charter members. Services were held in a little red top schoolhouse. With increased membership came the need of a church building and a pastor. The new church was dedicated on April 12, 1936. The 1957 membership was 68, with Elmer Borntrager as minister. L.B.

Red Well Mennonite Mission (MC), now extinct, located on the western fringe of Welsh Mountain, Lancaster Co., Pa., was opened in 1896 with John R. Buckwalter and John H. Hershey as superintendents. When they moved to Missouri, John Musselman and Amos H. Hershey became the next superintendents. In 1899 a large frame meetinghouse was built for the growing congregation. The first Sunday-school Meeting held in Lancaster County met here on Nov. 22, 1904. This was the first evangelistic field for John W. Weaver in 1909. The highest membership was 65. By 1929 the members had moved away, and the work was consolidated with the Welsh Mountain (q.v.) Samaritan Home, the building itself being razed to enlarge the Home. Recently a cottage meeting has been conducted in the neighborhood. I.D.L.

Redemptioners, a term used to denote immigrants to the United States who "redeemed" their fare by working for it upon arrival. Usually, upon landing in Philadelphia, Pa., they were auctioned off. An adult usually had to work four or five years to pay off the debt, and a child until he reached the age of 21. Many Mennonites came to America as redemptioners. E.C.

C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950) 543 f.; ML III, 438.

Rediger, Joseph (1826-1904), a minister of the Defenseless Mennonite Church, was born in Lembach, Baden, Germany, the son of Jakob and Veronica Rediger. Jakob came to America in 1834, living in a log hut near Peoria, Ill. Joseph visited him there and returned to Germany to help the rest of the family emigrate. With his mother, two brothers, three sisters, and a number of others he arrived in America and settled near Peoria. Joseph married Veronica Oyer (d. 1872) in 1850. Five sons and eight daughters were born to them. Their youngest son, Benjamin, served long as chairman of the Board of Directors of Salem Children's Home. In 1876 Joseph married Anna Oyer (d. 1897).

Joseph Rediger was received into the Mennonite Church (MC) at age of sixteen and chosen minister in 1863. After a period of service as minister he joined with Bishop Henry Egly and his newly formed Defenseless Mennonite Church in efforts to spread the Gospel. He started the Waldo (now Gridley) church and traveled extensively with Egly in Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri, also visiting churches in Ohio and Indiana. Rediger was one of the pioneers in the Defenseless Mennonite Church to promote foreign missions. In his later years he lived at Meadows, where he died on March 8, 1904. He was buried in the Waldo cemetery.

E.E.R.

Reed City Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located near Reed City, Osceola Co., Mich., was organized in the late 1870's. At first the small group of about 30 members was ministered to by John Holdeman, Mark Seiler, and Frank Seidner from Ohio. Later Jacob Litwiller, Dan Buerge, and Peter Yost became their local leaders, and held regular Sunday morning worship services. In 1883 some members moved to other congregations. The church was revived under the leadership of ministers Peter Litwiller and F. C. Fricke, but they too and others relocated with other congregations. Meetings ceased in 1914. P.G.H.

Reeder, Hermann (dates of birth and death not known), a Mennonite minister in the Palatinate in the 19th century, concerning whose life few particulars have been discovered. He probably stemmed from non-Mennonite parents, but he is reported to have been reared by Mennonites and to have been baptized by a preacher Dahlem (letter by David Kaeg of Offstein to Johannes Galle of Monzernheim, Jan. 1, 1836). He was educated in a Baptist seminary in England, and was then ordained as an elder by Dahlem. This Dahlem is apparently not Valentin Dahlem (q.v.) of Rosenköppel, since there is no mention of this ordination in Dahlem's letters although he casually mentions Reeder.

For a time Reeder served in the small congregation of Neuwied (q.v.). Having had his attention directed to the Palatinate by the Baptist preacher Angas (q.v.), he visited the Mennonite congregations there, and preached sermons to deepen the spiritual life and cultivate the newly awakened missionary spirit. There is definite information on a visit by Reeder to the Weierhof (q.v.) in August 1832, when he was given money collected for the Baptist mission. A letter written by Reeder on Sept. 22, 1832, to Jakob Krehbiel (q.v.) indicated he was already considering moving to the Weierhof. However, housing difficulties frustrated this plan.

In 1835 the Weierhof congregation decided to extend a formal call to Reeder, and thus acquired its first professional and trained minister, though not without opposition from the conservative element led by Johannes Galle (q.v.) of Monzernheim. Reeder lived for a time in Kirchheimbolanden, four miles distant.

In a short time Reeder succeeded in reviving the congregation, so that both the inner and outer growth were soon evident. In two years (1837) the new, larger church was built, modeled externally after a Baptist meetinghouse in Tottenham, England, which Reeder had doubtless seen. Much of the cost of the building was raised by Reeder himself on a tour via Elberfeld to England.

In 1836 Reeder also took charge of the Uffhofen (q.v.) congregation near Alzey, which had almost disintegrated. His first sermon there, delivered on March 6, 1836, was printed and distributed in the interest of the Weierhof church. Reeder built a parsonage at Weierhof out of his own funds, including a barn, which he used in farming as a secondary source of income. He is thought to have been the first to use a team of horses at Weierhof. He also set up a sort of boarding home for young Englishmen in his home and engaged a tutor for them. By means of these supplementary sources of income Reeder was probably finally able to support himself without the rather small salary at first offered him by the congregation, returning the money for the education of Michael Löwenberg (q.v.), who was to be his successor.

Reeder left Weierhof in 1848 or 1849, apparently on account of the disturbances of the German revolution of that year. It is not known whether or not he accepted another pastorate. At any rate he was still living at Bad Kreuznach in 1853 with his wife, Therese Keetman. He apparently had no children. In 1852 he sold his property in Weierhof to Johannes Kaegy, and in 1853 he gave the Weierhof congregation a gift of 400 guilders. Most of this money came from the sale of his book, Predigten an Festtagen und bei besonderen Veranlassungen, gehalten von Herm. Reeder, Prediger der Taufgesinnten-Gemeine Weyerhof, which was printed, perhaps gratis, by Karl Tauchnitz (q.v.) at Leipzig in 1842. (ML III, 439 f.) P.S.

Reedley, Cal., a city (pop. 5,683) situated in Fresno County, approximately midway between Los Angeles and San Francisco, in the center of the rich San Joaquin Valley. The combined Mennonite membership within the Reedley shopping area is approximately 2,000. The community has Mennonite Brethren, General Conference Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and a few Krimmer Mennonite Brethren who attend church near Dinuba. The Mennonites have settled all around Reedley, with a lesser concentration across the river to the west. Of the G.C.M. families, 134 live in the country and 219 in the city. Of the M.B. families one third operate farms and business, while two thirds are wage earners or retired.

The M.B. congregation was organized with 11 charter members on June 12, 1905. The present church, dedicated on May 4, 1952, seats 2,200. The membership in 1957 was 1,436. The G.C.M. church was organized on June 10, 1906, with 25 charter members. The membership in 1957 was 593; this represents a slight decline due to the recent organization of the G.C.M. church in Fresno. The E.M.B. church, with 36 members, was dedicated May 26, 1952.

Important Mennonite institutions in Reedley include the Mennonite Brethren Home for the Aged with 52 guests and the Immanuel Bible Academy with an enrollment of 220. Kings View Homes, the West Coast Mennonite Central Committee psychiatric hospital, is located near Reedley.

Reedley is a rich fruit-growing center. Its soil and water conditions grow citrus fruits, plums, peaches, grapes, tomatoes, celery, and nuts, to name only a few products. Up to 4,400 carloads of fruits and vegetables have been shipped in a year from its group of packing houses. Reedley is called the "world's fruit basket." It serves a trading area of approximately 20,000. A.J.

Arnold C. Ewy, "Grape and Raisin Industry," Menn. Life V (October 1950) 4.

Reedley Bible School: see Immanuel Academy.

Reedley (Cal.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, called Grace Church, was started in 1950 as a conference-subsidized congregation. In 1957 it had 30 members, with C. A. Wall as pastor. Its church building was dedicated in 1952. H.S.B.

Reedley First Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Pacific District Conference, had its beginning in 1903, when Daniel T. Eymann and a few other families came to Reedley through the Santa Fe Immigration Department to look over its possibilities. In June 1906 the Mennonites who had settled in Reedley organized a congregation. In 1908 the first meetinghouse was erected, which was enlarged in 1914 and remodeled in 1944. The membership of 593 consists largely of immigrants from South Germany and from Russia and their descendants. A majority at the present time live in the country and are fruit farmers, although many live in Reedley. Ministers who have served the congregation since its beginning are H. J. Krehbiel, J. M. Regier, J. H. Langenwalter, P. K. Regier, and Aaron J. Epp, the present pastor (1957). P.K.R.

The First Mennonite Church (1906-1956), Reedley, California. Fiftieth Anniversary Program and a Brief History of the Church.

Reedley Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Reedley, Fresno Co., Cal., in the fertile San Joaquin Valley, a member of the Pacific District, was organized June 12, 1905, under the leadership of D. T. Enns, whose family had come with others from the Middle West to settle in the area. The church of less than 20 charter members has grown to a membership of 1,436 in 1957, the largest Mennonite congregation in the Western Hemisphere of any branch. In 1907 a building with a seating capacity of approximately 150 was constructed, enlarged in 1910 to seat 300 and in 1919 to 1,200. In 1952 a fireproof structure with 2,000 seats was built. The membership, which is 30 per cent urban and 70 per cent rural, migrated from Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, and Minnesota, approximately 100 coming from Russia. The church is well organized in all phases of church work. It practices footwashing. Pastors who have served the congregation are D. T. Enns, Abr. Buhler, Johann Berg, D. C. Eitzen, G. B. Huebert, J. B. Toews; Dan Friesen was serving as pastor in 1957, with H. R. Wiens as assistant pastor. J.J.T.

Reekalf, Goossen Jansz, a burgomaster of Amsterdam in 1535, was kindly disposed to the Anabaptists in this town, though he was not an Anabaptist himself. In May 1535 he took stern measures to stop the assault of the small group of revolutionary Anabaptists on the city hall in Amsterdam. (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 177, 179.) vDZ.

Reense (Rhenense, Rhijnse) Veen: see Veenendaal.

Rees, a town (1944 pop. 4,792) on the Lower Rhine, in the duchy of Cleve (q.v.), Germany, in which there was formerly a Mennonite congregation. Little is known concerning this church and its history, since the church records were not preserved. Mention is made of a Mennonite congregation in Rees as early as 1570 in a letter by Hans Buschaert. On May 1, 1591, Louijsz Boudewijns, very likely a Flemish immigrant, signed the Concept of Cologne (q.v.) for the Rees congregation. Until 1680 it was an independent congregation with preachers, deacons, and elders. On Aug. 6, 1680, Jakob Welsing of Rees married Helene van Voorst, the daughter of the minister of the Emmerich congregation. Later the congregation gave up a measure of its independence, for although Jakob Welsing is named as the preacher of Rees, its baptisms and most of its marriages were solemnized at Emmerich (q.v.). The congregation later became independent again for a time. The Naamlijst of 1731 names the following as preachers of Rees: Harmen Leendertz from 1707, Pieter Koenders 1727, Isaac Welsing(g)k 1727; the Naamlijst of 1743 states that these three preachers had died, Hendrik Welsing being the only preacher of the Rees congregation at that time. He served until 1761-62 and was the last preacher of Rees. The Emmerich records for this period contain no entries concerning Rees. On Feb. 11, 1738, Rees purchased a house and land on Deelstrasse, sold the house, and built a church on the site of the barn (archives of the town of Rees). At that time it was one of the small Mennonite congregations. In 1721 its share of the recruiting fee levied on the six Mennonite congregations of Cleve-Mark was fixed at 10 per cent of the total. In 1752 certain Rees members were again mentioned in the Emmerich church records. The membership continued to decline, and died out in the first half of the 19th century. The church on Deelstrasse stood until the end of 1944.

The Mennonite families in Rees in the 18th century were Rave(ns), Welsing, Korsten, Leenders (Leendertz, q.v.), Braakman, van Zutphen. Some were buried in the Protestant cemetery, and the rest in the Catholic cemetery. W.N., vdz.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); the letter by Hans Busschaert was published by Karel Vos in Bulletin de la Commission Royale d'Histoire de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 384 f.; Naamlijst 1731, 1743, 1755, 1757, 1759; Mennonitisches Adressbuch (Karlsruhe, 1936) 45, 74; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2571, 2850; ML III, 440.

Reesch: see Resch.

Reesema, a Mennonite family in the Netherlands: see Sieuwertsz van Reesema.

Reesor: see also Risser.

Reesor, Christian (1833-1915), an Old Order Mennonite leader, was born in Markham Twp., York Co., Ont., on April 16, 1833, the son of John Eby Reesor, a Mennonite preacher, and Maria Burkholder. His home was on the site of the present Reesor (Wisler) Mennonite Church. His brothers Simeon and Noah were older; Benjamin and Susanna (Diller) were younger. He farmed directly south of Cedar Grove in Scarboro. His first marriage, in 1856, was to Esther (1838-68), daughter of John Hoover. His second marriage, in 1885, was to Rebecca Miller (1837-1917), of Pennsylvania. He was ordained minister in 1863 and bishop in 1867. In the schism of 1889 in Ontario he allied himself with bishops Abraham Martin of Waterloo and Christian Gayman of Cayuga. This was the beginning of Old Order Mennonites in Ontario. Christian Reesor died Dec. 26, 1915. One of his sons was Thomas Reesor (q.v.). J.C.F.

Reesor, Thomas (1867-1954), Mennonite immigration leader, was born March 18, 1867, on the old homestead in York County, Ont., the fourth child of Christian Reesor (q.v.) and Esther Hoover. In 1891 he married Adeline, the daughter of Joseph and Diana Grove. They had five children. Thomas was ordained to the ministry in 1916. He helped to organize the Non-Resistant Relief Organization of Ontario and assisted conscientious objectors in 1917-18. In 1924 he aided Russian immigrants in finding homes, and in 1925, employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway, he acquired land from the government for a settlement of Russian Mennonites in northern Ontario, west of Cochrane. This point, Reesor Station, flourished, growing to a population of 150 by 1935, but then deteriorated as the urban centers and frontiers expanded. Thomas Reesor died March 20, 1954. He was an Old Order Mennonite of the Markham branch. J.C.F.

Reesor Old Order Mennonite Church, located on the border between York and Ontario counties, Ont., formed a single congregation with the Altona group until 1956. In 1911 its membership was 46. A meetinghouse built in 1857 on the farm of the preacher John E. Reesor became the possession of the Wisler group at the time of the division in 1889.

In 1957 Fred Nighswander was the minister and the combined membership with Altona was 105. E.C.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Markham, 1935) 119 f., 197-200, with picture of meetinghouse; ML III, 521.

Reesor United Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located at Cochrane, Ont., was organized in May 1927 by Jacob H. Janzen. The settlement was situated along the Trans-Canada Highway, where Mennonite refugees from Russia in 1925 took up homesteads in the woods. It was organized in the traditional Russian Mennonite manner, with Toews as district man, Rempel as Schulze (q.v.), Penner and Lepp as ministers, and Heidebrecht as schoolteacher. The settlement prospered at first, reaching a membership of 75 in 1932, but declined rapidly during the depression. The congregation was dissolved on Jan. 5, 1948, most of the families having moved away. The congregation was named after Thomas Reesor (q.v.), who aided in establishing it. J.C.T.

Reformed Amish Christian Church (Christliche), an independent Mennonite congregation located 4 miles northwest of Berne, Ind., listed in H. P. Kriebel's Mennonite Churches of North America as having 69 members in 1911. It had divided from the Old Order Amish group in Adams County sometime earlier. The ministers then were David Schwartz, Jacob J. Schwartz, and Daniel Mazelin. The group was dissolved in 1952. M.G.

Reformed Authors against Mennonitism in the Netherlands. When the war of independence (Eighty Years' War) of the Dutch against Spain broke out in 1568, the power of the Catholic Church in the Netherlands collapsed with the overthrow of Spanish domination. This meant at the same time a rapid rise of Calvinism in this country. The Calvinists did not persecute and execute the Mennonites as the Catholics had done, but the Calvinists were also far from tolerant. They persistently tried to influence the government to restrain the Mennonites, for example, by prohibiting their meetings. Moreover they published many books of warning against Mennonite teachings and of opposition to their views.

Preceded by such authors as John à Lasco (q.v.) and Martin Micron (q.v.), who attacked Menno Simons, it was Guy de Brez (q.v.) who made a first major attack on the Mennonites with his book La Racine, source et fondement des Anabaptistes (1565), of which a Dutch translation appeared in 1570 (reprinted 1589, 1608) with the title De Wortel, den oorspronck ende het fundament der Wederdooperen. As his sources de Brez mentions Calvin, à Lasco, and Heinrich Bullinger. His arguments against the Mennonites are as follows: they originated in the heresy of Jan van Leyden (q.v.) and Münster; they have false ideas on baptism, the oath, and the magistracy. In the introduction de Brez argues that the Mennonites (de Brez always calls them Wederdoopers or Anabaptists, i.e., "rebaptizers") are recognizable by three distinguishing marks: (a) they have a remarkable knowledge of the Scriptures ("it seems that they have eaten the Bible"), by which they deceive and seduce the simple people; (b) they teach that their faith is proved by their good conduct, but "can a good life outweigh a bad faith?"; (c) they impress the people by their patient endurance of suffering, torture, and death; but this does not prove that their faith is from God, because it is "not the pain and death that make the martyr, but the cause for which he suffers"; only those who suffer and die for the truth are real martyrs, for "they suffer for the sake of Christ, which the Anabaptists do not do, because they are suffering for the doctrine of Antichrist." The magistrates should not tolerate the Anabaptists, even though to all appearance they are peaceful at the present time. Their history at Münster and Amsterdam and their ungodly doctrines reveal their real face. Menno Simons is a hypocrite; if he and his followers had a chance, they would conduct themselves as outrageously as their predecessors had done.

De Brez's arguments and his bitterly hostile tone became dominant for a large number of polemic writings by Reformed authors, of which only the most outstanding or influential publications are listed here: Caspar Heidanus (q.v.), Cort en claar Bewys van de h. doop (1581); Jean Taffin (q.v.), Onderwysinghe teghen de dualinghen der Wederdoopers (1590); Marnix van Sint Aldegonde (q.v.), Ondersoeckinge . . . der Geestdrijverische Leere . . . der Wederdooperen (1595); Herman Moded (q.v.), Grondich bericht van de eerste beghinselen der Wederdoopsche Seckten (1603); Hermann Faukelius (q.v.), Babel, dat is verweringhe der wederdooperen onder malcanderen (1621); Johannes Cloppenburch (q.v.), Gangraena Theologiae Anabaptisticae, dat is: Cancker van de leere der Wederdooperen (1625; Latin editions 1645, 1656); Doorelaer (q.v.) and Austro-Sylvius (q.v.), Grondige en klare Vertooninghe van het onderscheydt in de voornaemste hoofdstucken der Christelijcke Religie, tuschen De Gereformeerde ende de Wederdooperen (1637, repr. 1649; this work was composed on the instigation of the Reformed Synod of North Holland); Petrus Bontemps (q.v.), Kort Bewijs van de menighvuldighe doolingen der Wederdoopers ofte Mennisten (1641, repr. 1653, 1661); Fredericus Spanhemius (F. Spannheim, Sr. q.v.), Variae disputationes anti-anabaptisticae (1643-48); Johannes Hoornbeek (q.v.), Summa controversiarum religionis (1653, repr. 1697); Christiaan Schotanus (q.v.), Van de Gronden der Mennisterij (1671; against van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror); Fredericus Spanhemius (F. Spannheim, Jr., q.v.), Controversiarum de Religione Elenchus historico-theologicus (1687, repr. 1694 and 1757).

These books were countered by Mennonite authors. Menno Simons wrote against à Lasco and Micron. Outstanding polemics by Mennonite authors were as follows: Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.), Declaratio (1600); Claes Claesz (q.v.), Bekentenisse van de voornaemste Stucken des Christelijcken Gheloofs (against Faukelius; 1624, repr. 1650); Anthoni Jacobsz (q.v.) Roscius, Babel d.i. Verweringhe der Kinderdooperen onder malcanderen (against Faukelius; 1626); Joost Hendricksz (q.v.), Wederlegginge van de Argumenten, voor- gesteld door P. Bontemps (1643); E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.), Brief aan den Heer F. Spanhemius (1693, repr. 1693, 1700); Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), Verdediging der Christenen, die Doopsgezinde genaamd worden (against Spannheim, Jr. 1699); Herman Schijn, Korte Historie der protestante Christenen, die men Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden noemt (1711), and other works by Schijn.

In the 18th century a few of these Reformed polemic books were reprinted, but no new polemics by Reformed authors against Mennonitism were published. The Reformed Church had grown more tolerant, though there was still a hidden aversion among the Calvinists against the Mennonites, as is shown by the novels by Wolff and Deken (q.v.), and occasionally by some Reformed writings. Even in the 19th century, as late as 1883, Abraham Kuiper, a Calvinist divine, who in 1886 had separated from the main Dutch Reformed Church to found a separate Reformed church, warned his followers in an introduction to a new edition of Adriaen Haemstede's (q.v.) martyr book against using the wrong martyr book, i.e., that of van Braght.

Occasionally the antiquated and historically wrong perception of the descent of the Mennonites from the Münsterites is still found in modern Reformed books, but better information by such Reformed historians as L. Knappert and J. Lindeboom has cleared away false interpretations. Besides this the growing ecumenical movement has opened the way for better mutual understanding. (See also Historiography IV: Netherlands.) vbZ.

Reformed Mennonite Church, a body founded in 1812 by John Herr (q.v.), of Strasburg, Lancaster Co., Pa., the son of Francis Herr, who had been a member of the Mennonite Church in West Lampeter Twp., Lancaster Co., but had been expelled for reasons no longer clear, probably about 1798. According to the son John Herr and Daniel Musser, chief historian of the later Reformed Mennonite Church and himself a member, Francis gave as his reason for leaving the church the fact that the Mennonites had departed far from the beliefs and practices of their founder Menno Simons and that the church leaders had become too lax in disciplining those members who had become careless in their religious life and social practices. The small group of sympathizers who had been expelled or had withdrawn from fellowship with the old church with Francis, finding no church with which they felt they could affiliate, and desiring to continue as Mennonites, continued to meet in their various homes for informal religious services consisting of praying, singing, and exhortations in which each took part, though Francis Herr was apparently the chief exhorter. Francis also preached the funeral sermons for members of the group. He always spoke in a sitting position, however, since he felt that only a regular ordained minister could properly speak while standing and preferably before a pulpit. These meetings had not gone beyond the informal state at the time of his death in 1810.

After the death of Francis, the son John Herr, 28 years old at the time, and before this not a member of any church but probably one of the informal group above mentioned, now assumed leadership of the group and continued his father's cause. It was not his intention at this time to start a separate church, but on May 30, 1812, at a meeting in his home, he was selected as pastor and bishop of a new church organization, even though not yet baptized. In this dilemma, the group followed the only course possible, and like the first two members of the original Anabaptist church in Zürich, Switzerland, in 1525, who baptized each other, so too Abraham Landis, who as a former member of the Mennonite Church had already been baptized, but now no longer regarded this baptism as valid, baptized John Herr, who in turn rebaptized Landis. The new group called itself Mennonite, the only "true" Mennonite Church. By others, however, in order to distinguish them from the old church they were sometimes spoken of as "New" Mennonites, occasionally merely as "Herrites" and later as Reformed Mennonites, which latter term finally became the official name of this group.

The new Reformed Mennonite movement began almost as a family affair. In addition to a few of Francis Herr's old associates, John's wife, five sisters, and three brothers-in-law, some of whom had never been members of their father's church, formed the first organized church. John Herr, who possessed some ability as a public speaker and writer, with a rather wide knowledge in church history, now began an aggressive campaign in behalf of his father's cause and his own religious views, and soon had organized a number of small congregations in Lancaster and several of the surrounding counties, as well as in several of the neighboring states. But with his death in 1850 expansion of the movement practically ceased. It is probable that it never reached a baptized membership exceeding 2,500 at any time.

John Herr wrote a number of books, in which he freely expressed his own religious views and especially assailed the old church in strong terms, insisting as his father had done before him that it was a "dead" church, and claiming that the Mennonite Church of that day had departed far from the traditions and practices of the original teachings and practices of Menno Simons. "Back to Menno" might well be called a fitting slogan of the new movement. Herr says, "So far as the evening is from the morning, of darkness from light, are [the Mennonites] separated from our first reformer's doctrine, or the community of Christ." Musser in the same strain says, "Those who departed from the distinctive features of Menno's profession are not fairly entitled to the name Mennonite."

Among the "carnal" practices of Mennonites of that day censured by the Herr following were voting at elections and taking part in political campaigns, foolish talking and jesting, attending county fairs, observing race-ridings, excessive drinking, and especially the failure of many members to observe footwashing and avoidance of excommunicated members and the kiss of peace, and laxity on the part of the elders in admitting members and in disciplining unfaithful members.

The following statement of the doctrines, practices, and attitudes of the Reformed Mennonite Church in 1958 has been supplied by two present bishops of the church in Lancaster County, Pa., Jacob L. Kreider and J. Henry Fisher, both of Lancaster City.

"The Reformed Mennonites are a small body of people who adhere to the doctrines and principles of love taught in the New Testament, and practiced by true Christians in all ages since the church was established on the day of Pentecost. They are not a part or branch of any other organization. They believe that Menno Simons, from whom they derive their name, and with whose teachings they are in full agreement, was not a founder of the original Church of Christ. Likewise, John Herr, who in 1812 helped to organize the group now known as Reformed Mennonites, did not establish a new church. It was under his leadership that a number of persons, who could not at that time find an organization which they felt sincerely carried out the teachings of the New Testament, were drawn together to worship, and subsequently organized into church fellowship.

"The Reformed Mennonites believe the church is the effect of the power of the Holy Spirit, that there could be no true Christian organization without it, and that the continuity and succession of the church is dependent on the presence and guidance of God's Holy Spirit. They do not believe outward forms of religion can save anyone, but that the divine power or principle begotten within the soul by the combined influence of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit will result in repentance, regeneration, and a hope of salvation, bringing about love, unity, and peace among believers. Without love and unity in the church, the Reformed Mennonites feel it would be impossible to keep the commandments and observe the ordinances given by Christ. They practice adult baptism upon faith and the evidences of a consistent life, believing that baptism is an outward symbol of the spiritual baptism within the heart. Their communion, too, is closed, for to them communion signifies not only fellowship between God and the believer, but also with one another.

"They carry out the plain commandment of laboring with an erring one as explained in Matthew 18:15-17, even to the extent of applying the ban when there is evidence that the spiritual life has been lost, so that the church may be kept pure, and with the hope that such a one may become sensible of his situation, and penitently return to the Lord. The Reformed Mennonites believe this labor is a duty devolving not alone upon the ministry, but also upon each individual member of the church. This labor of love, as well as the original washing of regeneration and the daily need of forgiveness by the Lord, is exemplified for them by the ordinance of footwashing, which is participated in by all the members of the church. The laity, as well as the ministry, also 'greet one another with the kiss of charity.'

"The Reformed Mennonites are entirely non-resistant and do not sue at law. They ask to be excused from military service; for this reason they do not vote or hold any office in government. They believe Christians are called out from the worldly kingdom into Christ's kingdom in nonconformity to the world. They try to live in simplicity, abhor strife, contention, and worldliness. Their manner of dress is plain, and the women wear a head covering at all times as commanded in I Corinthians 11:1-14. This head covering, as well as their clothing, is of generally uniform design throughout the church, both in the United States and Canada, where their congregations are located.

"They feel they cannot consistently and conscientiously participate in the worship of those who do not live in harmony with the doctrines of Christ, for in so doing, they would be bidding them God-speed, as taught in II John 10, 11. Because of love for the souls of all mankind, they would not want to encourage anyone in a course at variance with Christ's teachings, but by withdrawal from all divided religious services, quietly but earnestly and firmly testify to their belief that the power of God's Spirit will lead regenerated persons in unity and love and away from the saying of 'Lo here is Christ, and Lo there' manifest by the many professions of Christianity. They believe the Scriptures clearly indicate that there can be but one true Church of Christ in any one place because Christian love draws Christ's followers together into one, as was the case on the day of Pentecost. 'There is one body . . .' (Eph. 4:4-6)."

In methods of church work the Reformed Mennonites confine themselves principally to Sunday morning worship services, having no Sunday schools, young people's work, or mission work, although they cordially invite others to attend their services. Their ministers are selected by vote and serve without pay. They have the threefold ministry of bishops, ministers, and deacons. In 1958 there were five bishops in the United States and two in Canada. The church has remained relatively unchanged in doctrine, practice, forms of dress and worship, and organization since John Herr's death in 1850.

Their children, however, so long as they are not members of the church, are permitted and expected perhaps to live the normal life of the young people of the community, and are in no way limited in their political, social, or cultural contacts with the rest of the community. The radical transformation from this free and easy way of life to the rather rigid regulations of membership no doubt accounts partially for the fact that so few of the children of Reformed Mennonite parentage join the church of their fathers.

The Reformed Mennonites, though very strict and very conservative, live up to their convictions unusually well. In their daily life they are an upright people, honest, industrious, conscientious, law-abiding citizens. Their religious exclusiveness does not extend to their business enterprise except that there are no partnerships with nonmembers. In this field they are frequently unusually successful. Among those in their line of descent, though himself never a member, was the late Milton Snively Hershey (1857-1945), the Pennsylvania chocolate candy king, whose mother was a member. His grandfather, Abram Snively, was a bishop of the church 1830-67. In the professions open to them, such as medicine and dentistry, they also succeed above the average.

The membership of the Reformed Mennonites has manifested a steady decline apparently throughout the past fifty years at least and probably longer. The Census of 1906 reported in the United States 2,079 members, that of 1936 only 1,044; in 1958 there were only 616. In 1910 there were 34 congregations with 29 meetinghouses and 1,655 members according to the Census, but in 1958 there were only 19 congregations with 616 members. The United States Census of 1890 reports 34 congregations with 1,655 members.

The 1948 distribution of Reformed Mennonite congregations was as follows: United States, 24 meeting places with 733 members; Canada, 6 congregations with 217 members, a total of 950 members. In 1958 there were only 616 members in the United States and 211 in Canada. Following is a list of congregations in 1958, with (where known) year of founding, year of building of first meetinghouse, and membership: Pennsylvania, 10 with 309, in Lancaster County 5 meeting places (all within 20 miles of Lancaster City) with a total of 221 members as follows: Landisville (1869), Lancaster (1864), Longenecker's (1812), New Danville (1830), Shirk's near Brownstown (1889) (including former Denver and Steinmetz); other Pennsylvania locations—Hershey's near Hershey, Dauphin Co. (1833) 9, Worcester near Lansdale, Montgomery Co. (1864, meetinghouse 1890) 15, Falling Spring near Chambersburg, Franklin Co. (1841, 1847) 12, Middlesex near Carlisle, Cumberland Co. (1870) 28 (including former Plainfield, 1882 and former Winding Mill, 1870); Waynesboro, Franklin Co. (1827 beginning at Ringgold, Md., 1876 at Waynesboro) 24; Ohio, 5 with 150 as follows: Lauber Hill near Archbold, Fulton Co. (1852) 70; Bluffton, Allen Co. (1876) 47; Marshallville, Wayne Co. (1820, 1860) 24; Medway, Clark Co. (1872, now sold) 3; Whitehouse, Lucas Co. (1852) 6; Indiana, 1 at Valparaiso (1860) 24; Michigan, 1 at Shelby, Oceana Co. (1868) 52; Illinois, 1 at Sterling (1820, 1868) 52; New York, 1 at Williamsville, Erie Co. (1834) 29. In Canada there were 6 congregations with 211 members, all in Ontario as follows: Humberstone (1825) 44 and Stevensville (1835) 41, both in Welland County, Rainham near Selkirk in Haldimand Co. (1825) 5, Hostetler's near New Hamburg (1844) 52, and Kingwood near Wellesley (1850) 27, both in Waterloo County, and Amulree near Stratford in Perth County (1850) 42. The group operates two homes for the aged, known as Lancaster Church Home (in Lancaster City) and Waynesboro Church Home (in Waynesboro). The only Reformed Mennonite church paper ever published was Good Tidings, published at Lancaster, Pa., July 1922 to July 1932. It is a 32-page, 13½ x 9½ inch quarterly, edited by Jacob Kreider. The address of the church is 734 S. West End Ave., Lancaster, Pa. C.H.S., H.S.B.

John Herr, The True and Blessed Way (Harrisburg, 1816); idem, Erläuterungs Spiegel (Lancaster, 1827); John Herr, Complete Works (520 pp.) (Buffalo, 1890); Daniel Musser, The Reformed Mennonite Church, Its Rise and Progress with Its Principles and Doctrines (Lancaster, 1873); John F. Funk, The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (Elkhart, 1878); J. S. Hartzler and Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Church History (Scottdale, 1905); M. G. Weaver, The Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (Scottdale, 1931); I. D. Rupp, An Original History of All the Religious Denominations in the United States (Philadelphia, 1844) contains a section (pp. 502-10) "The Reformed Mennonite Society," which had "the sanction of the Rev. John Herr of Strasburg, a Bishop of this Society"; Wilmer J. Eshleman, "History of the Reformed Mennonite Church" in Papers read before the Lancaster County Historical Society XLIX (1945) 85-117, containing also a complete list of the 47 bishops and ministers ordained 1812-1940 in the Lancaster County Reformed Mennonite Church.

Reformer und Agriculturist und Allgemeiner Neuigkeits-Berichter, Der, a weekly (first and for a short time issued as a daily) local newspaper (16 x 22 in., 4 pp.) of general interest, published from July 4, 1867, to at least 1879 in German by John G. Stauffer, a Mennonite printer and publisher living at Milford Square in Bucks County, Pa., reported here only because it was published by a Mennonite (GCM) and had a considerable circulation among Mennonites in Eastern Pennsylvania. It is listed in a brief report in Zur Heimath for Oct. 1, 1879, in an anonymous article, "Ein flüchtiger Blick auf die mennonitische Literatur der Gegenwart." It was merged with Patriot und Reformer in 1878 or 1879, and continued publication by John G. Stauffer to October 1886, by U. S. Stauffer and A. B. Shelly for one further year, by Daniel Stauffer 1887-1905, and by David M. George to July 14, 1910. Der Reformer und Pennsylvania Advertiser was a weekly, published in English and German, edited by John G. Stauffer and A. B. Shelly, and published by the Mennonitischer Druckverein (q.v.), which appeared 1867-71(?). Der Bucks County Patriot, still another weekly paper, also apparently edited by John G. Stauffer, appeared under this name July 4, 1867-77, then as Der Bucks County Patriot und Reformer und Agriculturist 1878-80, as Der Bucks County Patriot May 6, 1880-81, and again as Der Patriot und Reformer 1881-1910. The above listing of titles and dates may not be wholly accurate, as May E. Olson indicates, who furnished much of the information. For an evaluation of Stauffer's newspapers, see Ralph Wood's article "Journalism among the Pennsylvania Germans" in The Pennsylvania Germans (Princeton, 1942), especially pp. 148-50. H.S.B.

Refugee Camps (Flüchtlingslager, later called Mennonite Homes, Mennonitenheime), shelters for the remnants of Mennonite refugees from Russia, located at Mölln, Wandsbeck, and Altona on the Elbe, established in 1929. About 16,000 Mennonites and other Russians of German descent at that time left their homes under terrible pressure of the Soviet government to go to Moscow and from there to Canada and the United States. The refugees who managed to escape at all made their way via Germany. Here they were temporarily lodged in refugee camps at Hammerstein, 4,000 persons; Prenslau, 1,500 persons; and Mölln. They were cared for in the best possible manner under the direction of the German government committee in charge of aid to Germans escaping from Russia and the German relief committee Brüder in Not (q.v.). They enjoyed frequent visits by German Mennonite preachers. Special services were rendered by Mayor and Mrs. Wolff in Mölln, Pastor Braun, and B. H. Unruh. In April 1930 the Prenslau camp was dissolved, and at the end of the year the Hammerstein camp also.

The remaining refugees stayed in Mölln. On Feb. 1, 1931, acting on a resolution passed by the Mennonite World Relief Conference, the refugee camp was turned into a Mennonite home. After eighteen months, when the lease on the building at Mölln expired, the home was moved to Wandsbeck; later another building was rented in Altona, which sheltered 50 persons. Nearly all the inmates of the Altona home soon left for America. The few who remained were provided for elsewhere.

On May 1, 1936, the Mennonite Home was closed, terminating an important phase of the work of Brüder in Not. (Menn. Bl., 1930, 7; 1931, 5, 7, 14, 41; 1932, 91; 1934, 27; ML III, 106.) NEFF.

Refugee Relief: see Relief Work.

Regeer: see Regier.

Regehr family: see Regier.

Regehr, Cornelius: see Regier.

Regehr, Jakob, elder of the Alexandertal Mennonite Church, Samara, Russia, was born at Heubuden, West Prussia, in 1841 and moved to Mariental, Alexandertal settlement, where he resided the rest of his life. He was elected minister in 1896 and elder in 1897, succeeding Johann Wiebe. In 1918 he was succeeded by his son, Eduard Regehr, who was exiled under the Communist government. (See also Alexandertal.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 720; H. Dirks, Statistik (1905) 26.

Regehr, Johann, elder of the Romanovka Mennonite Church (q.v.), Aulie-Ata, Central Asia, was elected minister in 1878 and elder in 1884, in which office he succeeded A. Peters who had led the group from the Molotschna settlement to Central Asia. Little else is known about his life and work. C.K.

H. Dirks, Statistik (1905) 36; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 720.

Regel, Anna: see Regel, Georg.

Regel, Georg (Jörg) (d. 1547), the scion of an old patrician family of Donauwörth, Bavaria, Germany, became a citizen of Augsburg by his first marriage. In 1510 he married as his second wife Anna Manlich(in). In 1517-25 he lived on his estate Lichtenberg on the Lech. Here he read the Gospels to the peasants and took communion in both forms. The dukes of Bavaria, from whom he had acquired the estate, then had him and his wife arrested and imposed a heavy fine upon them; then they returned to Augsburg. Georg carried on an active correspondence with Zwingli (q.v.) in 1527-28.

Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) had been a guest in the Regel home in 1524. Georg Regel assisted Hans Denk (q.v.) in 1525-26 in finding a position as a teacher of Latin and Greek at Augsburg. Hans Hut (q.v.) probably baptized Georg and Anna and their two maids Apollonia and Dorothea in the spring of 1526. Anna, however, recanted in October, and Georg in the following February. But then they were "driven back into the old track," so that they were compelled to flee from Augsburg at the time of the arrests at Easter in 1528. They fled to Constance in May 1528. By the time Ludwig Haetzer arrived there, between Nov. 20 and Nov. 28, the Regels had no doubt already left Constance.

In the autumn of 1528 Ludwig Haetzer was tried in court in Constance. The charge was that "he had a wife here, whose name was Apollonia, and in addition he also married the wife of Jörg Regel of Augsburg, and took the liberty of persuading her and others that she might take him, since Jörg Regel . . . was not a brother in Anabaptism. This Haetzer has also written much about the Trinity and other articles of the Christian faith, but contrary to the Holy Scriptures; hence these unworthy books were done away with." The report says that when the sentence of death was read to Haetzer he said he was satisfied with it, and commended his father and his wife Apollonia to the mayor and the magistrate. Haetzer was executed on Feb. 4, 1529, and in the same year the Regels were readmitted to Augsburg upon recanting and doing penance. The Hutterite chronicles do not mention any guilt; Christian Neff speaks only of "unproved accusations," and Fritz Blanke doubts the correctness of the charge. Others, however, have given sharper verdicts. Goeters says, "It was not only justice that was satisfied in this suit. The accusers were intent on eliminating the man whom they wanted removed as a teacher of heresy. Haetzer's moral lapse—to be sure, at an opportune moment—furnished the formal reason, but the ends pursued extended further. The lawsuit of Constance . . . is one of a series of major actions in the attempt to subdue South German Anabaptism." The charge, for example, was issued from Augsburg; Haetzer was merely transiently in Constance when he was arrested.

Later the Regels definitely turned their interests to spiritualism (q.v.). Georg aided his fellow countryman Sebastian Franck (q.v.) especially by means of a loan, and Anna attached herself to Kaspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.). In 1532-33 Georg was an intermediary in settling the friction between Leo Jud and Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.). Finally, in 1538, Georg was again admitted to patrician society. He died childless in 1547; his will, made in 1542, bequeathed his wealth for the establishment of a charitable foundation. . . . HEGE, E.T., E.C.

Fritz Blanke, "Beobachtungen zum ältesten Täuferbekenntnis," Archiv für Reformationsgesch. XXXVII (1940) 245, note 1; Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VIII (1927) 432 ff.; J. F. Gerhard Goeters, Ludwig Haetzer (Gütersloh, 1957); Alfred Hegler, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mystik in der Reformationszeit, in Archiv f. Reformationsgesch., supplement vol. I (Berlin, 1906) 102, 120, 121, 169, 186; W. Hans Herwarth von Bittenfeld, "Zur Geschlechtskunde der Regel von Altisheim," Ztschft des Historischen Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XVIII (1891) 93-100; TA Bayern I, 454-67; Wilhelm Renn, Cronica neuer geschichten, ed. Friedrich Roth (Die Chroniken der Deutschen Städte XXV) 1896, 57 ff.; Friedrich Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte I (1517-1530) (Munich, 1901); Eberhard Teufel, "Täuferum und Quäkertum im Lichte der neueren Forschung," Theologische Rundschau, n.s. XIV (1942) 148-50; ML III, 444 f.

Regensburg, the capital (1952 pop. 80,000) of the Oberpfalz, Bavaria, Germany, formerly an imperial city, was in the earliest time of the Reformation the seat of an Anabaptist congregation. It may have been founded in the fall of 1527 (by Ludwig Haetzer, q.v.), when several persons were baptized. In that year several Anabaptist leaders stopped here en route to other places—Oswald Glait (q.v.), Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), and probably also Hans Hut (q.v.). Hut is named in a warning about the Anabaptists sent to Regensburg by the Nürnberg city council on March 18, 1527. At the end of the year the congregation was discovered by the authorities. Some of its members, mostly Austrian Anabaptists, including Leonhard Freisleben (see Eleutherobios), were imprisoned and cross-examined on Nov. 15, then expelled from the city. A worse fate befell the Augsburg schoolteacher Augustin Würzlbürger (q.v.). He was captured on May 21, 1528, and executed on Oct. 10 of that year; he is the only Anabaptist who died as a martyr in Regensburg.

Until 1534 there is no further mention of Anabaptists in the city. It was then reported that hundreds of Anabaptists were on their way to Linz (q.v.) or to Moravia (q.v.) by way of the Danube. Daily large numbers passed through the cities on the Danube. The cathedral preacher Laurentius Hochwarth boasted it was due to his preaching that Regensburg was saved from the fate of Münster (q.v.). In a letter of June 30, 1534, Luther warned the city council about the Anabaptists. Scarcely a year later (June 11, 1535) the council issued a severe mandate against them, and in 1537 took active steps. Several were banned from the city, but upon recantation readmitted. Nothing is heard of enforcing the imperial mandates. This may have led to an increase in the number of Anabaptists in the city. In 1539 the council estimated their number at several hundred. Twenty persons were summoned before the court; most of them were expelled, but those who recanted remained in the city. This lenience evoked an ungracious letter from King Ferdinand demanding severe punishment for the Anabaptists. It was not heeded. Captured leaders were expelled from the city.

Slowly the movement receded. In the 16th century it is heard of only occasionally, and in the 17th not at all.

Since the beginning of the 19th century there has been a Mennonite congregation with Regensburg as its meeting place. It was formed by families from Alsace and Lorraine who leased the larger farms in the vicinity of Regensburg; most of the members are still farmers. The first preacher was Jakob Ackermann (1785-1841), who had a large farm in lease at Köfering near Regensburg. The congregation was reduced in size by emigration to America, and even more by the transfer of members to the Lutheran Church. It has at present (1957) a membership of 128 baptized members; the families are scattered over 33 villages. Meetings were held in rotation in the homes of the members until 1893, when they rented the use of the Bruderhaus church in Regensburg. Services are held twice a month.

The Regensburg congregation formerly belonged to the Amish (q.v.) branch, but most of the distinguishing characteristics have been dropped, although footwashing (q.v.) was practiced until 1908.

On July 8, 1908, some changes were made in the organization. The congregation decided to cooperate with those at Munich (q.v.) and Eichstock (q.v.) in engaging a minister; they chose Emanuel Landes (b. 1879 at Kradolf, Switzerland, now retired), who served at Munich and Eichstock 1905-54 and in Regensburg 1908-54. On the above date (1908) they joined the Vereinigung (q.v.), and replaced the Waldeck Catechism (q.v.) and the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) with the Christliches Lehrbüchlein, published by the Committee of Elders (see Aeltestenrat) of the Gemeindeverband (q.v.). Since Jan. 1, 1908, the congregation has kept a church record. Since 1955 lay ministers have again been serving the congregation. In 1957 they were Albert Schantz, Ludwig Krehbill, Ernst Horsch, and Heinrich Funck. E.L., E.C.

Gerhard Hein, "Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in Bayern," Gesch.-Bl., 1953, 54-56; Hermann Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); TA Bayern I, 1-86; Leonhard Theobald, Die Reformationsgeschichte der Reichsstadt Regensburg (Munich, 1936) 176-87, 231-37; Eberhard Teufel, "Täuferförmung und Quäkertum im Lichte der neueren Forschung," Theol. Rundschau, 1942, 151-53; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 87-97; Gem.-Kal. 1957, 45 f.; ML III, 443 f.

Regensburger Ordnung (Constitutio), a set of regulations passed at Regensburg, Bavaria, Germany, on July 7, 1524, at a conference of twelve South German Catholic bishops or their representatives, with Cardinal legate Campeggi as chairman, in the presence of Archduke Ferdinand (see Ferdinand I) as well as the dukes of Bavaria. The rulers of the South German states countered the stormy progress of the Reformation in Middle and South Germany by a staunch adherence to Catholicism. It was especially the Wittelsbach family in Bavaria (q.v.) who organized a union of the South German princes in 1523 to present a united front against the ecclesiastical innovations. Cardinal Campeggi was successful in eliminating the greatest obstacle, viz., the jealousy between the Hapsburgs and the Wittelsbachs. He gathered the South German estates about him at Regensburg in June 1524, and there in July the principles were laid down for the procedure in blocking the progress of the Reformation. The estates obligated themselves to carry out the Edict of Worms of 1521 and to oppose all changes in matters of faith and worship in their provinces, suppress the writings of the innovators, etc. The object of the Constitutio was, first of all, to bring about a reformation in the life of the clergy; for, as Campeggi said, the disorderly conduct of the clergy played no small part in the rise of heresies. It was decided to institute commissions composed of clergymen and laymen to investigate the life of the parishes and to remove abuses. It was of great significance for the Catholic Church in South Germany.

In Austria (q.v.), especially in Lower Austria, the spread of the Anabaptists in 1528 was the immediate occasion for the passing of regulations similar to the Regensburger Ordnung there. On Jan. 16, 1528, King Ferdinand issued to all bishops, prelates, etc., who had authority in spiritual matters a mandate (q.v.) to this effect, which was to be read from the pulpits at specified times. A commission was organized to visit all parishes in Upper Austria; it reported to the king on June 27, 1528.

LOSERTH, HEGE.

Josef Jäkel, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich und speziell in Freistadt," in 47. Bericht des Museums Franciscus-Carolinus (Linz, 1889) 25, 26, 71 f.; Walter Friedensburg, "Der Regensburger Convent von 1524," Historische Aufsätze dem Andenken an Georg Waitz gewidmet (Hannover, 1886) 502-39; ML III, 444 f.

Regewart (Regenwort), Hermann, a Catholic priest of Warendorf (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, who was converted by the Anabaptist elder Hendrik van Maeren (q.v.) and joined the Anabaptists in early 1534. On Feb. 17 of this year Regewart and some 30 other Anabaptists, all converted by van Maeren, accompanied him to Münster (q.v.). Here Regewart became a follower of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), who sent him with seven others to Coesfeld, Westphalia, as an emissary of his policy. Upon arrival at Coesfeld they were all arrested; Regewart was executed there in January 1535. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 24, 27, 48.) vDZ.

Regier (Regehr, Regeer), a widespread Mennonite family found in West Prussia, Germany (105 Regiers and 85 Mennonite Regehrs in the Vistula Delta in 1936), Russia, and North America. The spelling was often interchangeable in earlier times, Regehr being probably the older form. There were two lines in West Prussia, one going back to Peter Regier (b. 1669) and one to Cornelius Regier (b. 1743). The Regiers were found in large numbers in the Heubuden congregation, and furnished a large number of ministers and elders here and elsewhere. Cornelius Regier (1743-94), elder at Heubuden from 1771, was an outstanding leader; he died May 30, 1794, in the Chortitza Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, whither he had been called to assist in solving the serious church problems which had arisen. Other Regiers who served the church were Peter Regier (q.v.), a brother of Cornelius; Abraham Regier (q.v.; 1774-1851), a son of Cornelius; Heubuden elder 1804-51; Peter Regier (q.v.; 1776-1814), a brother of Abraham, elder 1809-14; Peter Regier (q.v.; 1798-1856), a son of Abraham, elder of the Gross-Werder congregation 1833-56. Three of the four sons of the above Peter Regier (d. 1856) were active in the ministry of the Gross-Werder congregation—Peter Regier (1825-97), elder at Fürstenwerder, Abraham Regier (1831-1909), elder at Tiegenhagen 1885-1909, Cornelius Regier (1835-1916), preacher at Tiegenhagen.

A Peter Regier (1851-1925) of Rückenau, elder of the Rosenort congregation from 1888, emigrated to the Rosthern, Sask., community, in 1893, where he founded and became the first elder of the Rosenort congregation there, dying at Tiefengrund in 1925. (David Toews became his assistant elder in 1913.) His son Johannes Regier became assistant elder to David Toews at Rosenort in 1929, then moved to British Columbia, where he has served as elder of the Bethel congregation at Aldergrove since 1947. Bernhard Regier (1810-92), a preacher in the Heubuden congregation from 1838, left his homeland in 1880 because of his strong convictions for nonresistance and settled in Newton, Kan., where he joined in founding the First Mennonite Church (GCM) and served as preacher until his death. A son of his, Bernhard Regier (1855-1940), served as minister of the First Mennonite Church of Newton 1903-40, and a nephew of his, Jacob W. Regier, served as pastor of the Zion Mennonite Church at Elbing 1919-39. Ernst Regehr was chosen elder of the Rosenort congregation in West Prussia in 1934, emigrated to Uruguay in 1948, and has been elder of the El Ombu congregation there since then, and moderator of the Uruguay Mennonite Conference. In the United States and Canada there are six Regehrs and two Regiers serving as ministers in the M.B. Church, and nine Regiers and two Regehrs as ministers in the G.C.M. Church. J. M. Regier (1885-) served pastorates in Reedley, Cal., and Hillsboro, Kan., while P. K. Regier (1891-) has been executive secretary of the G.C.M. Church since 1952. A. J. Regier (1884-1947) was president of Freeman Junior College 1916-27, and professor at Bethel College 1927-46; D. A. Regier (1887-1956) was long a minister in the E.M.B. Church at Mountain Lake, Minn., and a leader in the E.M.B. Conference; C. C. Regier (1884-1950) was a professor of history, serving at Bethel College and then at a series of other colleges. (ML III, 445 f.) O.R., H.S.B.

Regier, Abraham (1774-1851), the son of elder Cornelius Regier (q.v.), was born Feb. 2, 1774. In 1794, upon his father's death, he took over the farm in Heubuden (Gurken). He was chosen as preacher in 1800, and as elder in 1804 for the Heubuden congregation. The first decade of his eldership was a very trying period for the West Prussian congregations.

Abraham Regier maintained conscientious church discipline. He was in close connection with the Gross-Werder congregation. In 1809 Abraham Regier ordained Jacob Kröker as elder of the Elbing-Ellerwald congregation and his brother Peter Regier (q.v.) as elder of the Gross-Werder congregation. When his brother died, he conducted a vote for a replacement in the three "quarters" of the Gross-Werder congregation (Ladekopp, q.v.; Tiegenhagen, q.v.; and Rosenort, q.v.). The vote resulted in a tie; the lot, used to break the tie, fell on Abraham Wiebe (who later married a daughter of elder Peter Regier, d. 1814). In 1833 an election for elder occurred to replace Abraham Wiebe. This was conducted at Rosenort, and also resulted in a tie. The lot fell on his son Peter Regier (q.v.), who, however, refused to assume the office of elder for the large district. Abraham Regier died on Aug. 8, 1851, at Heubuden. The congregation erected a tombstone.

Other ministers who served with Abraham Regier were Johann Regier of Heubuden (1777-1830), Gerhard Regier of Tralau 1831-d. 59, Cornelius Regier (q.v.) of Tralau, and Bernhard Regier (q.v.) of Sandhof. The relationship of these Regiers has not been established. In the branch of Cornelius and Abraham Regier was the Abraham Regier of Klein-Lichtenau (1877-1909), a preacher in the Heubuden congregation. (ML III, 446 f.) O.R.

Regier, Bernhard (1810-92), a Mennonite minister of West Prussia and Kansas, was born at Sandhof near Marienburg in West Prussia, Germany, in 1810. He learned to read at home, and by the age of ten had read the entire Bible three times (the Bible and the hymnal were usually the only books in the homes). He received his education in a private Mennonite school in Rodloffhuben, where the gifted Wilhelm Lange (q.v.) was teaching. The school was later transferred to Bröscherfelde (q.v.). In 1839 he was chosen to the ministry in his home congregation, and served without salary until the age of seventy.

He took an active part in the Danzig Missionary Association (founded 1829). The monthly meetings were held in Mennonite homes; the annual missionary conference, in which Lutherans and Reformed also took part, met in a roomy granary of a member of the Association. He was also interested in the temperance movement.

Bernhard Regier gathered in Germany the material for the Regier family history. When the German Mennonites lost their nonresistant privileges he emigrated to Newton, Kan., in 1880, and took part in the establishment of the first Mennonite (GCM) church in Newton, as well as of Bethel College. He died at the age of 82 after a ministry of 54 years. (ML III, 499.) C.H.R.

Regier, Cornelius (1743-94), a Mennonite elder, born in Rosenort (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany, later living in Altmünsterberg and Heubuden (Gurken), became a teacher in 1765, succeeded his father-in-law Gerhard van Bergen (1704-71) as elder of the Heubuden (q.v.) congregation. Concerning his inner life there is information in his correspondence with Isaak van Dühren (q.v.), the minister of the Danzig Frisian Mennonite congregation.

According to the church record, Cornelius Regier was loved by the Heubuden congregation; throughout his life his influence was conciliatory. By preaching in various churches he sought to bridge over the differences between the Frisian (q.v.) and the Flemish (q.v.) Mennonites. He maintained close contact with the Danzig (q.v.) congregation. The Danzig church archives show that his advice was frequently asked in church matters. His close connection with the Danzig Flemish congregation is also indicated by the fact that in 1780 he ordained Peter Epp (q.v.) as elder and in 1790 Jacob de Veer. His sermons as a guest preacher were no doubt widely announced and must certainly have strengthened the bonds between the elders of the various congregations.

Cornelius Regier was an elder in an age filled with disturbance for West Prussia. During his eldership the Werder (q.v.) was transferred from Poland (q.v.) to Prussia (q.v.) (1772). (See Regier, Peter.) For their exemption from the bearing of arms (see Nonresistance) the Mennonites had to pay 5,000 talers annually from June 1, 1773, for the military training school at Culm (q.v.). A conference (1775) presented a petition to the King in Berlin for the confirmation of the privileges (q.v.) acquired from the rulers of Poland and for the remission of fees to the local Catholic and Protestant congregations. In 1788 the "Wöllner" religious edict was passed which made a distinction between the principal creeds and the remaining religious groups, the Mennonites being counted with the latter, which, though tolerated, were subject to restrictions. Further restrictions were caused by the edict of July 30, 1789, which decreed that the Mennonite landowners must pay certain fees to the Catholic and Protestant clergy, and limited their acquisition of land. Under such conditions Mennonite emigration to Russia set in (q.v.). For the families of the Gross-Werder and the congregation of Danzig and Elbing-Ellerwald (see Elbing), 152 families with 919 persons, Cornelius Regier preached the farewell sermon in the Rosenort Mennonite Church.

The young Russian congregations had serious difficulty in regulating their church life, and urgently wanted an elder from West Prussia to come to help them. Cornelius Regier was chosen for the task. (Peter Epp, who was first chosen, died during his preparations for the journey.) On March 14, 1794, he and Cornelius Warkentin, a minister of Rosenort, began the perilous journey to Russia, and on April 29 arrived at Chortitza (q.v.). Cornelius Regier at once began his work of unification. After three weeks, during which he preached eight times, he succeeded in restoring peace. Then a fatal illness, probably typhus, struck Regier. Before he died he ordained Warkentin as elder, and asked him to preach a simple funeral sermon for him on Rom. 14:7, 8. His funeral was attended by Baron von Brackel, the director of the Chortitza settlement. A monument was erected 100 years later. (ML III, 445 f.) O.R.

Regier, Heinrich H. (1855-1934), a Mennonite (GCM) elder, was born Sept. 12, 1855, at Alexanderkron in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia. During the migration of the Mennonites from Russia to America he settled in Mountain Lake, Minn. He attended the Baptist Theological Seminary at Rochester, N.Y. In 1888 he became the first minister of the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.), and elder on Nov. 18, 1890. He married Maria Görtzen March 30, 1884. On Jan. 1, 1927, he resigned from his office and died Jan. 4, 1934. He baptized 157 candidates, ordained 12 elders, and served on the aid committee of the General Conference for many years. C.K.

"Altester Heinrich H. Regier," Bundesbote-Kalender, 1935, p. 29; J. John Friesen, "Early Mountain Lake Churches," Menn. Life XI (July 1956) 133-37.

Regier, John S. (1879-1918), an evangelist and Bible lecturer of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in the village of Klippenfeld in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia on March 6, 1879, the oldest of the four children of John J. and Maria Schellenberg Regier. In the summer of 1879 the family emigrated to America, first settling in Boone County, Neb., and a few years later in York County, Neb., where the father became the first elder of the Henderson M.B. Church and where the children grew up. Regier married Anna Wall on June 7, 1900. To them seven children were born.

They established their home first at Henderson. Later they lived at Reedley, Cal., Hillsboro, Kan., and again returned to Henderson. After his conversion Regier was received into the M.B. Church by baptism about 1896. At an early age he entered the Christian ministry and in 1901-18 he was very active as a traveling evangelist and Bible lecturer among the M.B. churches. He was especially qualified for Biblical exposition. Tabor College frequently called him to lecture at its annual Bible conferences. He died on Aug. 22, 1918, and was buried in the local M.B. cemetery. J.H.L.

Regier, Peter, of Tralau (Feld), West Prussia, Germany, a brother of Cornelius Regier (q.v.), was at the same time as he a minister (from c1764) in the Heubuden Mennonite Church. His home was the scene of a meeting of the ministers of all the Mennonite congregations in West Prussia (Flemish and Frisian) held concerning participation in the ceremony of obeisance for Frederick the Great (q.v.) on Sept. 27, 1722, in Marienburg, when a petition for the free exercise of religion and release from military service was presented to the King. From this year the two branches met together in an annual conference, usually held at Heubuden. In 1775 the Conference of East and West Prussian Mennonite Churches (q.v.) delegated elder Heinrich Donner (q.v.), of Orlofferfelde, and Peter Regier to present to the King at Berlin a petition for the confirmation of the privileges and the remission of fees. Like his brother, Peter Regier's work was conciliatory in an attempt to heal the breach between the Frisians (q.v.) and the Flemish (q.v.). In 1774 he was censured by many in his Flemish congregation for preaching a guest sermon in a Frisian congregation. (ML III, 446.) O.R.

Regier, Peter (1776-1814), an elder of the Grosswerder Mennonite Church, West Prussia, Germany, was born at Altmünsterberg, West Prussia, on March 10, 1776, the second and youngest son of elder Cornelius Regier (q.v.). He married a daughter of Gerhard Wiebe (q.v.) of Ellerwald and settled at Sparrau in the area of the Elbing-Ellerwald (q.v.) congregation. In 1798 his congregation chose him as minister, but he declined the office, because he was planning to move to the Grosswerder. In 1799 he moved to Siebenhuben and was chosen as minister by the Ladekopp congregation. In 1809 he was consecrated as elder by his brother Abraham Regier in the Orlofferfelde (q.v.) church. The time of his service there was a difficult period. In 1811 he and Johann Donner (q.v.), of Orlofferfelde, and Cornelius Wiens, the treasurer, journeyed to Marienwerder (q.v.) to present to Frederick William III (q.v.) a gift of 10,000 talers for use for the state. At a conference meeting in Marienburg (q.v.) in 1813 Donner and Regier were delegated to go to Königsberg (q.v.) to request exemption from military service for the Mennonites. An account of his mission is found in Donner's autobiography. On their return they had to wade to their knees through icy water caused by a flood. Regier became ill in consequence. His trouble was heightened by the lack of understanding and appreciation for their work; he and Donner were violently opposed by their members. On Feb. 26, 1814, at the age of 37 years, he died, and was buried at Orloff (q.v.), near his home.

Peter Regier served as elder only six years. He was the last elder serving the entire Grosswerder group of congregations—Rosenort, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, and Tiegenhagen. In 1809 he agreed to the appointment of an elder for Fürstenwerder (q.v.). ML III, 447.) O.R.

Regier, Peter (1798-1856), an elder of the Grosswerder Mennonite congregation, was born Jan. 31, 1798, at Heubuden, West Prussia, Germany, the son of Abraham Regier, elder at Heubuden. He was chosen as preacher in 1825, and as elder in 1833 (by lot; he had received 104 votes and Jakob Wiebe of Ladekopp 102) by the Grosswerder congregation. He, however, declined to carry the office alone, on the ground that each of the component congregations was entitled to an elder of its own, and that his father and Isaac Schulz, co-elders of the large district, had found the work too difficult. The Ladekopp congregation then chose Jacob Wiebe as elder, whereas the Rosenort congregation continued to be served by the elder of Tiegenhagen until 1857.

Peter Regier was active in the congregations. He conducted elections for elder at Fürstenwerder (1841), Ellerwald (1846), Heubuden (1852, to replace his father, who died in 1851), and Ladekopp (1853). In 1853 he officiated at an election for minister in Ladekopp, where his brother-in-law Peter Regier, of Mierau, was chosen. He died at Tiegenhagen on March 9, 1856.

All four of Peter Regier's sons served in the ministry in the Grosswerder congregations. (1) Peter Regier (1823-96/97), elder of Fürstenwerder; (2) Abraham Regier (1831-1909), preacher 1856, elder 1855 at Tiegenhagen; (3) Cornelius Regier (1835-1916), preacher 1867 at Tiegenhagen; (4) Gerhard Regier (1837-1902), deacon 1879 at Tiegenhagen (he declined the office of preacher to which he was chosen in 1881). (ML III, 448.) O.R.

Regier, Peter (1851-1925), a Mennonite elder of Prussia and Canada, was born in Prussia Jan. 14, 1851. He received his elementary and secondary education in Prussia. He married Anna Enss on Dec. 16, 1873, after which he lived in Rückenau, Marienburg. On Sept. 7, 1879, he was elected minister of the Rosenort Mennonite Church, and on July 1, 1888, was ordained elder by his father Peter Regier, elder of the Fürstenwerder Church. Because the Mennonites of Prussia were gradually yielding their principle of nonresistance he emigrated to Canada in 1893. After a stop at Greta he settled at Tiefengrund, Sask., in 1894, where he organized a new Rosenort Mennonite Church. Other Mennonites from Prussia followed him. Other congregations were organized which became subsidiaries of Rosenort. He died at Tiefengrund on April 11, 1925. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 I (Steinbach, n.d.) 26; ML III, 448 f.

Regina (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in February 1941 under the leadership of Abram Klaassen. Despite financial difficulties the little group with brave efforts was able to build its own church. In 1957 there were 18 members. The Regina M.B. Church is affiliated with the Herbert M.B. Church. J.I.R.

Register of the Names of the (Professors and) Ministers of the Mennonites in the Netherlands (and Adjacent Countries): see Naamlijst and Namensverzeichniss.

Regius, Urban: see Rhegius, Urban.

Rehlinger (Rechlinger, Rhelinger), Ulrich (d. 1547), an important mayor of Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, 1523-35, a zealous promoter of the Reformation, belonged to the local Schwenckfelder (q.v.) circle with his wife Ursula, née Gosenbrot, and his son Jacob. The noted Johann Rehlinger who was often consulted by the Regensburg (q.v.) council was his brother. E.T.

ABD XXVII, 597 ff., "Rehlinger"; Friedrich Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte 1517-1530 (Munich, 1901); TA Bayern II, No. 23, 26; Selina Gerhard Schultz, Caspar Schwenckfeld of Ossig (1489-1561) (Norristown, Pa., 1946); idem, Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum; Leonhard Theobald, Die Reformationsgeschichte der Reichsstadt Regensburg (Munich, 1936); ML III, 450.

Rehoboth Mennonite Church (MC), St. Anne, Ill., was established in 1953. It had a membership of 20 in 1958, with Mark Lehman as pastor.

Reichenberg, a village in the Danzig (q.v.) Werder, was a "Holländerdorf" (see Villages). As early as 1547 the locator (colonization agent) Philip Edzema distributed the territory to the immigrants, who apparently came from the Dutch province of Friesland, with the charge to cultivate the land and to construct windmills and sluices. They probably were Mennonites. Their descendants in the early 17th century moved east to the great Marienburger Werder, among whom was Peter Giesebrecht in 1607, a builder of sluices. vdZ.

Horst Penner, Ansiedlung Menn. Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet (Schriftenreihe III, Weierhof, 1940) 12, 23, 31.

Reichenberger, Hans, was active as an Anabaptist missionary in South Bohemia about 1527-28. (ME I, 382.)

Reichsweiler (French, Ricqueviller), near Rappersweiler, a few miles from Colmar, was one of the first villages in Alsace to admit Swiss Mennonites fleeing from oppression in the canton of Bern. With the help of Beatus Fischer, a patrician of Bern, they settled here as early as 1671. vdZ.

Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottsdale, 1953) 38.

Reidenbach Mennonite Church (OOM) (also called the "Thirty-Fivers") is a small group who in 1946 left the Groffdale Conference of Old Order Mennonites in Lancaster County, Pa., to form a separate congregation. During World War II, the Groffdale Conference had some boys in Civilian Public Service and some in jail. By 1946 a group of their constituency, led by Mrs. Rufus Martin, demanded that the CPS boys be excommunicated. When Bishop Joseph Wenger refused to take this action, the Mrs. Martin group refused to attend services. This led to their excommunication. Mrs. Martin and her son-in-law David Hoover moved to organize a separate group. By lot in the summer of 1947 Henry Martin was ordained by one of them to the ministry, and later to the office of bishop. Another minister and a deacon were also ordained. In 1948 they built a meetinghouse near Reidenbach's store in the Weaverland Valley, where they now worship with possibly forty members. The official name of their church is Reidenbach Mennonite Church. They have no Sunday school or missions, but are attempting to hold to the practices of the forefathers, using nothing containing rubber and no conveniences, not even poultry brooders. They are farmers. I.D.L.

Reiff Mennonite Church (MC), formerly known as Witmer's Church, is located near Maugansville, Washington Co., Md. In 1833 a group of families from Lancaster County, Pa., settled on homesteads in this community. Families represented were Reiff, Horst, Weber, Eshleman, and Martin. They worshiped in the near-by home of David Reiff until 1840, when a church was built on the present site and named for the man who granted the deed. In 1867 it was enlarged, and in 1891 it was replaced by a new brick building. The present building, the largest in the district, was erected in 1928. The first bishop, Peter Eshleman, was ordained in 1838. Ministers who have served the congregation were John Summers, Michael Horst (later bishop), Abr. Ebersole, Jacob Risser, George Keener, C. R. Strite, Martin E. Risser, D. R. Leshner, Moses K. Horst (present bishop), Stanley H. Martin, and Reuben E. Martin. The membership in 1957 was 389. J.D.R.

Reimann, Heini, an Anabaptist martyr, of Grünigen (q.v.) in the Swiss canton of Zürich. He was one of the most loyal of Conrad Grebel's adherents and a zealous preacher of Anabaptist doctrine in 1525 f. With Jakob Falk (q.v.) he baptized several persons and was therefore imprisoned. Both Falk and Reimann had been imprisoned previously, and in April 1525 they were again arrested at Appenzell (q.v.), but were apparently soon released. On a Sunday in May 1526 they were attending a meeting in the Herrliberg forest between Bubikon and Wetzikon, which was disbanded by the magistrate Berger; 15 participants were arrested, including Reimann and Falk, and imprisoned in Grünigen. They boldly confessed to Berger that they had been baptized and had also baptized others, although they knew that such baptism was forbidden on a penalty of death, and declared that they intended to continue the practice.

Now the Grünigen Landtag was faced with a serious decision as to whether Reimann and Falk should be sentenced to death "according to law." The Landtag refused to pass this sentence, thereby clashing with the Zürich council, which insisted on death on the basis of the mandate of March 7, 1526. Zürich decided that if these Anabaptists were not immediately drowned they would appeal to the court of Bern. Bern's verdict, favoring Zürich, was pronounced in 1528. The prisoners were then lodged singly in various Zürich prisons for two weeks on bread, water, and "Mus." Reimann and Falk, as the "rabble rousers," were again examined. Upon their persistence in their faith they were sentenced to death by drowning. On Sept. 5, 1528, in the early afternoon, they were drowned in the Limmat. This was the second Anabaptist execution in Zürich, the first victim having been Felix Manz (q.v.). S.G.

Emil Egli, Die Zürcher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1878) 58, 82 f.; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 121; TA Zürich, 54, 211, 214 f., 217 f., 220, 225, 257, 264, 266, 268, 273 f., 305; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 146 f.; ML III, 453.

Reimann, Valerian Maximilian, a student of theology who delivered a Latin address on Menno Simons with the title, Menonis Simonis qualis fuerit vita vitaeque actio exponatur (Life and Works of Menno Simons). The address was made on May 30, 1893, at Jena, probably at the instigation of Friedrich Nippold (q.v.), who was a professor of theology at the University of Jena 1884-1907. It was published (Jena, 1893) as a university paper, but was not meant for distribution, hence is rather scarce. It is found in the Mennonite Library of Amsterdam, in the National Library of Paris, and in the Library of the University of Göttingen. (ML III, 453 f.) E.C.

Reimer, a Mennonite family name. It is probable, but not certain, that the name originated in the Netherlands and that it was brought to West Prussia by religious refugees. At any rate members of the Reimer family took part in the reclaiming of the land north of Tiegenhof (q.v.) in the great Marienburg Werder.

In 1626 a Michel Reimer is named in Glabitsch north of the Vistula at Elbing. Two decades later he became a councilor of this village, an area that had just emerged from the fresh-water lake about 1600. In the neighboring Poppau, Isebrandt Reimer took part in the draining of this land which is below sea level. Also in the Scharpau, which was still an ideal fishing area in the time of the Teutonic Knights, the Reimers were active settlers; a Franz Reimer on the "Polish Hube" passed his land on to a Wiens about 1640, and a Wilm Reimer was living on the Schröderskampe near Altebabke about 1650. Johann Reimer was one of the founders of the village called Reinland (q.v.), whose lands did not become arable until 1725.

In the course of the centuries the Reimers in the Werder (q.v.) moved to the south. In 1936 there were 14 in the Fürstenwerder congregation (q.v.), 5 in Tiegenhagen (q.v.), 28 in Ladekopp (q.v.), 18 in Rosenort (q.v.), 76 in Heubuden (q.v.), 15 in the Danzig congregation (q.v.), 1 in Elbing-Ellerswald (q.v.), 2 in Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart (q.v.), 5 in Tragheimerweide (q.v.), and 1 in the Ludwigshafen congregation in the Palatinate; this makes a total of 165. There were also Reimers among the West Prussian Mennonites who emigrated to Russia. Gustav Reimer (q.v.; 1884-1955), a deacon in the Heubuden congregation, was long prominent in the West Prussian Conference; he moved to Uruguay in 1950.

The Reimer family furnished an unusual number of leaders among the Mennonites of Russia. Klaas Reimer (q.v.; 1770-1837) was the founder of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in 1812, and the Reimers have ever since furnished a large number of ministers and family heads in this group, both in Russia and in Canada, among them currently elder David P. Reimer and preacher P. J. B. Reimer. Jakob Reimer (q.v.; 1817-91) was one of the founders of the Mennonite Brethren in the Molotschna (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in 1860. Jacob W. Reimer (q.v.; 1860-1948) was an outstanding preacher and Bible teacher in the M.B. group in Russia and after 1924 in Canada. Jakob A. Reimer (1844-1917) was an outstanding layman in the General Conference Mennonite Church, sharing in the founding of the Zagradovka (q.v.) settlement in the Ukraine, and serving as the leader (1908) and Oberschulze (q.v.) of the Slavgorod (q.v.) settlement in Siberia. There are Reimer families in certain areas of the Russian Mennonite settlements (GCM and MB) in the United States and Canada, but few have been found among the ministers.

H.P., E.C.

Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl., 1940, 26-45; Horst Penner, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet (Weierhof, 1940); Reimer, Familienamen; ML III, 454.

Reimer, Gustav (1884-1955), a Mennonite leader of West Prussia and Uruguay, was born Oct. 17, 1884, at Heubuden (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany. In 1919 he was chosen as deacon by his home congregation. He was commissioned by the Mennonites of West Prussia to bring suit against the Protestant churches for requiring Mennonite landowners to pay them taxes. This task Gustav Reimer carried through successfully all the way to the imperial court in Leipzig. He saved many a church record from destruction and established a card index of the West Prussian Mennonites and their forebears.

After the flight from the East in 1945 he began to look after the religious and material needs of the Mennonites in Jeetzel, Hannover, where he was temporarily quartered, and promoted emigration to Uruguay (q.v.). In World War II he lost three of his five sons; in 1948 his wife, Frieda Reimer, also died. He therefore left without hesitation, settling in Montevideo, where he had a fruit farm and where he again served his brethren as deacon. He died there on July 19, 1955.

H.P., E.C.

Gustav E. Reimer, "Rescued Documents Relating to the History and Genealogy of the Mennonites of Former West Prussia," MQR XXIII (1949) 99-104; "Zum 70. Geburtstag von Diakon Gustav Reimer . . ." Der Mennonit VII (1954) 141 f.; obituary, Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 127; ML III, 454 f.

Reimer, David: see Felsenthal.

Reimer, Jacob Wilhelm (1860-1948), a noted Mennonite Brethren preacher and Bible expositor in Russia and Canada, was born in Alexanderkrona, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, on March 9, 1860, the son of Wilhelm and Helena (Klassen) Reimer. He entered the Orloff Zentralschule at the age of 13. At 17 he began to teach in Mennonite schools, which he continued for six years. He was converted at the age of 23 through the preaching of F. W. Baedeker of England, who was at that time visiting South Russia. He resigned from the teaching profession, joined the M.B. Church through baptism, and began to preach. Meanwhile he gained a most remarkable knowledge of the Bible through intensive study. Reimer was married twice. In 1887 he married Gertrud Neustädter (d. 1920) and settled in Rückenau. They had six sons and four daughters. His second wife, whom he married in 1923, was Margaret (Peters) Rempel.

The M.B. Conference in Russia appointed Reimer as itinerating minister (Reiseprediger) and ordained him to the ministry in 1900. He had a most effective period of ministry for 35 years and conducted meetings in all the M.B. congregations in Russia as well as among many other circles, his tours extending to Turkestan and to the Siberian Mennonite settlements. Seventeen times he visited the Kuban settlement in the Caucasus; twice he visited Germany, serving as Bible lecturer at the Blankenburg (q.v.) conferences. He found open doors for preaching among influential circles in St. Petersburg. For some time he accompanied the evangelist Baedeker as his interpreter. In 1899 he visited America and held meetings in many M.B. churches. In 1913 Reimer was largely instrumental in establishing the Mennonite Zentralschule in his native Alexanderkrona, and served on its board of directors (Schulrat) until the Revolution.

In July 1924, J. W. Reimer and his second wife emigrated to Canada, making their home in Ontario for four years; then after a stay of ten months in Winnipeg they settled in Steinbach, Man.

In Canada Reimer, though advanced in years, traveled much and preached in many M.B. churches. His ministry also extended into other circles. He wrote valuable articles for Mennonite papers. His book Der wundervolle Ratschluss Gottes mit der Menschheit has been widely read. He continued to preach up to his 87th year. He was largely responsible for the widespread introduction of premillennialism in the M.B. Church.

In October 1942 Reimer moved to Sardis, B.C., where he died on March 6, 1948, and was buried in the local cemetery.

J.H.L.

Reimer, Jakob (1817-91), one of the founders of the Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia, was born in the village of Krons Garten in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in the Ukraine, the son of David Reimer and Maria Neufeld, grew up on his father's farm Felsenthal (q.v.), was a close friend of his teacher Heinrich Franz I (q.v.), whom he followed to Gnadenfeld (q.v.) for a year. There he was admitted to the church by baptism. He would have preferred baptism by immersion, having been convinced in 1837, by reading the life of Ann Judson, that it was the proper form. Later he married in Gnadenfeld and became an outstanding member of the village and of the congregation. Inspired by the revival preaching of Eduard Wüst (q.v.), he joined the revival movement in the late 1840's and promoted it on his travels in the Mennonite churches with Johannes Claassen (q.v.) and Wilhelm Bartel (q.v.). Gradually his group left the large church and founded the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.). On May 21, 1861, he was baptized by immersion by Heinrich Hübert (q.v.). He was one of the signatories of the petition to the government for permission to settle in the Kuban, which was granted on March 4, 1864. After he had worked in Friedrichsfeld and Blumenau, villages near Andreasfeld (q.v.), he settled in the Kuban and founded Wiesenfeld, where he died in 1891. Jakob Reimer made important contributions to the development of the Mennonite Brethren Church. He opposed the emotional excesses of the early period with determination, and was excommunicated for this reason by his opponents in the group in 1864 through Benjamin Becker. In the next year he was, however, restored and the differences reconciled. From then on he worked quietly in a smaller circle. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 81 ff.; ML III, 455.) NEFF.

Reimer, Jakob A. (1844-1917), was born in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in Russia. He took part in the establishment of the Zagradovka Mennonite settlement in 1872, settling in Neu-Schönsee. He served as Oberschulze (q.v.) of the settlement for 16 (perhaps 18) years. Energetic and progressive, a man of vision, with a special gift for dealing with superior government officials, he was known as a "Mennonite Moses." Although he had the confidence of the people at times, he was somewhat harsh in his methods of promoting the cause of the settlement and in 1896 resigned from his office.

In 1908, when the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement in Siberia (q.v.) was established, Reimer immediately became the leader of this movement and the Oberschulze of the settlement. In fact, the establishment of the settlement is very closely connected with the person of Reimer. On one occasion when important visitors from St. Petersburg visited Slavgorod and all the officials of the surrounding community were gathered there for the event, Reimer was singled out by the St. Petersburg representative with the words, "You are no stranger in St. Petersburg because we have heard much about you and your settlement in the Kulundian Steppes," before the officials were greeted. Reimer had not only friends and followers, but also opponents. In 1914 he accompanied 200 young military draftees to the city of Tomsk, and there convinced the government of their status as conscientious objectors. Meanwhile some of his opponents had denounced him at the government office in Slavgorod and when he returned he was deprived of his office of Oberschulze. He retired to the home of his son, where he died in 1917. One of his particular friends was Cornelius D. Harder (q.v.), the elder of the church. C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 87; Der Bote, Aug. 13, 1952; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (North Kildonan, 1947) 45 f.

Reimer, Klaas (1770-1837), the founder of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) (now Evangelical Mennonites), was born in Petershagen near Danzig, Germany. He married the daughter of Elder Peter Epp and moved to the village of Neunhuben. On Sept. 1, 1801, he was elected minister of the Flemish Danzig Mennonite Church of which his father-in-law was elder. Reimer's autobiography relates that he studied the Bible and Martyrs' Mirror diligently. Encouraged by his dying father-in-law he decided that there was no future for the Mennonites in the Danzig area. He left with some thirty members of the church for Russia in 1804. During a stop at the Old Colony he became acquainted with a like-minded minister, Cornelius Janzen. From here Klaas Reimer and his group proceeded to the Molotschna settlement where he established a home in Petershagen near Halbstadt. Reimer soon found himself in disagreement with the leader of the church, Jakob Enns, and the religious conditions of the church. He was opposed to the contributions made to the Russian government during the Napoleonic War, to the punishment of miscreants in the Mennonite community, and to some "worldly" practices among the Mennonites. In 1812 he and a small group of the Flemish congregations began to hold separate meetings in private homes. Cornelius Janzen had meanwhile joined this group. Klaas Reimer was elected elder in 1814 in the presence of Elder Heinrich Janzen of the Schönwiese Mennonite Church of the Old Colony who, however, refused to ordain him as elder. Thus Klaas Reimer assumed the responsibilities of an elder without official ordination. Cornelius Janzen, his co-minister, preached an installation sermon and a group of some eighteen to twenty members considered itself organized and soon became known as the Kleine Gemeinde in distinction from the "Grosse Gemeinde" (the main body of Mennonites). Reimer and his followers were for some time not recognized as a separate body of Mennonites. Reimer died on Dec. 25, 1837.

Reimer's writings and concerns reveal that he was genuinely concerned in promoting and reforming the Mennonites in accord with the traditions of the church and the writings of Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, and Peter Peters. These books were cherished by him and his followers. On the other hand, Reimer had a very poor formal education and had some narrow views on the basic concepts of Christianity and Mennonitism. In the history of the Kleine Gemeinde the latter long overshadowed the good intentions and zeal of the founder and the leader of the group. C.K.

Valuable sources on Reimer's life are the diaries of Klaas Reimer, Abraham Friesen, the ministers' list of the Kleine Gemeinde, the Danzig Church record, etc., all found in the original, transcript, or microfilm in BeCL and GCL; some originals are in possession of Elder David P. Reimer of Giroux, Man.; C. Krahn, "From Russia to Meade," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 18; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 75 ff.; "Zum 100jährigen Gedenktage des Vorältesten Klaas Reimer, Gründer der Kleinge-meinde," Christlicher Familienfreund (Winnipeg), December 1937, 2 f.; ML III, 455.

Rein (Reyn) Edes, the brother-in-law of Menno Simons (q.v.). His wife was Griet, a sister of Menno's wife. In his letter of Sept. 1, 1558, to the brotherhood in Waterhorne Menno addressed to Rein his moving words of grief over the division in the brotherhood. Karel Vos and Cornelius Krahn, however, assume that this letter was written to Hoyte Renix (q.v.). NEFF.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 139; Cornelius Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 92; the letter is found in Menno Simons, Opera (1681) 392, and Writings, 1055; BRN VII, 236; ML III, 455.

Reincke, a Mennonite family name, found at Danzig, West Prussia, Germany, since 1641. A Wilhelm Reincke of Danzig was married to Anna Suderman about 1680. In Königsberg (q.v.), East Prussia, a Wilhelm Reincke is mentioned; he was a brewer who had moved in from Danzig. He is very likely identical with Wilhelm Reynke, who was named in the Naamlijst as a preacher of the Königsberg Mennonite congregation 1751-58. Giesbrecht Reincke, a "Dutch weaver," and Johann Reincke, "in trade with silk, wool, and camel's hair yarns," who are named in 1777 and 1789 as Mennonites, may have been sons of Wilhelm. Johann was a well-to-do citizen. There were formerly some members of this family in the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite congregation. vdZ.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 116; Gesch.-Bl., 1956, p. 28, Nos. 80-82; Naamlijst 1755.

Reinders, a Mennonite family name, found since the early 18th century at Sappemeer, Dutch province of Groningen, where Reinder Luitjes (d. 1758) and his son Luitje Reinders (d. c1800) (his descendants assumed the family name Reinders) were farmers. Jacob Luitjes, a member of this family, was a (lay) preacher of the Sappemeer congregation from 1780 to c1807. Recently two members of the Reinders family served as Mennonite ministers after studying at the University and Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. Uko Jan Reinders (1868-1917) served at Ternaard 1897-99 and Dantumawoude 1899-1916, and was very active in the cause of state pensions for the poor. He published a historical paper on Jan ter Borg in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, 1897. His brother Luurdo Reinders (1870-1948) served as Mennonite pastor at Berlikum 1897-1937. vdZ.

Reindertsz (Reynersz, Renicx), Tjaert: see Renicx, Tjaert.

Reinegom (Reynegom, Reninge), Jaques van: see Outerman, Jaques.

Reinfeld (Rheinfeld), a Mennonite village name which originated in Russia and was found in the Mennonite settlements of the Don region, Ukraine; Pavlodar and Amur, Siberia; East and West Reserves, Man.; Hague and Swift Current, Sask.; and Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico. (See Villages.) C.K.

Reinfeld Mennonite Brethren Church, located near the village of Reinfeld, Sask., a member of the Northern District (Herbert Division), was organized in 1927 under the initiative of C. C. Penner, with a membership of 18. The meetinghouse was built 20 miles southeast of Swift Current in 1928. The first leader was Jacob Derksen, succeeded by C. C. Penner and Heinrich F. Klassen; the latter was still serving as leader and pastor in 1957, with a membership of 20. The name had been changed to McMahon. J.I.R.

Reinfeld Mennonite Church, located in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia, was composed of the residents of the eight villages of Reinfeld, Protassov, Alexeyfeld, Tiege, Gnadenfeld, Schöntal, Nikolaipol, and Berezovka. The congregation was founded in 1908; its first leader was Franz Buller, who was one of the delegates to inspect the land for settlement. He was succeeded by Heinrich Sawatzky. Other ministers were Johann Bergmann, Gerhard Warkentin, Peter Zacharias, Peter Löwen, and Heinrich Sawatzky, Jr. After World War I the congregation remodeled a home in the village of Protassov into a church. Whether this congregation was revived after the death of Stalin in 1953 is not yet known. (See also Slavgorod Mennonite Church.) C.K.

Gerhard Fast, In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957) 70.

Reinhardsbrunn, a village (pop. 800) in the government district of Hausbreitenbach, Thuringia, Germany, which now belongs to Friedrichroda, but in the 16th century belonged to the duchy of Gotha. Reinhardsbrunn is of importance in Mennonite history in the fact that here and in the castle nine Anabaptists were imprisoned in January 1530 and cross-examined by Friedrich Myconius (q.v.), the superintendent of Gotha. Six of them remained steadfast—three recanted—and were put to death on Jan. 18, 1530. Their joyful martyrdom attracted much attention in the electorate of Saxony (q.v.). No seditious charges could be proved against them; they were executed for their faith. They were Andreas and Katharina Kolb (q.v.), Christoph Ortlep (q.v.), Katharina König (q.v.), Elsa Kuntz (q.v.), and Barbara Unger. In August 1533 another Anabaptist was held here and examined by Friedrich Myconius, but was released upon recanting. NEFF.

Wappler, Thüringen, 12, where an excerpt is given from the book by Justus Menius (q.v.), Der widerleuffer lere vnd geheimnis, aus heiliger Schrift widerlegt, and 135, where the trial is described and the Anabaptist defendants named; ML III, 455 f.

Reinier Wybrands(z): see Wybema, R. W.

Reinken Ramakers (Rademacher): see Remken Ramakers.

Reinland (Rheinland), a common village name which originated in West Prussia and was found among the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve, Man., from where it was transplanted to Swift Current and Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno in the Chaco, and Villarrica, Paraguay. (See Villages.) C.K.

Reinland, a village in West Prussia, Germany, was one of the later village areas to be cultivated, being covered by a forest until 1725. The first settlers had predominantly Dutch names. The settlers were given permission to build walls and dams, dig trenches, and build windmills and sluices for drainage. They were released from work on the main dam. They were permitted to sell their land only to relatives. In 1936 there were still seven Mennonite families there, who were members of the Tiegenhagen (q.v.) congregation. E.C.

W. Crichton, Zur Gesch. der Mennoniten (Königsberg, 1786) 28; E. J. Dormann, Gesch. des Kreises Marienburg (Danzig, 1862) 73; Horst Penner, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet . . . (Weierhof, 1940) 56; ML III, 456.

Reinland Mennonite Church or "Altkolonier Reinlaender Mennoniten Gemeinde," the name of the Old Colony Mennonite Church (q.v.) at Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico, which was transplanted from Manitoba, where it was also known as the "Reinland-Mennoniten-Kirche." The church was transplanted under the leadership of Elder Johann J. Friesen, who was succeeded by the present Elder Isaac Dyck (1958). The membership of the church including children was 3,340 in 1936, 7,706 in 1949, and 8,768 in 1953. The church has a number of places of worship in the various villages. (See also Old Colony Mennonites and Old Colony Mennonite Church.) C.K.

Reintal, a Mennonite village name which originated on the West Reserve of Manitoba, from where it was transplanted to Cuauhtemoc in Mexico, Menno in the Chaco, and Villarrica, Paraguay. See Villages.) C.K.

Reiseprediger (English, itinerant preacher), an office established in the second half of the 19th century by the Mennonites of South Germany, Switzerland, France, and Russia, and still maintained in the southeast German Verband (q.v.) and in France. Its purpose has been essentially to furnish pastoral ministry to individual families, often widely scattered, and to supplement the work of the local preachers with a special preaching ministry for various special occasions. Although the Reiseprediger has usually been appointed by a conference, with a salary guaranteed by the conference treasury, part of the support has often been provided by direct contributions from the families served and by offerings at the special meetings. At times the Reiseprediger has been conceived of as an evangelist and Bible teacher available for service both within and outside the conference appointing him. Elder Christian Schmutz of Rappenu (q.v.), a leader in the Verband, advocated this concept as early as 1866 (Menn. Bl., 1866, p. 11) and urged the establishment of a training school for such Reiseprediger and evangelists.

The Verband was the first Mennonite conference to inaugurate the Reiseprediger system, partly because it had the largest number of scattered families and partly because it wanted to supplement the work of its exclusively rural and untrained ministry. Since 1871 the Verband has had continuously one or two Reiseprediger. The list is as follows: Christian Herrmann 1871-74(?), Michael Landes (q.v.) 1873-75, Jakob Hege of Reihen (q.v.) 1876-1911, Johannes Hirschler (1853-1931) 1883-86, G. van der Smisen (1859-1923) 1886-1923, Michael Fellmann ?-1936, Daniel Pohl (d. c1943) 1935(?) -40, Ulrich Hege (b. 1892) 1945- , Adolf Schnebele 1956- . Christian Schnebele, first appointed by the South German Conference, served the Verband 1922-58. The South German Conference had the following Reiseprediger: Emil Händiges (1871-) 1912-18, Christian Schnebele 1918-20, Abraham Warkentin (1885-1947) 1918-20, and Christian Guth (1879-1952) 1923-52. All but Herrmann Händiges, Ulrich Hege, Warkentin, and Adolf Schnebele were products of St. Chrischona and carried the Chrischona emphasis in doctrine and piety with them. In Switzerland the Mennonites never had their own Reiseprediger, but Reiseprediger from Germany (e.g., Jakob Hege) and from non-Mennonite circles have served them. The Alsatian Conference appointed Henri Volkmar in 1913; he was succeeded in 1921 by Fritz Goldschmidt, who served until World War II. About 1950 Willi Peterschmitt was appointed. The French-speaking Mennonites have had Pierre Sommer and later André Goll, and for a time Pierre Widmer.

The North German and West Prussian Mennonites never adopted the Reiseprediger practice, although it was vigorously advocated by outstanding leaders. The Vereinigung (q.v.) included a provision for Reisepredigt service in its 1934 constitution but without practical result. One Reiseprediger served in the West Prussian area 1901-29, viz., Nikolai Wiebe of Lichtenau (Molotschna settlement in Russia), who had served as a missionary in Sumatra 1889-1901.

In Russia the first "Reiselehrer" of the Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.) was Benjamin Bekker (q.v.), ordained in 1861. The character of the Reiseprediger and their work in the M.B. Church was described about 1872 in a number of their diaries. Their reports were sewed together in a single volume and were sent from congregation to congregation on a specified route. Some of the evangelists were Jakob Dirksen, Jakob Jantz, Jakob Reimer (1817-1891, q.v.), Christian Schmidt (1833-1905, q.v.), Abraham Unger (1820-80, q.v.), and Abraham Wall.

"Systematic Reisepredigt in the Mennonite congregations as far as we know arose first in the private Reiseprediger committee, which was formed for the purpose of sending Bernhard Harder (1832-84, q.v.) to Halbstadt (q.v.) about 1880 and was organized through the initiative of Heinrich Lettkemann of Halbstadt and then carried on for a long time by Heinrich Janz. Then the matter of the Reisepredigt was taken up by the General Conference (Bundeskonferenz). The appointed Reiseprediger were Bernhard Harder, Jakob Quiring (educated at the Weierhof, q.v., and the Evangelical Seminary at Basel), who later went to America, Gerhard Harder, Elder Jakob Gerbrandt, and missionary Johann Kröker. . . . In addition elders and preachers frequently traveled as delegates of the church conference of this or that group and of the General Conference (q.v.). Much information concerning the Reisepredigt in the Mennonite Church is found in the Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (q.v.) published at Berdyansk in 1909."

In America the Reiseprediger concept found formal expression only among the General Conference Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren. Daniel Hoch (d. 1863) was the first to be appointed by the General Conference in 1861, the Conference at its organization in 1860 having expressly stated as one of its objectives the provision of a Reisepredigt ministry. He was followed by Christian Krehbiel. In 1868 the Conference appointed three Reiseprediger, L. O. Schimmel for the East, Ephraim Hunsberger for the Central area, and Christian Krehbiel for the new West. The Kansas Conference (first session 1877), later called the Western District, made provision for preaching visits and later appointed Reiseprediger. In 1880 a Reisepredigt Committee was created. Christian Krehbiel was appointed Reiseprediger 1881-83, followed by David Goerz 1883-84. In 1884 the Reisepredigt was made a full-time assignment, with J. B. Baer appointed, followed in 1890 by N. F. Toews. Wilhelm Ewert served 1885-86. In Canada Benjamin Ewert served as Reiseprediger 1921-38. The above list is by no means complete.

The Canadian Mennonite Brethren have never had an official Reiseprediger, although individual ministers have been called by provincial conferences for special service of this sort, visiting the congregations in the district area. In the United States the Committee on Evangelism of the U.S. area conferences appoints a Reiseprediger. In 1958 he was Waldo Wiebe.

In the Mennonite Church (MC), although there were never any official Reiseprediger, numerous ministers of their own volition traveled widely in the 19th century visiting scattered families and small congregations. The Evangelizing Fund and Evangelizing Committee established in 1882 as forerunners of the later Mission Board were essentially provision for a sort of modest Reiseprediger service. (Condensed from the article "Reisepredigt" by Ernst Crous, ML III, 456-60). H.S.B.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 385, 397, 430 ff., 762 f.; II, 45, 137; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1888, 96; ML III, 456-60.

Reisswitz: see Reisswitz.

Reist (Reyst), Hans (also called Hans Hüsli) (dates of birth and death not known), of Obertal, an elder in the Mennonite congregation in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland. Not much is known about his life and work, though he was without doubt an important preacher and elder. In the official documents of Trachselwald of 1670-71 Hans Reist is named as having left the country with his wife, who like him adhered to Anabaptist teaching; his leaving was probably not voluntary, however, for about that time about 700 persons were expelled from the canton of Bern (q.v.). The farm home of Hans Reist in Rothenbaum, near Affoltern in the Emmental, was confiscated and sold. In the "Täufergeltstage," in the state archives of Bern, his estate is listed. The stock of grain, two cows, a calf, a pig, hay and straw, seven beds with furnishings, a loom, and furniture were sold at public auction. After paying the debts and other expenses, a sum of 854 pounds remained, which was added to the Anabaptist fund (q.v.).

But Reist, like many other Emmental Anabaptists, returned from his exile. In 1686 the court record reads, "Hans Reist of Sumiswald, brother-in-law of Tobias Heininger, has been summoned to court, because he called for Heininger's wife at Waltrigen to take her to an Anabaptist meeting. He did not appear." In the prebendary manual of Dürrenroth, under date of Feb. 6, 1701, there is a notation that

"Hans Reischt" promised the magistrate, who had summoned him to answer for his Anabaptism (Teufferey), to attend church services and accept the sacraments. But by May 1704 the charge was made that Hans Reist's wife, "Baby Ryser," did not come to communion services, but instead went with her husband to an Anabaptist meeting on Saturday night and did not return until the next morning.

The Bernese Mennonites had a severe struggle to undergo in the storms of persecution of the 17th century; but a still worse struggle was brought upon the leaders by internal dissension. This was especially the case with Hans Reist, when Jakob Ammann (q.v.) demanded a strict enforcement of avoidance in marriage and in eating (see Avoidance), thus causing a deep schism in the brotherhood. When he was asked his position on this point by Ammann, who was making a round of the congregations as Nikolaus Moser (q.v.), the elder of Friedersmatt, and Peter Giger, of Reutenen, near Zäziwil, and others had done, Reist, at that time a preacher in Utzingen, near Worb, rejected such a strict interpretation of the ban. Avoidance at the table is wrong, said Reist, for it is not what goes into a man's mouth that defiles him. Peter Giger advocated calling all the Swiss elders together to examine the matter in the light of the Bible and then to act in accord with its teaching. Then a number of preachers and elders met at the home of Nikolaus Moser to discuss the question, when word came that Reist and his followers would not come. Peter Giger was grieved, as he wrote, when Ammann began to criticize the brethren. Giger begged them not to create a schism, "for if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another" (Gal. 5:15). But Ammann began to call Reist and six of his co-elders rabble rousers who should be expelled from the brotherhood as liars and shunned. The brethren begged him to exercise patience; open transgressors who persist in their sin should be excluded with the counsel of the entire brotherhood, but not brethren on account of difference of opinion. Ammann, however, cut off fraternal relations with the opposing group and pronounced the ban (q.v.) on them. There were several violent arguments. Hans Reist now became the leader of those who opposed Ammann.

Soon afterward Ammann wrote a warning letter demanding that the brethren yield to his "Biblical views" within a short period. Such ultimatum-like demands resulted in a complete break, which defied all attempts at reconciliation, between the Amish (q.v.) and the Reist or Emmental group. Other points of difference, such as footwashing (q.v.), and strict regulation of clothing, were added to the points in dispute and became prominent issues.

The division extended into Alsace (q.v.) and the Palatinate (q.v.). Ammann visited the Alsatian congregations, everywhere banning those who did not yield to his views. In March 1694 the preachers of the Palatinate (q.v.) reached an agreement with the Swiss, confirming their adherence to the milder application of the ban. This paper was signed by Hans Reist and nine other preachers and elders of the Swiss congregations, including Peter Giger, and seven of the Palatinate.

Again the brethren met in Markirch (q.v.) on Nov. 8, 1697, to take a position against the harsh attitude of the Amish. Elder Hans Rudolf Nägele wrote a letter at Altkirch to Hans Reist severely criticizing Ammann's view that without his interpretation of the ban there was no salvation. It was his view that when the knowledge of the Word of God increased and the light of truth shone more brightly it would be clear whether salvation is to be sought in the ban or in the merit of Jesus, and that Ammann's position made the suffering of Jesus of no avail; the Amish were like wolves who did not spare Christ's flock (Acts 20), and who avoided neither lies nor deception to secure a greater following.

The dissension was bitter; the brethren found it difficult to be just to one another. Both sides called the other heretics. The Markirch congregation wrote another letter to the Emmmental brethren on Dec. 23, 1697, stating that Ammann had called them false teachers, excommunicated liars, indeed, servants of the devil. In a letter of Oct. 16, 1699, Jakob Gut advised that the subject be dropped and all condemnation cease, for each would have to answer for his own deeds before the Judgment Seat of Christ. Ammann later rued his harsh action, and in a letter of Feb. 7, 1700, confessed his wrong to the Reist group, requesting their forgiveness. But it was too late; the schism could not be healed. Among the emigrants to Holland in 1711 the two groups were sharply distinguished. The "Reistschen" in general were less willing to join the emigration than the Amish, and many of the Hans Reist group obstinately refused to leave the country. Their elder then was Peter Hahbegger; Peter Spaar (?), Hans Gärber, Ulrich Säger, Peter Oberley, and Christian Jacob were the preachers of this group, who are said to have lived particularly in the "Unterland." Daniel Grimm and Benedict Brechbühl (Brechbill, q.v.), both of whom had been banished before but had secretly returned, were also very influential in persuading the Reist followers not to leave with the Amish.

Though nothing more is known about Reist's work, his spirit is evident in a prayer, which has been preserved in printed form, asking that God might come to the aid of the scattered believers who lived in tribulation, care, anxiety, and distress, and save them from the hands of those who did not know God. "Turn from us all unreasonable undertakings and attacks of men, who persecute, despise, insult, hate, and defame us, and . . . draw us all together in Thy great love and let no dissension or scattering come among us any more, but rather see, O Lord of Harvest, how great the harvest is, but how few Thy faithful workers are; so rouse up among us faithful workers, shepherds and teachers, preachers and elders, who may proclaim and reveal Thy Word."

Hans Reist is also the author of the song, "Es ist ein wunderschöne Gaab," 46 stanzas, which was long in use in the Swiss congregations. It has the heading, "A Scriptural Story of Abraham and His Son."

S.G.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1334; see also Nos. 1255a, 1255c, 1331, 1337, 1339, 1341; Milton Gascho, "The Amish Division of 1693-1697 in Switzerland and Alsace," MQR XI (1937) 235-66; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 417 f.; Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptisten (Scottsdale, 1953); John B. Mast, The Letters of the Amish Division (Oregon City, 1950); Müller, Berner Täufer, 314-19; Wolkan, Lieder, 156; ML III, 460-62.

Reist Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, met every fourth Sunday about 1850-70 near or in the home of deacon Peter Reist, who lived 6 miles east of Breslau, Waterloo Co., Ont. There is no indication of organization. According to arrangement by the Ontario Conference, ministers were likely supplied. Jacob Miller, a Mennonite minister of south of Niagara Falls, owned property in this community, and one member of his family lived there. Peter Reist was ordained deacon for the Wanner Church several miles to the south in 1873. J.C.F.

Reist Mennonite Meetinghouse, built on original Reist lands of Sun Hill, southeast of Manheim, Pa., was used both for church and school purposes by the Mennonites living between Erisman and Erb, and in the circuit. The site was abandoned in 1860, when the congregation built the Kauffman church on the Lancaster-Manheim Pike. I.D.L.

Reistschen (Reystsche Anabaptisten, Hans-Reist-volk), the followers of Hans Reist (q.v.).

Reiswitz (Reisswitz), George Leopold, Baron of (1764-1828), royal councilor and knight of the order of St. John, a friend of the Mennonites, was born of an old family of Silesian nobility at Moschen, Upper Silesia, Germany, on Feb. 7, 1764. He and Friedrich Wadzeck (q.v.) published the book Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Europa und America, statistischen, historischen und religiösen Inhalts (Berlin, 1821). The foreword presents the purpose of the book to be to protect the Mennonites from persecution by an objective illumination of their history, their principles, their life, and their attitudes. It contains 392 pages, and contains information on the Mennonite congregations in Prussia, privileges (q.v.), confessions (q.v.) of faith, also a collection of laws and regulations passed against them, as well as on Menno Simons (q.v.) and the Münsterite (q.v.) and Müntzer (q.v.) "abominations," with proof that the Mennonites had nothing in common with them, and also opinions concerning the Mennonites in France (q.v.), and concerning the "Sauds in East India, a religious sect that conspicuously resembles the Mennonites and Quakers," a very inexact and incorrect list of the sources on the history of the Mennonites, the account of a legal battle (see Riesen, David van), the census of the Mennonite congregations in Prussia, and information on the Mennonite settlements in South Russia and Caucasia. The statements and assertions are in many cases out of date, and thus detract from the value of the book.

The second part of the book appeared eight years later under the title, Beiträge zur Kenntniss der taufgesinnten Gemeinden oder der Mennoniten, statistischen, historischen und religiösen, auch juristischen Inhalts. It was published by Reiswitz, Wadzeck having died in the interim, at Breslau in 1829. Its contents are as follows: (1) "Notes of a scholar of the Mennonite faith concerning information on the Mennonite congregations, which has been furnished by several recent authors." (2) "Presentation of the organization of the West Prussian Mennonite congregations, with respect to their payment of dues to the church, parish, and schools to other religious parties and other organizations." (3) "Concerning the Mennonites" (an attempt at a historical presentation by means of excerpts from various writings). (4) "Concerning the creed of the various denominations similar to the Mennonites and yet essentially different from them" (Waldenses, Quakers, and Methodists). (5) "Concerning the attitude of the Mennonites toward government and their participation in public offices." (6) "Additional information on the life of Menno Simons." (7) "Directory of all the Mennonite congregations in Europe." (8) "Information on the origin of the Mennonite congregations in East Prussia (q.v.) and Lithuania (q.v.), according to Crichton and some manuscript data," and "Privileges (q.v.) of the Mennonites of West Prussia (q.v.) and Lithuania." (9) "Concerning the emigration of the Mennonites to Russia and the principles of government established for that purpose (a historical presentation)." (10) "Concerning the right of the Mennonites to possess property." (11) "Concerning the refusal of the Mennonites to render military service." (12) "Historical presentation of the various legal stipulations concerning the military obligations of the Prussian Mennonites." Then follows an appendix containing supplementary facts on refusal to do military service, statistics of the congregations of the Bavarian Rhine district, a law on the oath (q.v.), the number of Mennonites in America, the English language periodicals of the Anabaptists, a list of villages in Lithuania where Mennonites had settled, names of Mennonites who owned land in Lithuania, a list of the elders and preachers of the Mennonites in South, East, and West Prussia, Lithuania, Poland, and the recently settled colonies in Russia. This book of 375 pages has at the end a directory of Mennonite families in the "Marienwerder and Danzig Cammer-Departement," besides two pictures of the Mennonite church in Danzig and a map of the lands of the Mennonites and other German settlers in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia (q.v.). The numerous misprints and inexact statements as well as the omissions are very annoying. Nevertheless both books are of value for the history of the Mennonites. (ML III, 462 f.)

NEFF.

Baron von Reischwitz and Friedrich Wadzeck published in 1824 a Glaubensbekenntnis der Mennoniten und Nachricht von ihren Colonien, nebst Lebensbeschreibung Menno Simons. Concerning the origin of Anabaptism in Switzerland and its spread to South Germany, Holland, and to West Prussia the authors apparently lacked information, for by way of introduction they say, "The origin of this Christian religious party is very obscure." Their discussion in general does not go beyond Menno's leaving the Catholic Church, the confession of faith by Cornelis Ris, and the history of the Mennonites in Prussia, with the exception of the emigration to Russia. A detailed account of a legal contest on the question of the nonresistance of the Mennonites of West Prussia is presented. On the whole the authors try to do justice to the Mennonites and approach the Anabaptist movement with a respectable understanding. S.G.

Reitzes, Ulke: see Dijkstra, Ulke Reitzes.

Rekker, a Dutch family name, borne by four Mennonite ministers. Meindert Huyberts Rekker was a lay preacher of Sneek 1723-c57. Jan Pieters Rekker was a lay preacher of the congregations of Veenwoudsterwal c1740-49, Groningen (united Flemish and Waterlander congregation) 1749-51, and Winsum-Obergum 1751-c75. Gerlof (Gerlaicus) Rekker, of Dokkum, studied at the University of Franeker and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam and served the congregations of Den Hoorn on the island of Texel 1754-56, Bolsward 1756-59(?), and Vlissingen 1759-d.1809. His son Bartholomeus Rekker (1768-1844) was a merchant and writer. Sicco Rekker (1767-1835), also of Dokkum, and apparently a relative of Gerlof's, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and was a minister at Middelburg 1790-1832. His son Pieter Rekker served there as a deacon for many years. vdZ.

Naamlijst: F. Nagtglas, Levensberichten van Zeeuwen II (Middelburg, 1893) 502-4; DB 1884, 50; 1885, 92, 95.

Relics of the Martyrs, i.e., objects or portions of objects left by the martyrs, portions of their bodies, or articles connected with their death. In the Catholic Church there is a certain superstitious veneration of these objects on the assumption that they possessed miraculous powers of grace and benefit. There is no such veneration among the Mennonites. It is merely a matter of the loyal appreciation of several objects pertaining to their martyrs. So far as we know, there are three such objects: a fragment of a tablecloth owned by Thomas von Imbroich (q.v.), the pear of Maeyken Boosers (q.v.), and the tongue screw used on Hans Bret (q.v.). The first two are kept in the archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam, and were shown to visitors at the Mennonite World Conference held June 29-July 3, 1936. The tongue screw is in the possession of the de Hoop Scheffer family. A thorough investigation of the authenticity and history of these relics was made by Samuel Cramer. (DB 1898, 107 ff.; ML III, 53.)

NEFF.

Relief, Colonization, and Public Service, Incorporated, of the church of God in Christ, Mennonite. In the early 1930's, during and before the great drouth in western Kansas and eastern Colorado, Sam Dirks and A. L. Yost took a special interest in resettlement of needy families. In 1933 the General Conference chose five men of the Western District to form a Colonization Board, with one additional member from each of the other two districts. The board operates under the General Conference and serves in both home and foreign relief and rehabilitation work. The board has been instrumental in forming settlements at Fredonia, Kan.; Bonner's Ferry, Idaho; Burns, Kan.; La Junta, Chih., Mexico; Huron, S.D.; Atmore, Ala.; and Stapleton, Ga.

P.G.H.

Relief (Ken.) Mennonite Church (MC), established in 1943, is a mission station of the Virginia Mennonite Home Mission Board. In 1957 it had 7 members.

Relief News Letter began as the Relief Trainees' News Letter, issued monthly February-October 1944; the title was then changed to Relief News Letter, and continued monthly until September 1946, with 32 issues. It was a mimeographed paper, 8½ x 11 in., with 8-10 pages plus a 4-page supplement, published by the MCC headquarters at Akron, Pa. The supplement featured book reviews and articles on foreign relief activities. The Relief News Letter had the following editors: John E. Bender, Irvin B. Horst, Ruth L. Hilty, J. Richard Blosser, Delbert L. Gratz, David A. Shank, and Ralph K. Bargen. The purpose of the Relief News Letter was to present news concerning the MCC foreign relief program to MCC Civilian Public Service men and other young people in training for relief service. J.N.B.

Relief Work. The Anabaptist emphasis on discipleship and brotherhood required the material possessions of the Christian to be brought under the lordship of Christ. The extremes of luxury and poverty were to be avoided. Material aid and generous sharing and co-operation in economic matters were to be freely practiced; and after the manner of the Good Samaritan the needy were to be helped. Hans Leopold, a Swiss Brethren martyr of 1528, said of his brethren: "If they know of anyone who is in need, whether or not he is a member of their church, they believe it their duty, out of love to God, to render help and aid." Menno Simons, in an enumeration of qualities of the saints, says: "They show mercy and love. . . . They entertain those in distress. They take the stranger into their houses. They comfort the afflicted; clothe the naked; feed the hungry." Both the Dordrecht and the Ris confessions of faith in their statements on nonresistance emphasize the duty of the Christian to feed, clothe, and help his needy fellow men.

Anabaptist-Mennonite history is filled with illustrations of this brotherhood and "Good Samaritan" faith in action. In 1553 occurred the well-known incident in which the followers of Menno Simons at Wismar in North Germany gave asylum to a group of English Calvinist refugees who had been driven from home by the Catholic queen and then were refused admission to his country by the Lutheran king of Denmark. The Hutterite chronicles of the 17th century record the presence in their communities of numerous strangers receiving bread and alms during a time of famine.

During the 17th and 18th centuries the Dutch Mennonites gave much material assistance to their persecuted and needy brethren in Switzerland, the Palatinate, Danzig, Poland, and Moravia. In 1666 the Amsterdam city authorities, in a formal protest made to the Swiss government at the request of the Dutch Mennonites against the persecution of the Mennonites, included the following sentence: "The Mennonites are a people which at no opportunity have failed to extend noteworthy charity toward the people of the Reformed faith. Only recently, when our brethren, the Waldenses, were so cruelly driven from their homes [by the duke of Savoy], they have in this city, simply upon our recommendation, contributed the sum of about 7,000 pounds in Holland money, for the support of the aforesaid Waldenses." Following the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685 the Dutch Mennonites contributed similar assistance to the French Huguenots.

In 1710 the Dutch Mennonites organized the Foundation for Foreign Relief (Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden, q.v.), which carried on an active relief program for half a century and which was not finally liquidated until 1803. In 1711 this organization assisted 400 refugees from Switzerland to settle in the Netherlands. Other settlers followed in 1713 and subsequently. During the 1720's and 30's large sums were contributed by the Dutch organization for the assistance of Mennonites migrating from the Palatinate to Pennsylvania. It is estimated that in 1709 the Dutch Mennonites contributed more than 270,000 guilders for foreign relief work, for the aid of both those who were going to America and those who settled in Holland. When the Mennonite World Relief Conference was held in Danzig in 1930 G. Fast in an address enumerated a long list of cases, first in which the West Prussian Mennonites had been assisted by the Dutch, and then in which the Prussian Mennonites gave aid to their brethren in West Germany and in Russia.

The new settlements of Mennonites in America continued the tradition of helping the needy. As early as 1756 the Franconia Mennonites in Eastern Pennsylvania organized a small relief program for the help of the Moravian communities of Northampton County who had suffered loss of life and property because of Indian raids. In 1775, when the war spirit of the revolutionary era was running high, the Mennonites joined the Dunkers in a petition to the Pennsylvania Assembly declaring it according to their principles "to feed the hungry and give the thirsty drink; we have dedicated ourselves to serve all men in everything that can be helpful to the preservation of men's lives, but we find no freedom in giving, or doing, or assisting in anything by which men's lives are destroyed or hurt." During the war the Mennonites used the facilities of the Brethren Cloister at Ephrata for hospital purposes. A Mennonite minister, John Baer, and his wife died, evidently of a contagious disease, while ministering to sick soldiers at this place. One writer says: "we may be sure from what we know of their character and customs, that many a weary straggler, invalid soldier, or destitute refugee received aid and comfort from the rich farms and hearths of the Pennsylvania pacifists." Even British fugitives received such aid. In 1783 some British soldiers who had been imprisoned in Lancaster escaped and called at Mennonite homes northeast of the city, where they received help. Local officials regarded this as an act of treason and insisted that the Mennonites be punished. Only through an appeal to George Washington himself were these Mennonites saved from a prison sentence. But they had to pay a fine.

The immigration of 18,000 European Mennonites, chiefly from Russia, in the decade following 1873, was the occasion for a large-scale relief and aid program on the part of the Mennonites of Canada and the United States. Three committees were organized for carrying on this work. The first was the Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.) organized in 1873 with Christian Krehbiel and David Goertz of Summerfield, Ill., as president and secretary, and John F. Funk of Elkhart, Ind., as treasurer. The second committee known as the Mennonite Executive Aid Committee was organized in Eastern Pennsylvania under the leadership of Bishop Amos Herr of the Lancaster Conference. The third committee was formed by the Ontario Mennonites and was known as the Canadian Aid Committee, with Jacob Y. Shantz of Berlin (now Kitchener) as president. These three committees co-operated very closely and did a remarkable piece of work. They distributed literature throughout the Mennonite communities of south Russia, giving detailed instructions as to procedures for taking advantage of the provisions being made by the American committees. They had representatives in Hamburg and New York who met the immigrants and helped them with the details of their travel and transportation arrangements. They helped them make contact with the proper railway companies and arranged for very cheap immigrant fares, and gave assistance in the location and purchase of lands on which to settle. It is estimated that the assistance in money and services given by the Mennonites in the United States to the Russian immigrants amounted to more than $100,000. The Ontario Mennonites secured a loan of $88,000 from the Canadian government to assist the immigrants who came to Canada. In addition, private loans and gifts brought the aid given by the Canadian Mennonites also considerably above $100,000.

The next important relief project of the American Mennonites was in response to the India famine of 1896-97. In 1897 the Home and Foreign Relief Commission (q.v.) was organized at Elkhart, Ind., under M.C. auspices and for a decade contributed grain for famine relief aid funds for the support of orphans. The HFRC came to an end in 1906. The Emergency Relief Commission (q.v.) of the General Conference Mennonite Church, organized in 1899, carried on a similar work in India. This board continued in existence until it was merged with the Board of Christian Service in 1950. It served as a relief agency to aid members in needy North American congregations after the work in India was completed. An important outcome of these projects was the founding of two India Mennonite missions (q.v.), the M.C. in 1899 and the G.C.M. in 1900. The M.B.C. Church in 1898 started orphanage work at Hadjin, Turkey, for Armenian survivors of the Turkish massacres.

The Mennonite (MC) Relief Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.), organized in 1917 at Elkhart, was the official agency through which the Mennonite Church (MC) supported the Friends reconstruction work in France and other European Relief projects as well as the Near East relief following World War I. (For a treatment of the French work see Reconstruction Work in France.)

In 1919 the MRCWS appointed a committee of three reconstruction workers then serving in France,

A. J. Miller, J. Roy Allgyer, and A. E. Hiebert, to investigate opportunities for relief work in other parts of Europe. Leaving Paris on Oct. 9, 1919, they spent three and one-half days in Berlin, traveled through Leipzig, Dresden, and Prague, and spent five and one-half days in Vienna; then continued through Budapest and Bucharest and spent six days in Odessa and Kherson, South Russia. They visited hospitals, welfare centers, and charitable institutions, and reported great shortages of food, clothing, and fuel, accompanied by suffering, want, and disorganization wherever they went; the opportunities for a Mennonite relief work were great, working either independently or in co-operation with the American Friends Service Committee. In the meantime, however, the MRCWS had committed itself to the Near East work, its first workers having sailed in January 1919. Hence no extensive work was undertaken in any of the countries visited by the above team except Russia.

In 1920, however, John J. Fisher was stationed in Vienna, where he engaged in child feeding work under the Quaker organization. Russell Lantz transferred from the French Reconstruction Unit to Poland, where he worked under the Quaker relief organization. Four workers transferred from France to Germany; Atlee Hostetler, Homer Hostetler, and Ora R. Liechty assisted in chief feeding work under the AFSC, and Solomon E. Yoder visited families of German prisoners of war who had worked for the AFSC reconstruction unit in France, and remunerated them for their service. Russell Lantz worked for a time in Poland under the AFSC. The AFSC administered the entire German section of the European Children's Fund program which began in February 1920. At one time this organization was feeding 1,000,000 German children daily. The AFSC asked S. E. Allgyer to organize support for this program among all branches of American Mennonites. This offer was not accepted, however, because of commitments by the MRCWS in the Near East and Russia.

The American Mennonites did, however, give considerable support to the South German Mennonite relief organization, Christenpflicht (q.v.), founded in 1920 under the leadership of Michael Horsch (q.v.). In 1922 Horsch visited the American Mennonites in behalf of this work and in 1930 he reported that during this period the total receipts of Christenpflicht had been about $62,000, of which $44,000 had been contributed by the MRCWS, $8,500 by the Emergency Relief Commission (GCM), $6,500 by other American Mennonite sources, and the remainder by the European Mennonites. Closely associated with Christenpflicht was the Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge (q.v.), later called Deutsche Mennoniten-Hilfe (q.v.), also organized in 1920, with headquarters at first at Heilbronn, for the assistance of Mennonite refugees from Russia. This organization operated a refugee camp at Lechfeld (q.v.).

Near East Relief (NER). Another needy relief field was the Near East. For many years the Armenians and other Christians had been persecuted by the Turks. Perhaps a million had been killed or died as a result of mistreatment. Perhaps another three quarter million lived as refugees and orphans in various parts of the old Turkish Empire. In addition to the obvious need of the sufferers, this field of service appealed to the American Mennonites because its location was in Bible lands which it was believed would provide opportunities for a new mission field.

As early as November 1915 the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, later known as the Near East Relief, was organized. The NER was able to do a small amount of work during the war. As soon as the war was over, however, it was ready to operate on a large scale, using missions and mission schools throughout the region as the base of operations. A plan was launched to raise $30,000,000 during the winter of 1918-19. The cause was promoted through American Sunday schools, who were asked to raise $2,000,000. The General Sunday School Committee of the Mennonite Church (MC) co-operated in this plan.

On Jan. 4, 1919, the MRCWS accepted an invitation from the NER to co-operate in its work by contributing personnel and funds. Five days later payment of $20,000 as the first financial contribution to the NER was authorized. On Jan. 25, 1919, the Pensacola sailed for Beirut carrying 42 relief workers and 5,000 tons of relief supplies. Among the relief workers were nine Mennonites, seven young men going out as workers under the direction of Aaron Loucks and William A. Derstine, the latter two men having the responsibility to locate and organize a field of work and to determine its relation to the Near East Relief. It was hoped that a semi-autonomous work could be organized under the general administration of the NER, conversations with the NER headquarters in New York apparently having suggested this possibility. It was also hoped that the Mennonite relief program in the Near East would lead directly to the establishment of mission work. After further study, however, the idea of a semi-autonomous Mennonite unit was abandoned. Loucks and Derstine then sailed for home, while the seven young men remained in Beirut in the service of the Syrian area of the NER under the direction of James H. Nicol.

The reasons for abandoning the original plan for a Mennonite relief unit were (1) the inexperience of the Mennonite Church; (2) confusion within the administration of the NER, particularly lack of understanding between its New York office and its Constantinople director; (3) the poor prospects for a mission in the area since the field was covered by other long-established missions; (4) the need for the services of the Mennonite workers within the NER organization at Beirut.

Of the seven men in the first contingent Orie O. Miller became administrative assistant to Nicol and assistant director of the Syrian area extending from Port Said to Mardin, in which at least 7,000 orphans were located; David Zimmerman was construction engineer; Ezra Deter was engaged in transport in the Beirut district; William Stoltzfus and Silas Hertzler had charge of orphanage work in Sidon; B. F. Stoltzfus was assistant director of an orphanage in Jerusalem; and C. L. Graber was director of a refugee camp and industrial work in Aleppo. During 1919 nine more Mennonites entered the NER service and in the next two years 13 more men and two women did so, making a total of 31 Mennonite NER workers. The work of these men and women was similar to that of the original seven. One of the men, Menno Shellenberger of Kansas, who sailed with the last group in July 1921, died on the field. The total financial contribution of the American Mennonites to NER was $339,000, of which $326,000 was contributed through the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers (MC) and the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. While the original hopes for the establishment of a semi-autonomous or even an independent Mennonite relief project in the Near East were not realized, the workers on the field and the American Mennonites as a whole gained much valuable experience through their co-operation with NER, as well as earlier with the AFSC in the French reconstruction work.

Russian Relief. As early as 1919 M. B. Fast, W. P. Neufeld, and B. B. Reimer, Mennonites of Reedley, Cal., collected funds, clothing, and relief supplies amounting to more than $40,000 for the suffering Mennonite communities in Siberia, which were at that time not under Soviet rule. Fast accompanied the shipment in person and was joined later by Neufeld. Following their return the Emergency Relief Committee of the Mennonites of North America was organized Jan. 4, 1920, at Hillsboro, Kan., with P. C. Hiebert as chairman and M. B. Fast as general secretary; but it soon found the door to Siberia closed by military developments.

In June 1920, however, the Studienkommission (q.v.), composed of four Mennonite delegates from Russia, came to America to solicit help for their people who were suffering from famine, many of whom desired to emigrate. In response to this need and appeal the MCC was organized in July 1920 for the operation of a joint Mennonite relief program. The Emergency Relief Committee of the Mennonites of North America now joined its forces with the new movements as did the MRCWS, the Emergency Relief Committee of the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and the Mennonite Brethren Church. P. C. Hiebert was elected as chairman (serving until 1952) and Levi Mumaw as executive secretary (serving until his death in 1937), after which Orie O. Miller was chosen to fill his place (serving until 1958).

The Constantinople Unit. In August 1920, a church-wide program was launched for the gathering of new and used clothing, and in September twenty-five tons of clothing were shipped and three men sailed from New York to open the work in Russia, these being Orie O. Miller, Arthur W. Slagel, and Clayton Kratz. They reached Constantinople on September 27 and found numerous refugees from Russia, including some Mennonites, in the city. Slagel then remained in Constantinople with the shipment of goods and acquainted himself with the work of the NER, while Miller and Kratz went to Sebastopol, arriving on Oct. 6, 1920, from whence they pushed up into the Mennonite territory to survey the needs and complete plans for carrying on the work. After spending a few days there Miller returned to Constantinople to bring in the supplies in company with Slagel, while Kratz remained in Russia.

Although the Soviet government was now about three years old, the opposition forces had not been completely subdued, and at the time when Miller and Kratz came into Russia the White army of General Wrangel was in control of much of the area of the Mennonite settlements. Before Miller returned from Constantinople, however, Wrangel's forces were defeated and Clayton Kratz was caught behind the Bolshevik lines. He was later taken into custody by Bolshevik authorities and has never been heard from since. It is assumed that he died at their hands. Another result of Wrangel's defeat was the flight of about 130,000 refugees, including 200 Mennonites, from Russia to Constantinople. When they arrived many of them were unable to leave their ships for almost a month. The condition of these people was so appalling that the MCC found its first task to be that of helping to care for them. An orphanage was opened for the care of the children, and a department was opened for the distribution of the clothing which had been sent over. A home was opened for women and girls, and also a Mennonite home to care for the Mennonites on the refugee ship. Besides these four projects the MCC had charge of four smaller camps outside the city where they distributed soap, fuel, clothing, medicine, and other necessities. This work in Constantinople was finally closed in July 1922. The total amount expended for the work of the Constantinople unit was over $200,000. Of this amount more than $14,000 was used to assist a group of sixty-four Russian Mennonite refugees to come from Constantinople to America. In addition to Arthur W. Slagel, the workers comprising the Constantinople unit were B. F. Stoltzfus, J. E. Brunk, Vesta Zook, and Vinora Weaver.

Relief Work in Russia. Early in 1921 Alvin J. Miller, who had been with the reconstruction service in France, was appointed by the MCC as director of relief work in Russia, which was now almost completely under Soviet control. He came to Constantinople on Jan. 29, 1921, and then early in April, in company with Arthur W. Slagel, he sailed for the port of Novorossisk on the Black Sea, but they were refused entry into Russia. Miller now turned to Western Europe to make contact with Soviet diplomatic missions there, particularly in London. The Soviet government was very suspicious of all outside influences; therefore Miller's task was a very difficult one. But after making many contacts with the Red Cross, with Herbert Hoover's American Relief Administration, with the Quaker organization, and other agencies, Miller finally found his way to Moscow and gained an audience with the head of the Russian Central Commission for Combatting Famine, who signed an agreement on Oct. 1, 1921, stating the terms whereby the MCC would be permitted to carry on relief work in South Russia. Although the American Relief Administration had received permission in August 1921 to open work in Russia, authorization to do so in the Ukraine was not granted until January 1922, three months after the MCC agreement was signed.

The MCC operated in that part of Russia where the Mennonites lived, but relief was given to the entire population regardless of race or creed. Extensive work was carried on in some villages where no Mennonites lived at all. The method of work was to establish feeding kitchens in villages and distribute food to the needy. By May 1922 the Mennonites were feeding 25,000 persons daily, and by August the figure had reached 40,000. The feeding kitchens continued in operation through the summer of 1924. In addition to this service the MCC distributed food packets sent by Americans directly to their relatives and friends in Russia. Fifty or more Fordson tractor plow outfits were also shipped to the Mennonite villages by the MCC, these to take the place of the horses lost to the villages during the time of the war. The American Mennonites spent a total of about $1,200,000 for the relief work in Russia, and this was supplemented by several hundred thousand dollars contributed by the Mennonites of Holland, who also sent two Dutch representatives to the field in Russia. The total amount contributed by the American Mennonites and distributed through its own organizations for the relief of war sufferers in Europe and the Near East during World War I and immediately afterwards is estimated at about $2,500,000. In addition to O. O. Miller, A. J. Miller, and Clayton Kratz, the Mennonite relief workers in Russia included G. G. Hiebert, P. C. Hiebert, D. R. Hoepfner, Barbara Hofer, D. M. Hofer, C. E. Krehbiel, Daniel Schroeder, A. W. Slagel, P. H. Unruh, and H. C. Yoder. In August and September 1921, Jacob Koekebakker, pastor of Middelburg, as a representative of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs, negotiated with the authorities at Moscow, where he worked with Orie O. Miller. Pastor F. C. Fleischer (q.v.) had charge of the food and clothing shipments of the Dutch Mennonites in the Ukraine from early 1922 until the summer of 1923. R. J. C. Willink was the director of the Dutch relief action in Russia. For particulars see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Noodden.

Emigration from Russia to Canada. Besides its relief program in Russia, MCC had an important part in the migration, although at first several other Mennonite organizations were effected to carry on this task. One of these was the Mennonite Board of Colonization (q.v.) organized in 1920 at Newton; the other, the more important one of the two, was the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization (q.v.) with headquarters at Rosthern, Sask., organized in 1922 under the leadership of David Toews. The Canadian Pacific Railway and Steamship Company welcomed the prospect of new immigrants to settle the lands in western Canada, especially since it had confidence in the Mennonites because of the splendid record of the immigrants of the 1870's in repaying the loan which they had received from the government.

In the summer of 1923, therefore, the railway company readily entered into an agreement with the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization to transport 3,000 Mennonites from Russia to Canada at the rate of $140 per person on a credit basis. To this was to be added the railway fare from the port of entry to their final destination. The credit was extended without collateral, the Board of Colonization, with no assets, alone being liable for payment; individual members of the board assumed no financial responsibility. When the first 3,000 immigrants had arrived the contract was renewed. Renewal was repeated from time to time until by 1927 about 20,000 Russian Mennonites had arrived in Canada. The railway and steamship company extended a total credit of $2,000,000. In spite of the long depression years about two thirds of this amount had been repaid as early as 1940, and by 1945 the entire debt had been liquidated. In 1925-26 about 600 immigrants were brought from Russia to Mexico with the aid of the Mennonite Board of Colonization of Newton. Later, however, most of these removed to the United States or Canada. The few who remain live in a little settlement of their own at Cuauhtemoc, near the larger colony of Mennonites from Canada.

During the years following the Russian revolution, while some of the Mennonites were finding their way from Russia to America, many others were trying to restore the life of their old communities, hoping that the Soviet government would develop a policy of tolerance making it possible for Mennonite life to continue in a normal way. During the period of the New Economic Policy, 1921-28, it seemed as if this hope might eventually be realized; but after Stalin introduced his Five Year Plan in 1928 for the complete communization of Russia this hope was brought to an end. Those Mennonites who had the courage to maintain their individuality and their religious life soon found their property confiscated and sold, and themselves deported to northern Russia, where they suffered untold hardships and perished in large numbers. By 1929 the situation was so desperate that thousands of them determined to leave the country at any cost.

In the late spring of 1929 a few families from Siberia went to Moscow to secure passports for emigration. Finally, in August permission was granted them to leave. As soon as the news reached the Mennonite settlements there was a literal march on Moscow to secure passports. In a short time 15,000 would-be emigrants, chiefly Mennonites, were in the city, and it was estimated that 40,000 more were on the way. "It was a mass movement, unplanned, unorganized, hysterical almost." The government refused to grant passports, however, and made desperate efforts to stop the movement. Police were sent to the colonies to prevent Mennonites from boarding the trains and leaders were imprisoned. Thousands of the would-be emigrants encamped about Moscow were arrested and shipped, in unheated, sealed stock cars, to South Russia or Siberia in the cold of November and December.

Of this large number who sought to emigrate 6,000, two thirds of whom were Mennonites, however, received passports. But then they discovered that the Canadian government would not admit those without funds, unless they had friends who could guarantee that they would not become public charges. For a time it appeared that they would not be able to leave, but fortunately the German government admitted them to Germany temporarily, giving them time to decide on their final destination. The German Reichstag appropriated 6,000,000 Marks, as a loan for the aid of the refugees; various philanthropic organizations, including the German Red Cross, operating in an over-all organization known as "Brüder in Not," helped to care for them, and the Mennonites of Germany and Holland also organized an effectual relief work among them. Benjamin H. Unruh, one of the four Studienkommission delegates from Russia, who had remained in Germany as the agent for the Russian Mennonites and had done great work in the 1922-27 emigration, now served as the liaison with the Mennonites of Western Europe and America in caring for the 1929-30 movement.

Unruh now appealed to the MCC for help. Since emigration to the United States was impossible, and since the door to Canada was also practically closed because of the economic depression, the MCC turned to Paraguay as the best place to which the refugees in Germany might look for a home, and made plans to colonize as many as possible there. Harold S. Bender was then sent to Germany in early 1930 as special commissioner of the MCC, charged with the task of supervising the migration, arranging transportation, and purchasing basic equipment. At the same time C. G. Hiebert was sent to Paraguay. Eventually almost 1,000 of those who had close relatives and friends in Canada found their way there. Another 1,200 settled in Brazil under the auspices of the German government. These were joined later by a group of Russian Mennonite refugees from Harbin, China, making the total immigration to Brazil about 1,300. The remaining 1,700 were brought to Paraguay and settled on land near the Manitoba settlement formed in 1926-27, called the Menno Colony. The new Russian colony was called Fernheim. To these were added about 300 refugees from Harbin, besides a few immigrants from Poland. By 1938 the total Mennonite population in Paraguay was 4,757.

In addition to the 29,000 or more refugees who found their way from Russia to permanent homes in Canada, Brazil, and Paraguay in 1922-32 there were also numerous individuals or small groups who escaped from Russia. One man who was sentenced to forced labor succeeded in having his family brought to him and then together they escaped across Turkestan and the Himalayas to the Mennonite mission at Champa, India. In 1931 three young women fled through eastern Siberia, across the Amur River into China, and then across the Pacific to America. Some fled across the Caucasus into Persia. Others escaped from the lumber camps of northern Russia by British lumber steamer to England or Germany. Many who tried to do so perished in the attempt. Many who remained in Russia also perished at the hands of the Soviets.

Continuing Assistance in Paraguay. Since the colonization of the Mennonite refugees in Paraguay in 1930 the MCC has followed the policy of keeping in close touch with the settlers, providing the assistance necessary in the struggles and hardships of pioneer life. The original expenditure of the MCC in settling the refugees in Paraguay was nearly $200,000. At the time of immigration the settlers had contracted to purchase their land from the Corporación Paraguaya. As time went on, however, it became advisable for the MCC to purchase the Corporación Paraguaya and all its holdings. This purchase of an area more than twenty by twenty-five miles in extent, comprising 330,000 acres, was made in 1937 for some $57,500, with funds loaned to the MCC by the Mennonites of North America. The Paraguayan settlers now purchased their individual holdings from the MCC at one dollar (paper) per hectare, instead of the original eight dollars (gold) which they had contracted for with the Corporación Paraguaya. In 1943 a cancellation of approximately one half of the loan debt was actually carried through.

The program of aid to the new settlers in Paraguay has been continuous and vigorous from the beginning. It was being carried on in reduced form in 1958. Money was sent down for direct relief, but more important was such aid as the sending of a succession of doctors and a dentist for short-term service in the colony and the training of practical nurses and even "practical" dentists. Shipments of new and used clothing, new and used farm implements and tools, a large bulldozer with a trained operator, support of a mental hospital, support of an experimental farm, support of hospitals, and the support for the preparation of schoolteachers of Fernheim Colony in Switzerland were among the forms of aid. In 1957 a group of Pax men was sent down to aid in the construction of the Trans-Chaco roadway. In 1958, through the good offices of the MCC a U.S. government loan of $1,000,000 was made available for colony development through the Paraguayan government.

Spanish Relief. In June 1937 the Mennonite Board of Missions authorized a program of relief to be administered by the Mennonite Relief Committee (see Mennonite Relief and Service Committee) in Spain, which was then engaged in civil war. Funds and clothing were gathered and D. Parke Lantz and Levi C. Hartzler were sent to the field in November 1937, followed later by Clarence Fretz, Lester T. Hershey, Wilbert Nafziger, and Ernest Bennett. When the program closed in the spring of 1940 cash contributions and gifts in kind amounting to about $57,000 had been contributed for this work by the American Mennonites. The Dutch Mennonite Peace Group had also contributed about $1,500 to the work. The MRC work in Spain was closely co-ordinated with that of the AFSC. In addition to the Mennonite contributions the MRC in Spain distributed a large amount of food supplied by the International Commission for the Assistance of Child Refugees in Spain. The MRC work was on the Loyalist side.

World War II. With the coming of World War II the Mennonite relief ministry was expanded beyond anything which had been conceived in World War I. As a result of the earlier experience the MCC had now developed into an agency co-ordinating the relief work of Mennonites everywhere. It was an efficient and effective agency which had found its place in a world of relief agencies, both public and private, and was equipped to send funds and workers as needed anywhere in the world, operating independently or in co-operation with other agencies as the occasion might require.

Within three months after the opening of World War II the first MCC representative was in Europe to begin negotiations for a relief program in Poland. A modest work was carried on there from March 1940 until the entrance of the United States into the war. In the spring of 1940 work was opened in southern France for the care of Spanish refugees. Following the German occupation of northern France the work was extended to child feeding in Lyons and other cities and to the care of refugees from German-occupied territory. This phase of the work came to an end in 1942 after the Germans took over the southern French territory.

Early in 1940 the MCC began work in England among refugees from Austria, Poland, and Turkey. The work was later extended to include assistance to old people and children who had been bombed out of their homes in the cities, as well as a ministry to German prisoners of war and other services. The London center was now the European headquarters of the MCC. In addition to carrying on the work in that country plans were being made to open an enlarged work on the continent as soon as the opportunity presented itself. As the war drew to a close the headquarters were moved to Amsterdam and later in 1945 to Basel. (In 1952 it was again moved, this time to Frankfurt.)

As rapidly as possible, now, new relief projects were opened in practically all countries of western Europe. By the end of 1945 the MCC reported 14 workers in France, nine in Holland, three in Belgium, and two at the general headquarters. The work consisted of building reconstruction, emergency relief in the form of food and clothing, and the care of refugees.

In 1946 the MCC work was extended to Germany, Denmark, and Austria. By 1947 the relief program in Germany was in full swing. During that year alone 43 MCC workers distributed 4,538 tons of food, clothing, and other supplies in Germany. The over-all work of the MCC was co-ordinated with CRALOG (the Council for Relief Agencies Licensed for Operation in Germany), and Evangelisches Hilfswerk, the Protestant relief organization. Assistance to Mennonite refugees from Russia and East Germany was co-ordinated with German Mennonite relief agencies: Christenpflicht, the south German agency, and the Hilfswerk der Vereinigung Deutscher Mennonitengemeinden, the organization operating in the Palatinate and North Germany. The MCC had food distribution centers in many cities. In June 1947 alone MCC supplied food to 80,000 people in Germany. Work was extended into Poland (part MRSC), Hungary, Italy, and Belgium (MRSC).

A major portion of MCC work was devoted to Mennonite refugees from the east, who came in large numbers to Denmark, Germany, and even into Holland. In February 1947 the Volendam carried 2,304 of these refugees from Bremerhaven to Buenos Aires on their way to Paraguay. Of these passengers 329 were gathered from Dutch homes, 1,071 from a refugee camp near Munich, and the remainder came from Berlin. In 1947 the MCC opened two refugee camps in Germany, one at Gronau and the other at Backnang. These camps served as processing centers from which as many as possible were moved to Canada and South America, and a few to the United States, in many cases with assistance from the International Refugee Organization (q.v.). From 1946 to 1951 the MCC assisted a total of 13,980 European refugees in finding new homes in the Western Hemisphere. Of those who remained in Germany permanently, many have been settled in new housing projects with MCC help through its Pax (q.v.) services, in which the labor of young American Mennonites, engaged in alternative service under conscription, served as the down payment for the house which was then financed by the German government. Such housing projects are located at Wedel near Hamburg, Bielefeld, Backnang, and Enkenbach.

Pax units are also located in other countries, as in Greece where the work is devoted to agricultural improvement, in Algeria (MRSC) as a housing project, and in South America where it is road building. Additional forms of aid in Germany and elsewhere in Europe have been maintenance of children's and old people's homes and community centers.

In addition to Europe the MCC and Mennonite relief agencies associated with it had operations following the beginning of World War II in Jordan, Egypt, and Ethiopia in the Middle East. The work in Egypt in 1944-45 concentrated on aid to Greek and Yugoslav refugees; that in Ethiopia on hospital and medical service; and that in Jordan on help to the Arab refugees from Israel. In the Far East following 1942 work was opened in India, China, the Philippine Islands, Java, Sumatra, Japan, Korea, Formosa, Viet-Nam, and Nepal. One of the most significant projects of the MCC was that in Puerto Rico (q.v.) which began as a CPS unit in 1943, but which employed other personnel engaging in medical and hospital work, and in agricultural and community services.

From 1941 through 1950 the MCC and its affiliated organizations expended more than $12,000,000 in cash and kind for relief purposes. To this must be added perhaps several millions more for the resettlement of refugees. Bringing this help in the name of Christ represented a direct personal ministry of perhaps 700 or more men and women, besides occasional short-term commissioners. After 1948 the relief program had passed its crest. Even so, the annual meeting of the MCC in March 1950 reported a total of 156 workers still on the field, distributed as follows: South America 21, Ethiopia 15 (MRSC), Palestine 5, Far East 26, Europe 59. The latter group had 59 workers in Germany, 8 in France, 4 in Belgium, 4 in Italy, 4 in Austria, 5 in Holland, and 7 in Switzerland, the latter constituting the personnel of the headquarters office in Basel.

Relief in some form somewhere seems to be a continuing need. The annual meeting of the MCC in January 1958 reported a total of 211 Mennonite workers on the field in 1957, distributed as follows:

relief workers 115, Pax men 96. Of the total 61 were in Germany, with 30 additional in Europe (Austria, France, Holland, Switzerland), 24 were in Paraguay with 11 additional in South America (Brazil, Uruguay, Peru), 14 were in Korea, and 42 additional in the Far East (Viet-Nam, Indonesia, Formosa, Japan, India, Nepal); 16 were in Jordan and 9 were in Algeria (MRSC).

From such a long list of persons who served in Mennonite relief since 1940 it is impossible to mention by name all who rendered even outstanding service. Among the names which have become almost household words, however, are those of C. F. Klassen, the father of the refugees, who died in the service in Germany in 1954, and Peter and Elfrieda Dyck, who led the refugees on the Volendam to South America in 1947. In 1957 Peter Dyck was serving as general director of the MCC in Europe. The only MCC relief worker who died in the line of duty in Europe was Marie Fast, who lost her life in 1945 in the Mediterranean Sea while assisting in the repatriation of Yugoslav refugees returning from Egypt; however, two Pax boys died in Greece while swimming and one in Africa, and two girls serving under the MCC died in Korea while recreationing.

The world-wide Mennonite relief work which has developed beginning with World War I and especially since the formation of the MCC in 1920 represents both a cause and an effect of a reawakened and an increasingly ecumenical Mennonitism. In 1915 the European and American Mennonites did not know each other and even many of the Mennonite groups in America had little in common. Even in 1925 only two Americans were present at the first Mennonite World Conference in Basel, Switzerland. The events which followed in the wake of World War II, however, changed this picture completely. By the time of the 1957 World Conference at Karlsruhe, Germany, the existence of a world Mennonitism, in which Mennonites from all parts of the world including the younger churches, as those of India and Indonesia, share in common faith and life and work, had become a fact which was recognized by all.

The two-century-old tradition of active relief work in the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood is carried on today by the Stichting (q.v.) voor Bijzondere Noden in de Doopsgezinde Broederschap en Daarbuiten, organized in 1948 as the successor to the prewar Algemeene Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Nooden. It has been active in sending relief to Austria and Germany, and particularly since 1955 in Berlin. It took the lead in organizing the International Mennonite Relief Committee in 1955, with the specific purpose of strengthening the relief work for East Zone Mennonites through the Berlin Mennonite Church.

In Germany the Hilfswerk der Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden, established in 1948 to help care for the Mennonite refugees from the East (West and East Prussia), has continued to serve especially in aiding the relief work carried on by the Berlin Mennonite Church for the East Zone Mennonites. Mennonitische Heime was organized in 1948 to establish homes for aged refugees, which are subsidized by the German government through per capita per diem payments for inmates. The MCC has also helped by contribution of relief food. Three such homes have been established: Enkenbach, Leutesdorf, and Pinneberg. Additional German Mennonite organizations have been established to work in the field of resettlement of refugees: Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe (1953) and Genossenschaftliches Flüchtlingswerk (1954). G.F.H.

John D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ: A History of the Mennonite Central Committee (Scottsdale, 1952); P. C. Hiebert and Orie O. Miller, Feeding the Hungry (Scottsdale, 1929); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake: A Study of Mennonite Migrations Resulting from the World War (Goshen, 1940); Irvin B. Horst, A Ministry of Goodwill: A Short Account of Mennonite Relief, 1939-1940 (Akron, 1950); M. C. Lehman, Mennonite History and Principles of Mennonite Relief Work, an Introduction, Students Edition with Syllabus and Annotated Bibliography (Akron, 1945); W. J. Kühler, "Dutch Mennonite Relief Work in the 17th and 18th Centuries," MQR XVII (1943) 87-94; Christian Neff, ed., Menno-nitische Welt-Hilfs-Konferenz vom 31. August bis 3. September 1930 in Danzig (Karlsruhe, 1931); see also the reports and addresses on relief and refugee work in the printed reports of the other Mennonite World Conferences (1936 at Amsterdam, 1948 at Goshen and Newton, 1952 at Basel, 1957 at Karlsruhe); C. Krahn, J. W. Fretz, and R. Kreider, "Altruism in Mennonite Life," in P. A. Sorokin, Forms and Techniques of Altruistic and Spiritual Growth, a Symposium (Boston, 1954) 309-28.

Religious Liberty (freedom of conscience, toleration). Toleration of a variety of religions or religious groups and opinions within the boundaries of a single state has often been a major problem, under both Christian and non-Christian governments. The Roman Empire was not completely intolerant when Christianity was established. On the contrary, it symbolized its tolerance by the erection of the Pantheon at Rome, in which all the gods were to be represented. When it became clear that Christianity was not a part of Judaism and would not give the Roman Emperor divine honor and worship, it was declared an illegal religion (religio illicita), in the time of the Emperor Trajan (c96). After the failure of the policy of persecution became clear, edicts of toleration were issued in 311 and 313 making Christianity a permitted, i.e., tolerated religion. The pendulum then swung to the opposite extreme so that in 380 an edict was issued by the Emperor Theodosius making Christianity the state religion and the only tolerated religion. From that time on in the Empire, the only Christianity recognized was that of the ecumenical creeds (Nicea, Chalcedon, etc.). Not only were the heathen religions not tolerated but no form of deviant (i.e., heretical) Christianity was permitted. Heresy, as defined by the state church (Roman or Greek), became a crime against the state and punishable by death. There was no religious liberty, except for the one recognized religion. The Constantinian compromise of the essence of the church by union with the state meant the end of toleration. This was the state of affairs down to the Reformation.

But the Reformation brought no freedom of conscience or religious liberty to Europe. On the contrary, the Reformers, in spite of early declaration seemingly supporting freedom of conscience, finally turned out to be as intolerant as the Roman Church. (See Luther.) They were intolerant not only toward the Roman Church, but also toward other forms of Protestantism, and in particular bitterly intolerant of Anabaptism. When the principle of territorial churches, coextensive with the civil state, was established, in both Lutheran and Reformed areas, with only one religion tolerated, the rulers were often perplexed as to what to do with deviants from the established faith, particularly the Anabaptists, who were so persistent and earnest in witnessing to their faith and establishing their voluntary congregations. Seeking counsel from the religious leaders, such as Luther and Melancthon, they received lengthy documents, numbers of which have been printed, commonly counseling complete intolerance and usually calling for severe persecution including death. While without doubt the motives of both rulers and Reformers were mixed, including fear for the established political and social order if toleration should be granted, yet the basic fact is that religious liberty was denied. The bitter persecution of the Anabaptists everywhere, almost from the beginning, ordered on the basis of such sweeping decrees as that of the Diet of Speyer in 1529, is irrefutable evidence of the intolerance of both Catholic and Protestant civil and religious authorities.

The victory for religious liberty was not won in Western Europe until the 17th and even 18th centuries (in certain Eastern European, and even Western European Catholic countries, not until the late 19th or even 20th century, and in some parts is not yet secure, notably Spain and Soviet Russia), and then it was to a large extent due not to the will of the dominant Christian churches, whether Catholic or Protestant, but to the will of rulers exhausted by religious wars and determined to find a basis for peace in the European community which would transcend the warring religious parties; or it was due to the growing rationalism, secularism, and materialism of the ever more powerful emerging middle class, which often placed religion low in the scale of cultural values.

A. Anabaptist-Mennonite Experience of Religious Liberty. The record of the suffering of the Anabaptists and Mennonites under this policy of intolerance is reported in the various articles in this Encyclopedia covering countries, regions, and political units in general, and in the biographical articles on a number of emperors, kings, etc., and need not be repeated here. (See for instance Germany, Netherlands, etc.) Suffice it to say that often the rulers and landholders were tolerant toward the Mennonites of the 17th century and later, because of their economic value, and frequently had great difficulties with the intolerant clergy of their domains. The fact also that citizenship was not a universal right, but a privilege to be granted or withheld by the rulers or granted conditionally, had a direct bearing on toleration. In some areas in Germany, especially Mennonites were not granted full and unconditional citizenship until the second half of the 19th century.

By contrast the New World was a land of religious liberty and therefore a most attractive place of settlement for the harried Mennonites of Europe (outside the Netherlands, which as early as 1572 granted partial toleration to the Mennonites). While certain of the American Colonies had established churches (Massachusetts, e.g., down to 1844, Virginia, etc.) and in the early days were rather intolerant, complete tolerance soon became the general rule and full religious liberty was written into the federal constitution (1787) and into the several state constitutions. William Penn's colony of Pennsylvania (established 1681) from the beginning offered complete religious liberty (except for Catholics); in fact Penn planned it as a haven of refuge for persecuted Quakers and other persecuted religious minorities. The Mennonites who settled in Pennsylvania from 1683 on enjoyed complete religious freedom and have suffered no persecution anywhere in the New World, except by mob action, or by punishment for violation of certain regulations or aspects of the legislation requiring military or civil service. Difficulties arising out of conscription do not invalidate, however, the basic principle of religious liberty and freedom of conscience which has been a fundamental and deeply cherished principle of the American nation from its beginning. The same holds generally true for Canada.

There has been occasional persecution of Protestant minorities in Latin-American countries where Catholicism is the established or dominant religion. Mennonite missions or colonies established in these countries have generally enjoyed full liberty of worship and propagation of their faith. A recent outbreak of intolerance and persecution in Colombia has caused some tribulation for the Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonite Missions there.

The most serious case of denial of religious liberty for Mennonites in modern times has been Soviet Russia. It is true that Czarist Russia forbade proselyting of Greek Orthodox people, and in this sense certainly did not allow full freedom of propagation of faith (although allowing it among the non-Greek Orthodox people), but full freedom of worship was guaranteed to the Mennonites and other settlers immigrating into Russia in 1788 and later, and this right was consistently maintained. The constitution of Soviet Russia guarantees full freedom of worship, but denies freedom of propagation of religion. In actuality freedom of worship was severely restricted in 1929-41 through the closing of churches, imprisonment, deportation, and even execution of clergy, severe limitation of religious activities such as instruction of children under 18, and all types of religious organizations except direct congregational structure. At times religious persecution was carried on under the guise of breaking resistance to collectivization of agriculture; and it is clear that the leadership of the Soviet state sought to break up any type of solidarity of religious, ethnic, or economic groups, which might conceivably be or become a source of continuing resistance to the communist regime or ideology in any form. Religion, particularly for Mennonites, was one of the strongest bonds for the maintenance of a spirit of nonacceptance of the Marxist ideology. Mennonites in Russia were never guilty of any disobedience to the Soviet authorities or forcible resistance to government measures, but they did endeavor to maintain their church and community life as long as possible, and to nurture their children in the faith of their fathers. The clash with the Soviet state was inevitable and resulted in untold suffering, including the death of thousands in Russia, in forced labor camps, and in exile. Mennonite church life was completely broken up. Religious services were no longer held; probably no organized worship was conducted from 1935 to 1943. Since 1943, at first in a very slight and tentative way, and since 1953 more openly and extensively, Mennonite worship has been reviving, with regular preaching, choir singing, prayer meetings, etc. A severe handicap has been the death of ordained ministers, since very few survived the ordeal of 1935-43. A further difficulty is the fact that liberty of worship is permitted by law only to registered congregations, and it has been impossible for the Mennonite congregations to secure legal recognition and registry since they have again emerged from the period of persecution.

Mennonite suffering in Russia has been further compounded by the fact of their German culture, language, and sympathies. It is difficult at times to determine whether their tribulations were due to their Germanic character, their economic skill, their sturdy non-Marxianism, or their religious steadfastness. Perhaps the very combination of several undesirable (from the Soviet point of view) qualities made their lot more difficult. Certain it is that the Evangelical Christians and Baptists in Russia, though also subject to a certain amount of persecution in the dark days, have since 1943 enjoyed much more liberty than the Mennonites. A major reason may well be their Slavic character.

B. Advocacy of Religious Liberty. The Anabaptists were the only Reformation group consistently advocating religious liberty, separation of church and state, freedom of the individual conscience, and toleration of divergence in religious matters, although individuals like Sebastian Franck and Sebastian Castellio were outstanding exceptions, particularly the latter. The Anabaptists did not produce any extensive literary defense of their position, as did Castellio, but from the very beginning of the movement they gave constant witness to their strong convictions on this great principle. It was not only their Biblicism with its desire to follow both the commandments and example of Christ which motivated them, but their fundamental conception of Christianity as a matter of voluntary commitment and free choice, their insistence on love to all as a universal Christian obligation with its corollary of nonviolence and nonresistance, their understanding of suffering as the way of victory or a theology of martyrdom, and their belief that faith is a gift from God and hence impossible to create by compulsion of man.

The place of Anabaptism in the history of religious liberty has been recognized by a few scholars such as Ernst Troeltsch, Johannes Kühn, and Rufus M. Jones, but it has as yet not been brought out in sufficient clarity and strength to become a part of the commonly accepted understanding of the development of toleration, although certainly all who are at all seriously conversant with Anabaptist history are aware of the general Anabaptist position. It must be admitted that the break-through to religious liberty and toleration in Western Europe was due primarily to other forces, but the Anabaptists were the prophets before their time, the pioneers who had to raise their voices in a wilderness, who had to go counter to the entire spirit of their age, the 16th century. Professor Walther Köhler of Heidelberg declared that "they dare to claim a place in history as the pioneers (Bahnbrecher) of the modern world view with its freedom of conscience and freedom of faith." Ernst Troeltsch says, "All this [i.e., toleration, liberty, the rise of the modern free man, etc., in England] is not actually the work of Protestantism, but rather the work of a revived Anabaptism and Spiritualism (merged with a radicalized Calvinism), which thus received a belated compensation for the boundless suffering which this religion of toleration and personal conviction of conscience endured at the hands of all the confessions in the 16th century. Here the stepchildren of the Reformation finally enjoyed their great historical hour." Bradford Smith in his biography, Bradford & Plymouth (1951), does not hesitate to identify the Pilgrim libertarian tradition which ultimately won out over Puritan authoritarianism in New England as essentially Dutch and Anabaptist in character.

C. Anabaptist Testimonies on Religious Liberty. Out of the fullness of material cited in H. S. Bender's "The Anabaptist and Religious Liberty in the Sixteenth Century" (MQR XXIX, 1955, 83-100) the following typical statements are here cited. Conrad Grebel in the letter to Thomas Müntzer (1524) wrote: "The Gospel and its adherents are not to be protected by the sword, nor are they thus to protect themselves." Felix Manz, in Zürich court records of 1525 and 1526, admitted teaching that those of other faiths are to be left undisturbed in their practice. Balthasar Hubmaier in his four-page pamphlet Concerning Heretics and Their Burning (January 1524), which is called the first Protestant declaration for religious freedom, said, "So it follows that the slayers of heretics are the worst heretics of all, in that they, contrary to Christ's teaching and practice, condemn heretics to the fire." Hans Denk (1527) said, "Everyone should know that in matters of faith everyone should proceed as free, voluntary, and uncompelled." Kilian Aurbacher of Moravia wrote in a letter to Bucer in Strasbourg (1534): "It is never right to compel one in matters of faith, whatever he may believe, be he Jew or Turk. . . . And thus we conduct ourselves according to the example of Christ and the apostles and proclaim the Gospel according to the grace that He has entrusted to us; we compel no one. . . . That this then also is an open truth, that Christ's people are a free, unforced, and uncompelled people, who receive Christ with desire and a willing heart, of this the Scriptures testify." An appeal of the Zürich Anabaptists to the Zürich Council of 1589 asserts that "the state authorities have no place in the church of God, no right to control and persecute the conscience, and that this principle is one which they, the Swiss Brethren, have recently proved out of Scripture." Heinrich Bullinger, in his opus magnum against the Swiss Brethren, Der Wider-töufferen Ursprung (1560), sets forth clearly and emphatically the Anabaptist belief in freedom of conscience, tries to refute it point by point, and defends the Zürich policy of intolerance and persecution. Among other things he charges that they asserted, "One cannot and should not use force to compel anyone to accept the faith, for faith is a free gift of God." Menno Simons said, "Say, good reader, where have you, in all the days of your life, read in the apostolic Scriptures that Christ or the apostles have called upon the power of the magistracy against those who would not hear their doctrine or obey their words" (726)? "Faith is a gift of God. . . . It cannot be thrust upon a man by external force or by the sword" (605). The Hutterite Chronicle (in section written before 1542) says: "Faith is not to be compelled but is a gift from God." These testimonies are typical and could be multiplied from many sources.

H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Anabaptists and Religious Liberty in the Sixteenth Century," MQR XXIX (1955) 83-100, also the same in Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte 44 (1953) 32-50; R. H. Bainton, "The Struggle for Religious Liberty," Church History X (1941); idem, The Travail of Religious Liberty (Philadelphia, 1951); idem, The Development and Consistency of Luther's Attitude to Religious Liberty (Cambridge, 1929); idem, David Joris, Wider-täufer und Kämpfer für Toleranz (Leipzig, 1937); M. S. Bates, Religious Liberty; an Inquiry (New York, 1945); J. H. Cockburn, Religious Freedom in Eastern Europe (Richmond, 1953); Balthasar Hubmaier, Von Kettern und ihren Verbrennern (1524); Hans Denk's (q.v.) Wideruff; Sebast. Franck, Paradoxa (ed. Ziegler, Jena, 1909); Caspar Schwenckfeld, Ein Bedenken von der Freiheit des Glaubens christlicher Lehre, Urteils, und Gewissens (1547); H. Bullinger, Der Wider-töufferen Ursprung, Fürgang, Secten, Wäsen, fñrnehmen und gemeine irer leer Artickel (Zürich, 1560); Bluntschli, Geschichte der Rechte der religiösen Bekenntnisfreiheit (1867); K. Völker, Toleranz und Intoleranz im Zeitalter der Reformation (Leipzig, 1912); W. Koehler, Reformation und Ketzerprozess (Tübingen, 1901); P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse zu Zwickau (Leipzig, 1908); idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); N. Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Freiburg, 1911); Ernst Troeltsch, Protestantism and Progress (New York, 1912); J. Kühn, Toleranz und Offenbarung (Leipzig, 1923); Rufus M. Jones, Studies in Mystical Religion (London, 1909) 369; ML I, "Duldung," 484 f.; II, "Gewissensfreiheit," 108-10, "Glaubensfreiheit," 120 f., "Glaubenszwang," 121 f.; Menno Simons, Writings; Filip von Sesen, Des Weltlichen Standes Handlungen/ und Urtheile wider den Gewissenszwang . . . (Amsterdam, 1665); Sape van der Woude, "Gestaltung der Toleranz," in Castelliana (Leiden, 1951); J. Kühn, "Das Geschichtsproblem der Toleranz," in Autour de Michel Servet et de Sebastian Castellion (Haarlem, 1953); see also ML articles "Gewissensfreiheit," "Glaubenszwang," etc.

Rem van Hoorn: see Rem Pieters.

Rem Pieters (Rem de Pelsler), a Dutch Anabaptist, who was very active by preaching in Amsterdam in 1534. He was arrested and charged with preaching and possessing forbidden books, among which is mentioned the "Deutsche Messe" by Oecolampadius (q.v.). The sentence was remarkably mild: Rem was banished from Amsterdam for six years. Rem undoubtedly belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. He was later at Monnikendam, from where he was banished in December 1535. About his further life nothing is known.

Rem van Hoorn, a follower of David Joris (q.v.), who was active at Alkmaar, North Holland, is probably identical with Rem Pieters. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 142 f., 285; Grosheide, Verhooren, 161-65; DB 1909, 17, 30; ibid. 1917, 114, No. 43; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim.

Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn (Ryn) (1607-69), probably the greatest painter of the Western world, was born July 15, 1607, at Leiden, and died Oct. 4, 1669, at Amsterdam. In an age when the tradition of Christian painting had been practically abandoned in the Netherlands under the influence of the Dutch Reformed spirit, Rembrandt devoted about one third of his life's work to the depiction of Biblical scenes. Contrary to the trend of contemporary art, in which the "genre" picture, still life, and seascapes predominated, he founded a new style of interpretation of the Bible. To be sure, the young painter frequently drew his themes from the Bible because of the wealth of dramatic material found there, especially in the Old Testament. But after the death of his wife Saskia in 1642 an increasing religious sincerity becomes evident in Rembrandt's work. Especially his etchings and drawings (there are about 600 of these showing Biblical scenes) show Rembrandt's reactions to the message of the Gospel.¹

Officially Rembrandt was a member of the Reformed Church, and as yet there has been no evidence that he severed this connection² in spite of serious conflicts with the church council, such as the exclusion of Hendrickje Stoffels from communion in 1653, who lived with him after his wife's death. Nevertheless there is some indication that Rembrandt was in close contact with Mennonite circles and from them received essential religious motivations.³

Against the assumption that Rembrandt did not enter Anabaptist circles until Saskia's death recent research in archives has shown that at least outwardly Rembrandt was in contact with Mennonite families in his first years at Amsterdam.⁴ Of greater importance is the contemporary tradition which originated with the Italian Baldinucci, a writer on art, and which says that about 1642 Rembrandt belonged to the "religion of the Menists." This statement, as Michel has shown, goes back to Bernhard Keihl, one of Rembrandt's students.⁵ Hitherto this tradition was doubted because it was believed that Keihl came to Rembrandt's studio in 1648, when any close contact between Rembrandt and the Mennonites was improbable (financial collapse, illegal living with Hendrickje).⁶ But a re-examination of Baldinucci's statements about Keihl's life shows that Keihl came to Rembrandt's studio as early as 1641-42.⁷ In that year Rembrandt painted and etched portraits of the Waterlander Mennonite preacher C. C. Anslo. In January 1641 Samuel Hoogstraaten entered Rembrandt's studio, and he was demonstrably a Mennonite. All these data relate to the same period, and become important because it was at this very time, following Saskia's death, that Rembrandt's growing religious perceptivity is evident.

But beyond these historical facts, there are in Rembrandt's Biblical portrayals numerous traits that presuppose Mennonite rather than Reformed influences. With respect to the Old Testament the following can be asserted: Rembrandt sees the Old Testament accounts not from the point of view of prophecy and fulfillment; each Old Testament account contains for him its own religious lesson within itself. He does not hesitate—as in the Abraham scenes—even to depict God. He especially loved the Apocrypha, particularly the little book of Tobit. All of this was in contrast to the point of view of the Reformed Church. With respect to the New Testament, he strongly stresses the figure of Christ as the teacher and healer, whereas the artists preceding him had depicted preferably the stories of Jesus' birth and death (the dogmas of the Incarnation and atonement). Christ does not wear the stereotype halo, but is rather understood as the one who must "in all things be like His brethren." At the same time, however, by means of a symbol of radiation, Rembrandt puts emphasis on the particular moment in which Jesus of Nazareth discloses Himself as the Christ of God to a human being who meets Him.⁸ This stress on a very personal encounter with Christ in the act of receiving an insight of faith is suggestive of Mennonite influence. His frank portrayal of Mary is suggestive of the love of the Mennonites for Mary as the mother of the Lord, which was not burdened by confessional polemics. In the story of the death of Christ it is not the physical suffering and the related doctrine of reconciliation (satisfaction) that Rembrandt stresses, but rather the spiritually tempted Christ. Rembrandt's concept of the sacraments is also illuminating. The Lord's Supper, as has often been noticed, is unimportant in Rembrandt's work. Instead it is the Emmaus scene that dominates: the exalted Lord breaks bread for His church (communion as a ceremony of the "breaking of bread"). Also the interest in the picture of John the Baptist, in the baptism of the Ethiopian (adult baptism), in the blessing of the children (Hundred Gulden Print), as well as the act of washing the disciples' feet, point to an Anabaptist understanding of the sacraments. In the 1650's his presentations frequently take on the character of an immediate proclamation, which corresponds with the lay witness of the Mennonites.

The question whether Rembrandt was a member of a Mennonite church is not answered with all of this. His name is not found in any Mennonite membership list (these are, however, not intact). To become a member of a Mennonite congregation included the necessity of being baptized as an adult. It is unlikely that Rembrandt took this step. "Hundreds and more hundreds at that time reckoned themselves among the Mennonites without having taken this last step," and lived so to speak in the "courts of the real congregation." Certain facts indicate that in the last years of his life, i.e., after 1656, Rembrandt associated with a Mennonite circle with Collegiant (q.v.) inclinations and took part in their Bible discussions, which were conducted by laymen. One of the evidences for this is the portrait of Catherina Hoogsaet, the wife of a preacher with Collegiant interests, and his relationship with Collegiant-minded Anabaptist circles derived from this fact.⁹

In spite of all that is still unanswered with regard to the question, "Rembrandt a Mennonite?" this may be said in summary: In the early 1640's he experienced a deep contact with the piety of the Mennonites. His own Christian personality is stamped by this fact. His presentations of Biblical scenes may from this time on be evaluated as witnesses and self-statements of the Christian Rembrandt.¹⁰ Venturi's Lives says that the Spirit of Rembrandt's art was Mennonite. H.M.R.

(1) This as yet theologically unexploited treasure of interpretation of the Bible is best accessible in W. R. Valentiner, Rembrandt. Handzeichnungen I (1925), II (1934) in the series Klassiker der Kunst. In process of publication since 1954 is O. Benesch, Rembrandt's Drawings (6 vv., London).

(2) All the official documents (also the entries in the church records) are printed in Hofstede de Groot, Die Urkunden über Rembrandt (Quellenstudien zur holländischen Kunstgeschichte III, 1906). Also for the supposed membership of Rembrandt's son Titus in a Mennonite congregation, which was assumed by W. Molenaar and Christian Neff on the basis of a lecture delivered in 1907 by Alfred Seltzer, a professor at the University of Heidelberg (see Menn. Bl., 1908, 18, and on the opposite side Samuel Cramer, ibid., 29; also Menn. Bl., 1933, 92), there is no evidence, according to N. van der Zijpp, who at my request examined the archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam.

(3) In the discussion on the question of whether Rembrandt was a Mennonite, which was going on before the war but became somnolent during the war, Samuel Cramer took the negative view in his article, "Rembrandt menist?" (De Zondagsbode, 1906, No. 27), and C. N. Wybrands the affirmative, "Rembrandt doopsgezind?" (ibid., 1906, Nos. 35-41), besides the articles mentioned above. The first thorough investigation was made by Karel Vos, "Rembrandts Geloof" (De Gids, 1909, 49 ff.). Carl Neumann follows the Vos arguments in the chapter "Rembrandt und das religiöse Leben in Holland" of his monograph on Rembrandt. A careful summary of the discussions on the question "Rembrandt doopsgezind?" is given by N. van der Zijpp in the Doopsgezind Weekblad, 1948, No. 43. Recent affirmative answers to the question have been made by J. Rosenberg in his Rembrandt monograph, Vol. I, pp. 107 ff., discussed by Cornelius Krahn in Menn. Life VIII (1953), No. 1; H. E. van Gelder, Rembrandt en de heilige Schrift (Amsterdam, 1948) 59; idem, in Oud Holland, 1943, 35-37; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 58, speaks of the "Doopsgezinde Rembrandt," without giving the source. See also K. T. Gorter, "Een Doopsgezind Kunstenaar?" in DJ 1953. H. R. Rotermund, the author of the present article, a Lutheran, has treated the views summarized here in an article, "Rembrandt und die religiösen Laienbewegungen seiner Zeit," in Nederlandsch kunsthistorisch jaarboek, 1952, pp. 104-92. Hendrik van Loon's book, R. van Ryn, makes the flat assertion, without explanation, that Rembrandt was a Mennonite. (See also Art.) W. A. Visser 't Hooft in Rembrandts weg tot het Evangelie (Amsterdam, 1956; this essay had previously been published in French and English, and there is also a Spanish translation) takes the view that Rembrandt was not a Mennonite and that his piety was not typically Mennonite.

(4) See W. F. H. Oldewelt, "Rembrandts relatie met de familie Bruynningh," in Amsterdamsche archiefvondsten (1942) 158 ff.; also the articles by H. F. Wijnman noted in (9).

(5) F. Baldinucci, "Cominciamento e progresso dell' arte . . ." (Florence, 1686) 78; printed in Hofstede de Groot, document 360, par. 4 (see note 2 above). E. Michel, "Francesco Baldinucci et les biographies de Rembrandt," in Oud Holland, 1890, pp. 167-72.

(6) Also held by W. A. Visser 't Hooft, Rembrandt et la Bible (1947) 23 ff. See also P. R. Musculus, "Remarques sur Rembrandt, le Calvinisme et les Mennonites," in Bulletin de la société calviniste de France, May 1932.

(7) As early as the article "Bernhard Keihl," in Thieme-Becker, Künstler-Lexikon XX (1927) 66-68. J. Six in Jaarboek der Koninkl. Akad. van Wetensch., 1925/26, 233.

(8) Hans-Martin Rotermund, "The Motif of Radiance in Rembrandt's Biblical Drawings," Warburg Journal XV (1952) 101-21.

(9) H. F. Wijnman, "Een drietal portretten door Rembrandt," in Jaarboek Amstelodamum 1934, 90 ff. See also H. F. Wijnman, "Nieuwe gegevens omtrent den schilder Lambert Jacobsz," Oud Holland XLVII, 145-57, and LI, 241-55.

(10) Critical of this view, W. A. Visser 't Hooft, Rembrandts Weg zum Evangelium (Zürich, 1955), and Rembrandts weg tot het Evangelie (Amsterdam, 1956). (See also the Rembrandt issue of Mennonite Life, October 1956.)

Rembrandtsz, Dirk (1640-83), of Nierop (i.e., Nierdorp in the Dutch province of North Holland), was a Mennonite cobbler who was an able astronomer. He is the author of the Nieroper Graadboek (a travel book for seamen), which went through fourteen editions. The book proved useful to mariners, and was republished in 1725 and 1730 in revised editions, edited by Jan Albertsz van Dam, the Mennonite preacher at Hoorn. He also published some books on astronomy and mathematics. He corresponded with internationally noted mathematicians, e.g., Christiaan Huygens and Nicolaes Witsen. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. V, 373; Winkler-Prins Encyclopedie XIV (Amsterdam, 1952) 509; Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 70 f.; ML III, 253.

Remcken: see Remken Ramakers.

Remke, Govert, a Mennonite of Crefeld, who in co-operation with Wilm van der Leyen procured the release from prison for his brethren of Rheydt. On April 11, 1683, he purchased a tract of 1,000 acres in Pennsylvania, signing a contract with William Penn. He never took possession of the land, however, for he did not emigrate to America. He sold it on Jan. 14, 1686, to Dirk Sipman. NEFF.

Friedrich Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer nach Pennsylvania (Neukirchen, 1940) 32 and 89; William I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore, 1935) 243, 253 f.; ML III, 466.

Remken Ramakers, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed at Sittard in the duchy of Jülich, Germany (now Dutch province of Limburg), in 1550. He is probably identical with Reinken Rademaeker, who baptized Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.). NEFF.

DB 1890, 58; 1909, 120; Bibliographie, No. 655; Mart. Mir. D 98, E 497; ML III, 425, 427.

Remkes, Johann (1714-70), the last lay preacher of the Crefeld (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, was born March 16, 1714, and was ordained to the ministry on Oct. 17, 1754, by Winand Wynands (b. 1702, preacher 1727-77). On June 13, 1769, Remkes as preacher and Heinrich van der Leyen (q.v.) as deacon, both aged men, wrote an illuminating letter to the Lam en Toren congregation of Amsterdam asking for ministerial help. The letter gives much interesting information on the Crefeld congregation (see a long excerpt, ML III, 647). Remkes died Jan. 3, 1770. The first educated minister was then called in 1770; it was not de Vries, but Wopko Molenaar (q.v.) and Zino van Abbema. E.C.

Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939) 47, 81 f., 86 f., et passim; ML III, 467 f.

Remonstrantie en deductie over de Leere, en conventiculen der Mennisten der Stede Deventer (Deventer, 1670) (Inquiry and Conclusion Concerning the Doctrines and Meetings of the Mennonites in the City of Deventer) is a pamphlet by an anonymous (Reformed) author addressed to the magistrate of Deventer (q.v.), Dutch province of Overijssel, for the purpose of having the Mennonite meetings in this town prohibited. Shortly before, another pamphlet had appeared: Redenen waerom de . . . Magistraet den Mennisten tot Deventer niet magh toelaten Conventiculen te houden (Deventer, 1670) (Reasons Why the Magistrates of Deventer Should not Allow the Mennonites to Hold Meetings). These reasons are repeated in Remonstrantie en deductie; they are partly theological and partly political, viz., that the Mennonites were Socinians (q.v.), rejected the magistracy, and were of Münsterite (q.v.) origin.

Abraham Willemsz Cremer (q.v.), the Mennonite minister of Deventer, opposed both the Redenen and the Remonstrantie en deductie in the pamphlets Nootwendighe ontschuldiginghe (Necessary Apology) (Deventer, 1670) and Antwoorde (Answer) (Deventer, 1671).

The magistrates of Deventer officially decided to close the two Mennonite churches in this town, but actually they made no serious attempts to stop the Mennonite meetings, and the Mennonites continued to meet without hindrance. (DB 1919, 48-61.)

vdZ.

Remonstrants, a Protestant denomination in the Netherlands, founded in 1619. Soon after Calvinism had become predominant in the Netherlands, divergent views on a number of doctrines became apparent among the theologians within the Reformed Church. Particularly the doctrine of predestination as taught by Calvin became a point of controversy. Shortly after 1600 this dogmatic quarrel became very violent. Franciscus Gomarus, a professor at the University of Leiden, defended the doctrine of predestination to its utmost consequences, whereas Jacobus Arminius (q.v.), of the same university, championed a rather moderate view. In 1610 the followers of Arminius, who had died in 1609, addressed a petition to the Dutch government, which formulated "five articles of remonstrance." Hence the moderate Calvinists were called Remonstrants. At first they were also called Arminians (after Jacobus Arminius), but this name soon disappeared in the Netherlands. Outside the Netherlands Remonstrantism is generally known as Arminianism (q.v.).

The national Dutch Reformed synod held at Dordrecht in 1618-19 had to discuss and come to a decision in this matter. But the synod, composed of opponents of Arminius' views and presided over by the strict Calvinist Johannes Bogerman (q.v.), hardly permitted the Remonstrants to defend their opinions, dismissed the Remonstrants, and condemned their teachings. Two hundred Reformed preachers who embraced the Arminian views were deposed. Only a few of them were willing to submit to the resolutions of the synod. Most of the others went into exile, particularly to Antwerp, and as early as 1619 they organized the "Remonstrant Reformed Brotherhood," which has remained the official name. Soon some of the exiled pastors clandestinely returned to Holland and organized Remonstrant congregations. Notwithstanding the opposition and obstruction of the Reformed Church, they indeed succeeded in building up a number of congregations, particularly in the province of South Holland. Outstanding leaders in this first period were Simon Episcopius (Bisschop) (1583-1643), theological professor at the Leiden University in 1612-19, later professor in the Remonstrant seminary, who was the great leader, and Johannes Uytenboogaert (1557-1644).

In the course of time the Remonstrants were tolerated; in 1630 they were allowed to build a (hidden) church in Amsterdam, in 1632 in Rotterdam. In 1634 they founded a seminary at Amsterdam for the training of preachers (this seminary was moved to Leiden in 1872).

The Remonstrant Church has remained limited to the Netherlands; there is only one foreign congregation, i.e., Friedrichstadt in Holstein, Germany. About 1750 they had 34 congregations in the Netherlands with a total membership of about 3,000. In 1956 these figures were 34 congregations and nine circles (Kringen), with 21,000 members.

The Remonstrants, whose teachings have been influential far beyond the Dutch borders (see Arminianism), always have been moderate in their views as to basic Christian theology. In the 19th century the whole Remonstrant brotherhood adopted theological liberalism (modernism). Among its leaders in this period there were outstanding liberal theologians, such as H. C. Rogge, C. P. Tiele, and J. A. Beyerman. Their appeal for liberal Christianity caused a considerable increase in their membership about 1860, since many members of the Reformed Church, dissatisfied with the conservative orthodoxy in their church, joined the Remonstrants.

There have been rather close ties between the Mennonites and the Remonstrants. During the first years of their existence Remonstrant congregations often used the confession of faith of the Waterlander elder Hans de Ries. At the rise of Remonstrantism the Mennonites generally sympathized with these fellow Christians who were likewise oppressed by the Reformed state church and the government. Both the Mennonites and the Remonstrants objected to Calvinist dogmatism. S. F. Rues (q.v.), who visited the Netherlands in 1741, was of the opinion that there was not much difference between the Remonstrants and the Lamist (more liberal) Mennonites; hence he called the Lamists "Remonstrantsche Doopsgezinden" (Remonstrant Mennonites). Mennonites and Remonstrants met each other regularly in the meetings of the Collegiants (q.v.). Some of both groups believed that their churches were rather similar in views and doctrines; for this reason attempts were made to merge: in 1658 and in 1669-70 a merger of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at Rotterdam and the Remonstrant church was planned, but for some reason the union was not achieved. Only in a much later period at Dokkum (q.v.) in Friesland did the Remonstrant and Mennonite congregations merge, in 1796; the names Remonstrant and Mennonite were dropped and the new congregation henceforth was called the "United Christian Church."

Church letters were given when Mennonites wished to join the Remonstrant congregation, and many Mennonites who lived in places where there was no Mennonite church became (often temporarily) members of the Remonstrant church. The reverse happened less frequently, obviously because the Mennonite congregations were more "closed" than those of the Remonstrants, although many Remonstrants worshiped with the Mennonites and (in Lamist congregations) participated in their communion services.

During 1706-35 a number of Mennonites were educated for the ministry in the Remonstrant theological seminary, but then the differences immediately became clear. The Remonstrants maintained infant baptism, rejected by the Mennonites. Besides this, the Mennonites objected to Remonstrant theology and usually opposed any kind of theological system.

During 1731-1806 the Remonstrants and the Mennonites together published the Naamlijst (q.v.), a booklet, containing a list of congregations with their pastors, appearing at first irregularly, later annually.

During World War II there was a movement among some of the Remonstrant and Mennonite pastors toward a general union of the two churches, but especially the Mennonites questioned the desirability of such a step, and the discussion was not continued.

In recent times there has been among some Remonstrant leaders an orientation toward the Dutch Reformed Church, and a few wish to guide their flock back to the old church from which they were expelled some three and a half centuries ago. vDZ.

De Remonstranten, een Gedenboek (Memorial Book) (Leiden, n.d.-1919); Lucie J. N. K. van Aken, De Remonstrantsche Broederschap in verleden en heden (Arnhem, 1947); Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 364-66; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd I (Amsterdam, 1865) 200; Karel Vos, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde gemeente te Rotterdam (repr. Rotterdam, 1907) 23 f.; DJ 1850, 90-92, 109, 111; DB 1875, 87; 1880, 64 f.; 1901, 33; 1918, 70-74; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2884-91; S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staat der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1745) 82; ML III, 467.

Rempel, a widely ramified family name among the Mennonites in West Prussia and America. It is derived from Raganbald or Raganbold (meaning a brave council); it is not of Dutch origin, as is the case with most of the Mennonite names of West Prussia and Russia, since Raganbald and -bold had already become Rempaud and Remboud at an early time in the Dutch language; but in South and Middle Germany it had become Rempel. Its geographic distribution area in the late Middle Ages was Franconia, the Lower Rhine, Thuringia, and Silesia. From which of these areas the first Mennonite bearer of this name came is still to be investigated.

In West Prussia (q.v.) the Rempel family appeared first exclusively in the Flemish congregations of Elbing, Danzig City (since 1673), Tiegenhagen (since 1723), Ladekopp, Rosenort, and Heubuden. It cannot now be determined whether it appeared any earlier in the congregations named besides Danzig and Tiegenhagen. Representatives of this name were serving the congregations to a lesser degree than later was the case in Russia and America. Only once was there a preacher with this name (in Rosenort 1813-38) and in more recent times a Vorsteher in Königsberg. All other bearers of this name were probably exclusively farmers. In 1936 there were living in Germany 36 bearers of this name; 11 in Heubuden-Marienburg, 4 in Königsberg, 5 in Rosenort, 5 in Thiensdorf-Preussisch Rosengart, 7 in Tiegenhagen, and 2 in Berlin.

In Russia (q.v.) the Rempel family was far more strongly represented in the service of the church. The series begins in 1832 with Aron Rempel. The next preachers of this name were chosen in 1864 and 1878, and from this time on the name becomes much more frequent in the last two generations and it closes with the outstanding Elder Jakob Rempel (q.v.). Some of the ministers of this name in the Mennonite churches were: 3 elders—Hermann A. Rempel (q.v.), Hermann D. Rempel (q.v.), and Jakob A. Rempel; 21 preachers of whom 11 died a natural death, 2 in the 1920's escaped to Canada, while of the 7 remaining in Russia 6 went the way of martyrdom and the 7th probably as well: (1) Abram Rempel of Hochfeld-Yazekovo (q.v.); (2) Gerhard D. Rempel of Kantserovka No. 2, Orenburg (q.v.); (3) Gustav A. Rempel of Gnadenfeld (q.v.); (4) Gustav G. Rempel of Gnadenfeld; (5) Jakob D. Rempel of Kantserovka No. 3, Orenburg; (6) Johann D. Rempel of Klubnikovo, Orenburg; (7) Johann J. Rempel, last in Einlage (q.v.); 2 deacons, the first (chosen 1842) died a natural death, the second, Abram D. Rempel of Kantserovka No. 3, Orenburg, trod the way of martyrdom already in 1929 and as late as 1947 was still living in exile; 6 preachers, of whom one died a natural death, and another escaped to Canada, 4 on the other hand demonstrably entered the way of martyrdom: (1) Abram Rempel of Central, Voronezh area; (2) David D. Rempel of Kantserovka No. 3, Orenburg; (3) Johann D. Rempel of Davlekanovo, Ufa (q.v.); (4) Peter Rempel of Central, Voronezh area.

In America (North and South) a number of Rempel families should be mentioned: 3 elders, 20 preachers, 2 deacons, 2 teachers, and 3 professors. In summary there were (1) in the ministry: 7 elders, 42 preachers, and 5 deacons or Vorsteher; (2) in the professions: 3 professors, 1 engineer, 8 teachers, and 1 artist; (3) in agriculture: 1 estate owner, 2 mill owners, 1 factory owner, 3 merchants; besides founders and cofounders of the Kronsfield Mennonite settlement (q.v.). Among these are J. G. Rempel, elder of the Rosenort (GCM) congregation at Rosthern, Sask., and H. S. Rempel, elder of the E.M.B. congregation at Steinbach, Man. The Rempels are almost unknown, however, in the United States, and are found mostly among the newer immigrants of 1922-25 to Canada. Among these is C. J. Rempel, of Kitchener, Ont., for some years MCC director for Canada. (Reimer, Familien-namen; ML III, 467-69.) A.R.

Rempel, Cornelius, of Manitoba, was one of the delegates of the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) sent to South America in 1919 to find a place of settlement. After investigating some other possibilities, including the United States, the delegation went to Mexico where a purchase of land was made resulting in the migration of most of the Old Colony Mennonites to that country. Cornelius Rempel was one of the leaders of the settlement. C.K.

Walter Schmiedehaus, Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott (Cuauhtemoc, 1948) p. 72.

Rempel, David, of Swift Current, Sask., was one of the six delegates of the Old Colony Mennonites of Canada sent to South America in 1919 to investigate settlement possibilities. Rempel's diary is an important index of the things they were looking for, their impressions, and their reactions. Again, when a delegation was sent to Mexico in 1921 he kept a diary reporting of the findings and developments.

C.K.

Walter Schmiedehaus, Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott (Cuauhtemoc, 1948) 72 ff.

Rempel, G. J., Press. G. J. Rempel, of Blumenort, Cuauhtemoc, Chih., Mexico, an outstanding leader (Vorsteher) of the Cuauhtemoc Old Colony Mennonite settlement, has done much for the economic and cultural development of the conservative Mennonites. Among other things he established a small hand press to produce the most needed supplies for the schools and community life. On this press the whole Bible according to the translation of Martin Luther was printed in 1941 and the Russian Mennonite Gesangbuch in 1940 and 1943. The setting of the type and the printing were done primarily by the son of J. A. Enns, Rempel's brother-in-law. The book by Walter Schmiedehaus, Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott, was printed in Rempel's shop in 1948. Many other items have been printed in this little shop.

C.K.

Rempel, Heinrich, elder of the Deyevka Mennonite Church (q.v.), Orenburg settlement, Russia, was elected minister in 1899 and elder in 1911. He served the congregation until his early death in 1924. He was succeeded by Isaak G. Krahn. C.K.

Peter P. Dyck, Orenburg am Ural (Clearbrook, 1951) 61 ff.; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 902.

Rempel, Hermann Abraham, the first elder of the Mennonite congregations at Karassan in the Crimea (q.v.), then the founder and elder of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren at that place. Educated in his parental home of Gnadenfeld (q.v.) and later in the Zentralschule in Halbstadt (q.v.), he obtained a position as teacher in the Mennonite elementary school at Karassan. At the same time he was a member of the Mennonite school council in the Crimea, but he gave up his calling as a teacher and became a farmer. In 1903 he was chosen preacher and after the retirement of Elder Abraham Friesen he was chosen as elder of the Karassan congregation. His election as elder must have taken place after 1910, since in Friesen's book Abraham Friesen is named as the last elder here in 1910.

Following a Bible conference in 1920 a doubt stirred in Hermann Rempel "whether he had really been born again." One day he turned to Abraham H. Unruh with the words, "I was indeed at least born again when I went to baptism, but my conversion was not normal." Unruh reported later about this: "Later he asked me to go with him to the field. There we knelt down and Brother Rempel on his knees before the Lord judged his entire life down into the smallest detail. Deeply moved he rose from his knees and from that hour there was in him a deep calm assurance, and a sure course in pastoral care." From now on he worked together with the other preachers toward a "revival of his brotherhood." He was oppressed to see that "many members of the congregation lived indifferent lives," and he retired from his office as elder after Unruh had prevented him, when he was still the official elder, from accusing so-called believing members of his congregation of unfaithfulness and publicly challenging them to leave the congregation. He justified his withdrawal from office by saying that he was no longer in a position to distribute the communion emblems to "unconverted persons." After this he left the church "with a large group of like-minded persons" and with them in 1921 founded the "Evangelische Mennoniten-Brüderschaft" in the Crimea, serving as their elder. They built a meetinghouse in the Lustigal. In the course of time this brotherhood developed into a rather large congregation, "in close working fellowship with the Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) and in Bible conferences also with the Karassan Mennonite church."

In the fall of 1929 Rempel came with his family to the gates of Moscow to emigrate; like many others he was forcibly sent back and went to Memrik (q.v.). Therewith began for him and his family a difficult road of suffering. In order to maintain his family he had to work in stone quarries and coal mines at Yuzovka (today Stalino in the Donets basin). He, however, did not give up even here in Memrik the ministry to the Mennonite brotherhood. During a vacation he even visited once again his orphaned congregations in the Crimea in order to serve them. Later he was banished to Siberia, to which place his wife voluntarily followed him. Also three of his sons were sent into exile. Of the daughters some probably remained in Memrik. In exile father, mother, and two of the sons, it is definitely known, found a martyr's death and one day also the third son became silent; it is to be assumed that he also became a martyr.

A.R.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 709; Aron A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer (Winnipeg, 1949) 90 ff.; ML III, 469.

Rempel, Hermann D. (d. 1924), elder of the Mennonite congregation of Deyevka in the Orenburg Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Russia. He was by vocation a farmer and was chosen as minister in 1899. In that year the congregation of Deyevka, which had been founded in 1894 as a subsidiary of Old Chortitza, organized as an independent congregation. Its first elder was Abram Penner. He retired in May 1910, and his successor, Hermann D. Rempel, was chosen in 1911. During Rempel's eldership there was an important revival movement as the consequence of the house visits made by the preacher and missionary Johann J. Peters of Susanovo in nearly all the families. After a service of 12 years as a preacher and 13 additional years as elder Rempel died in 1924.

A.R.

Peter P. Dyck, Orenburg am Ural, Die Geschichte einer mennonitischen Ansiedlung in Russland (Clearbrook, 1951) 62, with portrait; ML III, 469.

Rempel, Jakob A. (1883-), one of the most prominent leaders of the Mennonite Church in Russia, elder of the Neu-Chortitza and Nikolaital Mennonite congregations, was born on April 8, 1883, the first of 13 children of Aron A. and Justina Peters Rempel, at Heuboden in the Borozenko settlement, Ukraine. He served as village schoolteacher 1901-5. He studied theology, philology, and philosophy at the Predigerschule and the University in Basel, Switzerland, 1906-12. In 1913 he became a teacher in the Zentralschule in Chortitza and was ordained preacher there. He was transferred by the governmental school authorities in 1915 to Stalino (formerly Yuzovka) as teacher of German and French, and in 1916 to the Nikopol gymnasium where he was also acting principal. In 1918 he became private lecturer at the newly founded University of Ekaterinoslav, where he was recommended as professor, though this was not carried through until 1920 when he was called as professor to the University of Moscow. While he was considering whether he would accept another call as elder of the Neu-Chortitza congregation, the Moscow University rector declared him deposed from the professorship because he was considering a religious office. He was ordained elder May 2, 1920, and soon thereafter accepted the call to serve also as elder of the Nikolaital congregation. He located in the village of Grünfeld. His bishopric now covered a territory some 40 x 60 miles in area including 22 villages, in which he averaged 40 communion services per year, in addition to a heavy load of pastoral duties and teaching in Bible conferences, and the ordination of many new preachers due to the death or emigration of a large number of preachers. Rempel also served the brotherhood at large. In 1921-25 he rendered special service in Zagradovka by request of the church there. In 1922 he was chosen chairman of the KfK (q.v.) at the General Conference in Chortitza, a position with heavy responsibilities for negotiations in Moscow which he held until 1925, when he refused reelection on the ground that it would be wiser to change leadership. However he continued in a leading position in the KfK and was counted on to head the ministers' training school which he was asked to organize. He was sent as a delegate to the first Mennonite World Conference in Basel in August 1925, but was denied a Swiss visa; so he made a three months' tour of the Mennonite congregations in Germany. He was appointed special commissioner of the KfK in 1928 to continue negotiations with the government. He continued to serve widely in Bible conferences, in 1929 for instance for two weeks in the Orenburg settlement.

On Sept. 8, 1929, Rempel was expelled from Grünfeld, and on Oct. 13, 1929, his property was confiscated and his family expelled. On Nov. 16, 1929, he was arrested in Moscow as he was seeking emigration papers. He was held seven months in Moscow in arrest, was placed under heavy pressure to renounce his faith, and offered a professorship in the University if he would do so. Upon his obdurate refusal he was sentenced to 10 years of hard labor in the Solovki camp on the White Sea. He escaped from Solovki on Jan. 24, 1932, but was arrested again on March 13, 1936, at Khiva and was brought to trial and sentenced at Piatigorsk in the North Caucasus. He was imprisoned first at Vladimir near Moscow and then at Orel. His last letter to reach the West was dated June 12, 1941. It was long assumed that he had died or been executed but recently there are indications that he may have survived and may be still alive. His family, which reached Canada (one son remaining in Germany), has 116 letters from Rempel written during the years 1930-41 in addition to much other material. (Condensed by H.S.B. from the article on Jacob A. Rempel by Alexander Rempel, his son, in ML III, 470-74.) A.R.

Peter A. Rempel, Aeltesten J. A. Rempel's Lebens- und Leidensgeschichte (Gretna, 1946); A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (Abbotsford, 1949); II (North Clearbrook, 1954); Unser Blatt (1926-29) passim.

Rempel, Johann D. (b. 1874), a Mennonite Brethren minister of Russia, was born on Nov. 2, 1874, at Hoffnungsort, Chortitza, South Russia, a son of David Rempel and Anna Thiessen. On Jan. 6, 1898, he was married to Katharina Krahn, and in 1906 moved to Rodichnoye in the newly established Orenburg (q.v.) settlement. In 1910 he was chosen to the ministry of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Klubnikovo. By attending Bible courses and by private study he acquired an extensive and deep knowledge of the Scriptures. On March 2, 1929, his wife died.

In connection with the "peasant flight" to Moscow in 1929 Rempel was arrested and banished with his son Johann to Archangel, and from there to the forests of Pechora in the northern Urals. Here he spent 3½ years. His good performance of the assigned work and also his general personality earned for him the respect of his fellow prisoners as well as of the GPU officials, a respect which gave him certain privileges easing the imprisonment. In 1933 he was released and returned home. Since he was not permitted to serve in his office of preacher and knew that further imprisonment awaited him, he went to the Ukraine, settling as a day laborer in the village of Einlage near Zaporozhe. Here he secretly served small Mennonite circles. Soon he was again arrested, but acquitted after an imprisonment of seven months. During this time his second wife died. His third wife, the widow Maria Klassen, took him into her home, but he could not rest long. During the night of July 20, 1938, he was arrested. His further career is unknown. F.R.

Rempel, Peter Paul (1865-1938), a Mennonite Brethren evangelist, teacher, and elder, was born Aug. 12, 1865, in Russia, the oldest son of Peter P. and Gertrude Rempel. At the age of 28 he was converted and joined the M.B. Church through baptism. For his theological training he attended the St. Chrischona Bible School at Basel, Switzerland. On July 31, 1897, he married Theresia Esau. A son and two daughters were born to them. He began to do evangelistic work in the M.B. Church in Russia and was ordained to the ministry in 1900.

In 1900 Rempel emigrated to America, establishing his home in Kansas, where he continued his studies, especially in English. For eight years he was chiefly engaged as traveling evangelist in the M.B. Church Conference and was much in demand for such service. With the beginning of Tabor College 1908 he served on its faculty five years, teaching chiefly theological subjects. The Hillsboro (Kan.) M.B. Church elected him to the pastorate in 1909 and ordained him elder the following year. This position he held until 1914, when he moved to California. There he held pastorates in several M.B. churches: at Los Angeles 9 years, at Shafter 4 years. He died at his home in Shafter on April 7, 1938, and was buried in the local M.B. cemetery. J.H.L.

Rempel-Wall und Reinländer Waisenamt is the name of one of the two companies which were organized by the Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba in 1921 to purchase and distribute the land of the Manitoba Mennonite settlement (q.v.) at Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico. C.K.

Renata is a small town on a stump peninsula in the Arrow Sea, about 20 miles northwest of Castlegar, B.C. It is reached by ship. This settlement sprang up in the primeval forest about 50 years ago and was settled by 5 Mennonite (GCM) families from the Rosenort (q.v.) Church near Rosthern, Sask. Climatic and agriculture conditions are favorable and there are about 50 homes in this settlement now. The main occupation of the settlers is fruit raising. But many Mennonites have left Renata in the last years, and there are now only about 10 Mennonite families left. The first ministers to visit Renata were D. J. Unruh, Herbert, Sask., in the early 1920's, and C. F. Sawatzky from Laird, Sask. Abraham Hamm, an immigrant preacher, arrived in 1923. In 1938-53 P. P. Dyck from Rosemary, Alberta, preached here the six months of each year while he was living in Renata. J.G.R.

Rennesse, a town on the island of Schouwen, Dutch province of South Holland, was the seat of a (Flemish) Mennonite congregation in the early 17th century. The congregation, which bought a house in 1644, where "public Mennonite meetings" were held, and of which Jan Aelwyns was a preacher in 1646, occasionally received financial support from the Rotterdam congregation. It had only a very small membership and died out before 1660. (DB 1883, 110; 1907, 153, 168.) vöZ.

Rengers, a Mennonite family found in the Dutch province of Groningen. The first known member of this family was a man with the Christian name of Renger, who lived in Leens or Ulrum about 1600. Some of his descendants took Rengers (a patronymic meaning the son of Renger) as their family name (found since about 1760); others assumed the name Arkema, Doornbos, and Huizinga (q.v.), all of which are still familiar names in this province. A number of them have been Mennonite preachers, e.g., Jacob Melles (Rengers), serving at Leens 1649-83.

There was also a noble Rengers family in the province of Groningen, which was not related to the Mennonite family of this name. A member of this family was Johan Rengers ten Post, a contemporary of Menno Simons, who wrote a chronicle, Kronyk, in which he described the Anabaptist troubles at 't Zandt (q.v.). vöZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Derk Pieters en Katrina Tomas (Groningen, 1883) passim; DB 1905, 97.

Renick van Kimsward: see Hoyte Riencx.

Renken, Melchior: see Rink, Melchior.

Renner: see Prenner.

Reno County (Kan.) Old Order Amish settlement was organized as a congregation in 1883, when the families of Christian H. Miller, Christian C. Miller, Tobias Schrock, and Peter Schrock came from Shelby County, Ill. The first ministers were Christian E. Bontrager, bishop, and John D. Nissley and Noah T. Schrock, ministers. The two districts, North Haven and East Haven, formed in 1899 and 1923 respectively, had a combined membership of 109 in 1957. A third district, West Haven, was discontinued in 1943. The Yoder Mennonite Church (MC), founded in 1917, was organized largely by former members from the Amish congregations. L.S.K.

Paul D. Miller, "Amish Acculturation" (M.A. thesis, University of Nebraska, 1950).

Repaix, a village in Lorraine (q.v.), near Blamont, the seat of a Mennonite congregation that in 1871-1918 lay on both sides of the German-French boundary. In 1888 it had 85 baptized members and 65 children. The elders were Fougond on the (at that time) German side, and Mosimann on the French side. Baptism was performed after instruction upon desire at the age of thirteen or fourteen. Footwashing was celebrated with the Lord's Supper. In 1908 there were 73 baptized members living in ten villages. The elders were Christian Lehmann on the German side and Pierre Sommer Jr. on the French side. In 1928 the congregation was reported to be dying out; the elder was Jean Lidviller. In 1938 the congregation merged with Lunéville (q.v.). In 1907 Repaix-Avicour was the scene of a meeting of the French congregations, which resulted in the organization of a conference. E.C.

Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire 1901-1951 (Montbéliard, 1951) 43; Gem.-Kal., 1902, passim; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 43; ML III, 475.

Reporter for Conscience' Sake is a monthly paper published since July 1942 by National Service Board for Religious Objectors, 401 Third St. N.W., Washington 5, D.C. The Reporter contains news about conscientious objection to war, including laws and regulations, CO court cases, the alternate service program, CO's in jail and in the armed forces, and other general information about conscientious objectors and their problems. It is a four-page paper, 8½ x 11 in., with an average circulation of 5,000 copies monthly. E.M.E.

Request met bygevoegde Deducatie voor het Regt van de Vryheid van Geloove, Godsdiens, en Conscientie op den naam van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland ingeleverd aan de E.M. Heeren Staten der gemelde Provincie (Request with Attached Conclusion in Behalf of the Right of Freedom of Faith, Worship, and Conscience, in the name of the Mennonite congregations in Friesland handed in to Their Highnesses, The States of the forementioned Province) was published in 1740 (n.p.). The Request numbers four pages in large octavo, the Deductie 24. The reason for this request and deduction was as follows: In 1738 the States of the Dutch province of Friesland had suspended Wytze Joens (Brouwer, q.v.) and Pieke Tjommes (q.v.), both Mennonite preachers at Heerenveen, on the charge of teaching Socinianism (q.v.). The Mennonite Conference of Friesland (Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, q.v.) held special meetings (on Oct. 9 and 23, 1739, and Jan. 8, 1740) to discuss the matter. They feared that as in 1722 (see Thomas Jan) the Frisian States, stirred up by the Reformed synods under the pretext that Socinianism was being taught in Mennonite churches, would require the Mennonite preachers to sign a confession drawn up by the Reformed ministers, and forbid the Mennonite meetings. They therefore resolved to present a petition to the States of Friesland. This petition, followed by an explanation, was drawn up by Joannes Stinstra (q.v.), Mennonite pastor at Harlingen and at this time moderator of the Frisian Conference.

After the Request and Deductie had been published, an anonymous Reformed author, calling himself "Liefhebber der Waarheit" (Friend of the Truth), attacked the Mennonites. Others who opposed the Mennonites were Daniel Gerdes (q.v.) and Gerardus Kulenkamp (q.v.). Both the Request and the Deductie were reprinted in Het Regt der Vryheid van Geloove . . . (three editions, all at Harlingen, 1740).

The States of Friesland adopted no special measures against the Mennonites in general at this time, and Pieke Tjommes and Wytze Jeens were in 1743 again permitted to preach in their congregation; Stinstra, however, was suspended by the States in 1742 and not readmitted to the pulpit until 1757.

vdZ.

Resch, Ambrosius, a Hutterite brother, died December 1592 at Schäkowitz (q.v.) in Moravia. He gained a certain significance as the author of a chronicle of the Hutterites, which because of its completeness and style was often copied and also used as model for similar books. Joseph Beck (q.v.) used it extensively for the text of his Geschichts-Bücher (1883), calling it "Codex A." Its title runs as follows: Ein klaines gründliches Denkbüechel, darin wirt begriffen und angezeigt, was sich seit dem 1524 Jar mit den recht christ glaubigen und fromen menschen hat zutragen, und wie sich die gamain gots wiederumb hat angefangen und vermört ist worden (small octavo, 146 leaves). The chronicle begins with 1524 and was continued by other writers up to 1640. At present it is in the city archives of Bratislava (q.v.). Resch also copied the Bible concordance of 1530 by Leonhard Brunner (see Concordances), but enlarged its contents by including references to the Apocrypha. The original manuscript is lost, but a copy made in 1642 is still extant in the library of the canons of the Bratislava cathedral. It is remarkable for its unusual size, a handwritten book of 1040 leaves folio size. R.F.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, pp. 3-4 prints the "Vorrede an den Leser" by Resch; op. cit., 318; Ernst Crous, "Wandernde und versteckte Täuferhandschriften," Gesch.-Bl., 1938, 61 f.; Robert Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift . . .," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., 1931, 225 f.; Frantisek Kraus, Nové príspevky k dejinám habanov na Slovenska (New Research and Documents about the Habaners of Slovakia) (Bratislava, 1937); this work is based largely on the Resch chronicle, excerpts of which are presented in Slovakian translation; ML III, 475.

Resinex: see Resinx.

Resius, Johannes (et Lubbertus Gerardi), Praecipuorum christianae fidei articulorum brevis confessio (Amsterdam, 1723), is the Latin translation of the Mennonite confession of 1610 by Hans de Ries (q.v.) (and Lubbert Geritsz). vdZ.

Ressler, Jacob Andrews (1867-1936), pioneer Mennonite (MC) missionary and editor, the son of Martin B. and Magdalena Andrews Ressler, was born near Ronks, Pa., July 28, 1867; died Oct. 3, 1936; interment in Scottdale cemetery. He received his education in the public schools and in Millersville Normal School, Millersville, Pa., from which he graduated in 1891. He was a teacher in the public schools of Lancaster and Westmoreland counties, Pa., for a number of years. In 1891 he married Elizabeth Bachman of Lancaster County, Pa. She died Aug. 3, 1898, leaving one child, Emma (Mrs. George Townsend), of Masontown, Pa. On June 18, 1903, he was married to Lina Zook of Sterling, Ohio, a former worker in the Mennonite Mission in Chicago, Ill. Two children of this marriage, Ruth and Rhoda Ressler, have served as missionaries in Japan.

Ressler was converted and united with the Mennonite Church (MC) at Strasburg, Pa., at the age of seventeen. In 1895 he moved to Scottdale, Pa., and in July of the same year he was ordained to the ministry at the Alverton Mennonite Church, three miles from Scottdale. In 1898 at a missionary meeting at Elkhart, Ind., he was unanimously chosen by the bishops and the congregation present to head a small group of missionaries to open up work in India. Before sailing he was ordained as bishop at Springs, Pa., on Jan. 5, 1899. He and Dr. and Mrs. W. B. Page sailed from New York on Feb. 22, 1899, and landed at Bombay, India, March 24. This was the beginning of the Mennonite Mission (MC) at Dhamtari, India. He returned to America for a brief furlough in 1903. During this year he married his second wife, Lina Zook, who returned with him to the field in December 1903. In 1908, owing to his wife's failing health, the family returned to America.

After his return from India Ressler lived near Sterling, Ohio, until 1911, when he was called to Scottdale to serve as editor of Sunday-school literature. This proved to be his longest field of service. For 25 years he edited the Advanced Sunday School Lesson Quarterly, and for the greater part of this time also the Words of Cheer and Beams of Light. He was for many years Associate Editor of the Gospel Herald. He was the author of a number of books and pamphlets, three of which were Stories from India (1916), Junior India (1927), and Elementary Studies in Prophecy (1917).

"J. A.," as he was popularly known, also served the church as evangelist and Bible instructor and was active in General Conference, serving as moderator in 1922-23, and in the conference and mission board of the Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) District. (ML III, 476.) J.L.H.

Restitution, a term said to derive from a concept of early canonical law, restitutio in integrum, meaning the restoration (of some institution) to its original state. Further back the term points to the still better known New Testament use in Acts 3:21, where it denotes "the restoration of all things" (apocatastasis panton, in the Vulgate restitutio omnium) on the Day of the Lord. The 16th-century Anabaptists understood the term restitutio primarily in the sense of a restoration of the church to its former position, from which it had fallen under the Emperor Constantine the Great (A.D. 313) when state and church had become allied and later fully unified, thus belying the original meaning of the idea of the church. The idea of restoration or restitution then assumed a twofold meaning. (1) It meant an immediate concrete attempt at actual restoring the primitive church, something which the state churches would consider either heresy (Ketzerei) or sectarianism (Abspaltung), and consequently would persecute as a threat to peace. On the other hand, those who advocated such restitution would consider their new beginnings the true church, which must needs be separated from the "world" and be nonconformist to it, while the depraved "world" had to be left to its unhappy destiny. Some modern authors speak in this connection of these people as "restitutionists" and also of a "restitutionist movement." (2) Restitution could also mean a sort of dream or romantic hope that the true church will one day, most likely soon, be restored again by divine fiat, implying that secular history will then come to its final end. Such a view represents a stronger apocalyptic interpretation of history, going back in the main to the vision (and periodization of history) of the Abbot Joachim of Fiore (c1200), and continued in the age of Reformation by a number of eschatologically oriented persons such as Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), David Joris (q.v.), and Michael Servetus.

The study of the entire attitude toward "restitution" and its meaning owes a substantial debt to some American church historians (Bainton, Littell, Wray, etc., see II below), although the facts as such have long been known also among European historians of the period. Attention has been drawn to the fact that a considerable number of 16th-century books and tracts bear the term restitutio on their title page or use it otherwise as a leading concept in the text itself. Karl Rembert was perhaps the first to discover this idea in Anabaptism (1899); it was discussed in a more general fashion by K. Borinski (1919) and J. Huizinga (1930) without connecting the ideas too closely with Anabaptism. It has also been recognized that the idea of restitution is always intertwined with the idea of the fall of the true church (see e.g., G. J. Heering, De Zondeval van het Christendom, 1928) and is a part of a general outlook which A. Lovejoy aptly termed "Christian primitivism" (1935).

The Main Works Witnessing to This Trend and the Subsequent Polemics Connected with These Books. The first work here to be considered is that by Johannes Campanus (q.v.), Göttlicher und heyliger Schrift vor vilen jaren verdunckelt und durch unheylsame leer und leerer . . . verfinstert-restitutio und besserung . . . (1532) (Restoration and Reformation of Divine and Holy Scriptures, Darkened and Obscured by Unwholesome Teachings and Teachers Many Years ago, . . .). This work is actually a shortened edition of his (now lost) work Contra totum post apostolos mundum (for contents see Campanus). It was soon widely read and became influential for the "Wassenberger preachers" (q.v.), Henrik Rol, and others who in turn influenced Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.), one of the promoters of the New Jerusalem to be erected in the city of Münster (q.v.).

Rothmann treats the idea of restitution in two works: first in his Bekentnis van den beyden Sacramenten (1533) and then in his more elaborate work, Eyne Restitution edder Eine wedderstellinge rechter vnde gesunder Christliker leer, gelouens vnde leuens vth Gades genaden durch de gemeente Christi tho Munster an den dach geueenn (1534) (A Restitution or Restoration of Sound Doctrine, Faith and Life Brought to Light out of God's Grace by the Church of Christ at Münster). This is an extensive defense of the principles and institutions of the Anabaptist "kingdom" in Münster. It teaches that just as the Jews restored their temple after their return from Babylonian exile, so also the true "Israelites" today must now restore the kingdom and eliminate the heathen and unbelievers. Rothmann took his ideas so seriously that he did not hesitate to send a copy of his book to the Margrave Philip of Hesse (q.v.), known as an open-minded and tolerant Christian ruler. Philip took a critical look at this strange book, and with the help of two court theologians, Corvinus (q.v.) and Lenning, he came to the conclusion that it contains teachings which "began well but ended rather badly." In 1536 Rothmann's book was also critically answered by the Lutheran polemicist Urban Rhegius (q.v.) in a pamphlet, De restitutione regni Israelitici, contra omnes omnium seculorum chiliastes. Also Dirk Philips (q.v.) felt urged to answer the book, opposing Rothmann's idea of establishing the "kingdom" by way of the sword. Since the kingdom is a spiritual one, says Philips, it cannot be restored in any other way than by that which the Dutch brethren have chosen. This is the leading idea of Philips' Van de geestelijcke restitution, dat is hoe dat al wat van de beginne gheschied is, in Christo Jesu geeste- lijck vervult, weder gehaelt ende weder gebracht (Spiritual Restitution, that is: Christ Jesus has Spiritually Fulfilled, Restored and Made Restitution for All Things that Were Done from the Beginning). This pamphlet shows that the Dutch Anabaptists were by and large rather cool to the idea of "restitution." To them discipleship and obedience to the divine commands were more central than restitutionism, even though some elements of it also appear in their thinking.

Other men of the 16th century who dealt with this idea follow: Hendrik Niclaes (q.v.), a native of Münster, who established the "House of Love" somewhere around the middle of the century, speaks of the restitution of "original complete justice" (erste vollkommene Gerechtigkeit). Wilhelm Postell, the former Catholic mystic and enthusiast, likewise uses this idea prominently in his rather abstruse Panthenosia (1547). David Joris (q.v.), who calls the fourth part of his famous T Wonderboek (1542 and 1551): Dat vierde deel, daer die restitutio oder wederbrenginghe Christi . . . gheopenbaert werdt (Fourth Part in Which the Restitution or Restoration of Christ is Revealed). Joris and Niclaes knew each other quite well and carried on a brief literary dispute. The last name to be noted is a man of a very different type of vision—the anti-Trinitarian Michael Servetus (q.v.), Calvin's famous victim at Geneva. In 1553 he published his Restitutio Christianisme, in which he (Völker in RGG) "dissolves rationalistically the doctrine of the church . . . in order to reveal Christ as the mediator of a spiritualized transcendental kind of life, to which adult baptism was to open the way." This pneumatic Christianity then was to represent the true and genuine "restitution" of the original (invisible) church. NEFF, E.C., R.F.

• • •

II. The Meaning and Significance of This Idea for the Radical Wing of the Reformation. Following the lead of Roland H. Bainton (1936), Franklin H. Littell and Frank J. Wray have developed the thesis that the idea of restitution of the true church, whether sectarian realization or eschatological dream, was the real tie which bound together Anabaptists and Spiritualists, Schwenckfelders and Polish Brethren (anti-Trinitarians). (Leonard Verduin in a yet unpublished study calls them all "restitutionists," where Bainton would have applied the term "Anabaptists" generically. See Radical Reformation and Anabaptist, Sixteenth Century Usage.) Characteristic of all was their antagonism to secular culture, which they judged corrupt and decadent, and also their expectation of the imminent triumph of the true church here on earth (Littell). "History in the eyes of sixteenth-century Anabaptists" (Wray) appears then as a tripartite affair: fall, redemption, restitution, whereby between redemption and restitution two more periods have to be inserted: a temporary fall in the days of Constantine, and a temporary restitution by true believers which continues until the Day of the Lord. (Rothmann, however, taught a number of successive falls and restitutions.) These true believers, among themselves called brethren and by their opponents called heretics or sectarians, are then a sort of trustee of this true church until the day when all the world will be redeemed and the true restitution (Acts 3:21) will come to pass. This was the idea of David Joris as much as of Sebastian Franck or, in due distance, of Michael Servetus. Whether or not it was also the idea of the evangelical Anabaptists is still an open question. To all of these men the great church history of Eusebius (q.v.) was a very welcome tool, undergirding their vision by an old and accepted authority, while the more radical spiritualists and millennialists liked to refer to Joachim of Fiore and his work.

Franklin H. Littell, who devotes an entire chapter in his Anabaptist View of the Church to this idea of restitution, and another to the idea of the fall, defines Anabaptism proper as that section of the "Left Wing of the Reformation" which gathered and disciplined a true church upon an apostolic pattern (50). He expressly says that the Anabaptists were pledged "to re-live in studied fashion" the life of the New Testament community in all of its phases. The term "biblicism" is therefore not specific enough, and this type of life should rather be called "Christian primitivism," that is, a restitution grounded in the New Testament. This restitution follows a very definite pattern to which belong believers' baptism, spiritual government (ban, shunning, shepherds, deacons, etc.), the practice of community of goods in some form, nonresistance and nonswearing of oaths, the great commission (missioners being called apostles or Sendboten), the Lord's Supper as a testimonial sign of true fellowship in the Lord, etc. These people also became the earliest champions of the "free church" idea and of freedom of conscience in matters of faith (toleration, Christian voluntarism). Simplicity and purity of life were understood as undisputed external forms of such a church (in which life and worship become one). Also pacifism in the sense of nonresistance and absolute non-sword-bearing belong to the picture as a whole.

Frank J. Wray elaborates still further on this idea in his dissertation "The Anabaptist View of History," calling restitution the "fundamental concept among Anabaptists," using the term in the broader sense developed by Bainton, which, however, is not generally accepted by Mennonite scholars. After discussing the close ties between restitutionism and eschatological vision (Hofmann, Rothmann, etc.), Wray concludes, "Although the radical fringe connected the restitution with the Day of the Lord more closely than did the main stream of Anabaptists, setting a definite date, Anabaptists in general believed that the restitution was a prelude to greater things to come." And again, "The term was used more frequently by those on the fringe of Anabaptism than by the representatives of the main stream of the movement." These are significant restrictions to the general thesis discussed above, but we will presently see that even under this new aspect the thesis is still open to debate, stimulating though it is in the endeavor of an understanding of the essence of Anabaptism.

In his essay "Recent Interpretations of Anabaptism" (1955) Robert Friedmann tried to analyze this thesis of Bainton, Littell, and Wray as far as the evangelical Anabaptists were concerned. Does restitution mean that the Anabaptists actually and consciously planned such a (historic) restoration as two millenniums earlier the Israelites had planned the rebuilding of their temple (Rothmann)? Does it mean a historic consciousness, an emulation of earlier patterns? If attitudes are considered (as they are in this context), it should be said that what actually concerned the brethren was not such an historic re-establishment of something previously lost but rather obedience to the divine will without reservation (see Reason and Obedience). Obedience is another term for discipleship, something extremely non-historical, and certainly it does not mean a "return" at all. Furthermore, many Anabaptists of the first generation were most emphatic with regard to the idea that what they were really striving after was nothing but a continuation of the true apostolic church. "We are not wrong," wrote Pilgram Marpeck in 1545 (Verantwortung, 405), "in wishing to consider our church in Christ equal to the first apostolic church." Ludwig Keller wrote in this connection of the invisible continuity of "old-evangelical brotherhoods" (q.v.). In other words, the opinion prevailed that the true church was never lost but existed as a timeless and perennial community of believers both before and after Constantine. From an interpretation of Anabaptism as discipleship (see Anabaptist, Modern interpretation), it follows that restitution has too strong a historical connotation to fit a description of the Anabaptist genius. The books enumerated above seem to indicate that the term was significant only to some fringe figures of the Age of Reformation, who dreamed of restitution or attempted its realization in Münsterite fashion. The larger body of evangelical Anabaptists (Swiss, Dutch, Austrian), however, did not have too much use for it, all the quotations in recent literature notwithstanding.

To clarify the situation still further, it might be useful to quote an unpublished remark by Bainton in a letter to this writer (1953): "The ideal of restitution or restoration was common in the Age of Reformation, and all parties desired to restore something. The difference was only as to what, and as to how far back one would go. Luther wished to restore the church of the early Middle Ages, since for him the great corruption [of the church] was the rise of the temporal power of the papacy in the eighth century. The Anabaptists went back further than any of the other groups, and turned exclusively to the New Testament. Even within the New Testament they tended to neglect Paul and to push back to Jesus. That is why the ideal of restoration tends to coincide with the ideal of the imitation of Christ."

R.F.

K. Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 241 ff.; K. Borinski, "Die Weltwiedergeburtsidee in der neueren Zeit," Sitzungsberichte der Bayr. Akad. d. Wiss. phil.-hist. Kl. (1919);

J. Huizinga, Wege der Kulturgeschichte (Munich, 1930) 124-27; K. W. Bouterwek, Zur Literatur und Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (Bonn, 1864); L. Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reiches zu Münster (Münster, 1880) 149-51; E. Braune, Die Stellung der hessischen Geistlichen zu den kirchenpolitischen Fragen der Reformationszeit (Marburg, 1932) Chapter I: "Hessische Geistlichkeit im Kampfe gegen die Wiedertäufer von Münster"; G. Franz, Urkundliche Quellen zur hessischen Reformationsgeschichte II (Marburg, 1954) 214-24; Roland H. Bainton, "Changing Ideas and Ideals in the Sixteenth Century," The Journal of Modern History VIII (1936) 428 ff.; Franklin H. Littell, The Anabaptist View of the Church (Am. Society of Church History, 1952), Chapters 3 and 4; Frank J. Wray, "The Anabaptist Doctrine of Restitution of the Church," MQR XXVIII (1954) 186-96 (this essay is a chapter of the unpublished Yale doctoral dissertation, 1953, "History in the Eyes of the Sixteenth Century Anabaptists"); R. Friedmann, "Recent Interpretations of Anabaptism," Church History XXIV (1955) 132-51, particularly 137; Leonard Verduin's book on the "Restituzionist Movement" has not yet been published; BRN V, 504, 559-64; ML III, 476 f.

Reublin (Röuble, Röblin, Reeblin, Reble, Räbel, Reubel, or Reiblin), Wilhelm (1480/84-after 1559), an early Anabaptist, is one of the most interesting figures of the century of the Reformation. Among the Anabaptists of his time he is one of the most frequently named; his fate as well as his career are among the most remarkable.

He was born between 1480 and 1484 in Rottenburg on the Neckar, died after 1559, probably in Znaim (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.). He had already received a clerical consecration while a student at the University of Freiburg. On Aug. 21, 1509, he went to Tübingen. His parish of Griessen (between Schaffhausen and Waldshut) he committed to the care of others, and in 1510 he gave it up. For the following years his trace is lost. In the spring of 1521 he appeared with the title of Magister and on June 24 he entered St. Alban's Church in Basel as people's priest. His powerful advocacy of the new faith won him a large following, particularly among the trade guilds. According to the Basel chronicles he explained "the holy Scriptures so well that the like had never been heard before." His audience numbered up to 4,000. He preached against the ceremonies of the old church and its hierarchy, the vigils, annual Masses and Masses for the dead, the regulations of fasting, and offered to give an account on all these points from the Bible. When he began to preach against the Mass the bishop raised a complaint with the council. The populace sided with the bold preacher, since he proclaimed the pure Scripture, and the council had to let him go. But on June 13 he declared the Gospel to be the true sacred object, and the monstrance to contain only dead bones; he was then expelled from the city, in spite of the intervention of his friends, on June 27, 1522. He at once received an appointment as people's priest at Lauffenburg on the Rhine, but could not remain under Austrian dominion. In the autumn of 1522 Reublin appeared in Zürich (q.v.) without a position, and at once joined the Reformation circles and became one of its most radical proponents. "God-fearing people gave him the necessary support at first." He preached repeatedly in the Fraumünster and was made assistant preacher in Wytikon (q.v.) and Zollikon (q.v.), subsidiaries of the prebendary foundation (Chorherrnstift) of Zürich. In Wytikon the peasants chose him as pastor in 1523, to the great displeasure of the prebendaries. In Zürich he also advocated a radical course, deliberately broke the fasts, incited the peasants to rebel against the tithe, and criticized the government and the monastic system. In his sermons he even used obscene expressions in speaking of the secret sins of the nuns. On April 18, 1523, he married Adelheid Leemann; he was the first priest to take this step in Switzerland.

Reublin was the first in the canton of Zürich, in early 1524, to preach against the baptism of infants; by Easter a number of parents in his congregation did not present their children for baptism. He said, "If I had a child I would not have it baptized before it came to maturity and could choose its own godparents." He was arrested and imprisoned for a time.

The opponents of infant baptism during this time gathered around men like Felix Manz (q.v.) and Conrad Grebel (q.v.). In the debate between them and Zwingli and his party on Jan. 17, 1525, Reublin was a participant. Zwingli considered him simple of mind and foolishly bold, garrulous, and unwise. After the debate the Anabaptists were expelled from the canton, including Reublin.

Reublin, accompanied by his friend Brötli (q.v.), went first to Hallau (q.v.), and stayed a while in the region of Schaffhausen (q.v.). While here it is assumed that he also visited his former parish of Giessen. But nothing is definitely known about such a visit. Specifically, there is no evidence that Reublin, Grebel, and Manz paid a visit to Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), who is thought to have stayed at Giessen three months previously. From Hallau Reublin went to the Austrian city of Waldshut (q.v.). There he won Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and with him the city for the Anabaptist cause, carrying through a baptism of 300 persons on Easter Day. In March 1526 he was in Strasbourg (q.v.), where he was probably received by the tailor Jörg Ziegler (q.v.). He debated on baptism with Capito (q.v.) in Capito's home. Capito wrote to Zwingli that Reublin appeared to be a pious and honorable man, but not a diamond in dependability. He evaded a colloquium, but started a rumor that the preachers had yielded to him and accepted Anabaptist doctrine but did not dare to take the position in the open for fear of the secular authorities. He was challenged three times to a discussion on infant baptism, but rejected it, saying that it was unnecessary, and left the city.

Reublin now turned toward his home town Rottenburg. Here and in Horb (q.v.) he was active in the Anabaptist cause. He called Michael Sattler (q.v.) to take charge of the work in the region of Horb. When Sattler and his followers, including Reublin's wife, were seized by the Austrian government and taken to Binsdorf, Reublin fled to Reutlingen (q.v.), where a married sister was living. Here he wrote a brief account of the death of his friend Michael Sattler and his companions, and of the tribulations of the Anabaptists in Swabia. His wife remained in prison a long time; the mayor of Zürich, at the request of her relatives, sent a petition in her behalf. She was probably released upon recantation and an oath, for Reublin reported to Zollikon that all the women with the exception of Sattler's wife had recanted. But the Zürich copyist of the letter written by Reublin to the Swiss Brethren (after July 17, 1527) added the sentence, "William's wife with her eighteen-months-old son is lying in prison with others at Horb in a tower, and has been lying thus since the second week after Easter" (Easter fell on April 21).

From Reutlingen Reublin went to Ulm (q.v.), probably by way of Esslingen (q.v.), where there was a large Anabaptist congregation. In Ulm he met Hans Denk (q.v.). He soon returned to Esslingen, and there, as his enemies reported, "he conducted a regimen like the infallible pope." But there were also other influences at work in Esslingen. The Anabaptists of Esslingen, embittered by the execution of Anabaptists at Rottenburg (q.v.), wanted to take up arms against those who believed differently, in the name of the true government in heaven. Reublin was sharply opposed to Leonhard Lutz (q.v.), who had fled to Reutlingen, and who with his group had been persuaded by the Lutheran clergy that the Anabaptist position on baptism was too harsh and severe. Reublin bitterly reproached him and his party. But Reutlingen was not open to Anabaptist doctrine. In 1528 Reublin was expelled from Esslingen with the lash, and Stephan Böhmerle—and in the next year four other Anabaptists—was put to death by beheading. The leaders of the Swabian League had demanded that Esslingen take a more active attitude against Anabaptism. Reublin was considered by them "a very wicked and seditious person"; on Feb. 20, 1528, the "shepherd, or Brother Wilhelm," as he was called, had disappeared from the city.

Reublin next went to Strasbourg. There he worked with Jakob Kautz (q.v.), who had recently been expelled from Worms, and Hans Bündlerlin (q.v.) of Linz. Reublin was also acquainted with Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), of Tirol, and Jakob Widemann (q.v.), of Memmingen. Reublin soon became known as an Anabaptist leader; his followers, for the most part refugees from other cities, held their meetings on Saturday, and also on other days; they had a proper congregational organization, with deacons who gathered contributions from the members and others in the vicinity. Since Reublin and Kautz everywhere attacked the clergy of Strasbourg, the council intervened. On Oct. 22, 1528, an Anabaptist meeting was interrupted by police and Reublin and Kautz arrested. Reublin tried to flee, but failed and was imprisoned in the tower of the "Ratsbote" Thomas. On Jan. 5, 1529, they were summoned to give an account of themselves. Ten days later they presented a statement of their faith: water baptism is the enrollment of the believers in the visible church of God. "If he desires it, he shall not be refused, if he has heard the word of penitence and consented to it in his heart. A confessed faith . . .

must precede and not follow baptism. Thus it is clear that infant baptism is contrary to the command of Christ." "Again, we know from experience that your preachers are comparable to poor carpenters, who have, to be sure, torn down the church of the pope, but have not yet built a church of Christian order; thus their call is not of God, not divine, but earthly." Thereupon the clergy were again sent to the two for further discussion. Reublin and Kautz demanded a public trial. Bucer (q.v.) and his colleagues favored their request, but the council insisted that the debate be fought out in writing. The result was inconclusive. The prisoners were released and expelled from the city and bishopric on threat of drowning if they reappeared. During his imprisonment Reublin had become crippled; he returned to his home to recuperate. He and his wife and children then went on to Moravia (q.v.). A group of his former flock had already gone there. In vain he had tried to settle in Constance (q.v.).

In early 1530 Reublin arrived in Austerlitz (q.v.), Moravia. The elements that had assembled here were too heterogeneous to function without friction. Satan, say the chronicles, attacked the people at their most vulnerable spot, namely, their elders, upon whom their whole life depended. During the summer they had held their meetings in the open; but during the winter, when it was too cold to meet outside, they found no place large enough to hold them. Therefore they were divided into three groups and a preacher assigned to each group. This step proved costly. The teaching differed from one group to another. One taught that Christ was a citizen in Capernaum; therefore they too might perform civic duties and the oath. Others, as Jakob Widemann, were not competent as preachers. They preached that the sisters should marry, else the brethren must be given heathen wives. Girls were bothered by peculiar questions. Some of the preachers showed signs of pride, eating and dressing better than their brethren. The Tirolese complained that the preaching here was not as edifying as it had been at home, and appealed to Jörg Zauring (q.v.), their compatriot, concerning "judgment" and "discipline of children." At this point Reublin intervened. He was not received with the cordiality he wished, but rather with distrust. He was not permitted to preach, "because they had had no experience with him." Was Widemann acquainted with Reublin's restlessness, and did he have a premonition of his lack of integrity? Perhaps he feared Reublin's sharp judgment, which had accused the Strasbourg clergy of being able only to tear down, but not to build up. Here Reublin was no more optimistic than there.

In Auspitz Reublin became the leader of an opposition party and began to speak about the abuses in the brotherhood. For a time he filled the place of the preacher Kilian; this fact he took as a justification to step in here. Concerning the reasons for this dispute with the elders he wrote to Pilgram Marpeck on Jan. 26, 1531 (letter in Cornelius, II, 253 ff.). The original letter was taken from Julius Lober (q.v.), on April 8, 1531, by Albrecht Gailing, magistrate in Hohenek near Ansbach (Bergdolt, 109). This letter says that one evening after the common meal near the close of 1530 he began to read aloud, and, since the people gathered around him, to explain the Scripture; likewise on the next evening. On the third evening the elders drove the people out of the room. Then they went to the schoolroom and listened to Reublin there. Jakob Widemann thereupon called the people together, spoke of the wonderful works he and his fellow preachers had performed at Nikolsburg (q.v.) and Austerlitz, and gave orders that only the preachers he specified be allowed to preach; the others were to listen. But Reublin's friends asked him to continue. Thus a break was inevitable.

On New Year's Day of 1531 Widemann summoned all the elders and announced that Reublin taught at inconvenient times and contrary to their order, that the people were running after him, and that he was a false prophet. Reublin's friends refused to have the reading of the Word denied them in their house. When Widemann asked all those who considered his preaching right to come to his side, Zauring and others remained on Reublin's side and demanded that Reublin's answer be heard. Reublin refused, "for they had already been sitting in the cold all day. They would have liked to turn the people from us, but the people understood the matter." On January 3 the elders demanded that Reublin and his immediate group give an account of themselves for calling the elders false preachers and prophets. Reublin replied that they would do so only before the assembled brotherhood. On the next day Reublin then presented his charges to the assembly as follows: the leaders of the brotherhood did not constitute a Christian church in one God, one faith, and one baptism; for they not only showed no fruits, but also prevented others from doing so. In the second place they grieved the Christian brotherhood which has its strength and being in the Holy Spirit, and thus wasted the fountain of divine grace in depriving preachers and hearers of the strength of the spirit of grace. Thirdly, they permitted the wealthy to have their own houses with rich food and clothing; the wives of some of the wealthy had never been seen at the common table. In the fourth place they held baptism alone to be the work of justification, whereas it should be faith. In the fifth place, though they taught that every person awakened by the Holy Spirit was a true apostle, nevertheless they did not allow him to preach. Other complaints dealt with the poor training of the children. Many a person had contributed fifty guilders to the brotherhood, and then had to see his own child go hungry. From such false prophets one must part. Thereupon Reublin was put out of the brotherhood as "one who incites and makes unhappy."

Reublin gathered his followers; on Jan. 8, 1531, they "shook the dust off their feet" and withdrew, about 300 persons, not including children. With great difficulty they reached Auspitz (q.v.). One of Reublin's friends by the name of Kaspar had gone to Auspitz some time earlier. "Let every one consider how burdensome such a journey with so many children was in winter in such poverty." Johanna von Boskowitz, a noblewoman and abbess of Mariasaal near Brno, gave them residence and in the village of Steurowitz (q.v.) in a parsonage, "in which we now have about fifty brethren." In particular the sick and the children were lodged here.

The beginnings were difficult enough in Auspitz and Steurowitz. "The people were not trained in agriculture and in the work in the vineyards." Attacks by robbers also caused some trouble. But still more serious was the fact that the Brethren were unable to achieve unity even here. There were justified complaints against Kaspar and especially against Reublin, who had rudely rejected a preacher of Swabia who wished to join them with a small group of his own. Reublin had organized a brotherhood on strictly communistic lines. But while the members suffered want though performing difficult work, forty guilders were found on Reublin during a severe illness. And so he, the leader of the Anabaptists, and the preacher of community, lost his good name, and was banned as a "lying, unfaithful, treacherous Ananias." He himself confessed that this judgment had come upon him with reason. But in spite of his repentance he was apparently not taken back into the brotherhood. Reublin's name then disappeared from the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren.

But in July 1531 Reublin appeared in the vicinity of Rottenburg. He was presumably making an attempt to collect the remnants of his former congregation here in his home area. Near Esslingen he found about 300 persons. But they had scarcely met, when they were dispersed by the Swabian League.

The next information comes in 1535, when Reublin wrote a letter to Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.), the leader of the Reformed Church in Zürich. Reublin had returned from Moravia with a demand against his brother-in-law Felix Leeman, and asked Bullinger (probably successfully) for support. The letter shows that Reublin had withdrawn from Anabaptism. His residence was in Znaim in Moravia. Ten years later (1545/46) he made two journeys from Znaim to Zürich, serving as a letter carrier between Socrin, a clergyman at Ulm, and Bullinger. On his second return trip to Moravia in June 1546 he was the leader of the Zürich citizens Hans Hug and Meinrat Oggenfuss, who with letters of recommendation from the Zürich city council went to Moravia for some unknown reason (but not as Anabaptists) and returned in August.

In August 1554, at the age of seventy, Reublin appeared in Basel in poor health and asked a shelter for himself and his wife for the short time of life remaining to them, and a small sum for their support; he offered to supply the sick and the aged in particular with distilled goods. But he was sent to a spa with a considerable gift of money (Burckhardt).

On Feb. 8, 1559, King Ferdinand wrote to the authorities at Innsbruck that Wilhelm Reble of Znaim had repeatedly requested the release of his inheritance in Rottenburg, which was being withheld. He was inclined to be gracious to Reble, and would like to see him come into his possessions if only in consideration of his advanced age—Reublin was at that time between seventy-five and eighty years old. It is not known whether Reublin lived to see the restoration of his property. Did he manage to conceal his past, so that Ferdinand was not aware that he was the "renegade Lutheran priest" whom he had once in great anger commanded to be seized? Had Reublin in his last days returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church? Could the love of money have taken him so far? It is not known, just as his character in general is a puzzle. At times he appears in a very dubious light, and at other times his tragic fate and often deeply moving words reach across the centuries. But his attachment to the Anabaptists was without question permanently broken in the 1530's.

(Based on material left by Johann Loserth and Gustav Bossert, written by Gustav Bossert, Jr., supplemented by Eberhard Teufel and Heinold Fast.)

G. Bos.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 86, note 1; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 66-68, 70; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 48, 92 f.; Johannes Bergdolt, Die freie Reichsstadt Windsheim im Zeitalter der Reformation (1520-1580) (Leipzig, 1921) 109; Gustav Bossert, "Die Täuferbewegung in der Herrschaft Hohenberg," Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte IV (1889) Nos. 10-12; V. (1890) Nos. 1 and 2; Paul Burkhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898); C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufstands II (Leipzig, 1860) 16, 252 ff.; Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VIII, 675 ff. Heinold Fast, "Neus zum Leben Wilhelm Reublin's," Theologische Zeitschrift XI (Basel, 1955) 420-25; Camill Gerbert, Geschichte der Strassburger Sectenbewegung zur Zeit der Reformation 1524-1534 (Strasbourg, 1889); Abraham Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905); J. Loserth, Doctor Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertaufer in Mähren (Brno, 1893); idem, Communismus; idem, "Die Stadt Waldshut und die vorderösterreichische Regierung 1523-1528," Archiv für österreichische Geschichte LXXVII; TA Zürich, Nos. 10-11, 36, 41, 42, 45, 55, 157, 249, 250, 253, 296, 303, 340-42, 391, 393; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954); J. C. Wenger, "A Letter from Wilhelm Reublin to Pilgrim Marpeck, 1531," MQR XXIII (1949) 67-75; ML III, 477-81.

Reusner (Reyssner), Adam (1496-1575), of Bavaria, Germany, a Schwenckfelder (q.v.) writer of hymns, one of which is No. 51 in the Ausbund (q.v.). (ML III, 481; Der Mennonit IX [1956] No. 7, p. 100a.)

Reusse, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, husband of the martyr Otilie Franke (q.v.) probably a native of Frankenhausen in Thüringen, Germany, where he suffered a martyr's death in 1534. NEFF.

Eduard Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Zeitschrift des Harz-Vereins für Geschichte und Altertumskunde, 1899, 423-536, 631-33; Wappler, Thüringen, 109, 159; ML III, 481.

Reusse (Ruse), Peter, a successful Anabaptist leader in Thuringia, Germany, by trade a feed-cutter, stemmed from Esperstedt near Frankenhausen, moved with his wife and children to Sandersleben in Anhalt, baptized many in the villages in the neighborhood also in Mühlhausen (q.v.), including Appolonia Kaiser (q.v.), and probably introduced the fraternal kiss and footwashing. His name occurs in the records of 1530-37. NEFF.

Eduard Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Zeitschrift des Harz-Vereins für Geschichte und Alter- tumskunde, 1899, 423-536, 631-33; Wappler, Thüringen, 106 f., 110, 118, 124, 126, 128, 157, 160, 224; Nos. 38, 45, 48, 52, 54; ML III, 481.

Reusser: see Risser.

Reutlingen, a town (1951 pop. 45,000) of Württemberg, Germany, on the Echaz, 20 miles south of Stuttgart, until 1802 a free imperial city. The preacher Matthäus Alber (1495-1570) thoughtfully introduced the Reformation here. Neither the dispute on communion, the Peasants' War, nor the Anabaptist movement gained much ground here. Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.) could accomplish nothing here in 1527. In the spring of 1527 some Anabaptists fled from Rottenburg to Reutlingen, where some of them found refuge with Friedrich Frick, master of the shoemakers' guild, and some in the "tile hut." On Feb. 28, 1528, the council prohibited the admittance of refugee Anabaptists. With friendliness and patient explanation Alber and his fellow preachers converted the Esslingen refugee Anabaptists back to the Lutheran faith, among them Leonhard Lutz, the master of the guild of vine dressers, so that they were permitted to return to Esslingen (q.v.).

In the first decades of the 20th century several Mennonite families settled in and around Reutlingen. At first they were members of the Stuttgart congregation. In 1948, when the division of Germany into military zones (1945) hindered travel, a congregation was organized here. Increased by refugees who settled in the neighborhood, the congregation numbered 73 baptized members in 1957, with Fritz Hege and Daniel Schneider as elders.

(Based on articles by Horst Quiring and Gustav Bossert.)

ADB I, 178; Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte XXX (Stuttgart, 1926) 198 ff.; Gustav Bossert, "Der Reutlinger Sieg vom Jahre 1524" in Für die Feste und Freunde des Gustav-Adolf-Vereins (Barmen, 1894) 178; F. G. Gayler, Historische Denkwürdigkeiten der ehemaligen freien Reichsstadt Reutlingen . . . bis 1577 (Reutlingen, 1840); Julius Hartmann, Matthäus Alber, der Reformator der Reichsstadt Reutlingen (Tübingen, 1863); Karl Theodor Keim, Reformationsblätter der Reichsstadt Esslingen (Esslingen, 1860); Friedrich Keppler, Die Marienkirche in Reutlingen . . . (Reutlingen, 1947); Karl Pfaff, Geschichte der Stadt Esslingen (Esslingen, 1840); Albrecht Ströle, Matthäus Alber, der Reformator Reutlingens (Reutlingen, 1895); Julius Volk, "Das Verhör des Reutlinger Reformators Dr. Matthäus Alber," Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte, 1926, 198 ff.; ML III, 481 f.

Reve, Hans van der (Hans von Reve), listed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror as an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake at Klausen (q.v.) in Tirol, Austria, in 1529 with Georg Blaurock (q.v.), is presumably identical with Hans Langeegger (q.v.). The execution took place on Sept. 6, 1529. (Mart. Mir. D 22, E 432; ML I, 233; II, 506, 617.) voZ.

Réveil, name given to an early 19th-century revival movement in Holland: see Revival: Netherlands.

Review, The, an illustrated periodical edited and published by H. P. Krehbiel starting in April 1899, as an 8-page monthly, 9 x 11 inches, at Canton, Ohio. It was transferred to Newton starting with the December 1900 issue, where it was published by the Western Book and Publishing Company (q.v.), which was managed by H. P. Krehbiel. With the issue of August 1903 the paper was enlarged to 11 x 14 inches. Starting with the December 1904 issue Krehbiel merged the Review with the Post- und Volksblatt (q.v.), which was in its 18th year of publication. In 1922 Krehbiel started the Mennonite Weekly Review (q.v.). (Complete set of The Review in BeCL.) C.K.

Revival (German, Erweckung; French, Réveil), a term commonly used to refer to renewal and intensification of spiritual life in an existing religious congregation, denomination, region, or country, without implying a doctrinal or organizational change or a basic reform. Revivalism has come to mean a technique by which emphasis is placed upon frequent religious renewal through specific methods adopted to produce a mass religious response on a smaller or larger scale, largely through special meetings with considerable appeal to religious emotions and definite personal commitment.

"Revival" as a descriptive term is not applied to movements of renewal or religious stir in Roman or Greek Catholicism, although certainly such renewals have taken place at various times and places in Christian history. Even for Protestantism the term is usually limited to revival movements since the 18th century, beginning in Germany with Pietism (1670-1750) including Zinzendorf and the Moravians (1722 ff.), in England with the Wesleyan movement (1738 ff.), and in the American Colonies with the Great Awakening of Jonathan Edwards and others (1734-44). The following sections will report on the revival movements in (1) North America, (2) Netherlands—Réveil, (3) French Switzerland and France, (4) Germany, and (5) Russia, as they influenced Mennonites in those areas or developed among Mennonites themselves.

North America. Nowhere else in the world has revivalism had so wide a spread and so powerful an influence as in the United States, beginning early in the 18th century and continuing into the 20th. As W. W. Sweet explains in his excellent survey Revivalism in America, Its Origin, Growth and Decline (New York, 1944), this was due primarily to the specific religious situation in Colonial America produced by the great migrations of generally lower-class European peoples to the New World, the freedom and individualism of American life especially on the frontier, and the extreme weakness of organized religion. As late as 1760 not more than 8-10 per cent of Americans were members of any church, and in the middle colonies of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, probably not more than 5-6 per cent. Not only manners but morals were crude, culture was low, educated leaders were scarce, and formal religion had little power. Under these circumstances only a powerful emotionalized, personal religion had much chance to convert America. The conversion was a slow process but it was gradually accomplished, largely as the result of revivalistic methods. Those denominations which operated on this level were the greatest beneficiaries of its results, hence the Methodists and Baptists and related groups have become the largest and most influential religious bodies in America.

The first great revival, called the Great Awakening, began in the 1720's with Theodore Frelinghuysen in New Jersey, a pietistic Reformed immigrant preacher, followed by the Presbyterian Tennents in the same area. With the great Jonathan Edwards at Northampton, Mass., it broke out in full power (especially 1734-36) in New England, where 60,000 and more new members were swept into the Congregational and other churches, and the old members greatly revived. George Whitefield, the Calvinistic Methodist from England, made seven journeys to America in 1738-70, becoming the great over-all unifying revival preacher, building up all denominations open to the movement. Thus German Pietism, English Methodism, and New England Calvinism all played a role in this tremendously significant Colonial revival movement. The Moravians in their own way (arrived in Pennsylvania 1738) made their contribution, particularly among the Germans. "Colonial revivalism brought religion to the common man" (Sweet).

It is not clear how much the Colonial Mennonites in Eastern Pennsylvania were involved in or affected by the Great Awakening and its side effects. The claim that they influenced Frelinghuysen or shared in his movement, made by some reputable historians, is unsubstantiated. But that the Mennonites were influenced by Pietism, both before they left the Palatinate (1707 ff.) and in America, especially by pietistic literature, is beyond question. It is highly doubtful, however, that they adopted the revivalistic preaching techniques or doctrinal and emotional emphases. They resisted the Moravian influences. The German Tunkers (Dunkards or later Church of the Brethren), who arrived in Eastern Pennsylvania in 1719-22, being themselves Pietists, joined vigorously in the revivalistic movement and profited greatly by it, winning many Mennonites to their membership.

Thereafter the Mennonites resisted and rejected the revivalistic influences and example until late in the 19th century. The second Great Awakening (1793-1810), the Charles G. Finney revival of 1824-27, the revival of 1853, and others of the first half of the 19th century had little influence upon the Mennonites except to tear large numbers of sheep from the folds of traditional staid Mennonitism. The newer revivalistic German denominations such as the United Brethren, founded in 1800 in Eastern Pennsylvania by the former Reformed preacher Otterbein and the former Mennonite bishop Martin Boehm (q.v.) of Lancaster County (who was followed by other Mennonites such as Newcomer), and the Evangelical Church, also founded in 1800 in Eastern Pennsylvania by Jacob Albright, gathered in many dissatisfied Mennonites in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and later in Ohio, Ontario, and Indiana. The Church of God (Winebrennerian), founded in Harrisburg, Pa., in 1836, had a similar attraction for Mennonites. Martin Boehm (q.v.; 1725-1812) is the most striking case of the revivalistic impact on Pennsylvania Mennonites. Ordained preacher in 1753 and bishop in 1759, he came in contact with Whitefield in Virginia in 1761 and thus was drawn into the Great Awakening. In 1767 he participated in the famous meeting in Isaac Long's barn in the Conestoga Valley in Lancaster County, where he met Otterbein. His ever more extensive revivalistic ministry outside the Mennonite Church and his general revivalistic practices and beliefs led to his excommunication in 1777. In his later years Boehm greatly influenced the spread of Methodism in the Lancaster area, and his funeral sermon was preached by his friend, Bishop Francis Asbury, the first Methodist bishop in America. The whole course of American Mennonite history in America might have been vastly different if Boehm had succeeded in "revivalizing" it in his day. The Brethren in Christ (River Brethren), who arose in Lancaster County about 1770, were a fruit of the revivalistic impact on Mennonites.

Whereas the early revivalism largely took Mennonites out of the church of their fathers (or led to their expulsion), the revivalism of D. L. Moody and others in the 1870's and following more often had the indirect effect of setting revival influences going in the church itself. An outstanding case of this in the M.C. group is J. F. Funk (q.v.; 1835-1930), who came directly under Moody's influence in Chicago in the 1860's and was his associate in mission Sunday-school work there. Funk attributed a very strong influence from Moody directly upon himself, which motivated him in turn in his important progressive work in the Mennonite Church. The first M.C. revival meeting (q.v.) was held by Funk and Daniel Brenneman (q.v.) in 1872. J. S. Coffman (q.v.) was the great carrier of revivalism into the church 1879-99. By 1900 the church was won over to this method, although it was conservative in its use and did not promote the emotionalistic emphasis and the Calvinism or Wesleyanism which often characterized it in general.

Daniel Brenneman (q.v.) in Indiana and Solomon Eby (q.v.) in Ontario did adopt this emotionalistic method and emphasis and formed the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (q.v.) in 1875, which has been deeply stamped by this point of view.

In the Amish Mennonite Church, Henry Egly (q.v.; 1824-90) came under the influence of revivalism and founded the small Defenseless (now Evangelical) Mennonite group in Adams County (Berne), Ind., and elsewhere in 1866. Out of this group later came the Missionary Church Association (q.v.; 1898 at Berne, Ind.).

The General Conference Mennonites, whose major elements were the Oberholtzer group (1847) in Eastern Pennsylvania, Swiss Mennonites in Ohio and Indiana coming in 1818 ff. and 1838 ff., and Russian Mennonites in the western states and provinces since 1874, have undoubtedly also been influenced by Pietism and revivalism, although Gehman and his Evangelical Mennonites (formed from the Oberholtzer group in 1858) represent a revivalistic influence which was excised from the G.C.M. Daniel Hoch (q.v.; 1806-78) of Ontario (ordained bishop by Oberholtzer in 1851) left the group with his followers in 1869 to join the later Mennonite Brethren in Christ.

The Mennonite Brethren (q.v.; formed in 1860 in Russia; in the United States since 1874) represent the revivalistic movement in a wholesome way and are joined in this by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (q.v.; formed in Russia in 1869; in the United States since 1874) and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (q.v.; formed from the G.C.M. in 1889).

In general the revivalistic influence has been wholesome in those groups which have remained Mennonite in basic and historic character. The groups which have left the Mennonite brotherhood have adopted a more emotionalized type of piety, together with general Wesleyan emphasis on "holiness" and the second work of grace or also entire sanctification (q.v.) or perfectionism. The "Camp Meeting" was adopted by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ from the earlier Methodistic revivalism.

In the Mennonite Church (MC), as well as in the Mennonite Brethren Church and related groups, the general adoption of the revivalistic pattern for securing new members led to the use of this method for bringing the children of the church into church membership in place of the older method of catechetical instruction and baptism at a traditional age of 14-18 years. The revivalistic emphasis upon personal conversion and decision is in principle, so long as it is not pressed upon children at too early an age or induced by emotionalized pressures, in accord with the Anabaptist understanding of faith as personal, voluntary acceptance of Christ as Saviour and Lord. Apart from undesirable excesses revivalism may therefore be understood as a renewal in a sense of the central Anabaptist emphases. (See also Evangelism, Revival Meetings, and Pietism.)

H.S.B.

W. W. Sweet, Revivalism in America, Its Origin, Growth and Decline (New York, 1944); F. G. Beardsley, A History of American Revivals (New York, 1904); H. S. Bender, Mennonite Sunday School Centennial (Scottsdale, 1940); W. W. Sweet, The Story of Religion in America (New York, 1950); K. S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity III, IV (New York, 1939, 1941); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1957).

* * *

Europe. The term Réveil is applied to a revival movement in the renewal of Pietism (q.v.) in the train of the Romantic movement in the early 19th century in western Europe, especially Holland. It is treated in the following series of articles.

1. West Switzerland and France. As early as 1805 several inspired members of a small congregation of Bohemian Brethren in Geneva, viz., Ami Bost (1790-1874), Henri Louis Empayatz (1790-1853), and others, met with some late adherents of Pietism. Soon external influences were added. In 1813 Mrs. von Krüdener (1764-1824), converted in 1807, appeared, in connection with Jung-Stilling (q.v.), in 1816 Robert Haldane (1764-1846), who was giving an exegesis of the epistle to the Romans in Geneva and with whom other Scots were working. The Anabaptist concept of "a church after the pattern of the apostolic church, which recognizes only converted persons and rejects infant baptism, was accepted by many awakened Christians" (Hadorn, 431). In 1841, after theological professors and pastors had rejected a reformation, and a transfer to the Catholic Church had been briefly considered, the first free church arose, known as the New Church (nouvelle église). Others then began to preach in the established church the forgotten doctrines of Calvin, such as original sin, predestination, etc. When Cesar Malan (1787-1864) was refused a pulpit he opened in his garden the Chapel of the Testimony (chapelle du temoignage), which in 1823 became the second free church. This was the origin of the Free Evangelical Churches. Louis Gaussen (1790-1863) was one of the founders of the Evangelical Association, for the defense of the evangelical faith within the established church. He was soon deposed from his pulpit; he then accepted a teaching position in the theological faculty of the Evangelical Association, which was founded in 1832, and in his Theopneustia (1840 and 1842) he taught the doctrine of the verbal inspiration of the Old and New Testaments.

The movement spread into France (Free Church in 1832, Evangelical Association in 1833, the Monod brothers as leaders), and also to the cantons of Vaud and Lausanne in Switzerland, where Alexander Vinet (1797-1847) was the leading personality and where a Free Church and a free theological faculty came into existence, and into Neuchâtel, where a revival had begun in 1817, though the Free Church and the free faculty were not instituted until Fredéric Godet initiated them.

In Bern a Free Church was begun in 1829 and an Evangelical Association in 1831.

The Evangelical Association of the canton of Bern (q.v.), as well as the Free Protestant churches, have had many contacts with the Mennonites in the canton of Bern. The Mennonite Der Zionspilger (q.v.) was called Der freie Zeuge in 1918-21. Since 1868 and particularly since 1912 the Swiss Mennonites have been connected with revival movements.

North Switzerland and Adjacent South Baden. The revival movement here was an outgrowth of the German Association for Christianity (Deutsche Christentumsgesellschaft) with its seat in Basel, Switzerland, which was founded by Johann August Urlsperger (1728-1806) in 1780 for the promotion of pure doctrine and true godliness (Gottseligkeit). Friedrich Steinkopf (1773-1859), who was the secretary of this association 1795-1800, brought in English inspiration. William Carey (1761-1834) had founded the Baptist Missionary Association in 1792; the Religious Tract Society was founded in 1799; and the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804. Gottlieb Blumhart (1779-1838), the revivalistic pastor of St. Peter's Church in Basel and long-time secretary of the Association for Christianity, was under the same influence. At times in 1816 f., Mrs. von Krüdener with her stormy enthusiasm stayed in and around Basel. Christian Friedrich Spittler (1782-1867), like Steinkopf and Blumhardt a native of Württemberg, but a layman, also a secretary of the Association for Christianity in 1801 f., "a personality who believed and achieved the incredible" (Hadorn, 493), formed the focal point with his organization. In 1804 the Basel Bible Society came into being. In 1815 in the castle Beuggen am Rhein, which the Grand Duke of Baden put at their disposal under the leadership of Christian Heinrich Zeller (1779-1860), a seminary was organized for the training of teachers for the schools of the poor and a rescue home for neglected children of the poor. In 1840 Spittler's favorite work, St. Chrischona, near Basel, was founded as an institution for the training of workers for home mission work, in 1865-83 and 1890-1909 under the leadership of Heinrich and Dora Rappard (1837-1909 and 1842-1923). The school at Beuggen educated many a Mennonite, among them Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.; 1800-79) and Michael Löwenberg (q.v.; 1821-74), the founder of the school at Weierhof (q.v.). "Between Zeller and the Mennonites there was a fraternal relationship and mutual confidence. He never entered into theological arguments with them, but he told the Mennonites, 'If you cannot decide to have your children baptized, you should at least bring them to Jesus in a ceremonial service, and ask Him to bless them' (Thiersch, 676)." The Pilgermission school at St. Chrischona educated the Mennonite elders Fritz Goldschmitt, Samuel Nussbaumer, Samuel Gerber, Hans Rüfenacht, and Theo Loosli of Switzerland, and Pierre Sommer of Montbéliard, France, and in Germany the ministers Johannes Hirschler of Monsheim (q.v.), Matthias Pohl (q.v.; 1860-1934) of Sembach (q.v.), Michael Landes (q.v.), Jakob Hege (q.v.), Gysbert van der Smissen (1859-1923), Emanuel Landes, the son of the above Michael Landes, and Christian Schnebele, the superintendent of Thomashof (q.v.). E.C.

2. Germany. In Württemberg leading spirits in the movement at this time were Ludwig Hofacker (1798-1828, converted 1816), whose sermons were much read by German Mennonites (even in South Russia, where they contributed to the rise of the Mennonite Brethren), the poet Albert Knapp (1798-1864), and J. C. Blumhardt (1805-80). Noteworthy is the establishment of the millennialistic community of Korntal near Stuttgart (1819), also the emigration of separatistic groups of revivalistic type to South Russia about 1843, among whom was Eduard Wüst (q.v.; 1817-59), who was a major influence in the rise of the Mennonite Brethren.

In Berlin the movement found leaders in several professors at the universities of Berlin (August Neander, 1789-1850, E. W. Hengstenberg, 1802-69) and Halle (August Tholuck, 1799-1877). In Hamburg the Mennonite deacon J. G. van der Smissen (1746-1829), influenced by the bookseller Friedrich Perthes, became much involved, serving as secretary of the Hamburg Bible Society (founded 1814). He was also connected with Johann Gossner (1773-1858). In the Lower Rhine-Westphalia region Barmen became a center, where a mission school was started in 1828, which was later attended by a number of Mennonites (Heinrich Dirks, 1842-1915, the first Russian Mennonite missionary. Thomas Löwenberg, 1849-1928, preacher at Weierhof and Ibersheim, and Ernst Regehr, elder at Rosenort in West Prussia and later at El Ombu, Uruguay). Early leaders of the movement in this general area were the Krummachers (Friedrich Adolf, 1767-1845, and Friedrich Wilhelm, 1796-1868). Isaak Molenaar (q.v.; 1776-1834), preacher at Leiden, Holland, 1813-18 and from 1818 on at Crefeld, was influenced by the movement.

The imported Anglo-Saxon Methodist (1831), Baptist (1834), Plymouth Brethren (1848), and Evangelical Association (1850) groups prospered in Germany largely as a result of the revival movement, as did also the Free Evangelical Church, which entered Germany from Geneva via Lyons in 1854. The Baptist Seminary in Hamburg-Horn was attended by a number of Mennonites from Russia (Jacob Kroeker studied here 1894-98, J. G. Wiens 1899-1903, and Abraham Warkentin 1912-15). (See also Pietism.) E.C.

* * *

3. Netherlands. About 1820, influenced by revivalist movements in Geneva and the canton of Vaud in Switzerland, and by Scotch and English revivalism, a religious revival arose in the Netherlands, which is usually known as the "Réveil."

The Réveil was opened by the Dutch poet and historian Willem Bilderdijk (1756-1831), who continuously and fervently attacked the halfheartedness and lack of Biblical fundamentalism of the Reformed Church of Holland. Bilderdijk became the spiritual leader of a number of close followers, among whom were the converted Jews, Isaac da Costa (1798-1860), who in 1823 published Bezwaren tegen den geest der eeuw (Complaints Against the Spirit of this Age), attacking political and religious liberalism quite in the style of Bilderdijk, and Abraham Capadose (1795-1874), both of Amsterdam. The Réveil, which at first had its center at Amsterdam, also had a group of followers at The Hague from about 1832. Its aim was to fight rationalism and liberalism, with a plea "back to the Bible"; hence their leaders conducted numerous Bible courses (particularly da Costa) and founded Sunday schools for children. Great stress was laid upon the experience of knowing Jesus Christ as the Saviour and Redeemer. In the large cities missions were started, rousing the people to personal conversion. The Réveil had a typically pietistic background, which, though distrusted by da Costa and others, was never denounced, and predominated in the activities of Jan de Liefde (q.v.) and others.

The Réveil movement gathered its followers particularly from the upper classes. From about 1830 it took a keen interest in charity, at this time greatly neglected by the churches, and much was done for the relief of social needs. The "Christian Friends," as they often called themselves, made contact with kindred spirits abroad and often followed their examples. Thus in 1844 a deaconess hospital was opened in Holland on the pattern of the Theodor Flidner's deaconess house at Kaiserswerth, Germany. The Réveil also prepared the way for the founding of special Christian schools.

In 1834 a number of members left the Dutch Reformed Church, to restore the church on the basis of Calvinism as formulated in the resolutions of the national Dutch Reformed synod held at Dordrecht in 1619. This caused a difference of opinion in the Réveil group, some of whom joined the separatists, who founded a new Reformed church, while others held to the (old) Reformed church, as did da Costa, who said that their position should not be juridical but medical ("Together we have become sick, together we should recover"), hence no separation. After 1850 the Réveil lost much of its strength and influence, but its adherents continued their activities and meetings until after 1865.

Although the Réveil as a movement was favored particularly by the Reformed, a number of Mennonites were actively engaged in it. The most prominent of these was Willem de Clercq (1795-1844; q.v.), of Amsterdam, who was for many years a close friend of da Costa. Others were Willem Messchaert (1790-1844; q.v.), of Rotterdam, Jan ter Borg (1782-1847; q.v.), a Mennonite minister at Amsterdam, and in later times Jan de Liefde (1814-69; q.v.) and Pieter van der Goot (1817-77; q.v.), who was also a Mennonite minister at Amsterdam.

The Mennonites who became interested in the Réveil were all more or less dissatisfied with the spiritual atmosphere of the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood. As was also the case in the Reformed Church, spiritual life in the church was at this time at a low level, the sermons being rationalistic or moralistic lectures rather than evangelical messages. Most of the Mennonite friends of the Réveil left the Mennonite Church—Messchaert in 1829; de Clercq, who from 1825 took a great interest in the development of the Reformed Church and had his children baptized, officially terminated his membership in the Mennonite Church in 1831; ter Borg resigned his office in 1829, but did not leave the church; de Liefde left the Mennonite pulpit and his congregation in 1845; van der Goot tried to realize some of the Réveil principles in the Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam. vdZ.

Ernst Crous, "Mennonitentum und Pietismus," Theologische Zeitschrift VIII (1952) 279-96; idem, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreussischen Mennoniten . . . 1772-1945," Gesch.-Bl., 1954, 7-29; W. Hadorn, Geschichte des Pietismus in den Schweizerischen Reformierten Kirchen (Constance, 1901); Ludwig Tiesmeyer, Die Erweckungsbewegung in Deutschland während des XIX. Jahrhunderts I-IV (Kassel, 1901-12); M. E. Kluit, Het Réveil in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1936); ML III, 482-84; W. Goeters, Die Vorbereitung des Pietismus in der Reformierten Kirche . . . (Leipzig, 1911).

Revival Meetings (German, Erweckungsversammlungen), a name given in North America to a series of meetings, usually one or two weeks in length, although they may continue as long as six to eight weeks, held in Mennonite and other Protestant churches for the purpose of stimulating spiritual life and activity among professing Christians. The name is often confused with "evangelistic meetings" (see Evangelism), whose ostensible purpose is to win unbelievers to faith in Christ. Often the two purposes are combined and accordingly the names are used interchangeably. Usually an outside preacher is brought into a congregation who is expected to preach on the great central themes of the Gospel and to urge more complete consecration, or renewal of careless members, in addition to appealing for unbelievers to accept Christ as Saviour. Sometimes a song leader or a musical team accompanies the preacher.

Revival meetings first entered the Mennonite churches in North America through outside influences, and usually against opposition. It is not clear whether Daniel Hoch (q.v.) of Vineland, Ont. (1806-78), who was ordained in the Mennonite Church (MC), then for a time (1850-60) joined the Oberholtzer (GCM) group and finally the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, introduced revival meetings, and if so in which group, certainly not in his original congregation. The same is the case with William Gehman (q.v.), founder of the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.) in Pennsylvania, who was expelled by the Oberholtzer group in 1857. The first revival meetings in the M.C. group were held in 1872 by Daniel Brenneman (q.v.) of Goshen, Ind., assisted by John F. Funk (q.v.) at Masontown, Pa. In 1875 he was expelled by his church in Indiana, apparently for too vigorous promotion of new methods of church work including revivalism, and led the formation of a new Mennonite body, with Solomon Eby (q.v.) of Ontario, which ultimately became the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (q.v.) and which used the revivalistic method extensively and effectively.

John S. Coffman (q.v.; 1848-99) was the pioneer in the use of the revivalistic method in the Mennonite Church (MC), beginning in 1879 when he moved to Elkhart, Ind. By 1900 the method was widely accepted in the church, and by 1920 it had become practically a universal custom for each congregation and each church college to have at least one series of revival meetings annually.

The Mennonite Brethren, who brought the revivalistic spirit with them from Russia, have followed a similar practice. Groups influenced by either of these two groups or drawing their inspiration directly from American Protestant revivalism have followed a similar pattern. These include the Conservative Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonites, the E.M.B. and K.M.B. groups, and lately the Church of God in Christ Mennonites and the Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde). In the G.C.M. group some congregations have also followed this pattern (e.g., Berne, Ind.).

The revivalistic procedures borrowed from the outside were usually altered and adapted somewhat to suit the Mennonite genius and spirit.

In recent years two organized revival efforts have appeared in the Mennonite Church (MC), which have conducted inter-Mennonite revival meetings in numerous larger Mennonite communities as well as in the M.C. congregations. These are Brunk Revivals, Inc. (q.v.), founded in 1951 by George R. Brunk, Jr., and Christian Laymen's Tent Evangelism, Inc., founded in 1952 by Howard Hammer, later led by Myron Augsburg. Both organizations aim to evangelize unbelievers as well as to revive church members, but the major effort usually turns out to be the latter. H.S.B.

Rexton Mennonite Church (MC), Rexton, Mich., was established in 1947 under the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board. The membership was 34 in 1957, with Joe Swartz as pastor. M.G.

Reyer Dirks, an Anabaptist martyr, a skipper by trade. Having been a member of the Anabaptist group for three years he was executed at Amsterdam on Aug. 16, 1550, after "terrible torture." NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 104, E 502; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 364; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 158 f.; ML I, 451.

Reyer Egberts, an Anabaptist martyr, died at the stake with five brethren at Amsterdam on Aug. 6, 1552, having been brutally tortured on June 28. During his trial and torture he admitted that he had left the Roman Catholic Church; he had not gone to the confessional for 15 or 16 years and had not taken the holy sacrament for 5 or 6 years. Reyser Egberts had not yet been baptized on the confession of his faith, because Gielis (Gillis van Aken, q.v.) had refused to baptize him, saying that he had not adequately examined and studied the Scriptures. Reyser was a citizen of Amsterdam and a weaver by trade. (Mart. Mir. D 142 f., E 536; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 160 f., 309; ML I, 507.) vdZ.

Reyer Willemsz (Reynier Franchynmaker, i.e., maker of parchment), of Leiden, Holland, was arrested in 1542 at Leiden, when a number of Anabaptist books by David Joris (q.v.) were found in his house. After trial and torture, in which he admitted that he had printed and distributed "heretical books," the trial was delayed because of a jurisdictional conflict, between the city magistrates of Leiden and the Court of Holland at The Hague. On Oct. 19, 1545, Maria of Hungary, regent for the King of Spain at Brussels, authorized the Court of Holland to bring the trial to a close. There is no further information about this case. Probably Reyser was executed; but it is also possible that he died in prison. It is not clear whether Reyser Willemsz was an Anabaptist. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 257, 261, 330 f.; DB 1864, 145; Mellink, Wederdopers, 205, 417 f.; N.N.B.Wb. V, 1030 f.

Reyers, Johannes (Jan), d. 1680, a practicing physician, was from 1661 until his death a preacher of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam, Holland. His congregation merged with the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) congregation in 1668. Reyers wrote Kort verloop van de Nootsakelyke voorwaarde der Saligheid (Amsterdam, 1672) and Paulus en Jacobus eens gevoelende in de Leer der Regtvaardigheid (Amsterdam, 1677). Reyers' collection of books became the basis of the present Amsterdam Mennonite Library. The Amsterdam Mennonite Archives have his autobiography. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 771, 805; Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 83; ML III, 486.

Reyn Christelijck Vermaeck was the title of a Mennonite hymnbook published at Haarlem in 1672, of which there is apparently no copy extant. vdZ.

Martin Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 88; DJ 1837, 65.

Reyniere van der Vere, of Veere, Dutch province of Zeeland, is said to have been an Anabaptist preacher, active in the province of Zeeland in 1534. Particulars are lacking. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 318.) vdZ.

Reynskes (Reintjes, Rynskes), Harmen (Harmen R. van Overwij(c)k) (d. 1737 at Amsterdam), a Dutch Mennonite preacher at Warns, Friesland, then from 1689 at the neighboring village of Molkwerum, where he became involved in a quarrel with his colleagues Homme Heeres and Ruurd Durks, the preacher at Warns, because of his leaning toward the Reformed doctrine of predestination, was finally removed from office by vote of the congregation on Feb. 2, 1695, and retired to Hindelopen. In November 1696 he was called to the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation after publishing his defense, titled Een verklaringe over het ongenoegeen der soo genoemde Doopsgezinde Christenen in Molqueern. Over haren Leeraer Harmen Reynskes (Workum, 1695, reprinted Amsterdam, 1696). In Amsterdam he served 1696-1716 and 1717-29, and then retired. In 1716 he was suspended from his office because of a quarrel with his colleague David van Heyst (q.v.), who resigned that year. In 1717 Reynskes was allowed to take up his office again. He was rather conservative and somewhat disputatious, in discord with many people within and without the congregation. One of these opponents was Cornelius van Huyzen (q.v.), who in 1715 attacked van Overwijk in De grondslag van de Leere der Doopsgezinde Christenen, verdedigd . . . tegen H.R.V.O. Reynskes published a number of books: the funeral sermon he delivered for his colleague Samuel Apostool (q.v.), De Heerlyckheit van een gestorven Gunstgenoot des Heeren (Amsterdam, 1699), Onderzoek over de Natuur van het Leeraer Ampt (Amsterdam, 1712), Eenige Vraagen en antwoorden over het verschillend gevoelen in de Doopsgezinde Gemeente de Zon (Amsterdam, 1717), Over den H. Evangelist Mattheus, followed by Over de Instelling en bediening van den H. Waterdoop (Amsterdam, 1722), Gods Alwetende en Voorsienige Bestiering aangetoont (Amsterdam, 1727), De Hoogste Trap, in de Godsdienstige Deugd, namentlyk de Liefde (Amsterdam, 1730), Onderzoek over de volstrektetheit van het Goddelijke Zyn en Werkinge (Amsterdam, 1726, reprint 1731).

NEFF, vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 927; DB 1895, 111 ff.; 1898, 78, 80, 88, 99 f.; 1901, 103 note; Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijver (Amsterdam, 1745) 73 f.; ML III, 331.

Reynx (Renicx), Huyte (Hoyte), a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Hoyte Rienx (Renicx).

Reytse Aysesz (Reitse Aitses), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned in Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on April 23, 1574. On Sept. 18, 1573, he left Beetsterzwaag, where he lived, to visit his parents in Oldeboorn (q.v.), and was there arrested by the magistrate Andries Grijpen (Gryf), having been betrayed by a friend. He was imprisoned in Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland. The Martyrs' Mirror contains an exact account of his trial and his confession before his inquisitors. Again and again in painful detail they cross-questioned him about the most important articles of faith, especially baptism and communion. Reytsse Aysesz confessed that he had never been in the Catholic church for confessions of sins and the holy sacrament, and that he agreed with Menno Simons' doctrine of the Incarnation; i.e., that Jesus had not taken His flesh from Mary. But he repeatedly embarrassed his opponents with his ready replies, amazing them by his knowledge and understanding of the Bible. No threats or tortures shook his steadfastness; nor did the most insidious questions of his opponents confuse him.

Reytse's letter to his mother shows a victorious readiness to suffer death: "Finally I . . . said very joyfully, 'Do what you will and you can answer for before God, for I do not want to forsake my faith, for either life or death.'" To the bishop he replied to the charge that he based his faith on the doctrine of Menno, who was a seducer and vagabond: "I rely not upon Menno or human doctrine, but only upon the Word of God; in this I desire by the help of the Lord to live and to die." Finally they questioned him anew on all the articles, and again he confessed his faith. Thereupon his sentence was read: because he was a heretic, unwilling to be instructed in the regulations of the holy church, he was committed into the hands of the judges (executioners). The assertion of the bishop that "he would rather fast two weeks with bread and water than pass sentence upon me" betrays qualms of conscience, as does also the act of the bishop's commissioner when he washed his hands "like Pilate, and thought he would be clean of my blood and that I must now await the verdict."

Reytse urged his fellow believers to be steadfast and consoled his parents with the glory awaiting him; he was deeply concerned that his two sisters and his young brother accept the faith. He also comforted his wife, from whom he was separated at the age of twenty-five after a marriage of two years, and urged her to be steadfast. He tried to convert his fellow prisoners by proclaiming God's Word to them. While he was being taken to the torture tower he sang the hymn "Ick roepe u, o hemelsche Vader, aen, wilt myn geloove stercken" (I call on Thee, O heavenly Father; wilt Thou strengthen my faith). This was a familiar Mennonite hymn, and was later included in the Dutch Mennonite hymnals Groot Hoorns Liedtboeck (q.v.) and Kleyn Hoorns Liet-boeck (q.v.).

The Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais mentions a booklet written in prison by Reytse Aysesz, Sommige Belijdingen, schriftelijke Sent-brieven ende christelicke Vermaningen. This assertion is, however, not very probable, for the booklet closes with an account of the execution and two hymns composed to commemorate the death of Reytse: "Wilt aenhoren een liedeken recht, men salt u gaen verbreden" (Listen to a song; you will be informed), and of Douwe Eeuwouts. The fact is that the letters and the account of the execution were gathered soon after his death and were published as a booklet about 1577, probably by Gillis Roman at Haarlem. Only one copy of this very valuable booklet is extant; it is found in the library of the Dutch Association for Literature at Leiden, Holland; the Amsterdam Mennonite archives have a handwritten copy of it. Most of this material has been included in all the Dutch martyr books from 1615 on, including the Martyrs' Mirror, which contains six letters written by Reytse Aysesz—two to his father in Oldeboorn, who was a member of the church, one to his mother, also a Mennonite, two to his wife, and a general letter about his trial. This letter to his friends contains the interesting information that the Mennonites sang hymns (liedekens), and not the Psalms as the Reformed did. The Martyrs' Mirror also gives an account of his sufferings and death. In a letter not found in the Martyrs' Mirror Reytse Aysesz thanks a brother in F. (probably Franeker, q.v.) for sending a book to him in prison, and a brother in L. (Leeuwarden) for a gift of brandy, cake, sweet wine, and wheat bread. (Mart. Mir. D 677-91, E 994-1004; Bibliographie I, 19-29, 646 f.; DB 1865, 68; ML I, 100 f.) E.H., vDZ.

Rheensche (Rhenensche) Veen: see Veenendaal.

Rhegius, Urban (1489-1541), a Lutheran theologian, reformer of Augsburg (q.v.), Germany. He attended the University of Freiburg and like Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) went to Ingolstadt with Johann Eck. In 1517 he was crowned imperial orator and poet laureate by Emperor Maximilian, settled in Constance, became the good friend of Johannes Faber (q.v.), and upon his recommendation was transferred to Augsburg in 1520. Here he soon became active in the cause of the Reformation and had to leave the city in 1521-24. Upon his return he was a zealous and active Lutheran. The Anabaptists he persecuted without mercy. He bears the principal blame for the expulsion of Hans Denk (q.v.). In 1530 he was compelled by order of Charles V to leave the city. He went to Celle and there promoted the Lutheran cause until his death. He also attacked the Anabaptists with his pen. In 1527 he wrote the pamphlet Wider den neuen Taufforden against Jakob Dachser's Ein Göttlich und grundtlich Offenbarung von wahrhaftigen wiederteuffern. Other writings along this line were: Zwen wunderseltzam sendbrieff zweyer Widertäufer an ire Rotten gen Augspurg gesandt, Verantwortung aller irrthum diser obgenanten brieff durch Urbanum Rhegium (1528); Ein sendbrieff Hans Huthen etwa ains furnemen Vorsteers im wiedertauß ordenn (1528); Widderlegung der Münsterischen neuen Valentinianer und Donatisten Bekenntnus an die Christen zu Osnabruck in Westfalen, Mit einer Vorrede Doctor Martin Luthers (Wittenberg, 1535); De restitutione Israelitici, contra omnes omnium seculorum chiliastes (1536); Ein bedencken der Lüneburgischen, Ob einer Oberkeyt gezymme die wiederteuffer oder andere ketzer zum rechten glauben zu dringen . . . (1538); Wie man die falschen Propheten erkennen, ja greiffen mag, Ein predig zy Mynden jnn Westfalen gethan (Brunswick, 1539).

NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1886, 89; S. Calvary & Co., Verzeichniss seltener und werthvoller Werke (Berlin, 1870) 56 f.; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 220; Ludwig Keller, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Hans Denk) (Leipzig, 1882) 102, 122 ff.; G. Uhlhorn, Urbanus Rhegius, Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Elberfeld, 1862); ML III, 486 f.

Rheinbund (Rhine Union), a federation of several German states established in July 1806 by Napoleon, the area left (west) of the Rhine having already been incorporated into France. The participant states, including Bavaria (q.v.), Württemberg (q.v.), Baden (q.v.), Hesse (q.v.), and Nassau (q.v.), were required to furnish troops. Universal military service was enforced, alleviated by the permission to hire a substitute actually meant for the upper classes. From this point on, the Mennonite principle of non-resistance was gradually but steadily lost. (ML III, 487.) E.C.

Rheinfelderhof, a large farm in the Upper Alsace, about 12 miles southeast of Colmar, which was the seat of a Mennonite congregation from the 18th century until 1924, when a meetinghouse was built at Neuf-Brisach (q.v.), which then became the center of the congregation. A number of the members are still living at the Rheinfelderhof. vdZ.

Rheingau, an area in the government district of Wiesbaden, formerly Nassau (q.v.), Germany. As early as 1537 there was an Anabaptist congregation at Lorch (q.v.), led by a bishop, Peter Nyerup, of Calcar. Toward the end of the 18th century Amish families settled here around Eltville, the principal town of the area, but left after 1880. The Dutch Naamlijst (1765 ff.) names as preachers: Bantz Güngerich in the Nassau-Siegen congregation; Valentin Dahlem (q.v.) and David Steiner in the Nassau-Usingen congregation (Mosbach near Wiesbaden); Peter Schantz, Hans Naftziger, and Peter Unsicher in the Nassau-Weilburg congregation. About 1830 a family of eight was living at the Eberbach monastery and another of the same size at Neuhoof. In 1894 Spielmann (Annalen, 143) listed the following families: at Massenheim a Müller family of six; at Eschborn three families, 22 persons, named Dahlem, Hiestand, and Christoph; at Schafhof a Krehbiel (Stauffer) family of five; at Wiesbaden three families, 16 persons, named Dahlem, Hüttwohl, and Steiner; at Rosenköppl the Dahlem family of eight; at Schierstein a Gossman family of seven; at Mosbach three families, 18 persons, named Borkholder, Kopper, and Kaltwasser. The statistics of Hesse-Nassau show for the Rheingau 22 Mennonites (Amish) in 1871, 29 in 1880, 6 in 1890, 5 in 1910, and one in 1925. E.C.

Ernst Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925) 131 f.; C. Spielmann, "Die Mennoniten und ihre Bedeutung für die Kultur in Nassau," Annalen des Vereins f. Nassauische Altertumskunde und Geschichtsforschung XXVI (1894) 137-44 and (somewhat shortened) Menn. Bl., 1895, 19-21, 27-29, 36 f.; Naamlijst, issues of 1765-1802; F. W. E. Roth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer am Mittelrhein, insbesondere im Rheingau," Menn. Bl., 1893, 89-91; ML III, 487.

Rheingrafenstein, a village near Kreuznach in the former Prussian Rhine Province, now Rhineland-Palatinate, Germany, is named in the Dutch Naamlijst of 1766 as the seat of the Mennonite congregation of Rheingrafenstein, Erbesbüdesheim, and Weierhof. Services were held weekly alternately at the Rheingrafenstein castle and Dimrotherhof. Ulrich Ellenberger was the elder of this congregation in 1743-67. In 1768 the congregation divided into its three component parts, each with its own deacons and preachers, but served by one elder, Jakob Galle of Uffhofen, who was ordained in 1767. In 1769 the baptized membership numbered 32. The preacher of the Rheingrafenstein congregation was Christian Moser (d. 1790), who was ordained as preacher in 1766 and as elder in 1782. Jakob Schwalter was a preacher of the Rheingrafenstein congregation from 1774 and elder from 1805 until after 1820. In November 1816 the seat of the Rheingrafenstein congregation was transferred to Neudorferhof (q.v.). The membership of the Neudorferhof congregation in 1956 was 138 including the children. The pastor was Gerhard Hein, of Sembach (q.v.), who was also serving the Aldeiningen (q.v.), congregation. E.C.

Naamlijst, issues of 1766-1802; Gesch.-Bl., 1955, 24; Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 9, p. 138; ML III, 487 f.

Rheinische Missionsgesellschaft, a missionary association founded at Mettmann, Germany, on Sept. 28, 1828, by the union of three smaller societies of the Lower Rhine area—Elberfeld, Barmen, and Cologne. It maintained a mission school at Barmen and mission stations in South and Southwest Africa and among the Chinese in New Guinea. In addition its missionaries, doctors, teachers, and deaconesses served the Batak (q.v.) and Nias churches in Sumatra, Nias, and Mentawai. For the Mennonites this missionary association was particularly significant in that a number of Mennonite preachers and missionaries received their training in Barmen; e.g., Thomas Löwenberg and Abraham Hirschler, and the missionaries Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), Gerhard Nikkel, and Nikolai Wiebe. On Sumatra, where the Association developed an extensive work among the Batak, it was closely associated with the former Dutch Mennonite mission. When Heinrich Dirks left the field in 1881 Tilmann Irle (q.v.) of the Association looked after the work at Pakantan (q.v.) until 1887, and at the death of Peter Nachtigal (q.v.) in 1928 the management of Pakantan was taken over until 1940 by native workers under the direction of the Association and since then under the direction of the Batak church. A considerable number of Mennonites from Russia attended the mission school at Barmen. NEFF, G.M.

Alfred Bonn, Ein Jahrhundert Rheinische Missionsgesellschaft (Barmen, 1928); Eduard Kriele, Geschichte der Rheinischen Missionsgesellschaft I (Barmen, 1928); Menn. Bl., 1889, 101; ML III, 488.

Rheinpfalz: see Palatinate.

Rhenish Hesse: see Rhineland.

Rheydt, a city (pop. 45,124) in the Rhine Province of Prussia, Germany (since 1929 part of Gladbach-Rheydt), formerly under the dominion of the duchy of Jülich (q.v.); here, depending on the greater or smaller dependence of the governor upon the duke, the Anabaptists for longer or shorter periods found refuge from oppression in the adjoining Jülich and Cologne territories. The sources on the Mennonites in Rheydt are rather meager until the expulsion of the Anabaptists; for this occurrence there is full information. It would be most peculiar if the populace of the district had been untouched by the preaching of the Anabaptists and if there had been no Anabaptists in Rheydt in the 16th century, when numerous Anabaptists were living in the region all around. Not until the end of the 16th century does the veil lift somewhat.

Otto von Bylandt (q.v.), the Baron of Rheydt, confidential adviser and chancellor of Duke William the Rich of Jülich, was eager to make Rheydt an imperial city, and thus became involved in a legal battle with the duke. He also oppressed his subjects with additional taxes and services. This course led to lawsuits in the imperial court, in the course of which the Mennonites of Rheydt are mentioned. In 1584 Peter auf der Heuren is called an Anabaptist. The defense statement by Bylandt's lawyer in 1594-95 states that "among the plaintiffs [the subjects] there are some who are suspect of Anabaptism, who have resisted their proper and inherited government" (since the Anabaptists did not wish to be subject to any temporal authority). Otto von Bylandt's son, Arnold Adrian, who remained Catholic, summoned five witnesses to report on Sept. 26, 1594, about the Anabaptists in the area. These witnesses named more than 25 persons who had for a year or two been "running to the corner preachers" and avoiding the parish church in Rheydt. In Alitgen Cüper's house the people of the Gladbach area and other neighboring places were meeting in broad daylight. Their singing could be heard daily, especially in the evening. One witness testified that he had often seen these persons passing through the courtyard at night toward Hockstein, to the Gladbach windmill, to "Hanssen Newissen" sons, who were acknowledged Anabaptists (Hans Neues, of Gladbach-Lürrip, was the ancestor of the Mennonite Neues family in Crefeld), or to Wetschewell (Wolter of Wetschewell signed the Concept of Cologne on May 1, 1591, for the Odenkirchen—q.v.—congregation). The persons named were, however, suspected only of Anabaptism. Thus it happened that at the Hochgeding of Jan. 29, 1595, the village neighbors pointed out only one, namely, "Thomas Velbereiter as unbaptized." These were all statements in a lawsuit in which the opponents were trying to blame one another. In 1599, when the Anabaptists in Gladbach were once more subject to severe oppression, several fled into the domain of Rheydt. The baron was suspected of having received them in his domain and giving them shelter in the castle. The bailiff of Jülich with his police fell upon Rheydt to take back what the Gladbach Mennonites had brought with them. The report names particularly Clasz Wolters (see Claes Wolters Kops), the "chief preacher and leader of the Gladbach congregation," who was in Sittard (i.e., Sittard Street in München-Gladbach). He is the same "Clasz Wolters, the preacher," who according to the register of Mennonites in Gladbach in 1622, lived outside the parish of Gladbach. He was apparently the son of "Herr Wolter," who was pastor of Odenkirchen (q.v.) in 1540, and later preached in Hüls, Kempen (q.v.), and Crefeld (q.v.), the forest ranger (Waldläufer) "with the long white beard."

With the beginning of the Reformed church records in Rheydt it is noted that Mennonites were transferring their membership to the Reformed Church, but the minutes of the consistory also show transfers to the Mennonites. This proves that in the first half of the 17th century there were Mennonites in Rheydt, some of whom belonged to native families, others of whom had married into Rheydt, or had immigrated. The deacons (Armenpfleger) mentioned in the court records of Rheydt in 1646-48 were members of the Rheydt and Gladbach Mennonite congregations. The Mennonites of Rheydt were at that time probably united in a single congregation with those of Gladbach. Theunes Comes, who signed the Concept of Cologne in 1591 as the delegate of the Mennonites of Gladbach and who was named in 1611 as a preacher of the Mennonite congregation in Gladbach, also owned property in Rheydt.

The decree of the Duke of Jülich of 1652, on the basis of which the Mennonites were expelled from Gladbach, was ineffectual in Rheydt. A list of "Mennonites staying in the domain of Rheydt" in 1664 named only four persons who owned a home. On Nov. 6, 1669, the Duke wrote to the Baron of Rheydt "on account of the abomination of Anabaptism," which had "again slipped secretly into the district of Rheydt," complaining that the Baron did not seriously take steps against "the damned sect," even when the Count Palatine renewed his demand in 1658. Indeed (said the letter), he admitted the Mennonite refugees from the vicinity and gave shelter to some in the castle grounds. The Mennonites from Dahlen (the present München-Gladbach-Rheindahlen) had in 1652 escaped to the imperial domain of Wickrath (q.v.). In the 1670's they were compelled to leave this place of refuge and settled in Rheydt and in Dohr, in Zoppenbroich, a domain of the Elector of Cologne. Now the Mennonites in Rheydt were so numerous that they could organize a congregation of their own. In the church records of the Mennonites of the Lower Rhine (especially Goch) there are certificates signed by the preachers of the congregations from which they came. Thus on March 11, 1690, Maryken Arents, daughter of Arent Claessen (van Aken) from Rheydt, brought a certificate to Goch which was signed by Jans Peter Camp and Derck Kouters (or Koeters), "preachers of our Mennonite congregation in Reid." Thus it is known that Rheydt had a firmly established Mennonite congregation in 1690, with a significant membership, some of whose members stemmed from Rheydt, others from their former home towns, frequently persons expelled from other places finally coming to rest in Rheydt. Here they acquired a home, paid a protection fee to the baron, and were quietly and industriously engaged as weavers and merchants.

This way of making their living became their doom. Their Reformed neighbors felt the competition and were angered by the fact that they had to perform so much the more guard duty at the castle and turnpikes, whereas the Mennonites were excused from this service upon payment of a fee. Then on May 16, 1694, about fifty houses of the town of Rheydt, including the monastery building, were destroyed by fire. The Mennonites were accused of arson. In Düsseldorf lived the splendor-loving Elector Palatine John William, whose conscience had been alerted by his confessor Splinter to consider the extirpation of the Mennonites as a work pleasing to God. His councillors made it clear to him that in this matter "100,000 Oberland guilders with interest would be won by His Highness." The time was well chosen. In 1692 a quarrel had broken out between the branches of the Bylandt family concerning the succession in Rheydt. A factitious letter from the Rheydt community arrived, making charges against the Mennonites, and the elector took vigorous action. He struck a final blow, which he hoped would finally clear his land of the "damned sect." A sad picture of religious and social intolerance unrolled in a rapid flow.

In the night of July 16, 1694, the officials of the elector suddenly arrived in Rheydt with 200 peasant marksmen, led by Baron Hermann von Bongart of Paffendorf an der Erft, Palatine privy councillor and bailiff at Kaster. The Mennonites were driven together in the village, struck and kicked until blood flowed. The next evening they were taken in chains to Jüchen together with the women and children of the seven families living in the castle, whose men had fled to Crefeld. In Jüchen they were cross-examined and threatened with death if they refused to become Catholic. But their lives would be saved if they would make a contribution of 12,000 talers to the elector. They finally agreed upon 8,000 talers. But since they were unable to find security for the money in such a short time, the prisoners were chained on Aug. 1, 1694, and taken to Paffendorf on the Erft and there given unworthy lodging and tortured in many ways.

In Rheydt their possessions were sold—houses, land, cattle, furniture, and looms. Their property was estimated by their account books and confiscated. The duke received his share in bolts of linen, etc. Meanwhile William (III, q.v.) of Orange, Stadholder of the Netherlands and King of England, who as Duke of Mörs was also sovereign of Crefeld, came to the aid of the prisoners (see Mörs). But before his aid became effective, the prisoners managed to collect in Crefeld the 8,000 Talers required "for expenses." The money was delivered by Govert Remkes (q.v.) and Wilhelm von der Leyen (q.v.), both citizens of Crefeld. In their presence the seventeen prisoners were interrogated for the last time, to make certain that they were subjects of the Duke of Jülich and that the conduct of the duke was therefore legal. They were given a receipt and released on Aug. 29, 1694. Most of them went to Crefeld and with the aid of William of Orange received back the property that had been sold (decree of Aug. 17, 1697). (The fate of these Mennonites is given in detail in the article Instrumentum publicum.) A number of Mennonites from Rheydt went to the Netherlands, where they were aided by the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs and the Conference (Sociëteit) of Friesland in settling in the province of Groningen. In the 1720's some Mennonites living in Crefeld sold the last of their possessions in Rheydt.

Since 1694 no Mennonites have lived in Rheydt. For one hundred years the town sank into economic insignificance, while Crefeld moved toward its great prosperity brought about by the Mennonites. W.N.

Instrumentum publicum wegen desjenigen, was bey denen Churff. Pfälzischen Herrn Commissarien gegen die Protestante Mennoniste zu Rheydt in Anno 1694 in facta vorgenommen und sich zugezogen (Crefeld, 1696), reprinted in Gem.-Kal., 1933, 126-31; Dutch translation by Godschalk Godschalks (Crefeld, 1771), English translation by N. B. Grubb (Philadelphia, 1909); Friedrich Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); Wilhelm Niepoth, Zur Geschichte der Mennoniten in Rheydt (n.d.); Rembert, Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1899); Ludwig Schmitz, Geschichte der Herrschaft Rheydt (Rheydt, 1897); Ernst Weydmann, "Ueber die Vertreibung der Mennoniten aus Rheydt und deren Einwanderung in Crefeld im Jahre 1694," in Menn. Bl., 1891, 21, 22, 25, 26; Inw. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1427, 1749; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 197 f.; ML III, 494-96.

Rhineland (German, Rheinland), since 1815 divided among the Prussian Rhine Province, Rhenish Hesse (Rhein Hessen), the Bavarian Rhenish Palatinate (Rheinpfalz), and since 1945 divided into North Rhine-Westphalia and Rhineland-Palatinate. For Rhineland-Palatinate see Palatinate.

1. Rhine Province, since 1824 embracing the Rhenish possessions of Prussia; the former principalities of Cologne and Trier, the former duchies of Cleve (q.v.) and Jülich (q.v., but without the Born district, which in 1814 was ceded to the Netherlands), Berg, the gravures of Mörs with Crefeld (q.v.) and Wied with Neuwied (q.v.), and imperial cities including Aachen (q.v.) and Wetzlar (see Lower Rhine). The total Mennonite population in 1812-27 of about 1,200 in this area were enumerated as follows: in the government district of Cleve (later a part of Düsseldorf) a total of 141 Mennonites in 1812, the city of Cleve having 51, Goch 39, Issum 8, Kalkar 9, Xanten 2, Wesel 4, Emmerich (1815) 23, and Rees (1815) 5. The government district of Düsseldorf (original area) had in 1819 a total of 720, distributed in Crefeld with 696, the rest scattered. In the government district of Cologne there were in 1817 two Mennonites. In the district of Coblenze there were in 1827 a total of 278 Mennonites, the Neuwied area having 218, Altenkirchen area 12, Braunsfels area 27, and Kreuznach area 21. The government district of Aachen had in 1827 four Mennonite families, one living in the Heinsberg area, two in the Aachen (Burtscheid) area, and one in the Düren area. The government district of Trier had in 1827 a total of 15 Mennonite families, one living in each of the areas of Wittlich, Trier, Saarbourg, Merzig, and Ottweiler, three in Saarlouis, and seven in Saarbrücken.

In 1925 the Düsseldorf government district had a total of 1,221 Mennonites living as follows: Crefeld 791, München-Gladbach 2, Hamborn 11, Oberhausen 32, Duisburg 21, Mülheim (Ruhr) 8, Essen 43, Düsseldorf 59, Elberfeld 19, Barmen 8, in other villages 227. The government district of Cologne had 76 Mennonites, 58 of whom were living in the city of Cologne. Coblenze had 66, Aachen 5, and Trier 33.

Reiswitz lists for 1829 the congregations of Cleve, Emmerich, Rees, Crefeld, and Neuwied; Goch and settlers in the district of Trier who had been transferred from the Palatinate.

In addition to the liberal city congregations, which were of the Dutch Mennonite type, and all of which except Crefeld and Neuwied gradually died out, there were Amish settlements; viz., the rural congregation of Neuwied, which extended over Andernach as far as Münstermaifeld, and which in 1857 (besides the city congregation of 35 members) had 200 baptized members. It also disappeared. Whereas the city congregation of Neuwied adopted the Cornelis Ris (q.v.) Confession of Faith, the Amish held to the Dordrecht (q.v.) Confession. As late as 1818 the Landrat of Braunsfeld expressed serious distrust of the quiet and sober, industrious and competent Amish farmers, because they let their beards grow, wore no buttons, took part neither in (state) church services nor religious instruction, and married only in their own group.

The Prussian government at once sought to reach an understanding with the Mennonites living in its Rhenish possessions. On June 7, 1815, Chancellor Hardenberg, in the midst of the Congress of Vienna, wrote a letter to the Oberpräsident in reply to his report that there were many Mennonites living there. His letter inquired what attitude the Mennonites had taken under French rule and how they were planning to help in the defense of the country. In 1818 the small Amish congregation near Dierdorf (Neuwied area) wrote a letter to the chancellor and received a prompt reassuring reply. The Crefeld congregation was in constant communication with the king and the Oberpräsident. Individuals also, e.g., Hermes and Winkelman of the Crefeld congregation, personally fought the issues of nonresistance and the oath through to the highest instance. Meanwhile the Berlin government was also working on the problem. On July 8, 1817, the Minister of the Interior, and on Feb. 8, 1819, the Council of State, presented to Frederick William III (q.v.) a report based on Menno Simons, the confessions of Dordrecht (q.v.) and of Cornelis Ris (q.v.), the writings of Schijn (q.v.), Zeidler (1698), Rues (q.v., 1643), Crichton (q.v., 1786), Starck (q.v., 1789), and others. Shortly before the question of the oath was settled in 1827 by an order of cabinet, the king requested that all Mennonite heads of families be questioned on their position on nonresistance. The question was not settled for them until May 16, 1830. Most of the Mennonites had accepted military duty, but all those who remained nonresistant, including the Quakers, were to be excused from service, but must pay a 3 per cent income tax; they should be admitted to local offices but not to state offices; they were not permitted to acquire land, and the settlement or reception of new members was prohibited. By 1848 Hermann von Bekerath (q.v.) was in a position to say in the Frankfurt Parliament that the Mennonites in the Rhineland with few exceptions had accepted military service, and that they did not regard the rejection of this service as a necessary part of their doctrine. E.C.

Ernst Crous, "Wie die Mennoniten in die deutsche Volksgemeinschaft hineinwuchsen," in Gesch.-Bl., 1939, 13-24 (reprint, Karlsruhe, 1939); idem, "Mennoniten im alten Reich und Staat," in Die Heimat (Crefeld), 1939, 137-44; idem, "Mennoniten im Regierungsbezirk Trier 1827-1870," in Gem.-Kal., 1941, 62-73; J. Mannhardt, Namens-Verzeichniss . . . (Danzig, 1857); Georg L. von Reiszewitz, Beiträge zur Kenntniss der . . . Mennoniten II (Breslau, 1829); ML III,

2. Rhenish Hesse (German, Rhein Hessen), since 1815 the possession of the Grand Duke of Hesse, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, viz., the northern edge of Rhineland-Palatinate (q.v.) (Alzey district). For the distribution of the Mennonites in the areas of Mainz, Alzey, Bingen, Oppenheim, and Worms in 1871-1925, see Hesse. The Mennonite membership in congregations follows:

	1857	1887	1914	1934	1954	Church built
Uffhofen	45	72	62	53	62	1829
Ibersheim	300	233	160	156	185	1836
Monsheim	180	280	260	230	286	1820
	525	585	482	439	533

The Uffhofen (q.v.) congregation is under the care of the pastor of Weierhof (q.v.); Ibersheim (q.v.), Eppstein (q.v.), and Ludwigshafen-Friesenheim (q.v.) are united, as are Monsheim (q.v.) and Obersülzen (q.v.), disregarding the new political divisions. The change from a lay ministry to a professional ministry began in the Hessian congregations. In 1817-22 a merger was formed between the Lutherans and the Reformed, which the Mennonites were also urged to join. This they refused to do; and believing that they would be in a better position to assert their independence if they had professional ministers, the Kriegsheim (q.v.) congregation, which in 1820 transferred its center to Monsheim, in 1818 called Leonhard Weydmann (q.v., 1793-1868) as the first minister of this kind, who had been educated at the universities of Basel, Amsterdam, and Berlin. The second trained minister was called in 1832 to Sembach in the Rhenish Palatinate, viz., Johannes Risser (q.v., 1810-68), educated at the universities of Heidelberg, Erlangen, and Bonn. The third was the older Jakob Ellenberger (q.v., 1800-79), called to Friedelsheim; he had studied in the Zeller Institute at Beuggen, east of Basel. In 1835 Weierhof in the Rhenish Palatinate followed with a trained minister, and in 1843 Ibersheim in Rhenish Hesse.

Outstanding Mennonite farmers of Rhenish Hesse were Christian and August Dettweiler (q.v.); Peter Dettweiler (q.v.) was a leading physician in combating tuberculosis; Jakob Finger (q.v.) as Minister of State governed the entire province in 1884-98. (For bibliography see Palatinate.) E.C.

3. North Rhine-Westphalia, a state in West Germany, formed in 1947 of the government districts of Aachen, Düsseldorf, and Cologne of the Prussian Rhine Province, of Westphalia, and of Lippe. Its capital is Düsseldorf and its population (1952) 13,147,100 (56 per cent Catholic, 39 per cent Protestant). The state is divided into the government districts Aachen, Düsseldorf, and Cologne; Arnsberg, Detmold, and Münster; in 1949 small border areas were ceded to the Netherlands and Belgium.

The old Mennonite congregations of Crefeld (q.v.) and Gronau (q.v.) were located here, and also the new refugee congregations of Bergisches Land (q.v.) and Espelkamp (q.v.). Of the congregations belonging to the Westphalian group, Bielefeld, Detmold, Münster, and Recklinghausen belong to North Rhine-Westphalia, while Hameln, Rinteln, and Osnabrück are reckoned with Lower Saxony.

	1940	new members	influx
Crefeld	c800	1,605	805
Bergisches Land		275	275
Total	c800	1,880	1,080
Gronau	c70	110	40
Espelkamp		135	135
Westphalia (part of)		400	400
Total	70	645	575
Grand Total	c870	2,525	1,655

These figures show that in 1955 the membership in this area included about 900 members in the original families and an increase of 1600 refugee members, mostly from West Prussia. The Neuwied congregation (q.v.), formerly closely connected with the Crefeld congregation in the Rhine Province, now belongs to the Palatinate.

The churches at Crefeld and Gronau, which had been destroyed in World War II, were rebuilt in 1950. The refugee congregation of Espelkamp acquired its meetinghouse in 1953 in a remodeled munitions storehouse. With the help of the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) and later the Pax (q.v.) boys the refugees were given supplementary food and clothing (of the nine areas in West Germany under the care of the MCC in the period of want following 1945, three lay in North Rhine-Westphalia, viz., Crefeld, Gronau, and Brakel) and later also assistance in building settlements. After World War II the MCC built a refugee camp with a hospital in Gronau, which published a periodical Unser Blatt (q.v.) from Oct. 8, 1947, to June 15, 1950. Settlements were built at Espelkamp (north of Bielefeld) in 1951 and at Bechterdissen (south of Bielefeld) in 1955. In general, the refugee congregations have rarely been able to retain the West Prussian organization of elder, preacher, and deacon; in most cases a pastor now serves under a church board of several members. The general organization of North German Mennonite congregations formed in 1951 and known as the "Gemeinden-ausschuss" was joined at once by the congregations in Bergisches Land and "Westphalia," i.e., Crefeld and Gronau. In 1948 the second Mennonite student conference (Studententagung) met in Crefeld. In Gronau the Vereinigung (q.v.) and the German Mennonite Historical Association (see Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein) met in 1948; the Historical Association decided to establish the Research Center (Forschungstelle) at Göttingen, the home of the director Ernst Crous. In 1954 the Vereinigung met at Crefeld. Youth organizations were formed at Cologne and Espelkamp. In May 1955 a ministers' retreat (Predigerrüstzeit) was held at Espelkamp. The Crefeld Mennonite minister took a leading part in a petition for offerings on Dec. 11, 1946, on behalf of relief. This appeal was to be presented to the Christians of all creeds throughout the world, and a sacrificial offering for the needy of Crefeld was to be made in all the churches of the city. In Heerewegen (q.v.), near Utrecht, representatives of the Dutch and Northwest German congregations met on May 7, 1954, to try to renew old bonds of co-operation and find new ways of working together.

Gustav Kraemer (1863-1948) served as pastor of the Crefeld congregation for many years; he was followed by Dirk Cattepoel 1937-51, and Daniel Reuter 1951-. Hendrick van Delden (1872-1950), an elder of the Gronau congregation, and Reinhard Rahusen (1883-1951), a minister of the same congregation, were of great importance for the entire Mennonite brotherhood. The large textile firm M. van Delden & Co. celebrated its centennial in 1954.

E.C.
Gem.-Kal., 1941 and 1951; printed matter on the appeal for relief funds (Bitt- und Opfergang) in the Göttingen Research Center; ML III, 491 f.

4. Rhineland-Palatinate, a state of West Germany, which was formed on Aug. 30, 1946, by order of the French military government, of the government districts of Coblenz and Trier of the Prussian Rhine Province, of parts of Nassau, of Rhenish Hesse, of the Bavarian Rhenish Palatinate (hence essentially the core of Kurtrier, Kurmainz, and Kurpfalz). Its capital is Mayence, and its population (1952) 2,993,700 (59 per cent Catholic, 39 per cent Protestant); it is divided into the government districts of Coblenz, Trier, Montabaur, Rhenish Hesse, and Palatinate.

Statistics for the old Mennonite congregations in this area follow.

Congregation	1940	1955	Increase	Decrease
Branchweilerhof	46	65	19
Deutschhof	198	122		76
Friedelsheim	140	180	40
Kohlhof	45	70	25
Ibersheim	162	185	23
Eppstein	121	120		1
Ludwigshafen	127	90		37
Kaiserslautern	60	91	31
Kühbörncheshof	122	209	87
Zweibrücken	304	245		59
Saar		70	70
Monsheim	200	310	110
Obersülzen	100	121	21
Sembach	350	400	50
Neudorferhof	110	138	28
Altlingen	44	40		4
Weierhof	370	560	190
Uffhofen	44	58	14
Neuwied	25	500	475
	2,568	3,574	1,006	net

There are in this area about 2,600 members of local old Mennonite families and 1,000 recent additions, mostly refugees from West Prussia. The increase occurred principally in the congregations of Neuwied (formerly closely associated with Crefeld in the Rhine Province), Weierhof, and Monsheim. The loss in the Deutschhof congregation is due to the fact that the Alsatian part, Geisberg, became independent; the loss in the Zweibrücken congregation is due to the fact that the members living in the Saar area had to form an independent organization.

Almost half of the German Mennonites are now living in the two Rhenish states, as a regional survey clearly shows:

Area	1940	1955	Increase
Rhineland-Palatinate	2,568	3,574	1,006
North Rhine-Westphalia	870	2,525	1,655
Lower Saxony	434	1,793	1,359
Baden and Württemberg	922	1,177	255
Berlin	406	1,122	716
Hamburg	338	935	597
Schleswig-Holstein	25	855	830
Bavaria	651	736	85
Bremen		500	500
Frankfurt and South Hesse		170	170
	6,214	13,387	7,173

The churches in Deutschhof and Ludwigshafen, which were destroyed in World War II, were restored in 1949-50. In the area of Rhineland-Palatinate two homes for the aged were built, especially for the refugees from West Prussia, viz., Leutesdorf, near Neuwied, and Enkenbach, near Sembach, in 1949-50. In 1955 the refugee settlements in Niederbieber (q.v.), Torney, near Neuwied (q.v.), built a church besides the one in Neuwied, which belonged to the small original congregation. Since the school at Weierhof (see Realanstalt am Donnersberg) was not released by the occupation authorities, an organization was formed which opened a dormitory (Schülerheim) in Kirchheimbolanden for Mennonite (and other) students attending the secondary school in that town. Refugees were not admitted into the French zone until 1948. In that year they began to come into the Palatinate and were assisted by American relief. The settlement in Neuwied (Niederbieber/Torney) was begun in 1949, the one in Enkenbach in 1943. An organization to help refugees get settled (Genossenschaftliches Flüchtlingswerk), founded at Weierhof (q.v.) in 1949 by Otto Zenger and Johannes Driedger, included local Mennonites and refugees who wished to settle, for the purpose of support in assuming rented farms. Thus, on the Offweilerhof near Zweibrücken three farms, called "Werderhof," were established, and by 1954 thirty Mennonite refugee families had been helped to find homes and a chance to earn a living. The association called Mennonite Settlement Aid (Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe) serves a wider clientele; it originated in Ludwigshafen (q.v.) on July 24, 1953, under the direction of Fritz Stauffer. The HVDM (the relief organization of the Vereinigung, q.v.), the corporation Mennonite Homes for the Aged (Mennonitische Altersheime), and the voluntary service organization MFD (Mennonitischer Freiwilligendienst, q.v.) maintain a common office with Mennonite Settlement Aid in Ludwigshafen, headed by Richard Hertzler. The chairman of the German Mennonite Missions Committee is Abraham Braun, former pastor of the Ibersheim congregation.

Various conferences and committees have resumed their activities. The Conference of the Palatine and Hessian Mennonite Churches (q.v.) meets annually either in Neustadt a.d.W. or Ludwigshafen. Since 1953 the congregational ministers and leaders of the Palatinate and Hesse have been meeting annually for a study conference. In 1950 the fourth edition of the hymnal (see Hymnology) was published.

There have been conferences for youth, and at Monsheim (q.v.) one for the aged. The Gemeindekalender has been edited by Paul Schowalter, pastor of Weierhof, and the Mennonit by Gerhard Hein, pastor of Sembach. Several ministers have retired: Johannes Foth in 1953, at the age of 75; Emil Händiges in 1951, at the age of 70; he was succeeded by Alexander Prieur in 1954; Hugo Scheffler who emigrated to Canada in 1951 was replaced by Theo Hotel. Abraham Braun has been succeeded by Daniel Habegger, who served as his assistant 1952-57. In Neuwied Otto Wiebe, formerly a preacher of Heubuden (q.v.), became the elder. E.C.

